The Supreme Court will not weigh the evidence upon which the judgment rests.

3. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Question for jury.

Negligence is a question of law for the court instead of a question of fact for the jury only when the facts are not in any event or in any view of the case susceptible to the inference of negligence sought to be deduced therefrom.

4. Warehousemen 🔑24(1)—Required to exercise same degree of care as a reasonably careful owner would exercise.

Under Warehouse Receipts Act, § 21, a warehouseman was required to exercise such care in the safeguarding of property stored in warehouse as a reasonably careful owner of similar property would exercise.

5. Warehousemen 🔑34(9)—Whether warehouseman failed to provide sufficient fire fighting appliances held for jury.

In action against warehouseman for destruction of goods by fire, question of whether the fire fighting appliances provided by the warehouseman for the protection and preservation of the warehouse and its contents were ordinarily adequate and reasonably sufficient as a protection against loss and damage by fire under the circumstances held for the jury.

6. Warehousemen 🔑24(6)—Owner's knowledge as to conduct of business did not affect liability for loss by fire.

Warehouseman's liability for destruction of goods in fire was not lessened and owner was not estopped from asserting such liability merely because owner may have had knowledge as to the manner in which the warehouseman conducted its business at the time owner stored his goods in warehouse.

7. Warehousemen 🔑24(3)—Liable for negligence of employee.

Warehouseman is liable for destruction of goods in fire caused by his employee's negligence.

8. Warehousemen 🔑34(10)—Instruction that ordinarily prudent employer would not retain "habitual drunkards" in its employ held warranted by evidence.

In action against warehouseman for loss of goods in warehouse fire claimed to have been caused by an intoxicated employee of the warehouseman, evidence that employee frequently got drunk held to warrant instruction that an ordinarily prudent employer would not retain in its employ a man who was known or should have been known to be a habitual drunkard, a "habitual drunkard" being one addicted to the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess and who is commonly or frequently intoxicated and becomes so as often as opportunity permits, it being unnecessary that he be intoxicated so often as to incapacitate him from attending to his business for a considerable portion of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Habitual Drunkard.]

9. Trial 🔑219—Failure to define "habitual drunkard" used in instruction not error.

In action against warehouseman for destruction of goods in fire claimed to have been caused by intoxicated employee, instruction, that an ordinarily prudent employer would not retain in its employ a man who was known or who should have been known to be a habitual drunkard without a definition of the words "habitual drunkard," held not erroneous; such words needing no explanation as used in the instruction.

10. Warehousemen 🔑34(9)—Whether employee in charge of warehouse was habitual drunkard held for jury.

In action for loss of goods in warehouse fire, question of whether defendant's employee in charge of warehouse, and who was intoxicated at time of fire, was an habitual drunkard, held for the jury.

11. Warehousemen 🔑24(2)—Warehouseman who knowingly employs habitual drunkard liable for damage resulting from employees' drunken negligence.

Where an employer hires a habitual drunkard as a warehouseman knowing him to be a habitual drunkard, and where an ordinarily prudent person would not have hired such employee as a warehouseman, employer is liable for damage proximately caused by the employee's drunken negligence.

12. Warehousemen ⚷34(5, 9)—Plaintiff suing for loss of goods in warehouse fire not required to prove what constitutes ordinary care.

In action against warehouseman for loss of plaintiff's property in destruction of warehouse by fire, plaintiff is required to prove defendant's negligence, but in so doing is not required to show affirmatively what would constitute ordinary care on the part of the warehouseman in the operation and management of its warehouse, such question being a matter of defense, and, in the absence of a showing in relation thereto, it is within the province of the jury to determine from all the evidence whether the warehouseman conducted its business with the care and caution which would be required of a reasonably prudent person conducting such business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Frank J. Runkle against the Southern Pacific Milling Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for appellant.

Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment entered upon the verdict of the jury in the sum of $5,652.17 as damages for the destruction by fire, resulting from the defendant's negligence, of a lot of beans which were stored in the warehouse of the defendant at Santa Susanna in Ventura county. Substantially stated, the pleaded facts of the plaintiff's case, in so far as material to the points presented on appeal, are these: The corporation defendant was doing a general storage business on and prior to the 25th day of December, 1918, and on that day the plaintiff had stored in the defendant's warehouse certain quantities of beans reasonably worth the sum of $5,675.67. On the date last mentioned and prior thereto, the defendant failed generally to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence for the protection and preservation against destruction by fire of the plaintiff's beans, which had been deposited and stored in the warehouse of the defendant, and was particularly negligent in failing to provide a watchman or caretaker of its said warehouse other than one Roy Thomas, "who was at all times careless, negligent, reckless, and unfit to have charge of said public warehouse" and its contents, and on the said 25th day of December, 1918, said Thomas, then and there, being the servant of said defendant, entered the warehouse of the defendant in an intoxicated condition and negligently set fire thereto, causing the warehouse and its contents, including the plaintiff's beans, to be destroyed.

[1-6] The jury's finding of negligence, implied from the verdict, is sufficiently supported by evidence. It is idle to discuss upon appeal to this court the weight of the evidence upon which the judgment rests, and, of course, it is only when the facts of a given case are not in any event or in any view of the case susceptible to the inference of negligence sought to be deduced therefrom that the question of negligence becomes one of law for the sole consideration of the court rather than one of fact for the determination of the jury. It is conceded, as indeed it must be, that by reason of the relationship of the parties arising out of the contract of bailment for hire and the provisions of section 21 of the Warehouse Receipts Act (Stats. 1909, p. 437), that the duty devolved upon the defendant to exercise such care in the safeguarding of the plaintiff's property as a reasonably careful owner of similar goods would exercise, and, failing in this, the defendant must be held in damages for the resulting loss. The evidence in the instant case shows, in response to the issue of negligence, substantially as follows: The defendant's warehouse was a wooden structure, 200 feet long and 74 feet wide, in which, in addition to general merchandise, gasoline, and other inflammable and explosive substances were stored. Two barrels of water, without buckets at hand, were located at either end of the building, and these, with two small pyrene fire extinguishers and a three-quarter inch low-pressure water pipe leading from a neighbor's well and terminating with a faucet in a sink inside the warehouse, constituted the fire-fighting appliances provided by the defendant for the protection and preservation of the warehouse and its contents. Whether these fire-fighting appliances were ordinarily adequate and reasonably sufficient as a protection against loss and damage by fire under all of the circumstances, and considering particularly the situation of the warehouse, was clearly a question of fact for the jury to determine. The liability of the defendant as a bailee for hire was not lessened, and the plaintiff was not estopped from asserting such liability merely because the plaintiff may have had knowledge as to the manner in which the defendant conducted its business at the time plaintiff stored his beans with the defendant. Stevens v. Stewart-Warner Corporation, 223 Mass. 44, 111 N. E. 771.

Upon the question of the particular negligence of the defendant in employing an unfit man to have charge of its warehouse, the record shows some evidence to the effect that the defendant, prior to and at the time of the fire, employed as a warehouseman one Roy Thomas, a person who was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquor and who got drunk to the knowledge of the agents of the defendant. Upon the latter phase of the case there was evidence to the effect that the agents of the defendant knew the failing of this man when they employed him. There is further evidence to show not only that this man was especially employed as the warehouseman but had in fact acted in his capacity of warehouseman, and that he was at times in complete charge of the warehouse and at all times had the key to the warehouse, although there was another person over him who was known as the "agent for the warehouse" who was agent at Santa Susanna and Moorpark and who was generally in charge of those warehouses, but he resided at Moorpark, some ten miles from Santa Susanna and only occasionally visited the warehouse there. Another employee, a Mrs. Haigh, the bookkeeper, lived on a ranch about 1¼ miles from the warehouse. Thomas was the only person residing usually in Santa Susanna who was in authority in the warehouse, and when the warehouse was open for business Thomas "seemed to be boss there. He wasn't doing anything but standing around and giving orders."

[7] It is an undisputed fact in the case that Thomas was intoxicated to the point of irresponsibility on the night of the fire, and that, prior to the discovery of the fire, he was seen, still intoxicated, going towards the warehouse, and while it was not shown by any direct evidence that he was in the warehouse until after the fire started, nevertheless, within the evidence adduced upon the whole case, there are to be found circumstances which unerringly point to the conclusion and justified the jury in finding that he was not only in the office of the warehouse where the fire originated and at the time it originated, but that he, while in a drunken stupor, was the cause of the fire. That Thomas was acting within the scope of his employment on the day and the evening of the fire, notwithstanding the fact that the warehouse was not open for business at that time, is fairly inferable from the evidence as a whole and in particular from that evidence which tended to show that Thomas was employed as "a warehouseman * * * to take charge of the warehouse" and was given a key thereto which he had at all times in his possession. Under these circumstances, we are not prepared to say that the jury was not justified in finding that when Thomas entered the warehouse on the evening of the fire he was acting within the scope of his employment. Thomas was the only agent of the corporation at Santa Susanna who had control of its property at the time of the fire or who could be said to be in charge of the warehouse, and it may well have been found that the duties of Thomas as warehouseman in charge of the warehouse extended beyond the hours ordinarily occupied for the public use of the warehouse, and it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that at the time of the fire Thomas was engaged in executing any particular business or specific command of his principal. If Thomas at the time of the commission of the act which resulted in the fire was in the warehouse within the general scope of his employment and the injury and damage resulted from his negligence, that is all that need be shown in order to charge the defendant with liability for the damage. Mulvehill v. Bates, 31 Minn. 364, 17 N. W. 959, 47 Am. Rep. 796; Rahn v. Manf. Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 912; Riordan v. Gas Consumers' Ass'n, 4 Cal. App. 639, 88 Pac. 809; Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 18 Cal. App. 349, 123 Pac. 219. But, however that may be, the jury may well have found that the defendant was guilty of actionable negligence in the selection and employment of a man whose duties called for the constant possession of a key to the warehouse, with the consequent right of access thereto at all times, and who to the knowledge of defendant's agents drank intoxicating liquors to excess and who was in the habit of getting drunk. Cussen v. So. Cal. Sav. Bank, 133 Cal. 534, 65 Pac. 1099, 85 Am. St. Rep. 221. In short, the real question involved in the instant case is not so much one of the scope of Thomas' employment but rather a question of the negligence of the defendant in the selection of an employee whom it knew was not competent, by reason of his known drinking habits, to be placed in the care and charge of the defendant's warehouse and the property of the plaintiff therein.

[8-12] No fault can be fairly found with the instruction of the trial court to the effect that an ordinarily prudent employer would not retain in its employ a man who was known, or who should have been known, to be an habitual drunkard. While there is no evidence showing that Thomas was an habitual drunkard in the sense that he got drunk so often and to such an extent as to incapacitate him from attending to his business for a considerable portion of the time, nevertheless the evidence as a whole shows that Thomas frequently got drunk while employed at Santa Susanna, was drunk when he came there on or about November 20, was drunk on the occasion of the fire, and was observed to be drunk by the townspeople and under the influence of liquor oftentimes when on duty in and at the warehouse. The habitual drunkenness referred to in the instruction was not used in a technical or limited sense but in its general sense as distinguished from that habitual intemperance, for instance, which might be made the ground of an action in divorce. An "habitual drunkard" in the general sense and as commonly understood is one who is addicted to the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess and who is commonly or frequently intoxicated and becomes so as often as an opportunity permits. State v. Pratt, 34 Vt. 323. As used in the instruction complained of, the phrase "habitual drunkard" needed no explanation. The jury, presumably, was competent to understand what is meant by language in common use. And whether the habits and conduct of the man Thomas, as shown by the evidence, were insufficient to stamp him as an habitual drunkard was a question properly submitted to the jury under the allegations of the complaint to the effect that Thomas was incompetent and unfit to have charge of the defendant's warehouse and to care for the plaintiff's property deposited therein. 3 Labatt's Master and Servant, § 1087 (185), p. 2875; Probst v. Delamater, 100 N. Y. 266, 271, 3 N. E. 184. Fairly construed, the instruction in question did not purport to tell the jury that they might come to a conclusion based upon their own individual opinion, without regard to the evidence, as to what a prudent warehouseman would or would not have done under the circumstances. The most that the instruction can be said to have done was to tell the jury that if the evidence in the case warranted a finding that an ordinarily prudent person would not employ a known habitual drunkard as a warehouseman, and that if it were further found that the defendant knowingly and imprudently did that very thing, the defendant was guilty of negligence and must respond in damages for the injury and loss proximately resulting to plaintiff as the result of the warehouseman's drunken negligence. So construed, the instruction clearly stated the law. 3 Labatt, Master and Servant, § 1087, p. 2875; Huntingdon, etc., Co. v. Decker, 84 Pa. 419-424. While it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to sustain the burden of showing defendant's negligence, it was not necessary to the plaintiff's case to show affirmatively what would constitute ordinary care on the part of the defendant in the operation and management of its warehouse. That was a matter of defense, and in the absence of a showing in that behalf by the defendant it was within the province of the jury to determine from all of the evidence whether the defendant was negligent in the management of its business or conducted it with the care and caution which would, considering the character of the business, ordinarily be required of a reasonably prudent person.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Consolidated actions by C. J. Proud, by the Patterson Ranch Company, and by the Ætna Insurance Company, against the Southern Pacific Milling Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for appellant.

Robert M. Clarke and Henry L. Knoop, both of Los Angeles, I. W. Stewart, of Oxnard, A. D. Shaw, of Hollister, and W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Although they are three separate and independent suits, the three above-mentioned cases are identical in their facts with the facts of the case of Runkle v. Southern Pacific Milling Co., 195 Pac. 398, this day decided. The points urged for a reversal in these cases by appellant, Southern Pacific Milling Company, are the same as those which were presented in said case of Runkle v. Southern Pacific Milling Company, and therefore what we have said in the latter case sufficiently disposes of the points made.

Upon the authority of that case the judgments in these three cases are affirmed.

Los Angeles City Charter, as amended in 1913, authorizing city to license and regulate, "under general and uniform laws," any lawful business or calling, held not to render the charter subordinate to state-wide laws on such subject, the quoted words referring not to state-wide laws, but to laws or ordinances by the legislative body of the city; the words "general" and "uniform" as applied to laws having a meaning antithetical to special or discriminatory laws.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑592(1)—Occupational tax imposed on grocers for revenue held authorized by charter.

Los Angeles City Ordinance No. 39600 (New Series), imposing an occupational license tax upon grocers, held valid as against objection that it was contrary to the general laws of the state, prohibiting the imposition of license taxes for revenue purposes, since the charter of the city, in view of article 1, § 2, subd. 51, as amended in 1917, is a limitation on and not a grant of power, and does not prohibit the imposition of such a tax, but under article 1, § 2, subd. 21, empowering city to license and regulate any lawful business or calling, expressly authorizes the imposition of such taxes for purposes of raising revenue.

7. Constitutional law 🔑83(3)—Imprisonment for nonpayment of license tax held not unconstitutional.

In Bank.

Application by Frank Nowak for writ of habeas corpus against George K. Home, Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ discharged.

Henry N. James, J. P. Chandler, Paul H. McPherrin, and Rex Hardy, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, J. D. Taggart, Deputy City Prosecutor, Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., Wm. P. Mealey, Asst. City Atty., and Julius V. Patrosso, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Petitioner was arrested for the commission of an alleged misdemeanor, namely, the violation of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, No. 39,600 (New Series). This ordinance is a rather complex piece of municipal legislation, the numerous sections or subdivisions of which attempt an elaborate classification of various businesses or callings as a basis for the imposition of an occupation tax, differing in amount in the case of different businesses. The precise offense charged against petitioner consisted in conducting, managing, and carrying on the business of a retail grocer in the city of Los Angeles without paying the tax upon said business prescribed by the ordinance. Retail grocers are not specifically mentioned in any provisions of the ordinance, and they are therefore governed by the provisions of section 153 of the ordinance. This section contains an omnibus provision, imposing upon "every person, firm or corporation, conducting, managing or carrying on any business, whether as a merchant, manufacturer or otherwise, not otherwise specifically licensed by other sections of this ordinance, the gross annual receipts of which business amount to less than six thousand dollars ($6,000.00)" a tax of $1.50 per quarter of a year, and thereafter sets forth a graduated scale, indicating the amount of license tax to be paid upon businesses whose gross annual receipts amount to sums falling within the classes therein specified. Petitioner's gross receipts during 1919 were $30,000. He failed to pay the license tax provided by the ordinance for the quarter commencing July 1, 1920, and terminating September 30, 1920, and has been arrested pursuant to a provision of the ordinance making the conduct of a business without paying the required license tax a misdemeanor. Petitioner claims that the ordinance in question, or at least so much of it as is applied against him, is null and void.

[1] It is contended, first, that inasmuch as the sole purpose of the ordinance is to raise revenue, its enactment is not authorized by the charter of the city of Los Angeles. In their argument the parties overlooked a certain provision of the charter of which mention should be made. By 1914 amendment to section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution of California a new scheme for city charters was adopted, in that it was provided that—

> "Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters * * * so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

In 1917 the city of Los Angeles adopted an amendment to the city charter, subdivision 51 of section 2 of article 1, by which the city is authorized to exercise all powers in municipal affairs, subject only to the limitations of the charter, which was strictly in accordance with the language and the purpose of the constitutional amendment. The question of the effect of a similar amendment to the charter in 1913, prior to the constitutional amendment above mentioned, need not be considered in this case. The net result of this situation is that, as to municipal affairs, the charter, instead of being a grant of power, is, in effect, a limitation of powers, and, the imposition of the tax for revenue purposes being strictly a municipal affair, the city has the power to impose that tax unless the power was taken from it by the charter itself. Civic Center Ass'n v. R. R. Comn., 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351; Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 Pac. 436; Hayes v. Handley, 187 Pac. 952.

[2, 3] Section 2 of article 1 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, relating to the enforcement of the ordinances of that city, reads as follows:

> "The city of Los Angeles, in addition to any other powers now held by and that may hereafter be granted to it under the Constitution, or laws of the state, shall have the right and power: * * * (21) To license and regulate under general and uniform laws, any lawful business or calling; to fix the amount of license tax thereon, and to prescribe the manner of enforcing the same."

Petitioner insists that the use of the term "license and regulate," in defining the power of the city over lawful businesses and occupations, restricts the municipality to the imposition of license taxes for purposes of regulation only, and we are indebted to counsel for a learned and comprehensive analysis of authorities from other jurisdictions in support of this proposition. However persuasive we might find the reasoning of the cases and texts thus called to our attention had the language in question never received interpretation in this state, we are now bound by previous decisions wherein a grant by the Legislature of authority to "license and regulate" has been held to include authority to impose a license tax for revenue only. Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642; San Jose v. San Jose R. R. Co., 53 Cal. 475; Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 Pac. 780. Assuming, apparently, that these decisions have no effect other than as mere precedents, petitioner argues that they were based upon erroneous reasoning, and should now be overruled. We are unable to follow petitioner in this argument. The question is not whether or not, as a matter of logic and policy, the words "license and regulate" appearing in a grant of power to a municipality should, as an original proposition, be held to include authority to impose a license tax for revenue purposes only. The question is what, as a matter of fact, was the intent of the people and of the Legislature when, in amending the city charter in 1913, a time subsequent to the decisions above cited, they again incorporated in the charter the words "license and regulate" in defining the power of the city over lawful businesses and occupations. Whether correct or incorrect as to reasoning, the decisions of this court had given to the words "license and regulate," as used in this connection, a precise and technical meaning. When, therefore, at a subsequent time, the people and the Legislature undertook to use these exact words in this particular connection, the presumption is almost irresistible that they used them in the precise and technical sense which had been placed upon them by this court. Harris v. Reynolds, 13 Cal. 514, 73 Am. Dec. 600; Dalton v. Lelande, 22 Cal. App. 481, 135 Pac. 54; Robert v. Superior Court, 38 Cal. App. 199, 175 Pac. 800.

[4] The question being one of intent, this presumption is, of course, not irrebuttable, and it is possible to conceive of circumstances which would suffice to indicate that the words "license and regulate" were used in a sense other than that which has been accorded to them by this court. No such circumstances or combination of circumstances has been called to our attention by petitioner. It is, indeed, contended that the fact that the Legislature amended the general laws in 1901 so as to forbid municipalities not operating under freeholders' charters to impose license taxes for the purpose of revenue only indicates a change of policy which should be reflected in a change in the construction of the expression to "license and regulate." This argument obviously has no weight when applied to the interpretation of freeholders' charters, and, moreover, this court has reenunciated its former interpretation of the words in question in Ex parte Braun, supra, a case decided subsequent to the amendment of the general laws.

Petitioner makes several additional arguments based upon the provisions of the charter. In this behalf, our attention is directed to the fact that no limit is placed upon the amount of the license tax authorized. In the light of the legislative policy to jealously safeguard all exercise of the taxing power, a policy exemplified in the charter itself by a limitation upon the amount of the tax which may be levied and collected upon real and personal property, it is argued that this failure to place a limit upon the license tax authorized by the charter indicates that it was intended to restrict the power to impose the said license tax so as to prevent its use for revenue purposes. The very fact, however, that an inflexible limit is placed upon the amount of revenue which may be raised by real and personal property taxes lends force to respondent's suggestion that some other source of revenue must have been contemplated by the people. Moreover, the charter provides that the law imposing the license tax shall be general and uniform in its operation, and that no discrimination in the amount of the tax shall be made between persons engaged in the same business otherwise than in proportioning the tax to the amount of business done. In view of this safeguard, we cannot say that there is such danger of uncontrolled legislation upon the subject as to reasonably require a construction limiting the effect of this portion of the charter as contended by petitioner.

Petitioner next relies upon certain principles of statutory construction, namely, that the express inclusion of one thing is tantamount to the exclusion of another, and that the meaning of a word may be ascertained by reference to the meaning of words associated with it. It is insisted that the application of these maxims requires that subdivision 21 of section 2 of article 1 of the charter be interpreted as a restriction to the power to regulate, for the reason that the latter portion of the subdivision refers expressly to the regulation and suppression of certain occupations which are in themselves noisome or unhealthful. We do not think that these maxims are to be so applied. Indeed, the very fact that the opening provisions of the subdivision refer to all lawful businesses and callings and use words well recognized as expressing an authorization to tax for revenue purposes, while the closing provisions refer to businesses noisome or unhealthful in themselves and contain words apt to authorize control and prohibition, indicates clearly that the subdivision deals with two separate and distinct matters, namely, the taxation of all lawful businesses and the police control of all noisome or unhealthful businesses. Neither provision can be construed to exclude or absorb the other.

[5] Upon this phase of the case petitioner finally contends that by the charter amendment of 1913 the power of the city to impose license taxes was subjected to the general laws of the state, which, as we have already indicated, prohibit the imposition of license taxes for revenue purposes. As it stood prior to 1913, the charter authorized the city "to license and regulate the carrying on of any and all professions, trades, callings, and occupations. * * *" As amended in 1913, the charter authorizes the city "to license and regulate, under general and uniform laws, any lawful business or calling. * * *" (Italics ours.) Petitioner's contention in this behalf is that the words "general and uniform laws" as used in the charter amendment should be construed to read "general laws of the state of California." We cannot so construe them without doing plain and obvious violence to the charter. The only basis for petitioner's contention that there was an intent to render the charter subordinate to state-wide laws on the subject is the use of the adjective "general," which is often used to describe state-wide laws. The significance of this fact is very slight, indeed, when we consider that the obvious purpose of the charter was to safeguard the exercise of the taxing power by forbidding discriminatory laws, and that in this connection the words "general" and "uniform," as applied to laws, have a well-defined and generally accepted meaning as antithetical to "special" or discriminatory laws. That the word "general" was used in this sense is further indicated by the use of the correlated adjective "uniform." The words "general and uniform laws" as used in the charter as amended would certainly be interpreted by the average person as referring, not to statewide laws, but to the enactment of laws or ordinances by the legislative body of the city. We can see no good reason for adopting a different or more technical interpretation.

[6] Our conclusion is that, not only does the charter not prohibit, but it expressly authorizes the imposition of a tax upon petitioner's business for the purpose of raising revenue.

[7] Ordinance No. 39,600 (New Series) provides that this tax may be recovered in a civil action as a debt. It also provides that the act of doing business without the payment of the tax shall be a crime, and shall be punishable as such. For the commission of this crime petitioner has been imprisoned. This imprisonment does not violate his constitutional right not to be arrested for debt. Imprisonment for debt, as such imprisonment is defined in our constitutional guaranties, is necessarily imprisonment in a civil action for debt. As such imprisonment existed in the English common law, it was a provisional remedy strictly analogous to the present-day remedy of attachment of goods. It is against such attachments that the constitutional guaranties against imprisonment for debt are directed.. They have no application whatever to imprisonment for crime, and legislative bodies are free to provide for punishment by imprisonment of offenders who commit acts denominated by the said legislative bodies as offenses against the public, provided, of course, that other constitutional limitations are not violated Rosenbloom v. State, 64 Neb. 342, 89 N. W. 1053, 57 L. R. A. 922.

We proceed next to a consideration of petitioner's contention that the ordinance is unlawfully discriminatory in its operation and effect, and is in other respects unreasonable.

[8] We need only mention, in passing, the contention that the ordinance is uncertain in that section 153 imposes a license tax upon all persons conducting, managing, or carrying on any business, whether as a "merchant, manufacturer or otherwise," without defining more specifically the business included. Petitioner has answered this objection himself. He concedes in his reply brief that, had the section referred to merchants and manufacturers only, it would have been sufficiently certain, while he demonstrates in his opening brief that such, in fact, is the precise interpretation which is to be placed upon the section.

[9] It is also objected that the ordinance operates unequally by reason of the fact that it adopts a method of gradation based upon gross receipts such that the business whose gross receipts are just within the maximum amount for a given class enjoys an exemption practically equal to the difference between the maximum and minimum amounts, while no such exemption is enjoyed by the business whose gross receipts are just above the minimum amount for the given class. This objection is but the expression of the effect of classification by amount, and has been frequently made before and been considered by the courts. Their judgment has been uniformly adverse to the contention of petitioner herein. Sacramento v. Crocker, 16 Cal. 120; Clark v. Titusville, 184 U. S. 329, 22 Sup. Ct. 382, 46 L. Ed. 569; Magoun v. Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283; State v. Ins. Co., 40 La. Ann. 463, 4 South. 504. We do not think it necessary to review the cases or enter into the reasoning upon which they were based further than to say that, while it is conceivable that a legislative body might undertake to classify by amount in a manner so arbitrary and unreasonable as to be confiscatory, no such case has, so far as we are aware, been presented to the courts. Certainly such a case is not presented herein.

[10] The remaining objections to the ordinance, based upon alleged discriminations therein, will not be considered, for the reason that these claimed discriminations do not work any injustice upon petitioner or violate his rights. Admittedly, all persons engaged in the same business as that of petitioner, namely, that of retail grocer, are governed by the general provisions of section 153 of the ordinance, and the only distinction made by that section between such persons is to be found in the fact that the tax is proportioned to the amount of the business done. Petitioner is therefore confronted with the general rule that a person not within the class, whose constitutional rights are invaded by an alleged discrimination, cannot complain. Hatch v. Reardon, 204 U. S. 152, 160, 27 Sup. Ct. 188, 51 L. Ed. 415, 9 Ann. Cas. 736; Jeffery Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 35 Sup. Ct. 167, 59 L. Ed. 364; Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 222, 233, 118 Pac. 714; Brown v. Los Angeles, 192 Pac. 716. Inasmuch as it has not been pointed out that there is, in the present case, any circumstance giving rise to a reason why this general rule should not be applied (see Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 38 Sup. Ct. 16, 62 L. Ed. 149, L. R. A. 1918C, 210, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 1201, and Quong Ham Wah. v. Ind. Acc. Com. 192 Pac. 1021), petitioner's objection in this behalf must be held not maintainable.

Petitioner has, consequently, no ground for complaint on account of his imprisonment because of his violation of the ordinance in question, and the writ is accordingly discharged.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1921.)

1. Attorney and client 🔑14—Attorneys not officers of the state.

Attorneys, though in one sense officers of the court, are in no sense officers of the state, and do not hold a public trust.

2. Licenses 🔑6(3)—State may delegate to city power to impose occupational tax on lawyers.

A state may impose an occupational tax upon persons engaged in the practice of law, and may delegate such power to a municipality; the imposition of such a tax not being an interference with state affairs or with state regulations.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑58—Charter held a limitation upon and not a grant of powers.

Los Angeles City Charter, in view of article 1, § 2, subd. 51, Const. art. 11, § 6, is a limitation upon power, rather than a grant of powers, so far as municipal affairs are concerned.

4. Licenses 🔑6(1)—City held authorized to impose occupational tax for revenue only; "license and regulate."

Los Angeles City Charter, empowering city to "license and regulate" any lawful business or calling, held to authorize city to impose an occupational tax for revenue purposes only.

5. Licenses 🔑6(3) — Charter authorizing city to tax any "business" or "calling" held to authorize tax against lawyers.

Los Angeles City Charter, empowering city to license and regulate "any lawful business or calling," held to authorize city to tax persons practicing law, since the words "business" and "calling" include persons following the professions, as well as those engaged at work of a more purely commercial nature.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Elon G. Galusha against George K. Home, Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ discharged.

Eugene D. Williams, Benjamin E. Page, Arthur C. Hurt, Hugh M. Bode, and J. R. Scott, all of Los Angeles (Eugene Overton, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and Wm. P. Mealey, Asst. City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Petitioner was arrested and held in custody under the charge of carrying on the profession of attorney at law in the city of Los Angeles without paying the license tax imposed upon persons engaged in that profession by section 152 of the ordinance of the said city of Los Angeles, designated as No. 39,600 (New Series). In the present proceeding petitioner questions the validity of the tax thus imposed. The only feature of the ordinance attacked is its application to the profession of attorney at law, and the single question presented to this court for determination in this case is whether or not the city of Los Angeles can legally impose a license tax upon the business or profession of attorney at law in so far as that business or profession may be carried on within the said city.

The salient argument advanced in support of the negative of this proposition is that, owing to their peculiar position as officers assisting the courts of the state in the administration of justice, and owing to the supervision which the state is already exercising over these officers, the control of the conditions upon which the profession of attorney at law may be carried on is solely a state affair, which cannot be delegated to a municipality. This argument is based upon a misconception of the status of the attorney at law and of the theory upon which the occupational tax is imposed.

[1] While attorneys are, in one sense, officers of the court, they are in no sense officers of the state, nor do they hold a "public" trust. Ex parte Yale, 24 Cal. 241, 85 Am. Dec. 62. The adequate protection of public interests, as well as inherent and inseparable peculiarities pertaining to the practice of law, require a more detailed supervision by the state over the conduct of this profession than in the case of almost any other profession or business. This circumstance, however, does not alter the fact that attorneys are not public officers, but are engaged in a private profession pursued primarily for pecuniary profit. "The manner, terms, and conditions of their admission to practice, and of their continuing in practice, as well as their powers, duties and privileges, are proper subjects of legislative control to the same extent and subject to the same limitations as in the case of any other profession or business that is created or regulated by statute." Ex parte Yale, supra. The weight of authority in this country is to the effect that there is nothing which particularly exempts the attorney from bearing a just share of necessary public burdens, and that consequently an attorney can claim no peculiar exemption from an occupational tax imposed directly by the state for revenue purposes. Cousins v. State, 50 Ala. 113, 20 Am. Rep. 290; State v. King, 21 La. Ann. 201; Simmons v. State, 12 Mo. 268, 49 Am. Dec. 131; Languille v. State, 4 Tex. App. 312. Apparently the only authority to the contrary is the so-called "Lawyers Cases" of Tennessee, 55 Tenn. (8 Heisk.) 565.

[2] As in the case of other professions or businesses which can be taxed by the state, the cases hold that the state can delegate to a municipality the power to impose a tax for the privilege of following the practice of the profession within the jurisdiction of the municipality. Goldthwaite v. Montgomery, 50 Ala. 486; St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 289, Id., 4 Mo. App. 453; Wilmington v. Macks, 86 N. C. 88, 41 Am. Rep. 443. The imposition of an occupational tax by a municipality upon those engaged in the practice of the legal profession is not an interference with state affairs. The mere compliance with certain prerequisities, in return for which a license to practice law is granted by the state, does not place a person beyond the range of additional regulation of the conditions upon which the license may be used. The municipality, in imposing an occupational tax upon attorneys, is not interfering with state regulations, for it is not attempting to prescribe qualifications for attorneys different from or additional to those prescribed by the state. It is merely providing for an increase in its revenue by imposing a tax upon those who, by pursuing their profession within its limits, are deriving benefits from the advantages especially afforded by the city. The tax is levied upon the business of practicing law, rather than upon a person because he is an attorney at law. Ex parte Johnson (App.) 190 Pac. 852. A license to practice does not carry with it exemption from taxation. The fact that the state has itself imposed no occupational tax upon attorneys is of no consequence. "The omission of the state to tax lawyers does not affect the express power of the city to impose a tax upon them. That power is not thereby abrogated. It is of frequent occurrence, that the state omits to impose taxes of this kind, or omits some particular subject of taxation, to which the power of taxation of municipal corporations extends, and no diminution of that power is intended." Ex parte Montgomery, 64 Ala. 463. We are constrained to conclude, both upon reason and authority, that the state may impose an occupational tax upon persons engaging in the practice of law, and may delegate this power to a municipality.

[3] Petitioner then raises the question as to whether or not such power has, in fact, been delegated to the city of Los Angeles. It must be borne in mind that, as stated in Matter of Nowak, 195 Pac. 402, this day decided, the city of Los Angeles is operating under a charter amended so as to render the charter a limitation upon powers rather than a grant of powers, so far as municipal affairs are concerned. Charter of City of Los Angeles, art. 1, § 2, subd. 51; Const. Cal. art. 11, § 6. The question, then, is not whether the charter grants the power to impose the tax, but whether it prohibits the tax, and no such prohibition is to be found in the charter. Even if it be conceded, however, that an express grant of power is necessary in the instant case for the reason that the taxation of attorneys is not a purely municipal affair, but one in which the state is directly concerned, that would not defeat the tax in question, for the charter does contain an express grant.

[4, 5] The charter of the city of Los Angeles confers upon it the power "to license and regulate under general and uniform laws, any lawful business or calling; to fix the amount of license tax thereon, and to prescribe the manner of enforcing the same. * * *" In the case of the city of Los Angeles the power "to license and regulate" includes the power to impose a tax for revenue purposes only. The reasons for this interpretation are fully stated in the recent decision of In the Matter of Nowak, supra, and need not be repeated here. The case of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674, wherein it was held that the city of Sonora had no power to impose upon attorneys a tax for revenue purposes only, is not in point, for the reason that the city which passed the ordinance in that case was not operating under a freeholders' charter, as is the city of Los Angeles. Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 Pac. 780; In the Matter of Nowak, supra. The grant of a power to tax for revenue purposes "any lawful business or calling" is sufficiently definite to confer the power to tax those practicing the legal profession. The present phraseology of the charter was adopted in 1913. Prior to that time the terms used were "professions, trades, callings, occupations or other business." The amendment of 1913 did not constitute a restriction; it is equally as broad and comprehensive as the previous wording. The word "business" is defined in the New Standard Dictionary as:

> "1. A pursuit or occupation that employs or requires energy, time and thought; trade; profession; calling."

The same dictionary defines "calling" as:

> "Habitual occupation; regular work or duty to which one is called; a vocation in life; profession."

Clearly these terms include those following the professions as well as those engaged in work of a more purely commercial nature. It is true that some cases seem to hold that, in delegating the power to tax attorneys, a state must specifically mention them (St. Louis v. Laughlin, 49 Mo. 559); on the other hand, it has been held that where a city was authorized in general words to tax "all such callings, trades and employments as the public good may require," a tax might be imposed on the occupation of attorney at law. Abraham v. City of Roseburg, 55 Or. 359, 105 Pac. 401, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 597. In the absence of constitutional or statutory restrictions, there is no reason for making a particular exception of the legal profession, and where, as in the present case, the wording of the charter is sufficiently broad to include other professions in the delegation of the power to tax, it must also be held to embrace the legal profession.

The tax is valid and the writ is therefore discharged.

WALLIS et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

1. Negligence ⚷132(3)—Evidence of habit of caution admissible on issue of contributory negligence.

On the issue of contributory negligence of one killed by a train at a crossing, evidence of his habit of caution, stopping his team at crossings, and when necessary going ahead to ascertain if a train was approaching, was admissible, at least where there was a space within which he might have stopped to look and listen, as to which there was no eyewitness, though so far as he was seen he did not do so.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1066 — Unwarranted submission of last clear chance issue prejudicial.

Giving an instruction submitting the issue of last clear chance when there was not sufficient evidence to justify the submission is prejudicial error.

3. Negligence ⚷83—Last clear chance doctrine stated.

To make one liable under the last clear chance doctrine, not only must he have been aware of the danger in time to avert it, but he must have known or had reason to believe that the person injured was oblivious of the danger and in a position where he could not extricate himself from it.

4. Railroads ⚷350(33)—Evidence insufficient for submission of last clear chance doctrine.

Evidence of engineer having seasonably realized or had reason to realize that a person approaching crossing was oblivious of danger held insufficient for submission of last clear chance doctrine.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Wallis and others against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. A. Moore, Stanley Moore, and Geo. K. Ford, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clarence A. Henning, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, heirs of Thomas Henry Wallis, in an action to recover damages for the latter's death, caused from his being run into by an engine of one of defendant's trains.

The accident occurred on the evening of October 16, 1909, at the intersection of Oak street and First street in the city of Oakland. The deceased was driving a lumber wagon, drawn by two horses, southerly on Oak street. The train was approaching from the east on the tracks of defendant company on First street. There was no load or bed on the wagon, and decedent was seated on what is termed the cinch, about midway between the front and rear wheels. Just as the wagon reached a point where the driver was midway between the rails of the railroad track it was struck by the engine and the driver was killed.

The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiffs in the sum of $3,500.

Plaintiffs' case rests upon allegations of negligence of defendant in running its train at unlawful and excessive speed and in its failure to exercise due care in giving warning of its approach. Defendant, besides denying its own negligence, pleads contributory negligence of the deceased in failing to stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross the track.

That negligence of the defendant in exceeding the speed limit was shown by the evidence is not seriously disputed. On the defense of contributory negligence there was no direct testimony as to whether or not the decedent took any precautions to ascertain whether the track was clear before driving upon it, but there were circumstances given in evidence which might justify an inference that the decedent did not exercise such precaution.

[1] One of the grounds urged by defendant for a reversal, and the only one upheld by the District Court of Appeal, is alleged error of the trial court in admitting, over defendant's objection, testimony of plaintiffs' witnesses that the decedent on other occasions, not only at this crossing, but elsewhere, was in the habit of stopping his team, and, when necessary, going ahead to the railroad track to ascertain if any train was approaching. The objection to this testimony was made generally on the grounds that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, but the more specific contention of counsel for defendant was that such evidence of custom or habit to support a presumption of conduct in a given case was permissible, if at all, only when there was no eyewitness to the fact. The language of counsel in supplementing his general objection was:

> "If there is evidence of any eyewitness, then it is not admissible. I think unless there is evidence that there is no eyewitness it would be very doubtful."

After the court had overruled the objection, counsel for defendant stated:

> "I want the evidence to go in subject to my objection that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and no sufficient foundation has been laid. * * * That is the only point. My theory is that it must first appear there was no eyewitness. * * * It is addressed to that only in this particular, that it has not been shown there was no eyewitness, and it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial."

We think it sufficiently appears that defendant's objection to this evidence was thus limited to the condition that the evidence introduced was inadmissible if there was direct evidence of eyewitnesses to the fact. It was upon this assumption that the ruling of error was made by the District Court of Appeal. Accepting this theory of the law, we doubt if the foundation appears in the evidence here to exclude this testimony. No eyewitness testified directly on the subject or made reference to it. Only two witnesses saw the decedent as he approached the crossing. Neither of these saw him for more than a moment. Mrs. Borba, who lived on Oak street a block south of the crossing opened her door and looked out just as what was probably the crossing whistle of the train sounded at a point shown to be some 700 or 800 feet east of the crossing. At that time she saw the decedent driving on Oak street toward the crossing at some point between her house and First street. She re-entered the house, closed the door, and heard the continued whistle of the engine. J. F. Finn, the engineer of the locomotive, testified that just after he had finished blowing the crossing whistle he saw the heads of the horses coming into his line of vision at a point about 10 feet from the north rail of the track at the crossing, and that he thereupon began to sound the warning whistles; that the team continued toward the track until the collision happened. We do not agree with respondents' interpretation of the testimony of Mrs. Borba that she saw decedent just after he was past the intersection of Oak and First streets. She distinctly states that she saw him on Oak street between First and Second streets "right by the red building," which was between these streets. That would leave a considerable space where he was not seen by either witness. It is obvious that an interval elapsed between the moment when Mrs. Borba saw the decedent and when the moving team came into the engineer's line of vision. There is room for inference, however, that decedent did not stop to look and listen in that brief interim, and yet he might have done so, and there was no eyewitness to testify on that point. The time and place for so stopping would have been as he came into First street, where he could see up and down the railroad track. He might have just started his team after an instant's halt to glance up and down the track, when the engineer first saw the heads of the horses. If ever a cause was entitled to whatever presumption arises from habits of caution to overcome an inference from adverse circumstantial evidence of negligent conduct, it arises under the facts of this case.

We do not understand that the authorities which uphold the admissibility of this class of testimony only in the absence of direct evidence base the condition of its admission upon an entire absence of other evidence as to collateral facts that may uphold an inference as to what happened, but upon the absence of direct testimony of any eyewitness that the thing did or did not occur. In this case there was no such direct testimony.

The law governing this class of evidence is perplexingly inharmonious. The weight of authority, however, seems to uphold its use under the conditions stated, that there is an absence of satisfactory testimony of eyewitnesses as to the fact in controversy, while other decisions and authorities consider it legitimate evidence without such condition. This limitation upon the introduction of such testimony seems rather illogical. If the fact of the existence of habits of caution in a given particular has any legitimate evidentiary weight, the party benefited ought to have the advantage of it for whatever it is worth, even against adverse eyewitnesses; and if the testimony of the eyewitnesses is in his favor, it would be at least a harmless cumulation of evidence to permit testimony of his custom or habit.

The only authority in this state directly in point is that of Craven v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878. In that case the plaintiff was suing for damages resulting from a fall from a train. The controversy was as to whether she was thrown off by the jolting movement of the car, or fell in an attempt to step off while the car was moving. Testimony was admitted as against testimony of eyewitnesses to the actual occurrence that she was in the habit of alighting from cars while they were still in motion. The court in this connection says:

> "A sensible man, called upon, out of court, to determine whether or not a certain person had on a certain occasion carelessly jumped off a moving train of cars, and finding the direct testimony as to the matter conflicting, would naturally and properly give some weight to the fact that the person was in the habit of alighting from cars in that manner; and the consideration of such a fact in cases resembling the one at bar has frequently been sanctioned in court. The evidence, at least, had some legal tendency to show that plaintiff's conduct at the time of the injury was such as defendant ascribed to her."

If the evidence of habit is to be recognized at all, this unconditional rule would seem to be the logical ground for its admission. It is contended by appellant that later decisions of this state, though not directly calling in question the case above cited, are in substantial conflict with it, citing Towle v. Pac. Imp. Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207; Cunningham v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 561, 47 Pac. 452; Langford v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 729, 164 Pac. 398; Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 120 Pac. 35.

These are all cases in which negligence was charged against defendant corporations through acts of their servants or employees. In each instance it was sought to prove or disprove negligence by the general character of the servant as to his skill or incompetence, prudence, or carelessness in the certain line of employment involved. Such evidence was excluded. This class of evidence is clearly distinguishable from that establishing a custom or habit of doing some particular thing in a particular way. Because one is a skillful workman in a given occupation does not tend to disprove negligence in some specific act, but, if the question in controversy is whether he did the thing at all or his manner of doing it, his custom or habit regarding that particular matter would be significant. Most of the text-writers seem to recognize the competency of such testimony. Ruling Case Law, vol. 10, p. 955, § 127, thus states the doctrine:

> "A habit of doing a thing is naturally of probative value as indicating that on a particular occasion the thing was done as usual, and, if already shown as a definite course of action, is constantly admitted in evidence"

—but recognizes the limitation upon such evidence by adding:

> "The weight of authority seems to be against admitting evidence of general conduct under proven circumstances, to show conduct of the same kind under similar circumstances on a particular occasion, when there were eyewitnesses of the occurrence."

In Thompson on Negligence, vol. 6, § 7140, it is said:

> "Where there are no witnesses to the accident, evidence of the habitual care of the deceased is often admitted on the question of his exercise of due care at the time of the accident."

Mr. Greenleaf says (1 Greenlf. on Ev. [16th Ed.] §§ 14j and 14k):

> "A habit of doing a thing is naturally of probative value as indicating that on a particular occasion the thing was done as usual, and, if clearly shown as a definite course of action, is constantly admitted in evidence."

In Elliott on Evidence, vol. 1, § 172, the author says that—

> "Evidence of personal habit is often of some probative value and is frequently admitted; but such evidence should not be admitted when to admit it would violate the character rule, and it cannot ordinarily be proved that a person did or did not do a certain thing at a particular time by showing that he acted in a certain way under similar circumstances at other times."

We find in Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, § 92, the following strong indorsement of habit evidence:

> "Of the probative value of a person's habit or custom as showing the doing on a specific occasion of the act which is the subject of the habit or custom there can be no doubt. Everyday experience and reasoning make it clear enough."

The author, however, very pertinently points out the distinction in the probative value of casual and infrequent acts along given lines of conduct and such a constant and repeated course of action, as would indicate a fixed habit. He adds:

> "It is easy to see why in a given instance something which may be loosely called habit or custom should be rejected because it may not in fact have sufficient regularity to make it probable that it would be carried out in every instance or in most instances. Whether or not such sufficient regularity exists must depend largely upon the circumstances of each case."

When we turn to the decided cases there is such a diversity of facts and confusion of rulings that it would be impracticable to analyze them or try to reconcile them other than in a general way.

In Parsons v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. R., 133 App. Div. 461, 117 N. Y. Supp. 1058, it was held in a case similar to this that evidence was not admissible for the purpose of showing that a decedent who was killed while crossing a railroad track used care at the time of the accident, by introducing evidence of specific instances of care on other occasions, although no eyewitnesses were present. In the opinion, Mr. Justice Chester said:

> "A man may be careful on one occasion and may be careless on another. The circumstances at one time may be such as to induce prudence while they may not at another."

In that case, however, it was merely offered to show that the decedent had been seen on several isolated occasions to stop and look and listen at this crossing. There may have been many intervening occasions when he failed to observe that precaution.

In the case at bar the testimony of the witness Glass was that he had worked in connection with the decedent, not only in hauling lumber over this particular crossing (which had only been for a few days), but in teaming elsewhere when they hauled hay and grain across a railroad track. The witness was asked if he was familiar with the practice of decedent when he approached a railroad track, and if he knew decedent's habit in that respect. In making objection to the testimony counsel for defendant stated that he did not make the point that the witness had not had sufficient observation, but that his objection was to evidence of decedent's custom in the matter. In testifying the witness states as to decedent's habit "that he would get off and look to see if there was a train coming," and that for the few days they had been at work over this crossing "he always stopped, looked to see if the train was coming." So the evidence here was not to show the casual acts, but a consistent habit.

In Smith v. Boston & Maine R. R. Co., 70 N. H. 53, 47 Atl. 290, 85 Am. St. Rep. 596, another case of a railroad crossing accident, evidence was upheld to the effect that the deceased "for many years always checked his horse and looked and listened for the train at such crossing." The Supreme Court in the opinion says:

> "Cate's uniform habit of slackening the speed of his horse to a walk at the Waukewan crossing, and looking and listening for the approach of a train before attempting to pass the crossing, tended to show that he did so on this fatal trip. It was substantial evidence of the exercise of care on that occasion"—citing a number of New Hampshire cases to the same effect.

This subject is quite fully discussed, with citation of numerous authorities, pro and con, by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of Zucker v. Whitridge, 205 N. Y. 50, 98 N. E. 209, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1250. In the trial of that case evidence had been introduced of the habitual exercise of caution on the part of the deceased killed by a street car at a crossing, as tending to prove freedom from contributory negligence at the time of the accident. The admission of the testimony was held prejudicial error, but the ruling was made on the ground that there were eyewitnesses of the occurrence and expressly withheld any opinion as to the admissibility of such testimony where there was no direct evidence on the subject.

The following cases are cited in the foregoing opinion as disapproving this class of evidence. Attention is called to this list of decisions as indicating how generally the question arose on testimony of casual and disconnected acts or upon evidence of general reputation of carelessness or incompetence not going to a specific act or circumstance:

> "In Wisconsin, to show that the person injured 'was an habitually careless man' (Propsom v. Leatham, 80 Wis. 608, 612, 50 N. W. 586, 587); in Pennsylvania, that the deceased 'had made a practice of jumping from the elevator while in motion' (Baker v. Irish, 172 Pa. 528, 531, 33 Atl. 558); in Connecticut, that the intestate 'was a careful and prudent driver' (Morris v. Easthaven, 41 Conn. 252); in Illinois, 'that the deceased was in the habit of jumping on trains' (Peoria & Pekin Co. v. Clayberg, 107 Ill. 644, 648); in Iowa, in a case where there was some evidence that the deceased was asleep in his buggy when he drove on the track, 'that he had been found asleep in his buggy on other occasions' (Dalton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. R. Co., 114 Iowa, 257, 259, 86 N. W. 272, 273); in Maine, 'that, in the opinion of those who knew the deceased well, he was a cautious and careful man,' no witness having seen the accident (Chase v. Maine Cent. R. R. Co., 77 Me. 62, 65, 52 Am. Rep. 744); in Massachusetts, specific instances of want of care in the engineer in his business of running trains within three months of the injury, before or after (Robinson v. Fitchburg & Worcester R. R. Co., 7 Gray, 92, 95); also 'previous specific acts of negligence on the part of defendant's engineer known to its superintendent' (Conners v. Morton, 160 Mass. 333, 335, 35 N. E. 860)."

We do not find enough in these authorities, or in the rule laid down in Towle v. Pacific Imp. Co., Cunningham v. L. A. Ry. Co., and Langford v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., cited in this opinion, to discredit the ruling in the Craven Case, supra, so far as it applied to the evidence tending to show a consistent uniformity of action along given lines indicating a fixed habit, and applied to the question as to whether some specific act involving the same trait was done or was not done in a certain manner.

The probative force of evidence of habit, though not passed upon as a rule of evidence (that question being expressly withheld), is recognized by Mr. Justice Shaw in the case of Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059. In that case the plaintiff was injured while riding as a passenger in a carriage which was run into by a street car. Evidence of the driver's habitual carelessness in crossing in front of moving cars, and of plaintiff's knowledge of his customary want of care, was held admissible as tending to show contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff in failing to keep a lookout or to warn the driver to watchfulness. This, of course, could only be upon the theory that plaintiff, having knowledge that the driver was careless in this particular matter, was bound in common prudence to anticipate the probability of a repetition of his careless conduct on this occasion. The rule admitting evidence of habit to rebut or support conflicting testimony of eyewitnesses, as adopted in this state in Craven v. Cent. Pac. R. R. Co., supra, is cited and approved by the Appellate Court of Indiana under a similar state of facts, in Pittsburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. McNeil (Ind. App.) 66 N. E. 777. To the same effect is Denver Tramway Co. v. Owens, 20 Colo. 107, 36 Pac. 848. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in the case of Parkinson v. N. & L. R. R. Co., 61 N. H. 416, says:

> "Although it is quite generally held elsewhere * * * that evidence of other specific instance of negligence on the part of either party is not competent, because raising a collateral issue, yet in this state a different rule prevails, and has become established in cases where the evidence is conflicting; and it is held to be competent to show that the party charged with negligence had performed or omitted the same act in the same way before, as tending to show that he did or omitted the act at the time in question, on the ground that a person is more likely to do a thing in a particular way, as he is in the habit of doing * * * it."

Gillett's Indirect and Collateral Evidence, § 68, states:

> "The weight of authority favors the view that, where the direct evidence shows that an act was done or omitted, it is competent to prove that a custom existed prior to the time to do or not to do such an act, as such evidence legitimately tends to uphold the theory of one of the contending parties."

Other decisions upholding this character of evidence upon one ground or another are: State v. R. R., 52 N. H. 528; International & G. N. R. R. Co. v. Kuehn, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 21 S. W. 58; Shaber v. St. P., M. & M. Ry. Co., 28 Minn. 103, 9 N. W. 575; Saffer v. Dry Dock, etc., R. R. Co., 5 N. Y. Supp. 700;[1] Bower v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 61 Wis. 457, 21 N. W. 536; Cleveland, etc., R. R. Co. v. Moss, 89 Ill. App. 1; Cox v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 92 Ill. App. 15; Mayer v. Milwaukee St. Ry. Co., 90 Wis. 522, 63 N. W. 1048; Meier v. Shrunk, 79 Iowa, 17, 44 N. W. 209.

Most of these cases involve habits of negligence, but, of course, habits of caution and prudence are of equal, if not greater, evidentiary weight. Prof. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence (volume 1, § 97), even questions if acts of negligence can be anything more than casual or occasional. Experience, however, will not support that theory. It may be said, however, that prudence and caution in matters involving exposure to danger may more readily become habitual from the incentive always present to follow the path of safety.

The main argument which seems to prevail with the authorities excluding habit evidence is the fact that it introduces into the trial collateral issues of fact of which the opposing party has had no notice. This condition, however, arises in numerous instances in nearly every trial on the introduction of probative facts, collateral in their nature, and of which the ultimate facts pleaded give no inkling.

We think the evidence excepted to in this case was properly admitted. The weight of this class of evidence, of course, depends upon the nature of the act and the fixity of the habit, but that is a question which can properly be left to the jury under proper instructions.

Men are accustomed to weighing, and acting upon, such evidence of conduct in their everyday affairs. Recognition of its force is seen in the adoption by the law of many presumptions based on common experience, such as the presumption that a letter properly deposited in the mails has reached its destination in due time, the presumption that the regular customs of business have been followed, and the express declaration of our Code of a presumption "that things have happened * * * according to the ordinary habits of life." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 28.

It may be doubted if the jury in this case was seriously influenced in its verdict by evidence of decedent's habit of caution, but we have felt justified in devoting so much attention to the question because of the general uncertainty of the law in other jurisdictions and the apparent confusion as to the rule in California arising out of the suggested conflict between the Craven Case and other later decisions of this court herein cited to that point.

[2-4] There are only two grounds of error presented. The first, which we have already ruled upon, is the admissibility of the evidence as to decedent's habits of caution. The other is alleged error of the trial court in giving to the jury an instruction submitting an issue on the last clear chance.

Without passing upon the objection, raised for the first time on motion for a hearing in this court, to the sufficiency in form of the instruction given, to fully present the doctrine of the last clear chance, we are compelled to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence to justify submitting this instruction to the jury, and for this reason the judgment must be reversed.

This instruction may have governed the jury in arriving at a verdict for the plaintiff, and, in the absence of evidence to support it, must be held fatally prejudicial.

The jury may, under the evidence, have found the decedent guilty of contributory negligence. A verdict for plaintiff after a finding of such negligence could not be supported, excepting under the doctrine of the last clear chance. The rule is well settled in this state that in order to make the defendant liable, notwithstanding contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the defendant must not only be aware of the danger in time to avert it, but must also know or have reason to believe that the plaintiff is oblivious of the danger and is in a position where he cannot extricate himself from it. Arnold v. S. F. O. T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 Pac. 798; Basham v. So. Pac. Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 Pac. 359; Young v. So. Pac. Co., 190 Pac. 36. The only evidence on this point is that of the engineer himself. He testifies that when he rounded the curve some 400 or 500 feet from the crossing he saw the heads of decedent's horses some 10 feet from the track. He immediately sounded the crossing whistle. He doubtless believed, and had a right to believe, that the driver would at once stop his team and not attempt to cross the track. As soon as he saw that the team was still approaching and the driver not looking toward him, but in an opposite direction, he put on the emergency brakes with full force, and used every means shown by the evidence to be available to stop his train. He was justified in assuming that at the distance from which he sounded the warning, and with the headlight and noise of the approaching train, the driver would be warned of his danger. The team was moving at a walk, and, under ordinary circumstances and so far as appeared here, could have been pulled up within a space of 2 or 3 feet. Even though the train had been running at a lawful rate of speed, it would have been a new act of contributory negligence for the driver to attempt to cross ahead of it after the warning was sounded.

[1] Reported in full in the New York Supplement; reported as a memorandum decision without opinion in 53 Hun, 629.

The remarks of Mr. Justice Shaw in his opinion in Basham v. So. Pac. Co., supra, apply aptly to the case before us. Commenting on the last clear chance doctrine and the fact that the train whistle was sounding, the bell ringing, and the noise of the moving train considerable, he says:

> "The horses were in a slow walk. The lines were in Coffey's hands. The horses were under his control. He could have come to a standstill in a second. Under all these circumstances it would be extremely unreasonable for any one to suppose that he was unaware of the approaching train, and did not intend to stop before reaching the track, as he could easily have done, and as is the frequent custom. When the fireman did, nevertheless, begin to entertain a fear that Coffey was inattentive, he at once gave the urgent order to the engineer to stop. It cannot be said either that he did realize the danger sooner, or that, in reason, with his knowledge, he had cause to realize it sooner. Hence the last clear chance doctrine never came into operation."

Such was the situation in this case.

The judgment is reversed.

In re MILLER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9477.)

1. Taxation 🔑895(7)—Inheritance tax based on net clear value of beneficial interest transferred.

The only provision for deductions in the Inheritance Tax Act is for debts, but the plain purpose of the act was that the clear market value of the beneficial interest transferred should be its net clear value, so that the expenses of the administration should be deducted.

2. Taxation 🔑895(7)—Federal tax on estate should be deducted before assessing inheritance tax.

The California inheritance tax is a succession tax on a beneficial interest of each heir, computed on the net clear value, and chargeable against it, while the federal tax under Revenue Act, tit. 2 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 6336½a–6336½m), is not a succession tax, but a tax upon the estate left by decedent, so that the federal tax should be deducted before determining the state tax.

3. Taxation 🔑895(7)—Inheritance tax on corporate stock by state of corporation's domicile, deducted before assessing an assessment in California.

The Inheritance Tax Law of Nevada provides a succession tax on what the transferee receives, and where stock in a Nevada corporation is inherited by one in this state, the Nevada tax should be deducted from the amount of the inheritance before computing our succession tax.

4. Taxation 🔑895(7) — Federal and other state acts held enforceable though passed after gift inter vivos.

In view of Inheritance Tax Act, § 5, providing for appraisal immediately after death of decedent and according to market value in the manner provided by section 15, where a gift was made inter vivos in contemplation of death prior to the going into effect of the federal and Nevada inheritance tax laws, but the grantor died after their going into effect, taxes under them must be deducted to determine the succession taxable here.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henry Miller, deceased. From an order and judgment determining and fixing inheritance taxes, the State of California and the State Controller appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 175 Pac. 641.

U. S. Webb and Matthew Brady, both of San Francisco, Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and H. C. Lucas and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edward F. Treadwell and Forrest A. Cobb, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the state and the state controller, in whose charge is the matter of collecting inheritance taxes, from a portion of a common order and judgment entered in three different proceedings determining and fixing the inheritance taxes payable upon the death of one Henry Miller. Miller was a resident of California, and died, testate, October 14, 1916. On April 17, 1913, he had executed a deed of trust to Nellie Miller Nickel and J. Leroy Nickel, assigning to them as trustees approximately 120,000 shares of the capital stock of Miller and Lux Company, a Nevada corporation. It is conceded that the transfer was made in contemplation of death and is subject to tax under our Inheritance Tax Law in effect at the time of transfer. The controversy is solely as to the amount of the tax.

Immediately prior to the transfer, but not going into effect until afterwards, the state of Nevada adopted an Inheritance Tax Law (Statutes of Nevada for 1913, p. 411), and thereafter, and prior to Miller's death, the United States adopted the existing federal tax act. Revenue Act of 1916, tit. 2, 39 U. S. Statutes at Large, pp. 777–780 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 6336½a–6336½m). Under these laws, the United States makes claim for taxes in the amount of nearly $4,000,000 on the transfer mentioned, and the state of Nevada makes claim for some $48,000. The validity of both these claims is in contest and as yet undetermined. Such being the situation, the trustees named, when it came to fixing the inheritance taxes on the transfer under the California law, claimed that in case the claims of the United States and Nevada should be finally upheld, the amount of those claims as established should be deducted from the value of the stock transferred in order to obtain the value upon which the California tax should be computed. The claim of the state and the state controller, on the other hand, was that no such deduction should be made. The lower court sustained the contention of the trustees, and the order or judgment appealed from provides, among other things, for such deduction to the extent that the validity of the claims of the United States and Nevada may be finally established. It is from this portion of the order and judgment that the appeal is taken.

We are, of course, not concerned here with the validity of the claims of the United States and Nevada. We are concerned only with the result upon the amount of tax due the state of California in case those claims are valid and finally so established. For the purposes of discussion, then, we may assume their validity. It will also simplify somewhat the discussion of the primary question involved if we assume that it is not material that the transfer was made prior to Miller's death and prior to the going into effect of both the Nevada and the United States tax acts. Our discussion will therefore for the time being be on the basis of a transfer by inheritance or will occurring upon Miller's death. It should also be noted that shortly after Miller's death the California law was amended so as to provide expressly that no deduction should be made because of the federal tax. This amendment, however, very plainly cannot affect the question as to what was the law before its adoption, and that question must be determined as if the amendment had not been made.

[1] The California act (St. 1911, p. 713) contains no provision as to how the principal upon which the tax is to be computed is to be ascertained other than that it is designated as the "clear market value" of the "beneficial interest" transferred, and that there are provisions which plainly imply that the decedent's debts and the commissions of executors are to be deducted to ascertain this "clear market value." In this connection it should be noted that this designation of the principal upon which the tax is to be computed is one common to the inheritance tax acts of many other states, and in particular is the designation in the acts under consideration, in most of the decisions from other states which we subsequently cite. But while this is the designation in our act, and the only provisions for deductions are for the deduction of debts and executors' commissions, the plain purpose of the act was that the clear market value of the beneficial interest transferred should be its net clear value. This has been the construction given it in actual administration and by the courts (Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 108 Pac. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Estate of Hite, 159 Cal. 392, 113 Pac. 1072, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1167, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1014), and the deduction of expenses of administration, sums allowed by way of family allowance, and the value of property set aside as a family homestead, as well as of debts, has been sanctioned and has been commonly made. The primary question, or, rather, questions, in the present case are therefore: (1) In determining the net clear value of the beneficial interest transferred, should the federal estate tax be deducted? and (2) for the same purpose should the Nevada inheritance tax on the stock of a Nevada corporation owned by a resident of this state at the time of his death be also deducted? These two questions are not the same, and we shall consider first that concerning the federal tax.

[2] The solution is found in the different natures of the two taxes, the California tax and the federal tax. The California tax is a succession tax, a tax on the beneficial interest of each beneficiary or heir. If there be more than one beneficiary or heir there is a separate tax on the interest of each, computed on its net clear value, and chargeable against it. The provisions of the law are substantially the same as those of the previous inheritance tax act of 1905 (Stats. of 1905, p. 341), which was under consideration in Estate of

Kennedy, previously referred to. The question there presented was whether a homestead set apart for the widow of the testator out of his estate in the course of probate should be deducted in order to determine the amount upon which she, as residuary legatee, should pay the inheritance tax. It was held that it should be deducted because of the nature of the tax, the court saying at page 526 of 157 Cal., at page 283 of 108 Pac. (29 L. R. A. [N. S.] 428):

> "The provisions of our tax act clearly show that the tax imposed thereby is one solely upon the devisee, legatee, or heir, and one upon him only as to such property as he actually takes on distribution as devisee, legatee, or heir. It would appear to be a most absurd and inequitable provision that imposed a tax on one for the privilege of succeeding as heir, devisee, or legatee to certain property of the decedent, where the very property to which he is so held to succeed is lawfully diverted by the probate court to other purposes, and never can be distributed to him."

The federal tax under the act of 1916, on the other hand, is not a succession tax, but an estate tax, not a tax on what comes to the beneficiaries or heirs, but upon what is left by the decedent. In this respect it differs from the legacy tax imposed by the United States War Revenue Act of 1898 (30 Stat. 448). The act of 1916 entitles the tax an "estate tax," and in terms imposes it upon the net estate of the decedent as a unit. It is not apportioned among the various transferees, and bears no relation to the separate amounts which they are to receive. The distinction between a succession tax and an estate tax is a recognized distinction, and, so far as we are aware, it has been held without exception that the federal tax under the act of 1916 is of the latter character. It is not possible, in our judgment, to take any other reasonable view of it.

The nature of the federal tax is discussed in Re Roebling's Estate, 89 N. J. Eq. 163, and it is said at page 166 (104 Atl. 295, 296):

> "To be more precise, it is imposed upon the estate, transferred by death, and not upon the succession resulting from death. The distinction is well defined and recognized in countries where both kinds of tax exist. The federal tax resembles the probate duty of the act of 1862, chapter 119 (12 U. S. Stat. p. 483), which was payable by the executor out of the estate, while the legacy duty therein provided for (at page 485) was payable by the beneficiaries. The tax occupies the same field of death duty as does the 'Estate Tax' in England. By the Finance Act of 1894 an estate duty is levied upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, which passes on the death of a person and is imposed upon the estate and is payable by the executor as an administration expense. In addition to this tax, there is also a legacy tax, and a succession duty upon the realty, payable by the recipients. Speaking of the death duty, Mr. Hanson in his opening chapter (Hans. D. D. [6th Ed.]) says: 'The new duty imposed by the Finance Act 1894, and called estate duty, supersedes probate duty; but the key to the construction of the Finance Act 1894 and the amending act lies in remembering that the new estate duty, although it is leviable on property which was left untouched by probate duty, such as real estate, yet is in substance of the same nature as the old probate duty. What it taxes is not the interest to which some person succeeds on a death, but the property in respect of which an interest ceased by reason of the death. Unless this principle is clearly kept in view, the mind is constantly tempted by the wording of the act to revert to principles of succession duty, which have no real connection with the subject.'"

See, also, to the same effect, Corbin v. Townshend, 92 Conn. 501, 103 Atl. 647; Knight's Estate, 261 Pa. 537, 104 Atl. 765; People v. Pasfield, 284 Ill. 450, 120 N. E. 286; State v. Probate Court, 139 Minn. 210, 166 N. W. 125; People v. Bemis (Colo.) 189 Pac. 32; State v. First Calumet, etc., Co. (Ind. App.) 125 N. E. 200, and Northern Trust Co. v. Lederer (D. C.) 257 Fed. 812, affirmed in Lederer v. Northern Trust Co. (C. C. A.) 262 Fed. 52.

The state tax, then, being a succession tax, a tax upon what the transferee receives, and the federal tax being an estate tax, a tax upon what the decedent leaves, there would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that the federal tax must be deducted in order to determine the amount upon which the state tax should be levied, since it is plain that what the transferee receives is only the portion of what the decedent left which remains after the federal tax is taken. We might apply here the language from Estate of Kennedy already quoted that—

> "It would appear to be a most absurd and inequitable provision that imposed a tax on one for the privilege of succeeding as heir, devisee, or legatee to certain property of the decedent, where the very property to which he is so held to succeed is lawfully diverted by the probate court [in this case by operation of law] to other purposes and never can be distributed to him."

We might also say in the language of People v. Pasfield, supra, 284 Ill. 454, 120 N. E. 288:

> "The legatees and distributees cannot in any sense be held to have 'received' any part of the duty that is paid to the government by the executor or trustee or administrator as such estate tax, and there is no language in the act that will permit a construction that the duty is levied upon each share of the legatees or distributees of the decedent, as was given the federal act of 1898 by the court in Knowlton v. Moore, supra. The federal Estate Tax Act of September 8, 1916, necessarily operated to lessen, by the amount of such tax, the clear value of the beneficial interest which passed to the heirs and legatees in the instant case, and prevented their receiving any part of that tax, and the ruling of the county court that the same should be deducted before computing the state tax was correct."

The identical question presented here as to whether the federal tax should or should not be deducted in computing a succession tax has been presented in a number of other jurisdictions, and the overwhelming weight of authority is that it should be deducted. It was so held in all of the cases we have cited above as to the nature of the federal tax. The discussion of the question by many of them is full and convincing, and makes unnecessary here anything more than the rather brief discussion we have given to it.

We are cited to but three authorities as holding to the contrary. While one of them is not in point, the other two are, and it may not be amiss as to the latter to point out wherein we think they are in error. The case to which we have referred as not in point is In re Sanford's Estate (Iowa) 175 N. W. 506. It is not in point, for the reason that the Iowa statute, unlike ours, particularly specifies what should be deducted before computing the tax, and that nothing else should be deducted and the federal tax did not come within any of the deductions authorized. It is upon this peculiarity of the statute that the decision goes.

The two cases referred to which are in point are Estate of Sherman, 179 App. Div. 497, 166 N. Y. Supp. 19, affirmed 222 N. Y. 540, 118 N. E. 1078, and Estate of Bierstadt, 178 App. Div. 836, 166 N. Y. Supp. 168, which may be considered as one, and In re Week's Estate, 169 Wis. 316, 172 N. W. 732. The New York case or cases go apparently upon the ground that the federal tax is unconstitutional, and upon the authority of Estate of Gihon, 169 N. Y. 443, 62 N. E. 561. The question as to the constitutionality of the federal tax is not presented here, and, as we have said, its validity must be assumed. As to the authority of the Estate of Gihon, the two later New York decisions under discussion fail to recognize the difference between the federal legacy tax under the law of 1898, which was involved in the Estate of Gihon, and the federal estate tax under the law of 1916, which was involved in them. The legacy tax of 1898 was a succession tax, as its name would indicate, and it is upon this fact that the decision in Estate of Gihon is rested. It is said:

> "In our judgment the vital error of this argument [the argument for the deduction of the federal legacy tax] lies in the assumption that the 'taxes are primarily payable out of the estate.' The federal tax is of exactly the same nature as the state tax; a tax not on property, but on succession; that is to say, a tax on the legatee for the privilege of succeeding to the property."

The decision, therefore, cannot be considered as authority for not deducting an estate tax, and affords no justification for the later cases in so holding. On the contrary, the implication from it is that such a tax should be deducted.

As to the Wisconsin case, it proceeds solely upon the proposition that the statute makes no express provision for any deduction whatever. It recognizes the fact that this ground would forbid a deduction of any sort from the gross value of the estate left by the decedent, even a deduction of expenses of administration, and yet it also recognizes that it was the established practice in Wisconsin to make a deduction for expenses of administration, and by expressly refusing to disturb that practice, confirms it. We cannot follow it to such inconsistent and irreconcilable results. It is the settled law of this state that the inheritance tax is imposed upon the net clear market value of what the transferee receives, and that to ascertain this the value of what he does not receive, in contemplation of law, must be deducted from the value of what the decedent left. The application of this principle plainly requires the deduction of the federal estate tax.

[3] As to the deduction of the Nevada tax, the question is quite different, and its correct answer by no means so certain. Very little attention is paid to it by counsel on either side, undoubtedly because of the small amount of tax claimed as compared with the amount of tax claimed by the United States. But the Nevada tax, like our own, is a succession tax, a tax on what the transferee receives, and it is quite permissible to have two taxes on the same thing, and ordinarily where such taxes are levied neither is to be deducted in computing the other.

In support of their position, counsel for the trustees advance the reasoning and authority of Corbin v. Townshend, 92 Conn. 501, 103 Atl. 647, and Van Beil's Estate, 257 Pa. 155, 101 Atl. 316. That reasoning is that the tax of the foreign state "must be paid before the executor or administrator can reduce the [foreign] bonds or stock to possession. These cannot be transferred until the [foreign] state tax is paid, and the value of the security so transferred is reduced by the amount of the tax which the executor or administrator has had to pay." Corbin v. Townshend, supra. This reasoning is hardly sufficient. The stocks and bonds cannot, of course, be transferred until the tax is paid and the administrator or executor must pay it. But this is true of the tax by the state of the decedent's domicile as well. The point is that, while each tax must be paid and paid by the administrator or executor, both are a tax on the same thing, the interest of the transferee, and both are chargeable against it and finally paid out of it. If the two taxes were levied under concurrent or equal authority, we would have little hesitation in holding that, without express provision to the contrary in the statute, neither should be deducted in computing the other. Such was the situation and ruling in Estate of Gihon, supra, where the two taxes involved were the federal legacy tax under the law of 1898 and the state succession tax. It is manifest that in such a case both the federal government and the state have equal and concurrent authority, and no reason appears why the tax of one should be deducted in computing the tax of the other. Hooper v. Shaw, 176 Mass. 190, 57 N. E. 361, holds to the contrary, but we fail to appreciate the reasons it advances for so doing.

But there is, we believe, a difference between two succession taxes, one federal and one state, and two succession taxes, both state, one imposed by the state having actual control over the subject-matter of the transfer, and the other imposed by the state of the domicile of the decedent. The two states do not have equal and concurrent authority in such a case. The authority of the state having actual control of the subject-matter, either because it is personal property within its limits or because, as in this case, it is the stock of one of its corporations, is, of necessity, the superior. The state of the decedent's domicile can deal with the property only after the requirements of the state of its actual situs are satisfied. Putting it another way and concretely, the stock of Henry Miller in the Nevada corporation comes into his California estate, there to be administered upon and taxed, only after the requirements of Nevada are complied with, and the only thing over which California secures authority is what remains after Nevada has taken its tax. It would seem reasonable to say, under such circumstances, that so far as California is concerned, the value of the interest transferred by death or in contemplation of death is the value of the corporate stock after the Nevada tax had been paid. This, we believe, is the justification of Corbin v. Townshend and Van Beil's Estate, which hold that the foreign tax should be deducted. It is a reason hinted at in both, and may in fact be the thought which underlies them, too briefly expressed to be entirely clear to us. The Matter of Penfold, 216 N. Y. 171, 110 N. E. 499, is a decision to the contrary, but it proceeds solely on the authority of Estate of Gihon, which, because of the distinction stated, we do not think in point. At any rate, for the reasons given we are ready to follow the authority of Corbin v. Townshend and Van Beil's Estate, and to hold in this case that the Nevada tax should be deducted.

[4] There remains only the question as to whether or not the conclusion so reached as to both the federal and the Nevada tax is affected by the circumstances that the particular transfer under consideration was not made by death, but inter vivos and in contemplation of death only, and that when the transfer was made neither the federal nor the Nevada act was in force. It is the settled law in this state, as well as in other jurisdictions, that when a transfer is made inter vivos its liability for tax is determined by the law then in effect, even though the tax be not payable until the death of the transferor. Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961; Estate of Felton, 176 Cal. 663, 169 Pac. 392; Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126, 175 Pac. 641.

With this proposition as a premise, counsel for the state argue that upon the making of the transfer here involved there vested in the state the right to the tax imposed by the statute then in force, and that this right cannot be divested by a subsequent statute of another jurisdiction. This we may concede; but, conceding it, the question still remains as to the method of computing the amount of the tax, the right to which so vested. This is the real question in the case. It is evident that, if the tax is by our statute to be computed on the value of the property as of the date of transfer, then to permit this value to be reduced by the amount of taxes imposed subsequently by other sovereignties would be to reduce the tax from what our statute provides shall be collected. On the other hand, if our statute provides that the valuation is to be made as of the date of death of the transferor, then the valuation which our own statute calls for is one that must take into account valid burdens then existing upon the beneficial interests transferred, and which have the effect of taking from the beneficiaries a portion of those interests, and it is wholly immaterial that such burdens were or were not imposed at or prior to the time of transfer. They exist at the time of death, when the valuation is to be made, and reduce the value as of that time, and it is this value which our statute calls for. The question, therefore, presents itself as to whether under our own statute the tax in this case is to be computed upon the value of the beneficial interests transferred as of the date of transfer, or as of the date of the death of Miller, the transferor.

When the dates of transfer and death are the same—that is, in the usual case where the transfer is by death—the question does not arise, and the statute plainly contemplates a valuation as of the joint date of transfer and death. There is no declaration in the statute as to what shall be the rule when the dates are not the same; i. e., when a taxable transfer is made prior to the death of the transferor. The statute, however, does contain a provision which closely approaches a declaration that the valuation of future, contingent, or limited estates, created by the transfer, shall be as of the date of death. Such estates were created by the transfer here involved. The beneficial interests under the trust were a life estate in Miller, with remainder over to his daughter and her husband for their lives, and to the survivor of them for his or her life, with remainder over in fee. The provision of the statute referred to is the portion of section 5 reading (the italics being ours):

> "When any grant, gift, legacy, devise or succession upon which a tax is imposed by section one of this act shall be an estate, income, or interest for a term of years, or for life, or determinable upon any future or contingent event, or shall be a remainder, reversion, or other expectancy, real or personal, the entire property or fund by which such estate, income, or interest is supported, or of which it is a part, shall be appraised immediately after the death of the decedent, and the market value thereof determined, in the manner provided in section fifteen of this act. * * *" St. 1911, p. 713.

This provision is plainly one for the valuation of future, contingent, or limited estates. It appropriately requires an appraisal, both of the property as a whole out of which such estates are carved, and of the particular estates into which it is carved. Grammatically, the "market value thereof," as those words are used, would refer to the market value of the property as a whole, but a consideration of the purpose of the provision and of the character of the estates with which it is dealing makes it evident that it is the market values of the particular estates which are to be determined in the manner provided by section 15. It is these values upon which the tax must be computed, and the method of their ascertainment is what the section is seeking to provide for. Section 15 in turn appropriately provides that the value of future, contingent, or limited estates is to be determined in accordance with the mortality tables.

The provision of section 5, particularly significant upon the point under discussion, is that the appraisal in such cases, whether the taxable transfer be by death or inter vivos, be made "immediately after the death of the decedent." This, of course, is literally a provision as to the time of actually making the appraisal, not as to the time as of which it shall be made. It is also true that it is possible, when a transfer has been made preceding the death of the transferor, to appraise estates dependent upon his death as of the date of transfer and not as of the date of actual death although that death has already taken place. For example, in this case it would be possible to appraise the life estate of Miller's daughter and her husband, and of the subsequent remainder in fee, by going back to the date of transfer, disregarding the actual date of Miller's death, and taking in place of it the date of his probable death, according to the mortality tables, and upon this basis computing the value of the life estate which he provided for himself, and of the life estates and the remainder which were to follow. But such method would not be a natural or reasonable one. At the time when the statute requires the appraisal to be made, the death upon which the estates to be valued depend has actually occurred, and the natural and reasonable method of computing their value would be to take the actual date of death, rather than one determined by mortality tables, which might be very different, and the use of which would produce a correspondingly different result from the existing and known actuality. We think it fairly certain, therefore, that when the statute provides that in such cases as the present the appraisal is to be made immediately after the death of the transferor, it contemplates and requires that the appraisal be on the basis of the actual date of his death, and therefore, of necessity, as of that date.

We should, perhaps, say that the conclusion so reached, based, as it is, on the particular provisions of section 5 as to the appraisal of future, contingent, or limited estates, does not involve a determination of the question as to whether it is the date of transfer or the date of death of the transferor as of which the appraisement should be made in cases of taxable transfers inter vivos which do not create estates of that particular character. That question is not involved here, and should not be determined. It is worthy of note, however, that in a case recently argued before us, where the question is involved, the position of the state, contrary to that which it must necessarily take here, was that the property was to be valued as of the date of death of the transferor, and also that it was conceded on behalf of the transferee, who was contending that the valuation there should be as of the date of transfer, that if the estates created had been future, limited, or contingent estates, section 5 would require their appraisal as of the date of the death of the transferor.

Since, then, the appraisal in this case must be made under our statute as of the date of Miller's death, and at that time the federal and Nevada statutes had gone into effect, and the net clear value of the beneficial interests transferred had been reduced by the amounts of any valid taxes under those statutes, it is this reduced value which our statute prescribes shall be taken as the basis of computation. It follows that it is not material that the transfer was made before the going into effect of the Federal and Nevada statutes, and that the conclusion reached upon a discussion of the case as one of a transfer by death remains unaffected.

Direct testimony may be contradicted by circumstantial evidence, and the contradiction may be so strong that it will justify a disbelief of the testimony.

3. Carriers 🔑295(2) Operation of elevator with door open negligence.

The operation of an elevator with the doors opening into it open while passing a floor is negligence.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Verdict on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed.

5. Appeal and error 🔑837(11)—Incompetent evidence admitted without objection considered on appeal.

Technically incompetent evidence admitted without objection will be given as much weight by appellate court passing on the sufficiency of the evidence as if it were competent.

6. Death 🔑82—Damages for suffering of deceased child not recoverable.

In parents' action for death of son under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, only such damages as have been suffered by the parent can be recovered; no damages being allowed for the pain or anguish inflicted on the child.

7. Death 🔑86(1)—Expectancy of life considered in fixing damages to parents.

8. Death 🔑58(2) — Son's benefit to parents presumed to continue during mother's survivorship of father.

In parents' action for son's death, where the mother will survive the father according to her expectancy, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the benefit to the parents from the son would have continued during her survivorship the same as during the lives of both of them.

9. Death 🔑88—Damages recoverable for loss of society having pecuniary value.

In parents' action for son's death under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, damages are recoverable for deprivation of the society, comfort, and protection of the deceased son only where the circumstances show a reasonable probability that such society, comfort, and protection had a pecuniary value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by B. W. Parsons and another against Ansell M. Easton. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Watt, Miller, Thornton & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $6,000.

The action was instituted by the plaintiffs, as father and mother and heirs at law of one Jay Parsons, to recover damages from the defendant on account of the death of said Jay Parsons, which, it is alleged, was the result of defendant's negligence. The defendant assigns error in denying his motion for a nonsuit, and he also claims that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the allegation that the death of Jay Parsons was caused by the defendant's negligence, and that the damages allowed by the jury were excessive. The question presented on the motion for nonsuit is not substantially different from that presented by the assignment of the insufficiency of the evidence, and the two propositions may be considered together.

The defendant was the owner of an office building in Oakland and maintained and operated therein a passenger elevator. The death of the deceased was caused by injuries received by him while a passenger in the elevator.

The floor of the elevator cage on the inside was 5 feet and 6 inches in length and 4 feet and 9½ inches in width. The cage had no door, but for ingress and egress an opening was provided at the front on the left-hand side going out. This opening was 3 feet wide and about 7 feet high. The cage ran up and down in a shaft composed of vertical iron bars five-sixteenths of an inch square, set 2½ inches apart. On each floor of the building there was a sliding door in the front of the shaft, opening opposite to the corresponding opening in the cage. This door was 2 feet 7½ inches wide and 7 feet 5 inches high. It was moved on wheels running upon an iron rail set on edge, 2 inches wide and three-eighths of an inch thick, extending entirely across the shaft. The distance between this rail and the cage as it passed was only 2 inches. Seven inches above this carriage rail was another rail or bar extending across the shaft, the distance from which to the passing cage was 2½ inches. Immediately above this bar there was a small steel air cylinder 18 inches long, parallel to the bar. It was used to open and close the door by air pressure. Above the air cylinder, for a distance of 3 feet, the space between the vertical bars of the shaft and the passing cage was 5½ inches. The air cylinder projected so far into the shaft that it left only one inch between it and the cage as it passed. The operator in running the elevator stood at the right-hand front part of the cage next to the end thereof. The full speed of the elevator was 550 feet per minute.

On the occasion of the accident Parsons and one other person entered the elevator. The other person got out at the second floor. Parsons was bound for the sixth floor, and was standing with his back against the end of the cage and about 2 feet from the front thereof until the third floor was reached. At that instant, according to the testimony of the operator, the only eyewitness, Parsons fell over to his left toward the front of the cage, turning his face to the front as he fell, bringing his right arm immediately under the projecting air cylinder so that it was caught there by the floor of the rapidly ascending cage. Upon seeing him fall, the operator immediately moved the lever to stop the cage, and it was stopped 3 feet above the door and just as the floor of the cage reached the bottom of the fourth floor. No negligence is charged on account of there not being a quicker stop. The operator immediately called the engineer of the building and with his assistance extricated Parsons. His body was wedged at or immediately above the hips between the floor of the cage, the floor above, and the iron bars of the shaft. His head, arms, and trunk were hanging down in the elevator shaft below the cage floor with the face toward the rear wall of the shaft. His legs and feet were inside the cage lying over on the floor. The pressure of the cage against the bars of the shaft or some of the irons connected therewith had ruptured the ascending colon and severely bruised the body immediately above the hips, from which injuries Parsons died a few hours later. The operator testified that the third floor door into the shaft was closed as he passed it. The engineer testified that it was closed when he arrived on the scene. There was no other direct evidence on that point, and there is no evidence tending to show that the motion of the cage or anything done in its operation caused Parsons to fall.

Relying on the testimony that the door into the elevator shaft was closed at the time, the defendant contends, in accordance with the testimony of the operator, that by reason of the fall of Parsons toward the front of the cage his head, shoulders, and body were drawn into the 5½-inch space between the cage floor and shaft bars above the door after the cage floor had reached that space and while the cage was traveling the remaining 3 feet before it was stopped, and that the body was crushed immediately above the hips, as above described, by the pressure. As the fall, if such it was, was not brought about by the operation of the elevator, the result, upon this theory, would be that the negligence of the defendant was not proven to be the cause of the injury.

[1] The attendant circumstances appearing in the evidence are somewhat inconsistent with this theory, and they tend to show that the elevator door was open at that floor, and that that fact caused the injury. If the head and upper part of the body did not enter the space between the cage floor and the sides of the shaft until the cage floor reached the 5½-inch space above the cross rails at the top of the door, it is extremely improbable that there would be no injury of any consequence to the head or any part of the body except at and just above the hips and no crushing or rupture of the internal organs except the ascending colon, and no abrasions or contusions of the skin or flesh at any other part of the body. Yet these facts were shown by the evidence. The injuries at and immediately above the hips were very great. There must have been much greater pressure at that point than upon any part of the body above them. Yet, upon the theory of the defendant, the head and upper parts of the body must have passed first into the narrow space between the shaft and the cage floor, and the part of the body which received the injuries was drawn in afterwards. As the shoulders and chest of a normal man would have been practically as large as the portion at the small of the back and immediately above the hips, it is reasonable to believe that the pressure on the upper parts would have been enough to make perceptible lacerations of the skin, bruises, and contusions upon the shoulders and chest. If the door of the shaft opening on to the third floor was open at the time, the condition of the body is more easily explained. If Parsons, seeing it open, had impulsively thrown himself forward to get out, under the impression that it was his floor, or had fallen from some other cause toward the front of the cage at that point, it is entirely reasonable to suppose that the upper part of his body might have passed through the opening just far enough to have been caught at the hips by the top of the door, where there is a space of only 2 inches between the floor of the cage and the iron carriage rail which there extended across the shaft. This would have produced great pressure at that point and would have caused the rupture and bruises described as appearing at that part of the body. This pressure would have been relieved as soon as the floor of the cage had passed this rail and the other cross rail 7 inches above it so that the upper parts of the body coming, as they would in that event, into the wider space immediately above these cross rails, would hang free in the shaft below and would sustain comparatively little injury. It is true that there is evidence indicating that the injury may have been caused, just as the elevator was stopped, by the jamming of the body against the projecting lower edge of the fourth floor. But it was for the jury to determine between the two theories, since both were reasonable deductions from the circumstances.

[2-4] Direct testimony may be contradicted by circumstantial evidence, and the contradiction may be so strong that it will justify a disbelief of the testimony. We think that in the present case the circumstances contradictory of the testimony as to the door being closed and as to the manner of the accident are sufficient to justify the jury in rejecting that testimony and adopting the theory indicated by the circumstances above stated. The operation of an elevator with the doors opening into it open while passing a floor is clearly negligence. Consequently we cannot overturn the verdict on the ground that the evidence does not show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

[5] The plaintiffs testified that shortly before his death the son, in telling his mother how the accident happened, said that he "thought he was there before he got there" and started to get off. This is corroborative of the theory that the door may have been open. Although this evidence was technically incompetent, it was admitted without objection. It must therefore be given as much weight in this court, in reviewing the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, as if it were competent. Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 223; Curiac v. Packard, 29 Cal. 197; McCloud v. O'Neall, 16 Cal. 397; Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 102, 77 Pac. 762. The plea of contributory negligence did not aver the attempt to get off the elevator at the wrong floor as a part of such negligence, but limited it to the act of falling toward the front of the cage.

[6] The next question is in respect of the claim that the damages are excessive. Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in an action by heirs for damages arising from the death of a person not a minor, "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." The present action is brought under this section. The rules upon the subject of the measure of damages in such cases are as follows:

> "In actions by a parent, either for the death or the injury of a child, the damages to be allowed are those, and those only, which have been, or may be, suffered by the parent. No damages can be given in such an action for pain or anguish inflicted on the child, or for any pecuniary injury personal to such child. * * * The damages are limited to the pecuniary loss suffered by the person or persons for whose benefit the right of action is given from the death or injury of the victim." Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 277, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50.
> "This pecuniary loss may be either a loss arising from the deprivation of something to which such heirs would have been legally entitled if the person had lived, or a loss arising from a deprivation of benefits which, from all the circumstances of the particular case, it could be reasonably expected such heirs would have received from the deceased had his life not been taken, although the obligation resting on him to bestow such benefits on them may have been a moral obligation only." Sneed v. Marysville Gas, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 710, 87 Pac. 379.

In 17 Corpus Juris, 1331, the rule is set forth more in detail as follows:

> "When the action is by a parent for the death of an adult son, substantial damages are recoverable only by showing that the deceased had been of actual pecuniary benefit to his parent, or that such benefit might be reasonably expected by the continuance of his life, the reasonable character of such expectation to appear from the facts in evidence, such as for instance the age of deceased, his wages, habits as to economy, and amount of help given by deceased to his parent."

[7] It is the shorter expectancy of life that is to be taken into consideration; for example, if, as in the case here, the expectancy of life of the parents is shorter than that of the son, the benefits to be considered are those only which might accrue during the life of the surviving parents. Id.; Redfield v. Oakland, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 287, 42 Pac. 822, 1063.

The facts relating to this subject are as follows: Jay Parsons, the deceased, was about 27½ years of age at the time of his death. When about 17 years old he became insane, and on September 6, 1907, he was committed to the Napa State Hospital for the Insane. Thereafter he was confined in said hospital for the following periods: From September 6, 1907, to March 1, 1908; from November 13, 1909, to February 6, 1912; from April 23, 1912, to June 12, 1912; from August 5, 1912, to April 1, 1913; from September 22, 1915, to June 21, 1917, less than 3 months prior to his death. During his absence after April 1, 1913, he was discharged from the hospital, on July 21, 1915, but not as cured, and he was recommitted thereto on September 22, 1915. He was not discharged on June 21, 1917, but was allowed to go on leave of absence. Shortly afterward he obtained work as messenger for the Postal Telegraph Company and remained in its service until his death, September 17, 1917, earning about $30 a month thereby. During this period he lived with his parents and occasionally contributed small sums of money to the support of the family. His mother testified that she was "lenient with him"; that "whatever he gave" to her was satisfactory; that "he gave me just what I wanted"; that there was no regular sum paid; and that the money he gave was not asked for by her, but was offered by him. There was no evidence as to the amount of any payment nor as to the total amount, nor of any previous contributions by him to his parents. He had only $10 in his possession at the time of his death. When about 5 years old his left leg became diseased in some manner, and he was kept in a hospital for 5 or 6 months for treatment thereof. The leg shrunk in size and it never recovered. The physician at the Napa Hospital who examined him on his recommitment thereto in September, 1915, testified that at that time the circumference of the left thigh in the upper third was 9 inches, while of the right thigh at the same point was 16 inches, and that of the left calf 6 inches while that of the right calf was 11 inches, and that the left leg was 2½ inches shorter than the right. He was, however, able to walk without difficulty and did not limp so as to be especially noticeable. Upon that examination he was not found to be insane, but was found to be mentally defective or "inferior." He was of a kind and affectionate disposition and well disposed toward his parents. His father testified that when he was out of the hospital he would take trips to New Orleans, St. Louis, Denver, Oregon, and different parts of the country and would sometimes be away for 2 years at a time. As will be noted from the hospital record, he was never out of the hospital as long as 2 years except between the dates of April 1, 1913, and September 22, 1915. The father also testified that when the son was away from home he would write to his mother for money and she would send it to him. He was a person of ordinary intelligence in some respects and was usually in good health. His own statement made to the physician at the Napa Hospital on October 6, 1915, a month after his recommitment, was that when he was out of the hospital on previous occasions he had sometimes helped his father in the father's business of distributing newspapers; that he also took care of the yard at home; that he had worked at odd jobs for meals in Los Angeles, Omaha, Oregon, and Oakland, and that 7 days was the longest time he had ever worked at one place; that he went away and traveled just to see the country, working his way for his board at times and riding in box cars.

[8] The son being 27 years old at the time of his death, his expectancy of life, according to accepted mortality tables, was 37 years. His father's age was 69½ years, with an expectancy of life of nearly 7 years. The mother's age was a little under 60 years, and her expectancy of life was a little over 14 years. This, of course, assumes ordinary good health. In the absence of anything to the contrary, the presumption would be that the benefit of the parents from the son, if any, would have continued during her survivorship the same as during the lives of both of them. Hence it is proper to consider the value in money of the benefits which, from all the circumstances of the case, the parents might be reasonably expected to derive from the son during their expectancy of joint life and for the remainder of the mother's life expectancy, assuming that the son's life would have continued for that period.

He was earning at the time of his death at the rate of $360 a year. Assuming that of this amount $180 yearly might have been devoted to the benefit of his parents, this benefit if continued during the life of the mother, would be the equivalent of an annuity of $180 for 14 years. Since the damage is to be paid in cash, the award on this account should not have exceeded the present worth of the annual contributions for the future period. Allowing 7 per cent. as the rate of interest and discount, at compound interest, the present worth of such an annuity would be $1,574. At a 6 per cent. rate the present worth would be $1,673. The evidence shows that up to the time of his death, instead of being of any pecuniary or other benefit to his parents, he had always been a burden and a cause of solicitude and care to them, except during the last 3 months, when he contributed small unascertained sums to his mother. There is nothing in the proof as to his character and capacity to indicate any reasonable probability that he would ever contribute materially to their comfort or support, or would ever be able to earn more than would be necessary for his own support. Any reasonable estimate of his probable earnings and contributions therefrom for the benefit of his parents must fall far short of the $6,000 awarded by the verdict. Considering his physical malformation and mental inferiority and the restless habits of previous years, even the sum above stated could not reasonably be expected by them from him.

[9, 10] It is also held that, in addition to the pecuniary loss arising from deprivation of direct financial assistance or services, while nothing can be allowed for grief, sorrow, and mental suffering of the heirs of a person whose death is caused by negligence, additional damages may be given where the "circumstances" referred to in section 377 indicate that there may be a pecuniary loss to a parent from the death of a child or to a wife from the death of her husband arising from the deprivation of the "society, comfort and protection" of such child or husband. Beeson v. Green Mountain G. M. Co., 57 Cal. 38; Munro v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 525, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248. But this is not a universal right existing in every case. It is allowable only where the "circumstances" show a reasonable probability that the "society, comfort, and protection" afforded to the surviving parent or wife was of such a character that it would be of pecuniary advantage to the parent or wife, and that a deprivation thereof would entail a pecuniary loss to them. Thus in the Beeson Case the court said:

> "The loss of a kind husband might be a considerable pecuniary loss to a wife; she loses his advice and assistance in many matters of domestic economy."

Manifestly no allowance can be made because of a possible loss arising from circumstances which do not appear from the evidence and which rest upon conjecture or imagination. The evidence in this case does not show circumstances indicating that the society, comfort, and protection of the son had been of any appreciable pecuniary advantage to the plaintiffs, or any reasonable probability that it would be so in the future. It may be that they dearly loved him and that they loved him the more because of his infirmities and helplessness. But it is pecuniary loss only, and not the loss of an object of love and affection, that the law recognizes as ground for allowing damages to the heirs of one whose death has been caused by the negligence of a third person. No great sum could reasonably be given as damages in this case on account of the deprivation by the plaintiff of the society, comfort, and protection of the deceased. A verdict of $6,000 is clearly greater than the evidence warrants.

The judgment is reversed.

LAW v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 9543.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law ⚷135, 298(1) — Public service commissions ⚷2—Change of utility rates as fixed by contract is within the police powers, and not interferences with contract obligation or denial of due process.

The change of rates to be charged for public service by a public utility corporation from those fixed by private contract is within the police power of the state, and is not an interference with the obligation of the contract, or a taking of property without due process of law, even though the contract was made before the enactment of the statute authorizing the change.

2. Public service commissions ⚷19(1)—Reference to other proceeding does not invalidate complete order.

Where an order of the Railroad Commission was complete in itself, finding that the rates therein fixed were just and reasonable charges for the service and prescribing them for all consumers, a reference in the order to findings made in another proceeding is superfluous and cannot vitiate the order in view of Civ. Code, § 3537.

3. Public service commissions ⚷15—Need not consider evidence as to value of privileges given by consumer.

In view of Public Utilities Act, § 17(b), prohibiting a public utility from receiving a greater or less, or different compensation than the rates fixed by the commission, privileges given by the consumer to the utility in part payment for service are different compensation prohibited by the act, so that, in proceedings to fix the reasonable rates, the commission need not receive evidence of the value of such privileges.

4. Steam ⚷5—Order changing rates fixed by contract authorizes rescission of privileges.

A contract whereby a consumer was entitled to heat from a public service company at rates therein specified in addition to privileges given the utility by the consumer can be rescinded by the consumer when the Railroad Commission fixes rates for such public service in excess of those fixed by the contract, and the utility can thereafter exercise those privileges only by paying an agreed compensation to the consumer.

In Bank.

Petition by Hartland Law for certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission of California fixing rates for steam power in excess of those fixed by private contract. Order to show cause dismissed.

Alexander McCulloch, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The questions in this case are before this court as the result of an order to show cause in response to a petition for a writ directing a review of an order of the Railroad Commission alleged to be violative of certain constitutional rights of petitioner.

In May, 1910, the petitioner and one Frederick G. Cartwright entered into a written contract, for a period of 20 years, whereby said Cartwright agreed to furnish steam and electricity for purposes of heating, power, and illumination in a building in the city of San Francisco owned by petitioner. The commodities furnished were to be paid for by petitioner at certain rates set forth in the contract, and, in addition, Cartwright was granted the right to use free of charge parts of said building and premises belonging to petitioner. The right thus granted included the privilege of using certain wells, a smokestack, a steam and water circuit extending from said building under the streets of the city to another building, and the right of constructing and maintaining tanks on the roof of the building and of installing and maintaining motors, pumps, and pipes in the basement of the building. Cartwright assigned this contract to the Great Western Power Company. Subsequent to the assignment the present Railroad Commission of the state of California was created, the Public Utilities Act of 1915 was passed, and the Great Western Power Company, considered as a corporation furnishing heat, became a public utility under said act. In May, 1920, the Railroad Commission made an order wherein it directed that all steam heating consumers should be charged upon a uniform basis for heating service, approved certain schedules of rates for steam heating service, and, in effect, prohibited deviations from said schedule under existing contracts providing different rates. Petitioner complains of this order in so far as it affects his rights under his contract.

[1] There is no longer any question as to the power of a state to fix rates for a public utility service which will supersede rates for such service previously fixed by private contract between the consumer and the company. It has been conclusively settled that the interference with private contracts by the state regulation of rates is but a legitimate effect of a valid exercise of the police power which neither impairs the obligation of a contract nor deprives of property without due process of law. Atlantic Coast Line Ry. Co. v. Goldsboro, 232 U. S. 548, 558, 34 Sup. Ct. 364, 58 L. Ed. 721; Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Public Service Corp., 248 U. S. 372, 39 Sup. Ct. 117, 63 L. Ed. 309, 9 A. L. R. 1420; S. P. Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 173 Cal. 291, 159 Pac. 865, L. R. A. 1917E, 680; Limoneira Co. v. R. R. Comm., 174 Cal. 232, 162 Pac. 1033. It is immaterial that petitioner's contract was entered into prior to the enactment of the present Public Utilities Act and the amendment thereto by which steam heating service was included as a utility to be regulated. If the service contracted for was devoted to public use (Allen v. R. R. Comm., 179 Cal. 68, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249), the contract for the service was subject to the exercise of the police power, and, the state having elected to confer upon the Commission the power to prescribe uniform rates for the service, petitioner cannot complain if the exercise of this power results in the practical annulment of his private contract fixing compensation for a public service (Producers' Transportation Co. v. R. R. Comm., 251 U. S. 228, 40 Sup. Ct. 131, 64 L. Ed. 239).

[2] Petitioner raises the objection that the opinion and order of the Commission refer to findings made in another proceeding. The proceeding referred to was one in which an order was made prescribing rates for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and prohibiting departures therefrom under private contract. This reference was made only by way of amplification for the purpose of indicating the attitude of the Commission in a previous parallel case. Nothing appears to suggest that the present proceeding was not independent and complete in itself or that the conclusion of the Commission was not based solely upon the facts presented therein. The substance of the opinion and order in the present case is that certain rates are found and declared to be just, fair, and reasonable charges for steam heating service by the Great Western Power Company, and such rates are accordingly prescribed for all consumers. The reference complained of does not affect the substance of the order, and, being superfluous, it cannot vitiate the order. Civ. Code, § 3537.

[3] It is pointed out that there was no evidence before the Commission as to whether the rates provided by petitioner's contract, when considered with the grant of privileges in the use of petitioner's property, were in fact discriminatory. Under section 17 (b) of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1919, pp. 488, 496), it is provided that no public utility shall receive "a greater or less or different compensation," than the rates fixed by the Commission. The same section provides that the Commission may establish such exceptions from the operation of this prohibition as it may consider just and reasonable. It appears from the face of petitioner's contract that the compensation provided therein is "different" from that fixed by the Commission. It was therefore unnecessary for the Commission to receive evidence as to the value of the privileges granted by petitioner in order to determine the amount of the rate fixed by the contract. It is not essential that a rate be greater or less in amount in order to be discriminatory; a difference in character of payment, such as the granting of privileges or concessions, may in itself give just such advantages as the act is designated to prevent. The contract did, in fact, fix a "different" compensation than that prescribed by the Commission. It therefore came within the general prohibition of the Public Utilities Act, and the Commission was not obliged to receive further evidence in order to determine whether or not an exception should be made.

[4] Having disposed of this point, for we deem it unnecessary to say more in regard thereto, there remains the claim of petitioner that, if the Great Western Power Company is to retain its right given by the contract to use agencies and appliances belonging to him, the order will operate to deprive plaintiff of the use of his property without compensation, and, by compelling him, in effect, to pay a higher rate than other consumers, create the discrimination it purports to abolish. If the order attempted to change the rate paid by petitioner and at the same time give the power company the right to continue to use the agencies and appliances of petitioner under the contract, then it would, indeed, exceed the jurisdiction of the Commission by depriving petitioner of his property without compensation and due process of law. This, however, is not the effect of the order, which simply does what the law permits, namely, fixes the rates to be paid by the consumer, and therefore nullifies the compensation fixed by the contract. It follows, of course, in view of the change effected by the order in such an important part of the contract, that petitioner will have the right under the law to rescind the contract, and prevent further use of his property by the former company, except for compensation properly determined. See Newport v. Temescal, etc., Water Co., 149 Cal. 538, 87 Pac. 372, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098; Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 415, 426, 147 Pac. 567.

The order to show cause is dismissed.

FIGARI v. OLCESE et al. (S. F. 9219.)

1. Bills and notes 🔑48—Signer qualifying signature by word "witness" held not liable as maker.

If a person subscribed his name to a note as maker without qualification and without notice or knowledge on the part of the payee that he was only intending to witness the signature of the other maker, he would be bound as maker, but where he wrote the word "witness" before his name, and where the payee knew that he was receiving no consideration, and that he had been asked to sign the note merely as a witness, he was not liable as the maker.

2. Evidence 🔑423(6)—Party who signed as maker may show that with payee's knowledge he signed in other capacity.

Under Civ. Code, § 2832, one who has signed note apparently as maker may show by parol evidence as against the payee that he has signed with the knowledge of the payee in a different capacity and with a different liability, where such facts are pleaded.

3. Appeal and error 🔑994(3)—Credibility of witness for trial court.

The credibility of witnesses is exclusively within the province of the trial court.

4. Evidence 🔑591—Defendant's testimony when called as witness by plaintiff to be given proper weight, although not conclusive on plaintiff.

Testimony of defendant called as plaintiff's witnesses under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, is to be given its proper weight, notwithstanding that under such statute plaintiff is not bound by such testimony; such provision of the statute meaning merely that such testimony is to be treated as though given on cross-examination, and that plaintiff is not concluded from rebutting the testimony or from impeaching the witnesses.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Andrea Figari against G. B. Olcese and Emilio Olcese. From a judgment for the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Schilling, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William A. Kelly and H. C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff brought this action to recover on a promissory note purporting to have been executed by the defendants.

The question here presented is whether the respondent, Emilio Olcese, signed the note as a maker, or merely as a witness to the signature of his codefendant, G. B. Olcese.

The trial court found that respondent signed the instrument only as a witness.

The appeal is from the judgment in respondent's favor, and is based upon the contention that the above finding is not supported by the evidence.

The instrument, as reproduced in the record shows the names of both defendants in the usual place of signature by the makers of a promissory note. The name of respondent, Emilio Olcese, is directly under that of his codefendant, an admitted maker of the note. The only distinguishing feature is that the word "Witness" appears immediately in front of respondent's signature.

The undisputed facts are that the plaintiff, Figari, loaned $1,300 to the defendant G. B. Olcese, and received this note as evidence of the indebtedness. The defendant Emilio Olcese is the son of the other defendant, and at the time of this transaction was 26 years old and was in the employment of his father in the latter's grocery store, and had no personal interest in and received no part of the borrowed money.

Figari was about 56 years of age and an Italian. Both he and the elder Olcese had an imperfect knowledge of English. The plaintiff was unable to read or write the English language.

Although the testimony is conflicting on the point at issue, plaintiff's testimony is that he had been given to understand by the elder Olcese that the note was to be signed by both the father and son, and that he accepted the note in the belief that both had signed it as makers, and did not know that Emilio Olcese had written the word "Witness" before his name until many months after the note was executed. The two principals, Figari and Olcese, went to a notary and had the note drawn up. It does not appear clearly whether the elder Olcese signed it at the notary's office or later. At any rate, the deal was not closed there, but the parties met the next morning at the office of Olcese over his store, at which time and place Figari produced his money to complete the loan. It is at this point that the matter in controversy arises as to Emilio Olcese's relation to the transaction. Figari says that he went the next morning to get the note. He testifies:

> "Emilio, the son, gave me the note." "I say, 'I want to see you put your name.' He say, 'I put it all ready.' I say, 'I like to see it. Some time I can't read. I like to see you put your name.' He told his father, 'He wants me to put my name again,' and the father say, 'Yes; put it again.'"

He further testified in this connection that the son then took the pen and retraced his name and handed him the note. There was other testimony of Figari indicating that it was agreed between him and the elder Olcese that the son, and perhaps the wife, was to join in signing the note. At any rate, it is enough to say, from plaintiff's standpoint, that Figari's testimony, standing uncontradicted, would sufficiently establish Emilio's liability as a maker of the note, and had the trial court found accordingly such finding might well be held conclusive.

Both the father and the son, however, dispute this version of the transaction. On this controverted point the testimony of the elder Olcese, in substance, is as follows:

> "My son was present when the money was delivered. He was outside of the store, and I told my son, Mr. Figari told me, 'I would like to see your son and I give you the money;' so I called Emilio to come up, and Emilio came up, and Mr. Figari looked at the money, and he told me, 'Now, you got the money here,' and he say, 'Your son can sign.' He says, 'You have your son sign this note to see I give you the money.'" "Well, my son was there and I told him myself to sign the note." Q. But you have just stated that Mr. Figari said to you in your son's presence to have your son sign as a witness. A. Mr. Figari told me, and he said he was telling me. He told me first, my son was not present, and I called him up and I told him to come up to the office. * * * Mr. Figari came to my office and counted the money and put it on the desk, and after he got the money counted and before I took the money he asked me, 'We are here alone and I give you the money.' He would like to have somebody see that I give you the money, and he says, 'Is your son downstairs,' and I said, 'Yes,' and called my son up, and I says, 'I got some money here, and I would like to have you come up,' and I told him—he don't know Figari—I told my son, 'I got some money, and I show it and he loan some money, and I want you to come up and see the man lend the money. Mr. Figari was present. Q. Did you hear your son testify here a little while ago that Mr. Figari was not present; that he was on the outside? Mr. Kelly: That is not the testimony. The testimony of both witnesses is to the effect that Mr. Olcese went outside and called Emilio and brought him into the room where the money was and had Emilio sign the paper in the presence of both of them. The Court: That is the testimony. Q. At what particular place did you ask your son Emilio to come and sign the note? A. Right there in front of the money, in my office. * * * In the presence of Mr. Figari I asked my son to sign the note to witness, so Figari says, so Figari could see him loan me the money, and my son sign as a witness, and Mr. Figari turned around, and he didn't see my son do the writing, and he said to my son, 'I like to see you sign; I like to see you sign your name next,' and my son says, 'Yes; I have signed that.' Mr. Figari never say nothing about a witness; he never mentioned anything about seeing the money turned over and like to see him sign like a witness, and he never say anything else. My son don't have anything to do with the business."

This testimony is confusing and perhaps contradictory, but there is nothing in it to indicate that Emilio Olcese had any intimation from either his father or the plaintiff that he was signing other than as a witness. It would appear from the testimony of this witness that Figari had no conversation with Emilio as to the capacity in which he was to sign the note, that his communication in that regard was entirely with the father, but that the statement was made to the son in Figari's presence that he was asked to sign as a witness.

The respondent's own testimony on this point is more explicit. His testimony in substance is as follows:

> "The first time I saw Mr. Figari to know him was when I signed the note. I knew nothing about the negotiation of the note. I saw the money delivered to G. B. Olcese."
> "Mr. G. B. Olcese came outside and I saw him; he was borrowing some money from Mr. Figari. Mr. Figari was upstairs in the office, and he wanted me to sign the note as a witness. Mr. G. B. Olcese asked me to sign the note as a witness that he took the money. I was outside handling potatoes and stuff, and Mr. Olcese asked me to sign the note as a witness. I believe the note was signed by my father when I signed it. I signed right under his name. I saw him sign it. He signed first and I signed afterwards. Mr. Figari was there, right between me and my father. He told me to go over it again, and I went over it. He says, 'Let me see you sign it,' and I went over it again and signed the note. I don't know whether he saw me sign it the first time; he was there. He never asked me to go over it again. I ran my pen over my name a second time. Mr. Olcese asked me to sign the note.

Figari never asked me to sign the note. I never signed the note for Figari. I went over it when he asked me to go over it. I will show you just how it was done. Mr. G. B. Olcese came out and asked me if I would sign the note as a witness, and I told him 'Yes.' I come upstairs, took the pen, and signed that note. Mr. Figari was there, and he says 'Let me see you sign the note; go over it.' Q. Mr. Figari did not ask you to sign the note as a witness? A. Not at all; he asked me to go over it. I never had any experience with a promissory note. That was the first note seen. I had never had any experience with promissory notes at that time. I did not know anything about whether a promissory note needed to be witnessed. The first time I knew anything at all about the fact of a loan was when I was asked to go up where the note was signed."

It seems to be conceded that the respondent wrote the word "Witness" before his name when he signed the note. The only reference in the evidence to this point is the following questions by plaintiff's attorneys and respondent's answers thereto:

"Q. And you signed the word 'Witness' in front of your name? A. I know what I signed, and he had the note there and I signed. Q. So when you put your name to the note and put in front of it 'Witness' you are not positive whether or not you had seen your father sign the note? A. Oh, yes; G. B. Olcese's name was on the note before I signed it."

It also appears from other evidence that the word "Witness" was written before respondent retraced his signature at plaintiff's request.

It is argued in behalf of appellant that when the respondent, at Figari's statement that he wanted to see him sign, retraced his signature without retracing the word "Witness," it was a new and unqualified signing of the note. No such inference can be drawn from this circumstance. Respondent had been told, according to the testimony, in the presence of Figari, that he was to sign as a witness. If he signed as a witness under these circumstances, he had a right, when told by Figari that he wanted to see him sign, to assume that he was retracing his signature for the same purpose and in the same capacity that he originally wrote it.

Of course, it seems improbable that Figari should have been so insistent upon seeing the signature made if it was only to witness the making of the note by the elder Olcese. But that is not the point. The controlling circumstance is that Emilio Olcese was acting with the understanding that he was only signing in the capacity of a witness, and there was nothing in the fact of this request to rewrite his name calculated to change the situation.

[1, 2] There is no doubt under the law that, if he had subscribed his name without qualification and without notice or knowledge on the part of Figari that he was only intending to witness his father's execution of the note, he would be bound as a maker, but such is not the situation here. He was not in any way a party in interest. If the trial court believed the testimony of the defendants, as it apparently did, Emilio Olcese went into his father's office where the note was being executed with no other idea in his mind than that he was being asked to put his name to the paper merely as a witness, and that both parties so understood. He was told by his father in Figari's presence that the latter wanted him to see the money delivered and to sign as a witness. He made his own understanding of the matter plain by writing the word "Witness" immediately preceding his signature. It is true that Figari testified that he could not read or write the English language, but the court finds that this fact was not known to respondent. The only evidence tending to show such knowledge was the remark testified to by Figari that in asking respondent to again sign his name he gave as a reason the statement, "Some time I can't read." Respondent had a right to assume, not only from what his father had told him in Figari's presence, but from what he had signified on the note itself, that it was understood by Figari that he was signing as a witness. Under these circumstances the request that he sign again, or that he retrace his signature, so that Figari could see it written, would not carry any different significance as to what was expected of him than attended the original signature. Even where one has joined apparently as a maker of a note, he may show by parol evidence, as against the payee, that he has signed with the knowledge of the payee in a different capacity and with a different liability where, as here, such facts are pleaded. Civ. Code, § 2832; 3 R. C. L. p. 1138; Kelly v. Gillespie, 12 Iowa, 55, 79 Am. Dec. 516; Spencer v. Alki Point Transportation Co., 53 Wash. 77, 101 Pac. 509, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1058; Gillett v. Taylor, 14 Utah, 190, 46 Pac. 1099, 60 Am. St. Rep. 890; Windhorst v. Bergendahl, 21 S. D. 218, 111 N. W. 544, 130 Am. St. Rep. 715; Farmers' N. G. Bank v. Slover, 60 Cal. 387; Casey v. Gibbons, 136 Cal. 368, 68 Pac. 1032. This is true for the purpose of showing that an apparent principal is only bound as a surety notwithstanding the appending of the word "Surety" after the signature does not in itself change the liability of the party so signing. Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282; So. Cal., etc., Bank v. Wyatt, 87 Cal. 616, 25 Pac. 918. It surely follows that where the signer, with the knowledge and assent of the payee, has signed only as a witness and has qualified his signature on the note itself by so significant a designation as the word "Witness," he may be permitted to show that his name was written and accepted in that capacity alone.

It may be admitted that it is an unnecessary and unusual precaution to have the execution of a promissory note witnessed, but it appears that all of the parties to this transaction were unfamiliar with business customs and requirements, and the respondent testified that this was his first experience with a promissory note.

If it is assumed, as the trial judge had a right to assume, from the evidence, that the respondent was acting in good faith, and that the testimony of both defendants was to be accepted as true, there is no justification for setting aside the findings and judgment of the trial court, as affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

[3] It is wholly a matter of the credibility of the witnesses, which is a consideration exclusively within the province of the trial court.

There could be no question about the matter were it not for the unusual circumstance of having a witness to such an instrument, the apparent inexperience and ignorance of the appellant, and the further fact that by the time the payment of this note was due the elder Olcese had gone through bankruptcy, and the son had succeeded to the position of financial responsibility. But even in this particular the respondent's explanation is plausible, and he testifies that it was not until after his father's financial failure and until long after the note was due that appellant made any claim upon respondent as a maker of the note. It is something, too, of a testimonial to the good faith of the elder Olcese that about $250 was paid by him on this note since his discharge in bankruptcy.

[4] There is no merit in appellant's objection that no testimony was taken in behalf of defendants, because of the fact that the defendants were called only as plaintiff's witnesses. Section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure as added by St. 1917, p. 58, provides that a party calling and examining as a witness an adverse party "shall not be bound by his testimony," and that the testimony of such adverse witness "may be rebutted by the party calling him." This provision does not mean that such testimony may not be given its proper weight, but merely as it declares, that the party calling such witness shall not be concluded from rebutting his testimony, or from impeaching the witness. Dravo v. Fabel, 132 U. S. 487, 10 Sup. Ct. 170, 33 L. Ed. 421. In other words, such testimony is to be treated as though given on cross-examination.

The findings of the court sufficiently cover all the material issues raised by the pleadings.

HINDLE v. WARDEN et al. (Civ. 3227.)

1. Quieting title 🔑44(4) — Proof of possession held prima facie proof of title when not controverted.

In a suit to set aside a deed on a sale under a municipal assessment and to quiet plaintiff's title, where plaintiff introduced a deed to himself and proved his possession subsequent to the date of delivery of the deed, such possession was prima facie evidence of ownership, and, though disputable, was sufficient evidence to support a decree quieting his title unless successfully controverted.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑581—Affidavit of service of notice before obtaining deed held not to show posting on property.

An affidavit on behalf of one purchasing property at a sale for a delinquent municipal assessment under St. 1909, p. 1066, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 17, stating that the affiant attached a copy of the notice to redeem to "front part of building in a conspicuous place near the front line of the property," did not show that the notice was posted on the property as required by section 24 of such statute.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑581—Affidavit of service of notice to redeem from sale for assessment must allege facts showing diligence to find owner.

An affidavit of service of notice to redeem from a sale for a municipal assessment under St. 1909, p. 1066, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 17, must set forth evidentiary facts justifying the conclusion that due diligence was used to find the owner, and an affidavit merely stating ultimate facts or conclusions in the language of the statute is not sufficient.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑581—Affidavit of service of notice to redeem from sale for assessment held not to show owner could not be found.

An affidavit of service of notice to redeem from a sale for a delinquent assessment under St. 1909, p. 1066, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 17, alleging that the affiant inquired of an unnamed person and was given the name of the owner and verified such ownership by referring to the records of the county and searched the county records for a certificate of residence, and that none was on file, and that he searched the latest city and telephone directories, and the name was not therein, was insufficient to show due diligence in locating the owner as required by section 24, where blanks were left for the names of the persons of and concerning whom inquiry and search was made.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑582 — Deed for land sold for delinquent assessment void when affidavit of service of notice insufficient.

A deed for land sold for a delinquent assessment under St. 1909, p. 1066, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 17, was void where the affidavit of service of the notice to redeem did not show posting on the property or due diligence to find the owner of the lot.

6. Abatement and revival 🔑15—Dismissal of prior action while second action is pending removes ground of abatement.

It is a good answer to a plea in abatement alleging the pendency of a prior action that the prior action has been dismissed by a judgment entered after a trial of the second action has commenced, but before its conclusion.

7. Estoppel 🔑91(1) — Plaintiff held estopped to question dismissal of prior action pleaded in abatement.

Where the attorneys of record for plaintiff in a prior action gave his attorneys of record in a subsequent action written authority to move to dismiss the earlier action, and plaintiff was in court when the motion was made, he was estopped to question the authority of the attorneys, and defendant, pleading the prior action in abatement, could not successfully contend that the motion was unauthorized.

8. Abatement and revival 🔑8(1) — Record must show identity of causes of action and issues.

To sustain the plea of another action pending, it must appear not only that there is another action pending between substantially the same parties, but also that the causes of action and issues involved are substantially the same, and, when there is nothing in the record to show the subject-matter of the former action or the relief sought, the plea is not sustained.

9. Abatement and revival 🔑7 — Dismissal of prior action pleaded in abatement cannot be collaterally attacked.

Assuming that under Land Titles Law, § 20, authorizing an applicant for the registration of land to withdraw the application, such right is subject to Code Civ. Proc. § 581, prohibiting dismissals when a counterclaim has been set up or affirmative relief sought, the judgment of the court in which the proceeding is pending dismissing such proceeding, though wrongfully entered and subject to reversal on appeal, is not open to collateral attack in another action in which the pendency of such proceeding has been pleaded in abatement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Norman W. Hindle against Julia P. Warden and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edgar F. Hughes and Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, averring that he is the owner of a certain lot in the city of Los Angeles, alleged that the defendant Julia P. Warden claims title under a deed executed to her by the board of public works of that city on July 11, 1916, after a sale of the lot following a delinquent assessment to pay the expenses of acquiring land for a public library under the act of April 22, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 1066), as amended by the act of December 23, 1911 (Stats. 1911, Extra Sessions, p. 17). Plaintiff does not question the validity of the proceedings leading up to and including the sale of the land by the board of public works, but does contend that the deed to appellant was invalid upon the ground, among others, that the affidavit of posting the redemption notice does not show that the notice was posted on the property or that due diligence had been used to find the owner. The complaint alleges, and the proof shows, that plaintiff, prior to commencing the action, tendered to the defendant Julia P. Warden, the purchaser at the assessment sale, the full amount necessary to redeem the property from the sale, namely, $2.45; that Mrs. Warden refused the tender; and that plaintiff deposited the sum with the clerk of the court and consented that it be paid to Mrs. Warden in redemption of the property.

The answer denied plaintiff's alleged ownership, alleged that the defendant Julia P. Warden acquired title under the deed to her from the board of public works, and, by way of a plea in abatement, further alleged that there is pending another action between the same parties for the same cause. The pleadings and files in this other action, though marked for identification, were not put in evidence. The record here is barren of any facts showing the nature of that other action, save a few incidental references thereto by court and counsel in the course of remarks made during the progress of the trial, and a finding by the court as follows:

> "* * * Prior to the commencement of this action and on November 3, 1916, the plaintiff filed in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, an application to bring the said real property under the operation of the 'Land Titles Act,' the same being L. R. No. 110; that Julia P. Warden was joined as a party in said action and did file an answer and cross-complaint, in which she claimed title to said property by reason of the deed herein referred to; that said application L. R. No. 110 was dismissed during the trial of this action and is not pending."

By its decree the court adjudged and declared the deed from the board of public works to the defendant Julia P. Warden to be null and void; that plaintiff had redeemed the property from the lien of the assessment and from the sale; and that the purchaser, Julia P. Warden, is entitled to receive the $2.45 deposited by plaintiff in court for the redemption of the property from the assessment sale. The decree also quiets plaintiff's title to the land. From this judgment Julia P. Warden appeals.

Appellant's principal contentions are: (1) That plaintiff did not prove title in himself; (2) that the deed to appellant from the board of public works, execution whereof was admitted by the pleadings, is prima facie evidence of title in appellant; and (3) that the plea in abatement should have been sustained. There is no merit in any of these contentions.

[1] Plaintiff made out a prima facie case of ownership. He put in evidence a deed to himself from John A. Rennebeck and wife, dated August 5, 1913. He offered no proof of title in his grantors, and therefore did not present any direct evidence of paper title from the paramount source of title. He did, however, testify that he has been in actual possession of the property at all times since he received the deed thereto on August 5, 1913. Such possession was prima facie evidence of his ownership of the lot and of his right to a decree quieting his title. It is the settled law of this state that possession is prima facie evidence of ownership. And while such presumption is disputable and may be controverted by other evidence, it affords full and sufficient evidence of ownership of land, unless it be successfully controverted. Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 518, 123 Pac. 294.

The deed to appellant from the board of public works conveyed to her no title whatever. According to section 24 of the act under which the deed was executed by the board of public works (Stats. 1909, p. 1072), the purchaser at the delinquent assessment sale, at least 30 days before he applies for a deed, must serve upon the owner of the property, and the occupant thereof, if it be occupied, a written notice setting forth various matters, among others "the time when such purchaser * * * will apply * * * for a deed." If the owner "cannot be found, after due diligence," the notice must be posted upon the property. "The person applying for a deed must file with the street superintendent an affidavit or affidavits showing that notice of such application has been given, as herein required, and if the notice is not served on the owner of the property personally, that due diligence was used to find said owner." Plaintiff, the owner of the property at the time when it is claimed that the notice was posted, was not personally served with the notice. The affidavit stated that he could not be found. Respondent's claim that the affidavit is fatally defective in that it fails to show that the notice was posted on the property or that due diligence was used to ascertain the owner's whereabouts is supported by the record and must be sustained.

There was no proof of service of the notice other than that afforded by the affidavit of C. D. Warden, to which was attached a copy of the redemption notice. The only statement in the affidavit respecting the posting of the notice is this:

> "That he [C. D. Warden] is agent of the owner of the certificate of sale referred to in the attached notice to redeem; that he did, as such agent, serve a notice to redeem on the 17th day of May, 1916, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, by attaching a true copy of the attached notice to redeem to front part of building in a conspicuous place near the front line of the property."

The only statements in the affidavit as to the use of due diligence in locating the owner are the following:

> "That affiant used due diligence in trying to find the residence, whereabouts, name, and address of the owner of said property, as follows, to wit: That he inquired of the ——, of Los Angeles, California; that the said company gave him the name of the fee title owners as ——; that he verified said ownership by referring to records of Los Angeles county in Book ——, page ——, of deeds; that he searched the county records of Los Angeles county for a certificate of residence of ——, per section 1163, Civil Code State of California; that none was on file; that he searched the latest city directory (1915) of the city of Los Angeles and the latest telephone directory of Los Angeles, Cal.; that the name of * * * was not therein; that after such above search was unable to learn the whereabouts of the said owner."

[2] By finding in favor of respondent the lower court ruled that the affidavit was insufficient. We cannot overturn this conclusion. Indeed, no other conclusion seems possible. The affidavit does not "show" that the notice was posted in a conspicuous or any place upon the property. Its language is that the affiant served the notice by attaching a true copy thereof "to front part of building in a conspicuous place near the front line of the property." Nowhere in the affidavit is there anything to show what property the affiant intended by his words "the property." The affidavit does not identify any property whatever. If we assume that by the words "the property" affiant meant the property that had been sold to appellant at the delinquent assessment sale, still there is nothing to show that the building, on the front part of which the notice was posted, was located on that property. If by the expression "near the front line of the property" affiant meant that he posted the notice itself near the front line of the property that was sold, there is nothing to show that the notice, though near the front line of the property was actually on the property. If by the phrase "near the front line of the property" affiant meant that the building on which he posted the notice was near the front line of the property, then there is nothing to show that the building was actually located on the property. For these reasons the affidavit is wholly insufficient to show that the notice was "posted in a conspicuous place upon said property," as required by the statute.

[3, 4] Nor does the affidavit show that the owner could not be found after due diligence. In Hennessy v. Hall, 14 Cal. App. 759, 762, 113 Pac. 350, 352, the court said that—

"To warrant the execution of a deed to the purchaser and foreclose the owner's right of redemption upon such constructive service, an affidavit must be filed showing, not merely stating, that due diligence was used to find the owner."

In other words, the affidavit must set forth evidentiary facts which justify the conclusion that due diligence was used. An affidavit which merely states the ultimate facts, conclusions in the language of the statute, is not sufficient.

The affidavit of C. D. Warden does not state of whom affiant made the inquiries. It is equally cryptic as to the identity of the person concerning whom the alleged inquiries were made. It does not state whether it was the owner of the lot, the plaintiff here, Norman W. Hindle, of whose whereabouts the inquiries were made, or whether it was some one else. It does not state whose name it was that was searched for in the directory and city records. In fine, there is a total absence of any showing of evidentiary facts tending to establish due diligence in locating the owner of the lot.

[5] For these reasons we agree with respondent that the affidavit fails to establish facts the existence of which is a necessary prerequisite to authority in the board of public works to execute the deed under which appellant claims. We conclude, therefore that the deed to appellant from the board of public works, her sole claim to title, is null and void, and that its introduction failed to overcome respondent's prima facie proof of title.

[6] There was no error in deciding against defendants' plea in abatement. It appears from the trial court's findings that the prior action, brought by plaintiff under the Torrens Land Law (St. 1897, p. 138), was dismissed by the court during the trial of the present action. It is the established rule in this state that a judgment of dismissal of the prior action, entered after the trial of the second action has commenced, but before its conclusion, is a good answer to the plea in abatement. Moore v. Hopkins, 83 Cal. 270, 23 Pac. 318, 17 Am. St. Rep. 248. Seeking to avoid this effect of the dismissal of the prior action, appellant contends: (1) That the motion to dismiss was not made by the attorneys of record in the prior action; and (2) that the dismissal was made over appellant's objection and notwithstanding she had filed a cross-complaint in the prior action whereby she had asked that she be decreed to be the owner of the land under the deed that had been executed to her by the board of public works.

[7] The attorneys of record in the prior action which, it is claimed, plaintiff had commenced under the Torrens Land Law, gave to the attorneys of record in the present action written authority to move the court to dismiss the former action. This was sufficient authority for the presentation of the motion to dismiss. Moreover, plaintiff, who was in court when the motion was made, is estopped to question the authority of his attorneys to dismiss the former action. Appellant, therefore, is not in a position successfully to contend that the motion to dismiss the former action was unauthorized.

[8] There is no merit in the contention that the judgment of dismissal in the former action was a nullity because entered over the objection of the cross-complainant therein, the appellant here. In the first place, none of the pleadings or files in the former action was introduced in evidence in this action. Nor does any of them appear in the record on this appeal. There is no way, therefore, whereby we may know whether the subject-matter of the former action and the relief sought therein are the same as in this. To sustain the plea of another action pending, it is essential that it shall appear, not only that there is another action pending between substantially the same parties, but also that the cause or causes of action and the issues involved are substantially the same in the two suits. There is nothing in the record before us that tends to establish this prime essential and indispensable requisite of a successful plea of another action pending.

[9] Moreover, even if we accept appellant's assumption that plaintiff had filed an application for the registration of his title under the Land Titles Law and that appellant had filed a cross-complaint therein, still the judgment dismissing such former action is not subject to appellant's collateral attack in this action. By section 20 of the Land Titles Law, an applicant for the registration of land may, on payment of all fees due, "withdraw his application at any time prior to the hearing thereof." Deering's General Laws 1915, p. 388. Assuming, for the purpose of this decision only, that an applicant for registration of land under the Land Titles Law has no right thus to withdraw his application if any defendant shall have filed a pleading asking for affirmative relief, that is, assuming, for the present purposes only, that a motion to withdraw an application for registration of title under the Land Titles Law is subject to that provision of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure which declares that the plaintiff in an action may dismiss his action "provided a counterclaim has not been set up, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant," nevertheless the judgment of dismissal was the court's final judgment in the case, and is not subject to attack here. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. The question of the applicant's right to a dismissal was properly before it for decision. Under such circumstances, a judgment of dismissal, though wrongfully entered and subject to reversal on appeal, would not be wholly ineffective. Until reversed on appeal or set aside in a direct proceeding brought for that purpose, it is binding upon the parties to the former action. The judgment of dismissal, therefore, even if erroneously entered, as contended by appellant, is not subject to her collateral attack in this action. 18 C. J. 1172; County v. Geisinger, 1 Lehigh Val. Law Rep. (Pa.) 113; Moore, etc., Co. v. Marion, etc., Co., 52 Ind. App. 548, 101 N. E. 15.

MURRILL v. VAN VLEET. (Civ. 3606.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 20, 1920.)

Account ⚷3—Contract for pasturage held not to have resulted in a mutual account.

Evidence showing an oral contract providing that defendant pasture stock on plaintiff's land, pay taxes on the land, and credit plaintiff with the balance of pasturage bill upon the price of the land which was purchased by plaintiff from defendant, held to show that only credit to be extended was of such balance, which was insufficient to establish a mutual account, and plaintiff could not recover such balance.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by E. M. Murrill against E. J. Van Vleet. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial unless plaintiff remit a part of the judgment, he appeals. Order affirmed.

Irvine P. Aten, Gallaher & Simpson, Ray W. Hays, and M. G. Gallaher, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for respondent.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover an alleged balance of $5,190.55 upon a mutual, open and current account for pasturage furnished by plaintiff between October 1, 1915, and April 1, 1918. The credit allowed to defendant is $200.45 for moneys paid by him for taxes upon land, which was in the possession of plaintiff under a contract to purchase the same from defendant.

There was a verdict for plaintiff for $2,716.92. Upon a motion for a new trial, the court made a conditional order granting it, unless within 10 days plaintiff should remit all of the judgment in excess of $300. He declined to accept the reduction, and has appealed from the order.

The principal point raised here and argued by the parties is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish a mutual account. It is contended by appellant that if there is any evidence to uphold the findings of the jury, then the order must be reversed, because, as he claims, for certain reasons not necessary here to mention, the order cannot be construed under section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 141) as having been granted upon any other ground than that of a legal insufficiency of the evidence to show a mutual account. The appellant relies upon no evidence other than his own to support the verdict, which is as follows:

> "Q. Now tell what, if anything, was said about pasturing cattle. A. Well, I says, I am not able to pay my taxes, and I have to pay you one-half of the money out of everything I make on the place, and I am not able to pay the taxes, I said, 'Will you help me to pay the taxes?' He says, 'Yes; we can arrange it.' I says, 'How?' He says, 'I have a lot of stock, and I take in a lot of stock from the neighbors I will put in the pasture at $2.50 a head a month, and,' he says, 'I will pasture it.' And I says, 'You will pay my taxes, and take your $75 or the $100 out of it, and then you credit me with the remainder?' He says, 'Yes; I will do that.' He says, 'Well, we will take Benge there for witness.' Benge was standing there at the gate. And I says, 'All right.' Benge and his wife both were standing there. And he says, 'That is all right,' and we went on, and that was about all the pasture matter at that time."

Benge was called as a witness for plaintiff Murrill, and his version of the conversation is as follows:

> "Why, Mr. Murrill, he says to Van, he says, 'What about the taxes?' he says, 'I am not able to pay them.' And Mr. Van Vleet says, 'Well, you needn't worry about that, Mr. Murrill' he says, 'I have plenty of stock, horses, and cattle,' and he says, 'I will pay the taxes on the place for the use of the pasture.' Then Mr. Murrill replies to him, he says, 'Mr. Van, how much is the taxes?' Van Vleet says 'They are $75 or $100,' and Mr. Murrill says, 'All right Van.' He says, 'Now all over $75 or $100, whatever the taxes are,' he says, 'you give me credit on the contract of the place,' and Mr. Van Vleet says, 'All right,' he says, 'Benge is present; he is a witness.'"

The defendant, Van Vleet, testified:

> "Why, he said if it didn't interfere with his crops, he would tell me when I could pasture; if he wanted to plow the ground, I had to take my stock away. If it didn't interfere with his crops and farming, I could have the pasture, after he took his crops off and before he put the crop in in the spring, if I would pay the taxes."

Appellant quotes and places much reliance upon the following excerpts from the opinion of this court in Copriviza v. Rilovich, 4 Cal. App. 26, 87 Pac. 398:

"Where different conclusions may be reasonably drawn by different minds from the same evidence as to whether an account is a mutual account, the question is one for the jury. * * * Under the evidence in this case it was for the jury to determine what was intended by the parties—whether the moneys paid to third parties for clothing for plaintiff's sister were intended to be payments to plaintiff, or were matters of set-off to be charged to plaintiff and credited to defendants pending the final settlement of the account." It appears from the record in that case that Copriviza was the bookkeeper for Rilovich Bros., and that he had entered on their books to his credit, his monthly salary, certain moneys he had loaned to the defendants and various amounts that he had paid out and advanced for them. He charged himself with the cash they paid to him. In order to establish the fact that there was mutual account Copriviza relied upon certain charges that he had made against himself for clothing, dressmaking, and a hat for his sister, which had been paid for by Rilovich Bros., at his request. He told them "to buy all the clothes his sister needed, and whenever they spent anything to tell him, and he would put it down and charge it to his account." (Italics ours.)

In the decision in that case it was said that there was a difference between the payment of money by a debtor to a creditor and the payment of money by a debtor to a third party at the request of the creditor; that in the first case it is presumed to be a payment on the debt, while in the second it may be a payment on the debt if the parties so agree, or it may be a matter of set-off for which an action would lie. In that case the money disbursed for Copriviza's sister was entered in the books of Rilovich Bros., as cash payments, but Copriviza kept a private personal account of all his transactions with the firm in all respects similar to such account, except in his private account there were entries of the various articles of clothing and the price paid for each. Under this situation and the circumstances surrounding the case, this court held that a different conclusion might be drawn by reasonable men as to whether the parties intended that moneys paid out for the sister were intended to be cash payments or were matters of set-off upon which a demand arose in favor of Rilovich Bros.

In Carter v. Canty, 186 Pac. 346, it is said that the conclusion reached in that case goes to the border line. In the case last mentioned, the claim that there was a mutual account existing between Carter and Canty was disposed of by the Supreme Court in this language:

> "To our minds no inference may reasonably be drawn from this situation other than that this transaction was mutually intended to operate as payment pro tanto of the indebtedness of Canty to Carter, leaving Canty without any demand or right of action for the money. If this be so it could not have the effect, in view of our own decisions and the overwhelming weight of authority elsewhere, to give to the account the character of a 'mutual' account, one where there are reciprocal demands between the parties."

The above-quoted language is applicable to the facts in the instant case, which are unlike those in Copriviza v. Rilovich, where the debtor advanced money for the benefit of a third party at the request of the creditor with the understanding that it was to be charged to the creditor's account. Viewing the evidence in the most favorable light for appellant, the amount paid by respondent for taxes constituted a mere payment pro tanto of the indebtedness for pasturage, which left respondent without any demand or right of action for the money.

The only theory upon which appellant could have gone to the jury upon his claim that it was a mutual account was that he was a vendee in possession under a contract to purchase; that he informed the vendor that he was unable to perform his obligation to pay the taxes on the land; that the latter in return for the privilege of pasturing his stock thereon at the price of $2.50 per head per month agreed to pay the taxes and allow the vendee credit on his contract for the balance.

This constituted a distinct understanding to apply the moneys paid on account of taxes toward the satisfaction of the pasturage bill, an unequivocal agreement to credit such moneys as payments on account of pasturage, and the jury was not warranted in finding, as it did, that it was agreed by the parties that the payments of the taxes were matters of set-off to be charged to Murrill and credited to Van Vleet pending the final settlement of the account. The only credit to be extended to Van Vleet was the remainder, after taking out the taxes. There is no evidence from which any other credit may be inferred.

The order of the court granting a new trial is affirmed.

SMITH v. UNITED CRUDE OIL CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 17, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑134(6)—Damages to lessor from unpermitted use is actual injury to property.

A lessor's damages, under Civ. Code, § 1930, where the property was used for purposes other than contemplated by the lease, would only be those which the lessor would suffer by reason of his property being injured by a depreciation in value or other injury naturally occurring; the mere value of the use not measuring the amount of damages.

2. Pleading 🔑365(1)—Motion to strike amended complaint too late after answer.

Defendant's motion to strike out the amended and supplemental complaint after it had made answer thereto was properly denied as coming too late.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑127(13) — Where amended complaint declared on different cause of action, application of statute is determined from date of filing.

If a lessor suing the lessee stated a cause of action under Civ. Code, § 1930, to declare forfeiture of the lease, and not for the alternative remedy of damages permitted by the statute to be recovered, by filing amended and supplemental complaint eliminating all claim to any right to have the lease forfeited, and adopting the other alternative given by the statute, of suing for damages, plaintiff lessor declared on a different cause of action than set out in the original complaint, and the application of the statutes of limitation will be considered with reference to the date of filing the amended complaint rather than the original date of commencement of the action.

Action by Mark B. Smith against the United Crude Oil Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Anderson & Anderson and Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for a large sum of money claimed as damages. Defendant has appealed, and presents the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The cause went to trial upon an amended and supplemental complaint and the answer made thereto. Issue was raised as to matters hereinafter discussed. The answer further pleaded in defense laches on the part of plaintiff and the interposition of statutes of limitation.

Predecessors of the assignors of defendant were the lessees named in a certain lease affecting land which at the time of the commencement of this action was owned by the plaintiff. The defendant succeeded to the rights of the original lessees. The lease mentioned was one made for the purpose of oil development under which, as we construe the instrument, the lessees were entitled to the exclusive possession of the property for the purpose of prosecuting the business designed to be accomplished. The lessees did so have the property, and this defendant, while in possession of the same, made a sublease on the 25th day of May, 1910, to cover a period of time up to the 25th day of May, 1915, and wherein the right to occupy certain portions of the land and to erect thereon buildings for the purposes of an oil-well supply business, was granted to a third party. In April, 1913, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant, calling for an account of rents and royalties on oil production, and further stating an objection to the sublease, terming it an incumbrance against the conditions of the lease, and requiring the sublease to be vacated. This demand having been apparently disregarded, a written notice was given on the 8th day of April, 1913, declaring the lease of the defendant terminated and void. This action followed. In the complaint plaintiff alleged the failure of the defendant to make account for rent and oil royalties; alleged that the sublessee had been allowed to "occupy and use large portions of the surface of the said land for a long period of years for purposes not contemplated by or within the provisions of said lease, * * * that the said defendant has been collecting of and from said Associated Supply Company the sum of about $100 per month from and after the 6th day of May, 1910, to the date of the commencement of this action and applying all of said sums to its own use, and that the said defendant has failed, refused, and neglected to pay the same, or any part thereof, to the plaintiff, and has failed, refused, and neglected to clear said land of said incumbrances." The prayer of the original complaint was that the lease be terminated, that an account be had, and "for such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet and proper." The cause was tried upon the original complaint and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, allowing recovery for the rents collected from the sublessee, amounting to $5,843.20. The cause was taken on appeal to the Supreme Court and decision made therein, which is found in 179 Cal. at page 570, 178 Pac. 141. The court there held that no term of the lease of the defendant prohibited the subleasing, and that therefore there had been no violation of any such covenant or agreement. The court did, however, declare that, as the lease held by the defendant was made for a particular purpose, the plaintiff might make his claim under section 1930 of the Civil Code, which provides:

> "When a thing is let for a particular purpose the hirer must not use it for any other purpose; and if he does, he is liable to the letter for all damages resulting from such use, or the letter may treat the contract as thereby rescinded."

The court further remarked that the complaint did not aver any damage, and that no proof was shown to have been offered of any damage to plaintiff by reason of any such use. The decision shows that at the former trial the collection of $100 per month rental by the defendant from its subtenant was not questioned. The judgment was reversed. Upon the cause being remanded to the lower court, plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental complaint in which he alleged only the material facts as to the tenancy of the defendant and the subleasing of a portion of the property, and alleged that the use made by the subtenant was of the value of $100 per month, which it was alleged was the damage suffered by the plaintiff because his property had been used "for purposes not contemplated by the lease." A number of questions are argued on this appeal, all of which it will not be necessary to particularly examine.

[1] The decision of the Supreme Court seems to settle the matter of plaintiff's right to damages as being a right to be predicated wholly upon the provisions of section 1930, Civil Code. That section provides, as has already been noted, that where property is let for a particular purpose and the hirer uses it for other purposes, he is liable "for all the damages resulting from such use." We have announced preliminarily, and we reaffirm the statement, that under the terms of the lease here exhibited and under which the defendant held the property of the plaintiff, the plaintiff reserved no right to use the ground, or any part thereof, during the time that the defendant held possession under its lease. What, then, would be the plaintiff's damages under section 1930, where the property was held for purposes other than those contemplated by the lease? In this case it seems quite plain that the damages would only be those which plaintiff would have suffered by reason of his property being injured by a depreciation in value being produced, or by some other injury which would naturally occur because of the nonpermitted use. The mere value of the use, where the plaintiff himself was not entitled to that use, would not measure the amount of damage, because to allow a recovery on that account would be to allow recovery for something to which the plaintiff was not entitled, considering his contract obligations to his lessee. The Supreme Court no doubt had that condition in mind when it declared that the original complaint did not aver any damage, "nor was proof offered of any damage by reason of such mentioned use." This statement was made in full view of the fact that in the opinion it had already been stated that the defendant did not deny that it had collected $100 per month rental from the subtenant. Let us illustrate the situation in a way which will point more readily to the conclusion already announced: Suppose that the defendant had leased to the plaintiff land for the purpose of occupying it with warehouse buildings only; suppose that this lease gave the right of possession to the lessee and reserved no right to such possession in the lessor; suppose that the lessee, instead of using the property for warehouse purposes, used it for the purpose of conducting a retail store thereon: It seems very clear that in such a case the lessor, seeking to recover damages, would necessarily have to prove some special injury to the property produced by reason of the use being changed from that contemplated by the contract. The keeping of a store instead of a warehouse might be a great deal more profitable to the lessee, and yet it could not be claimed that the lessor, under the provisions of section 1930, Civil Code, would be entitled to recover the increased profits which might accrue to his lessee. In order to permit a recovery at all of damages in this case, we think that the complaint should allege some special damage, if any there was, by which the plaintiff's property was injured through the nonpermitted use. The complaint as presented, taken in connection with the lease which is made a part thereof, in our opinion, fails to state facts warranting any judgment for damages.

[2, 3] Among other questions argued, which in view of our conclusion upon the proposition just discussed will not need elaboration, are: First, that the amended and supplemental complaint should not have been permitted to be filed; second, that a new cause of action was stated in this amended complaint different from the cause of action set up in the original complaint; third, that the alleged cause of action set up in the amended complaint was barred by certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are satisfied that a motion made by the defendant to strike out the amended and supplemental complaint, after it had made answer thereto, was properly denied, as the motion came too late. We are convinced, nevertheless, that the amended complaint did declare upon a different cause of action than that set out in the original complaint. If we assume that a cause of action under section 1930, Civil Code, was stated, though imperfectly included in the allegations of the original complaint, it is clear that the cause of action was to declare a forfeiture of the lease, and not for the alternative remedy of damages which section 1930 permits to be recovered. By filing the amended and supplemental complaint the plaintiff eliminated all claim to any right to have the lease forfeited, and adopted the other alternative given by the section of suing for damages. In such a case, of course, the application of the statutes of limitation will be considered with reference to the date of the filing of the amended complaint, rather than to the original date of the commencement of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

John Gavin was convicted of violating the juvenile court law, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 174.

Mrs. E. C. Harrington, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Appellant was tried before a jury and convicted of a misdemeanor upon an information charging him with the violation of section 21 of the juvenile court law (St. 1915, p. 1225), in that on a certain day, in the city and county of San Francisco, he did willfully and unlawfully—

> "commit an act which did then and there tend to cause and encourage one ——, a male person under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 9 years, to come within the provisions of subdivision 11 of section 1 of said juvenile court law, as follows: Said John Gavin did then and there willfully and unlawfully induce, persuade, and encourage the said —— to submit to a lewd and immoral act, * * * all of which * * * did thereby then and there manifestly tend to, and did, encourage, cause, and contribute to the said —— becoming and remaining such a person as is described in section 1, subdivision 11, of the juvenile court law of the state of California, to wit, a person under the age of 21 years, who is leading or from any cause is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd, and immoral life."

[1-3] Appellant urges that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime or public offense because it fails to allege that the minor named in the charge is leading an idle, dissolute, or immoral life, or that he is in danger of doing so. It is alleged that the acts complained of tended to encourage the minor to become such person as is described by section 1, subdivision 11, of the juvenile court law, and the inferences which must necessarily be drawn from the facts alleged are sufficient to sustain the information as against a general demurrer. It may be that the acts complained of were not set forth in the information with sufficient certainty and definiteness to support it as against a special demurrer, but no attack was made upon that ground, and the objection must therefore be deemed to have been waived. People v. Eddards, 25 Cal. App. 660, 664, 145 Pac. 173. Other similar technical objections to the information are made, but it is apparent from an examination of the entire record that appellant was not misled by any of the alleged defects in the form of the information and that no miscarriage of justice has resulted therefrom. Accordingly, under the well-known rule of decision laid down by the Constitution in section 4½ of article 6 thereof, the judgment cannot be reversed upon any of these grounds.

It is also urged that the evidence is insufficient to prove that any crime was committed. A careful examination of the entire record shows that this contention is without merit. The evidence is clear, explicit, and without substantial conflict, and it would be difficult to conceive of any jury reaching a verdict other than one of guilty.

Objection is made to the instructions given to the jury. But reading them all as a whole, it is apparent that, if any error occurred therein, it did not result in a miscarriage of justice, because, taken as a whole, the instructions of the court completely and fairly presented the law of the case to the jury.

[4] It is also urged that the trial court erred in not deciding appellant's motion in arrest of judgment and in failing to arraign appellant for judgment. The record does not contain a motion for the arrest of judgment, but in the reporter's transcript of proceedings it appears that after appellant's motion for a new trial was denied his counsel stated that she desired to appeal and make a motion for the arrest of judgment. The court thereupon immediately pronounced judgment, and from this it may be assumed that the motion for arrest of judgment, if one be made, was denied. The record clearly shows that defendant was duly arraigned before sentence was pronounced.

In support of his motion for a new trial appellant filed affidavits for the purpose of showing that new evidence had been discovered. The affidavits were clearly insufficient and the denial of the motion for a new trial was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Fong Lin and others, as special administrators of the estate of Fong Ben Yuen, deceased, against Frank H. Probert. Judgment for plaintiffs and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. S. Perry, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Miller, Thornton, Miller & Watt, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. Plaintiffs, suing as special administrators of the estate of Fong Ben Yuen, deceased, brought this action, alleging negligence on the part of defendant in the operation of an automobile owned by him resulting in injuries causing Yuen's death.

The complaint charged that deceased, at the time of the accident, was married and that he left surviving him a wife and two minor children, who are his heirs at law and in whose behalf this action is brought. Damages are hereby sought under the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, and damages were awarded to plaintiff in the full amount prayed for, which was the sum of $5,400. A motion for a new trial was made and denied.

The findings in the case described generally the manner in which the accident occurred, and they are in substance as follows: On the 22d day of September, 1917, at or about the hour of 7:30 p. m., deceased was lawfully upon Claremont avenue, a public highway, at a place commonly known as the North Gate station of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, in the city of Berkeley, county of Alameda. About this time defendant was driving his automobile in a westerly direction along Claremont avenue at a high rate of speed, and ran into, knocked down, and crushed and maimed deceased, inflicting injuries from which he died the same evening. Deceased at the time of his death was about the age of 37 years, was in sound physical health, and employed as a cook at a salary of $45 a month in addition to his board and lodging. That he left surviving him as his heirs at law Quong Shee, his wife, of the age of about 32 years; Fong Wing Jake, a minor son of about the age of 11 years; and Fong Kune, a minor daughter of about 7 years—all of whom reside in China, and were dependent upon deceased for support.

Appellant presents and argues several grounds upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment. It is his claim that the evidence fails to show any negligence on his part, and further that there is no proof that deceased was married or that he ever contributed to the support of the heirs above named. Complaint is also made that the judgment is excessive.

We do not consider that there is any merit in any of the points urged.

Upon the question of negligence the evidence shows that on the evening of the day when the accident happened defendant, accompanied by his son, left his home in his automobile and proceeded along Claremont avenue in Berkeley toward the North Gate station of the railroad mentioned, commonly known as the "Key Route." According to the testimony of the defendant and his son they were traveling at the rate of from 10 to 12 miles an hour. At the intersection of two certain streets they reached the railroad track, looked for a train going to San Francisco, and, none being in sight, they crossed over the track to the northerly side of Claremont avenue, continuing to drive at the same rate of speed mentioned. At a point about 85 feet from the place where the accident happened defendant saw two people step off the sidewalk and into the street, whereupon he tooted his horn, applied the foot brake, and, to avoid striking them, swerved sharply to the left. As the machine passed these persons defendant noticed deceased standing in the street about 15 feet ahead of him. Confronted with this situation defendant immediately applied his emergency brake and attempted to turn his car so as to avoid hitting deceased, but in this effort he was unsuccessful, for the left headlight of the car struck deceased, dragged him some 18 or 20 feet, and inflicted the injuries which resulted in his death.

It is the claim of appellant that the uncontradicted evidence shows these facts, from which it is argued that a case is thus presented of two persons unexpectedly placing themselves in a position of danger, to avoid injuring one of whom defendant swerved, and in so doing struck the other, for which act it is claimed no negligence can be imputed to him.

[1] Other evidence, however, presents a different situation. Upon the question of the rate of speed the automobile was traveling there is a conflict in the testimony. The only other witness who saw the accident besides defendant and his son testified that the machine was traveling at about 20 miles an hour at the time of the accident. In addition to this direct testimony, it is also in evidence that a police officer, immediately after the accident, in company with defendant, drove the car at the rate of from 10 to 12 miles an hour for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the brakes were properly working, and that, traveling at such rate of speed, he had stopped the machine in a space of some 9 feet. Expert testimony was also introduced to show within what distance at the place where the accident occurred a machine of the weight and character of defendant's car, and traveling at the speed testified to by the defendant, could be stopped. The witness upon this question placed the distance at about 10 feet, and further testified that it would have been impossible for the machine to have traveled as far as the evidence shows it did with the brakes applied as testified to by appellant. In this regard all the evidence shows that after defendant had traveled a distance of 85 feet or more, as above recited, with his foot brake on, he then applied his emergency brake, and notwithstanding this fact, with both brakes set he traveled an additional 35 feet. This evidence would indicate that defendant was traveling at a much greater speed at the time of the accident than he and his son testified to. Moreover, there was in evidence the character of the injuries that deceased suffered. His face and scalp were extensively lacerated, so much so that his employer could not recognize him shortly after the accident. His skull and leg were fractured. This, too, would tend to show that the machine was driven at great speed. Aside from the question of speed it further appeared that defendant was driving with sidelights only. His front lights were brilliant but had not been dimmed, as required by the city ordinance, and for this reason he was not using them. The degree of illumination and the speed of a car are somewhat inter-related. The evidence showed that the night was dark, the city lights not having been lit, and save from that produced by two lanterns on a gate and the illumination from lights in a store, there was no artificial light except that furnished by the automobile. There was also evidence to show that it would not be safe to drive with sidelights under these circumstances at a greater speed than from 10 to 12 miles an hour. These were questions of fact to be considered by the trial court in determining whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence.

[2] Appellant claims that deceased should not have been standing where he was. There was no regular station or safety zone where the train was accustomed to stop, but the place where deceased was standing awaiting its arrival was the usual place for persons intending to board trains to stand. Deceased had a right, therefore, to be where he was.

[3] Appellant complains of the admission of testimony of the existence of scars in the asphalt that appeared on the roadway the morning after the accident. These markings are caused from the friction of rubber. This testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing at what point defendant had applied his brakes. The witnesses who testified upon this subject had visited the scene at that time, and defendant contends that this evidence was inadmissible, for the reason it was too remote, there being no preliminary proof that the tracks were caused by defendant's automobile, and it being claimed that the street was a much traveled one. This evidence was received upon the condition that it be connected up. Plaintiff failed to do so, for the reason that defendant himself admitted that he had examined the tracks the same morning and that his car had made the scars testified to. Under these circumstances no connecting evidence was required of plaintiff.

[4] We deem the review of the evidence we have given sufficient to show that it is ample to support the finding of negligence.

[5, 6] Upon the question of the proof of marriage little need be said. A brother testified that deceased was married, and that he left surviving him the wife and two children hereinbefore mentioned. No objection was made to this mode of proof, nor was any evidence offered to disprove the fact. The evidence having been received without objection, its admissibility cannot be questioned for the first time on appeal. Lucy v. Davis, 163 Cal. 611, 616, 126 Pac. 490; McComish v. Kaufman, 185 Pac. 476.

[7, 8] The same applies to the claim that the record fails to show that deceased contributed to the support of his wife and children, or that they were dependent upon him. This question is not one of first impression in this state. The relief given by section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure is one for the benefit of the "heirs" for any pecuniary loss they may suffer, and lies regardless of the condition of such heirs as to dependency. Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co., 176 Cal. 347, 168 Pac. 348, L. R. A. 1918B, 185. Deprivation of the support that deceased was morally and legally bound to furnish his wife and children is the pecuniary loss here suffered, and the fact that they are nonresidents does not in any manner affect their rights. Id.

[9] And finally, we are called upon to declare the judgment excessive. This we cannot do. Mortality tables were introduced in evidence to show that the expectancy of life of the decedent was 32 years; his wife and children a longer period. He was earning $45 a month together with his board and lodging, and was to receive more. The judgment is not excessive as a matter of law. Nor does it suggest at first blush passion or prejudice; and there is nothing in the case to show that the trial judge did not justly meet his duty of fixing the proper amount of damages to be awarded. Parsons v. Easton, 28 Cal. App. Dec. 1151.[1]

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

SHAW, J. In each of these cases the complaint alleged that Thomas W. Prior, Thornton Kinney, Chauncey Pettis, J. R. Fones, F. A. Church, W. A. Rennie, Byron Palmer, and Charles W. Shaw did associate themselves under the fictitious name of Venice Road Race Association, for the purpose of promoting and conducting an automobile road race over the highways in the city of Venice; and that in preparing the highways and roads for said race and in the conduct of the same, plaintiffs and their assignors, at the special instance and request of defendants, with whom the city of Venice was joined as defendant, did certain described work and labor and, in connection with and for the use of said defendants, furnished certain materials.

In each case judgment went for the plaintiff, from which said defendants, other than the city of Venice, have appealed.

There appears to be no controversy as to the amounts for which the judgments were rendered; the sole contention of appellants in each case, as we understand their counsel, being that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding of the court to the effect that said defendants above named did form a voluntary association under the fictitious name of Venice Road Race Association for the purpose of promoting and conducting automobile and motorcycle road races in the city of Venice.

The evidence, as to be expected in such cases, is voluminous, and no purpose could be served in an extended reference thereto. Suffice it to say that it clearly tends to establish the following facts: A meeting was held by a number of citizens, at which it was proposed to hold the races, and a committee, of which said defendants were members, was appointed to consider steps to be taken in furtherance thereof. Thereafter a conference was held by members of this committee with Mr. Shettler, who was a member of the American Automobile Association. This was followed by a meeting at which it was determined to hold the races and over what streets and highways the races were to be run, and at which H. B. Eakins, the city superintendent of streets, was requested to take charge of the work necessary to put the course in shape, and with whom they discussed the work necessary therefor. Later he received a letter signed "Thos. W. Prior, Venice Road Race Association, Chairman," asking him to give an approximate estimate as to the cost of the necessary labor in putting the streets in condition, to which he replied that his acceptance of the responsibility for superintending the work was subject to the city board of trustees consenting that he do so, and at a meeting, at which several of the defendants were present and defendant Prior speaking for the committee, they were told by the board that Eakins could act in the matter, provided they were assured the money for the labor would be forthcoming every Saturday night, which assurance was given; Mr. Prior stating they would see that the money was sent out. Eakins, assuming that the committee would attend to the financial arrangements, just as they would attend to the other arrangements for the race, proceeded with the work and labor, and, to the extent that he was given money, paid therefor at the end of each week. A part of the money was delivered to him in cash and part by checks signed "Thos. W. Prior, Custodian." The members of the committee met when necessary to discuss the questions arising in connection with the enterprise, and assumed to and did exercise control over Mr. Eakins in directing him as to the performance of the work as it progressed. Stationery and printed matter were gotten out by the committee, which was given general circulation, the heading of which was "Venice Road Race Association," and whereon, under the title "General Committee," appeared the names of defendants as members thereof, and appeared likewise upon letter heads as a chamber of commerce committee in charge of the venture. It was apparently expected that the cost of doing the work and the incidental expenses of holding the races would be met by subscriptions, gate fees from spectators, and entrance fees paid by those who participated in the races and with whom defendants, acting through one of their number as chairman made contracts.

[1] The foregoing and other facts established tend strongly to show that defendants, with the consent of the city authorities, undertook to and did promote and hold the automobile and motorcycle road races over the highways of the city, having, as their agent, the superintendent of streets, with the consent of the board of trustees, superintend the doing of the necessary work in preparing the streets therefor, which consent was obtained upon their agreeing to furnish the money and defray the expenses of said work; that a large part of the funds, raised by subscription, was paid, but that the amount so raised, together with the moneys derived from entrance fees and gate charges was inadequate to liquidate all of the claims for labor performed and materials furnished in connection with the enterprise so undertaken by defendants.

[2] The evidence is not only sufficient to justify the finding of which appellants complain, but clearly brings them within the rule correctly announced in 4 Cyc. p. 311, that—

> "Each member of an association is liable for the debts thereof incurred during his period of membership, and which have been necessarily contracted for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the association was formed."

And in Winona Lumber Co. v. Church et al., 6 S. D. 498, 62 N. W. 107, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

> "Where parties unite in a voluntary unincorporated association, and for convenience contract under an associate name, the acts of the association, it not being a legally responsible body, are the acts of its members who instigate and sanction the same."

Other cases to the same effect are: Willcox et al. v. Arnold et al., 162 Mass. 577, 39 N. E. 414; Vader et al. v. Ballou, 151 Wis. 577, 139 N. W. 413, 7 A. L. R. 216; Crawley v. American Society, etc., 153 Wis. 13, 139 N. W. 734, and Richardson v. Keely, 58 Colo. 47, 142 Pac. 167, in which last case it is said:

> "Where a business is conducted in the name of an unincorporated association, all the parties thereto are regarded as partners."

Conceding the association did not, as to the members thereof, constitute a partnership in the full and generally accepted sense, nevertheless it appears that defendants were engaged in a joint venture in the nature of a partnership, to which the same rules for enforcing liability for debts incurred apply. Ash v. Guie, 97 Pa. 493, 39 Am. Rep. 818. They were not only members of the association, but held themselves out to the public as such members and as constituting a committee in charge of the work. In the employing of plaintiffs to perform labor and purchasing materials required in holding the races, they acted by persons designated as officers of the association, and the fact that the transaction out of which the indebtedness arose were had between plaintiffs and such purported officers selected and appointed by defendants makes them none the less liable.

The judgments are affirmed.

KERRIGAN, J. The plaintiff, as administratrix, brought this action to recover from the defendants, who are husband and wife, the sum of $1,000, claimed to be the property of the estate of Reuben D. Norton, deceased. The defendants alleged, and the court found, that the defendant Ellen Norton took said sum pursuant to the terms of a trust to care for Reuben D. Norton until his death, make certain expenditures in his behalf, and retain the remainder to her own use and benefit. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendants. The plaintiff thereupon made a motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, and for judgment for the plaintiff, which was denied. This appeal is from the order denying the motion.

We see no merit in the appeal. On or about July 12, 1917, Reuben Norton, then being in feeble health, entered into an agreement with his brother William Norton that, if William would take care of him while he lived, Reuben would turn over to him the sum of $1,000; it being agreed that William should pay to Mr. Meyer, a minister, the sum of $100, and should pay such expenses as might be incurred in the care of Reuben, and upon his death should discharge his funeral bill, and that William should keep for himself for his trouble any balance that might remain at Reuben's death. The money was then actually paid over to William, who looked after Reuben for a short time. As William lived in Placer county and Reuben in San Jose, it seemed that a better arrangement could be made. Accordingly Reuben, William and Mrs. Ellen Norton, one of the defendants and wife of J. A. Norton, the other defendant and a brother of Reuben, talked the matter over, and it was agreed that Mrs. Norton should look after Reuben and take William's place; that she was to take care of Reuben and pay Rev. Meyer; that she was also to pay any expense necessary in the care of Reuben, and the funeral bill, and that "she should have for her own any balance that remained at Reuben's death." William then paid the $1,000 over to Mrs. Norton, who took Reuben into her home and cared for him until his death in the October following. She paid Rev. Meyer the $100, and also paid the sum of $242.14 for the expense of Reuben's last illness and funeral, leaving a balance in her hands of $657.86. The foregoing is all the testimony taken in the case, and was sufficient to establish a valid trust of personal property, which, having been fully performed, entitled the defendants to the judgment which was entered in their favor. Defendant was not placed in jeopardy under information dismissed before the jury was impaneled.

5. Criminal law 🔑438—Photograph of deceased taken at morgue held admissible.

In murder prosecution, a photograph of the deceased taken at the morgue, showing numerous cuts upon the head and face, held admissible to corroborate testimony that defendant had struck deceased three times with a chisel after he had fallen to the floor, and to corroborate testimony of physician who examined deceased's body, notwithstanding gruesomeness of picture, and possible effect thereof on jury.

6. Witnesses 🔑2(3)—Withholding of attachment against witness held not error.

Action of court in withholding attachment where witness was ill did not deprive defendant of any substantial right, where court in so doing stated that defendant might prepare affidavits stating the testimony which he expected to prove by such witness, and that such affidavits might be ground for a continuance, and where no such affidavits were prepared by defendant.

7. Criminal law 🔑641(3)—Appointment of attorney for defendant on failure of retained attorney to appear held proper.

Action of court in appointing as counsel for defendant a lawyer who had previously appeared for him, where other lawyer retained by defendant did not appear, held proper.

8. Criminal law 🔑719(4)—District attorney's reference to letter which had been ruled out by court held improper.

District attorney's reference in his argument to the jury to a letter written by defendant, in which he admitted the crime charged, but which letter had been ruled out by the court, held improper.

9. Criminal law 🔑1186(4) — District attorney's improper remark in argument to jury held not ground for reversal.

Prosecuting attorney's reference in argument to the jury to letter which had been ruled out by the court held not ground for reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where the court directed that all reference to the letter be withdrawn and instructed jury to disregard it, and where evidence clearly proved defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Carlos Saenz was convicted of murder in the first degree, with life imprisonment, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richard K. Stewart, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of murder in the first degree, for which the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life.

The first error assigned by the appellant is that the trial court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion to dismiss the information against him, filed on April 10th, charging the defendant with murder in the first degree (upon which information defendant was tried), upon the ground that a former information filed herein on the 13th day of January, 1920, charging the defendant with murder in the second degree, had been dismissed by the court on March 2, 1920.

[1, 2] The proceedings under the first information are not before this court upon appeal; they have not been made a part of the record. Under the well-recognized rule that all presumptions are in favor of the regularity and correctness of the action of the trial court, we must assume that this order dismissing the former information was in all respects as required by section 1385, Penal Code. The case of People v. Disperati, 11 Cal. App. 469, 105 Pac. 617, cited by the defendant in his argument before the trial court does not aid the appellant here. It is true that that case states, at page 477 of 11 Cal. App., at page 620 of 105 Pac., that the order of the trial court did not recite the reasons upon which it was based; that the record shows the grounds upon which the motion to dismiss was made by the district attorney; but nothing in the order shows that these grounds were, or any of them was, the basis for the action of the court.

[3, 4] The appellant has stated in his brief that the motion was made in the present case by the district attorney upon the ground that he desired to charge the defendant with murder in the first degree, and therefore desired that the information for a lesser crime, growing out of the same offense, be dismissed. Appellant has also stated that the reasons for dismissing the information were not given in the order of the court. The statements in the brief are, of course, no part of the record, and we are not at liberty to assume that the order of the trial court did not specify the grounds of the dismissal. It is provided (section 1387, Pen. Code) that an order for the dismissal of an action is not a bar to a prosecution for the same offense if the offense is a felony. See, also, People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 263, 30 Pac. 814; People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243; People v. Breen, 130 Cal. 72, 62 Pac. 408; People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 Pac. 449. The order of dismissal was made, according to appellant's statement, before the impaneling of the jury, and the defendant at that time had not been placed in jeopardy under the first information.

by the name of Ah Chee. This witness testified that he had found the body of Ah Chee in the truck, but also testified that he did not know T. Shibata.

The defendant further objected to the action of the trial court upon the following facts: When the case was called for trial no counsel appeared for the defendant and the court directed the sheriff to bring into court Richard K. Stewart, who, the court stated, had been the only attorney appearing in the proceedings had in the case in the superior court. Mr. Stewart was brought into court and protested that he was not the counsel for the defendant, and that one Brickley had been retained as such, and that any action which had been taken by Mr. Stewart in the case was merely for the accommodation of Mr. Brickley. The court stated that Mr. Stewart was the only attorney which the court had recognized in the proceedings before it, and that as Mr. Brickley was not present the court would call upon Mr. Stewart to proceed with the case. Mr. Stewart then desired a continuance, to which the district attorney objected for the reason that a number of witnesses had been brought from Coalinga to Fresno, where the trial was had, and that the trial had been set for that day and no continuance had been asked. Upon the insistence of Mr. Stewart, a short continuance was granted, within which it was agreed that Mr. Stewart would proceed to the ranch where Mr. Brickley was at the time accompanied by the sheriff, and would bring Mr. Brickley into court by 11:15 o'clock; upon the understanding, however, that if Mr. Brickley was not present at that time, the trial would proceed without him. At the appointed time, the case was called and the record shows that Mr. Stewart answered that the defendant was ready, without further objection. Mr. Brickley was not produced.

[6] At the close of the plaintiff's case, counsel for defendant asked that a bench warrant issue for Mr. Brickley to bring him into court for failure to obey a subpœna which had been regularly served. It was stated at that time that he was required as a witness for the defendant. The sheriff was then sworn and testified that he had served the subpœna upon Mr. Brickley at 10 o'clock on the morning of that day, and had found him in bed, apparently so ill that he was unable to stand upon his feet. The sheriff testified that Mr. Brickley could not sit up and was unable to raise himself in his bed to speak with him. The court said that, under the circumstances, it would withhold from the hands of the sheriff the attachment ordered issued, and that affidavits might be prepared by defendant's counsel embodying the testimony which he expected to prove by the said Brickley, and that such affidavits might be ground for a continuance. The affidavits were evidently not prepared and do not appear in the record. Under these circumstances, we see no error in the action of the trial court, and we do not think the defendant was deprived of any substantial right in being denied the process of the court to compel the attendance of this witness.

> "On October 29, 1907, the case was set for trial on December 30, 1907, the defendant personally requesting that it be set for some time in December. At the time so fixed the case was called. Defendant said he was not ready for trial because his attorney was not present, but was in Seattle, where he had been trying a case for some weeks. This attorney had represented defendant up to this point. No continuance had previously been requested, or any intimation made that one would be asked be defendant, and a jury was present for the trial, as well as the prosecution and its witnesses. There was nothing, according to the showing made, to warrant the assumption that the case would not be tried at the time set. The trial court was not required to indefinitely wait for the return of defendant's counsel before proceeding with the trial. * * * The trial court stated to the defendant that he would appoint counsel for him, but defendant practically declined to avail himself of this offer, insisting that his original attorney should be present, and he subsequently conducted his own defense. * * * Defendant cannot now complain that he was not represented by counsel, that fact being due entirely to the further fact that he declined to accept the offer of the court in regard thereto."

Upon the contention of counsel for defendant that the case could have been conducted more ably by Mr. Brickley, the record speaks for itself, and it plainly shows that the case was very carefully tried for the defendant; that every objection was made and saved and the entire matter handled in all respects in a manner most creditable to the attorney and most advantageous to the defendant. There is absolutely nothing in the record to indicate that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by the fact that the case was conducted on his behalf by the attorney who represents him here upon appeal.

There is urged further on behalf of the defendant the objection that evidence of his confession to the sheriff should not have been introduced against him because it appears that it was obtained under a promise of immunity. The most that can be said for defendant upon this point is that conflicting inferences might be drawn from the testimony regarding the reasons for the making of the confession by the defendant, but we are convinced that there was sufficient evidence to justify the conclusion of the court that the confession was made voluntarily by the defendant and without the promise of any immunity. The testimony regarding the statements made to the defendant by the officers at the time of his confession is very similar to that set out in the opinion in the case of People v. Haney, 189 Pac. 338, and the court was entitled to accept this testimony, as against a different account of the matter given by the defendant, and conclude thereupon that the confession was a voluntary one, and, as such, entitled to be admitted in evidence.

[8, 9] The last error urged by the defendant is in reference to the conduct of the district attorney in referring in his argument to the jury to a letter written by the defendant to his brother in which he admitted the crime charged, which letter had been ruled out by the court. This was unquestionably improper. The court, however, upon the defendant's objection, directed that all reference to the letter be withdrawn and the jury instructed to disregard it. It will be presumed that the jury heeded this admonition of the court, most especially in view of the entire record, which clearly discloses the participation of the defendant in the commission of a most heinous crime. Under such circumstances, there has been no miscarriage of justice in the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court, and prejudice is not presumed from error since the enactment of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution.

DUFF v. ANDERSON. (Civ. 3601.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑995—Weight of evidence for the trial court.

It was the province of the trial court, and not the appellate court, to weigh the evidence.

2. Sales 🔑181(11)—Evidence held to prove tender of bill of sale.

In seller's action for possession following buyer's default in payment of installments, evidence held to support finding that before commencement of the action seller tendered buyer a bill of sale.

3. Sales 🔑176(3)—Failure to specify objection to bill of sale waiver of objection.

. Buyer waived the right to object to the bill of sale for insufficiency of description, in seller's action for recovery of goods on ground of buyer's default, by failure to specify such objection on seller's tender of bill of sale on making demand on buyer for performance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2076.

4. Contracts 🔑170(1)—Practical construction by parties considered.

Subsequent acts of the parties showing the construction they have put upon the agreement themselves are to be looked to by the court, and in some cases may be controlling.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1027—Demand in replevin for excessive damages harmless where possession recovered.

In replevin by seller following buyer's default in payment of installments, where seller obtained possession of goods at time of commencement of action, and where judgment merely awarded him possession without providing for money damages if delivery could not be had, plaintiff's demand for an amount in excess of that due held harmless.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1170(10)—Erroneous finding held harmless in view of judgment.

In replevin by seller of cattle to recover possession following a buyer's default in payment of installments, where judgment awarded seller possession merely, action of court in finding that buyer failed to feed or pasture the cattle as required by the contract, if error, held harmless under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, since seller was entitled to judgment for possession in view of buyer's default, regardless of such finding.

7. Judgment 🔑251(1), 256(1)—Award of possession of cattle with increase held erroneous in view of pleading.

In replevin by seller of cattle to recover possession following buyer's default in payment of installments, judgment for seller giving him possession held erroneous in so far as it entitled him to "all the increase of cattle had while in possession of defendant or $7 per head damages if possession could not be had," in absence of pleadings or findings specifying or describing any increase.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by H. S. Duff against M. A. Anderson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

Frank Kauke and Ernest Klette, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Geo. Cosgrave, of Fresno, for respondent.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an ordinary action of replevin by which plaintiff obtained judgment for the possession of certain cattle theretofore delivered to defendant under an agreement of purchase and sale. Defendant appeals.

By the terms of an agreement which bears date April 3, 1918, respondent agreed to sell, and appellant to buy, 35 dairy cows for $4,375. Upon the execution of the agreement $1,000 was paid. The balance, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, was payable within one year in any event, and installment payments were to be made on account in the sum of $150 per month on the 15th day of each and every month, commencing May 15, 1918, title to remain in seller until the purchase price was fully paid. The purchaser was given possession of the cattle upon the execution of the agreement, and was to receive a bill of sale upon full payment of the contract price.

The following covenant was inserted in the agreement:

> "The said stock and all thereof shall be held for six months from the date hereof and subject to what is commonly called tubercular test made in conformity to the laws of said state. All cows passing such test shall be accepted by the second party at that time. If any of said cows do not pass such test at such time, the same shall be held for an additional period of six months and a like test shall be made of them during that time, and all thereof which pass said test shall be accepted by the second party. At the end of one year from the date hereof if any of said cows fail to pass said test, then and in that event, the first party will withdraw the same from this contract and agreement and deduct $125 for each cow from the said purchase price, but the second party shall pay the first party $6 per month for each and every month of the milking period from the date hereof up to the time any animal is withdrawn by the first party for the reason that it does not pass said test."

During the six months following the execution of the agreement appellant made payments on account aggregating $765.17, but never made any thereafter.

On May 10th, and after the entire balance of the purchase price, with interest, amounting to $2,897.53, was due and unpaid, respondent delivered to appellant a written demand as follows:

> "Fresno, May 10, 1919.
> "To M. A. Anderson: Herewith is tendered to you a bill of sale conveying title to the cattle now in your possession belonging to me, and the same will be delivered on payment of the sum of $2,897.53, being the amount due on contract for the sale of the same, and demand is hereby made upon you for the said amount or in default of such payment possession of the cattle described in said bill of sale is hereby demanded. H. S. Duff."

The first point urged by appellant is that, as all the payments were due at the time of the demand, he could not be put in default until a bill of sale was tendered to him, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that such a tender was made.

Upon the trial the appellant denied that respondent had exhibited or left with him any paper other than the written demand. The respondent, as a witness, upon being questioned whether he tendered the bill of sale, said that he did not; that he did not remember; that he had the bill of sale in his possession at the time; and that it was his recollection that, if Mr. Anderson (appellant) made any kind of settlement, he was to turn over to him the bill of sale. Upon cross-examination, however, he said:

> "I think I exhibited this [bill of sale]. Q. You would not be sure? A. No; but my instructions were to do it, and I think I did. Q. You did not leave it with him? A. I don't think I did."

[1] The evidence, at best, is weak. Still it was the province of the trial judge, and not ours, to pass upon its weight.

[2] It appears that respondent went to the appellant's ranch, acting under the instruction of his attorney; that he was contemplating the immediate commencement of an action against appellant; that he had the bill of sale with him; that the written demand expressly stated that he tendered a bill of sale; that he had made unsuccessful and repeated demands upon appellant for money during the previous four months; and that he had slight, if any, faith in the defendant making any settlement when he made the demand. In view of all the surrounding circumstances, we think that the finding is supported by the evidence, and shows an actual tender as found by the court.

It is next claimed that the bill of sale, as tendered, was insufficient, in that it contains no description of the cattle except by reference "to the agreement hereto attached," while the evidence shows that no such copy was attached.

[3] The court found upon sufficient evidence that there was an actual tender of the bill of sale, and under section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure it devolved upon appellant at such time to specify any objection he had as to the instrument; otherwise it was waived.

It is urged that it was the duty of respondent to have the tubercular test of the stock made, and that by failing so to do he himself was in default and cannot enforce the contract. The evidence shows that the provision providing for a test was incorporated in the contract at the suggestion of appellant. The cattle were in his possession. The clause was for his benefit, and it was his exclusive right to waive the test. The appellant did not have the test made until April 12, 1919, and more than a year after the date of the contract. According to his own testimony he wrote to the state veterinary, and received word that it was thought that the man would be there at a certain time to make the test, which was to be about six months after the making of the contract. Afterward he received word that the man would come as soon as he could, and he got him as early as possible. Respondent testified:

> "I asked him several times for his test and it was always a case of they had written and when he got the test he would let me know, and was to let me know before the test was made, because I wanted to be present."

[4] If there was any uncertainty as to who was to make the test, this evidence shows that the court was warranted in believing from the conduct of the parties that they considered it to be, and that it was, the duty of appellant to do so.

> "Subsequent acts of the parties, showing the construction they have put upon the agreement themselves, are to be looked to by the court, and in some cases may be controlling." 9 Cyc. 588, and cases there cited.

It is next urged that appellant was entitled to an additional credit of $1,875 on the contract price, being $250 for 4 head of cattle that died and $1,625 for 13 head that did not pass the tubercular test which appellant had made on April 12, 1919, more than one year after the date of the contract. This contention is based upon an instrument in writing signed by respondent and delivered to appellant, which is as follows:

> "Mr. M. A. Anderson: In regard to your complaint regarding the four cows that died, I will give you credit for $62.50 per head and will also receive the thirteen head turned down on test, and in final settlement deduct the amount from the contract. H. S. Duff."

[5] The court found upon sufficient evidence that there was no consideration for the instrument; that it was made at a time when all the payments on the contract were due, and as an offer of compromise. It appears that according to appellant's own construction of the contract there was at least $734.53 unpaid on the agreement at the time of the demand. In any event he was not injured by a demand in excess of the amount due. All the cattle referred to in the agreement, except the 4 that died, were taken by plaintiff upon a writ at the time of the commencement of the action. Defendant in his answer admitted that plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the 13 head mentioned. The court found that all the cattle described in the agreement, except these 4 cows that died, were so taken by plaintiff upon the writ and retained by him. The judgment declares plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to the possession, but does not award plaintiff any money or their value, if delivery cannot be had.

[6] It is claimed that the court seriously erred in admitting evidence to the effect, and in finding, that defendant failed to feed or pasture the live stock as required by the contract, inasmuch as no claim of such failure was ever made by plaintiff until the time of the trial. Assuming that the action of the court was erroneous, it must be disregarded, unless it appear that a different result would have been probable if the error had not occurred. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc. It is obvious that the respondent would be entitled to judgment even if this finding had been in favor of appellant.

Appellant failed to make his payments, although frequently urged so to do. He paid no money after December 24, 1918, nor did he make a tender of any after that date. While he alleged in his answer that at the time of the demand he offered to pay to plaintiff all sums due, it is apparent that his talk upon that subject at the time of the demand was a mere subterfuge to further postpone the day of settlement, while he was receiving the income from the dairy cows.

[7] Objection is made to the improper insertion of a clause in the judgment, following a description of the cattle of which plaintiff is adjudged entitled to the possession. There appears in neither the pleadings nor findings any suggestion as to the amount of, or as to the description of any increase, of cattle; yet plaintiff by the judgment was awarded possession in general terms "of all the increase of cattle had while in possession of defendant or $7 per head damages if possession could not be had." In practical effect it allows plaintiff carte blanche to levy a writ of execution upon the property of defendant.

The judgment is modified by striking out the following words:

> "Together with the increase thereof while in possession of defendant M. A. Anderson, or if delivery of the increase now in possession of defendant cannot be had then for $7 per head damages for its detention."

In all other respects the judgment is affirmed; each party to pay his own costs upon appeal.

PEOPLE v. RICCARDI. (Cr. 903.)

1. Embezzlement 🔑32—Indictment charging embezzlement by a "bailee" sufficient to charge embezzlement by agent.

Indictment charging that defendant was "bailee" of named person, and that by virtue of his employment as such bailee there came into his possession a specified sum of money that he unlawfully and feloniously converted, embezzled, and appropriated to his own use, held sufficient to charge embezzlement by an "agent" under Pen. Code, § 508; the word "bailee" for the purposes of the indictment being synonymous with term "agent," since a bailee is a species of agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bailee.]

2. Embezzlement 🔑32—Indictment need not allege nature of bailment.

In prosecution of a bailee for embezzlement under Pen. Code, § 508, it is not necessary to allege the nature, purpose, and object of the bailment.

3. Embezzlement 🔑44(5)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution of a lawyer for embezzlement of money given him by client as bail money defended on the ground that money so given him was his fee, evidence held to sustain conviction.

4. Criminal law 🔑741(1)—Weight of evidence for the jury.

The weight of the evidence is for the jury.

5. Criminal law 🔑742(1)—Credibility of witness for jury.

The credibility of a witness who has twice been convicted of a felony is for the jury.

6. Witnesses 🔑345(1)—Previous conviction of witness of felony considered in determining credibility.

That a witness had twice been convicted of a felony should be given great weight by the jury in determining his credibility.

7. Embezzlement 🔑6—Conviction of embezzlement by person to whom check had been delivered held proper.

Where client delivered check to his attorney to enable the attorney to deposit money as bail, the lawyer's conviction of embezzlement of the money held proper as against objection that it was the check, and not the money, that he converted, since he was the bailee not only of the check, but of the money.

8. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12)—Court's statement held not prejudicial misconduct.

In prosecution of a lawyer for embezzlement, statement by the trial judge that lawyer who acts as his own attorney has a fool for a client, where court expressly disavowed any personal imputation of folly to the defendant, held not prejudicial misconduct.

9. Criminal law 🔑782(13)—Requested instruction as to proving defense held misleading.

Refusal of instruction requested by defendant that a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to establish a fact favorable to the defendant's innocence held proper, since to so instruct the jury might have misled it into supposing that the defendant must establish his innocence by a preponderance of the evidence.

10. Criminal law 🔑561(1)—Reasonable doubt as to guilt sufficient for acquittal.

All that is necessary to acquittal is that the evidence, taken as a whole, should leave a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to defendant's guilt.

11. Criminal law 🔑778(4)—Instructions on burden of proof held sufficient.

Instruction that defendant need prove nothing, that all presumptions were in his favor and that every fact necessary to a conviction must be established by the people beyond a reasonable doubt, held sufficient.

12. Criminal law 🔑1035(3)—Misconduct of court should be immediately called to court's attention.

A trial court is entitled, if it is the intention of counsel to rely, upon an appeal, on the conduct of the trial court, to have the alleged transgressions called to the trial court's attention, so that he may in a proper case by an admonition to the jury, or by some other suitable mode, immediately remove the prejudice possibly caused thereby.

13. Criminal law 🔑1111(5)—Clerk's minutes held to control reporter's transcript.

Recital in the clerk's minutes of the trial that the plea of the defendant was stated to the jury held controlling in support of the verdict, over reporter's transcript.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; G. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

C. Vincent Riccardi was convicted of embezzlement, and from judgment of conviction and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEASLY, Justice pro tem. The defendant was found guilty of embezzlement upon an indictment, was adjudged thereon to be imprisoned in the state prison, and appeals from this judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The indictment charges that the defendant, Riccardi, was bailee of one Alberto Rolatti; that by virtue of his employment as such bailee there came into the possession, care, custody, and control of him, the said Riccardi, $1,000 in lawful money of the United States of America and of the value of $1,000 in gold coin of the United States of America, and of the personal property of the said Alberto Rolatti, and that he, the said Riccardi, after the said personal property had come into his possession, care, custody, and control as aforesaid, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously convert, embezzle and appropriate the same to his own use and to uses and purposes not in the due and lawful execution of such trust as such bailee as aforesaid.

This indictment is attacked as not complying with the provisions of section 507 or section 508 of the Penal Code upon one or the other of which, under the facts in evidence and instructions of the court, the prosecution must of necessity have based its theory of the case. The answer to this contention is that the indictment is within the provisions of section 508 of said Code, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 508. When Clerk, Agent, or Servant Guilty of Embezzlement. Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement."

[1] It is true, as claimed, that the indictment charges the conversion by Riccardi as bailee, and that the term "bailee" is not found in section 508; but the word "bailee" is for the purposes of the indictment synonymous with the term "agent," a bailee being a species of agent. People v. Walker, 144 Cal. 1, 77 Pac. 705.

"The offense charged in the information," says the court in that case, "though stated in slightly different language, is essentially the same as that for which the defendant was committed. Every agent who, by virtue of his employment, receives into his possession the property of his principal, is as to that property the bailee of his principal so long as the title to the property remains in the principal, and every bailee of property who by the owner is intrusted with it is, for the purpose of its safe-keeping, the agent of the owner. It is immaterial whether the bailee receives the property directly from the owner or from third persons on behalf of the owner. In either case he is, in contemplation of law, intrusted with the property of the owner, and is an agent as well as a bailee. The two terms are, with respect to the persons and property and the particular offense here involved, but different names for the same relation. When, therefore, the information charged the defendant with embezzling money of the company received by him as its agent and by virtue of his said employment, it did, in legal effect, charge him with embezzling money of the company intrusted to him as bailee by the company, which was precisely the crime described in the original complaint, and for which he was committed."

"Stating that the property was intrusted to the defendant as bailee sufficiently shows a fiduciary relation, and it was not necessary to allege the circumstances of the felonious conversion, especially so in the absence of a demurrer."

[3] The defendant claims that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict; that there is in the record only slight evidence supporting the charge of embezzlement. He admits a conflict in the evidence, but contends that the verdict finds support only in the evidence of Rolatti, the prosecuting witness, and that, as Rolatti was shown to have been twice convicted of a felony, his evidence is discredited to such an extent as not to furnish more than slight proof of guilt. The evidence of Rolatti, if believed, clearly establishes the guilt of Riccardi. It is simple and may be briefly narrated: Rolatti was arrested for a felony in March, 1918, and lodged in the city prison of the city and county of San Francisco. He was presently called to the reception room of the prison, and there met Riccardi. Rolatti did not know Riccardi at all, but the latter introduced himself as a lawyer, and told Rolatti that the latter was in great trouble. After Riccardi had advised Rolatti not to employ an American lawyer on the ground that the latter would not be able to assist him, the two agreed upon a fee of $400 for Riccardi for his services in the latter's behalf. Rolatti had $1,500 in bank. Riccardi received all of the $1,500 of Rolatti's money. One thousand of this was retained by Riccardi for the purpose of procuring the release of Rolatti on bail, and was obtained upon a representation of Riccardi, who informed Rolatti that he could be liberated on bail in the sum of $1,000 in cash. Rolatti had this sum on deposit in the bank. Riccardi, under Rolatti's direction, obtained the latter's bank book from a suit case belonging to Rolatti. Riccardi thereupon showed Rolatti what purported to be an order for bail signed by a police magistrate of the city and county of San Francisco. Thereupon Rolatti signed and delivered to Riccardi a bank check. Riccardi presented this check to the bank. When so presented it was filled out for $1,000, and marked on the face in Riccardi's handwriting, "Paid as fee." The check was cashed, and Riccardi did not use the money to procure the release of Rolatti on bail, but claimed at the trial that the $1,000 was paid as a fee, and not as bail money. Riccardi kept the $1,000 and also the other $500.

[4, 5] It is clear from the foregoing, if the jury believed the testimony, that the complaining witness, Rolatti, intrusted the $1,000 of his funds to the defendant for the sole purpose of being deposited as bail money. That it was never used for this purpose, but was appropriated by the defendant Riccardi, is conceded by the very nature of his defense, wherein he admits that he received $1,500 from the complaining witness, Rolatti, but contends that he so received it upon an understanding had with the complaining witness that it was to be his fee. There was certain testimony which, if believed, corroborated Riccardi in this contention. The jury, however, evidently rejected this evidence of the defense, and chose to believe that of the prosecuting witness to the effect that the money was not paid to the defendant Riccardi as a fee, but was delivered to Riccardi to be deposited as bail. There was also the evidence of circumstances and some evidence arising out of the contradictory nature of the testimony of Riccardi which tended to corroborate Rolatti. The evidence was sufficient, if believed by the jury, to sustain the verdict. It was the function of the jury to pass upon the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witness Rolatti.

[6] It is conceded by the appellant that there is a conflict in the evidence, and that upon such conflict this court will not interfere with the verdict of the jury where the evidence is substantial as contradistinguished from slight. The fact that Rolatti had twice been convicted of a felony should have been given great weight by the jury in determining his credibility. Nevertheless to the jury is left by the law in such case the question of determining whether or not the testimony of the witness with his felonious record was to be believed as against that of Riccardi and other witnesses. The jury saw the witness Rolatti, had an opportunity to observe the other witnesses, and upon the jury the law lays the burden of determining whether Rolatti or Riccardi should be credited. If any other rule obtained, the felon would be helpless against any rogue who might find himself in a position to swindle him. The evidence of Rolatti cannot be said to have been slight as a matter of law, and the question whether it should be believed was one for the jury. That body determined it against Riccardi, and he must abide that determination.

The appellant also contends that the evidence, if believed, established the commission by him of grand larceny, and not of embezzlement. This contention is based upon an admission that the defendant obtained the $1,000 through the instrumentality of a forged, false, and fictitious order admitting the latter to bail in the sum of $1,000. No evidence was introduced, however, to show whether the paper, purporting to be an order for bail, submitted to Rolatti, was forged or false. Neither the justice whose name was attached to it nor any one else was called to testify that such order, or signature of the magistrate thereon, was false or forged. The paper itself was not in existence; and there is nothing whatever in the evidence to show or indicate that the order was not genuine.

The appellant further contends, at least inferentially, that what he embezzled, if anything, was the check, and not the cash. But he did with the check exactly what it was intended he should do; he cashed it; and the obtaining of the check was only a circumstance in the chain of facts. He embezzled, if anything, the cash, and not the check. As to when the defendant formed the intent to convert the money to his own use, the evidence was quite sufficient to support the conclusion that it was after the money came into his possession that he formed and executed that intent. A similar construction was given to similar evidence in People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174, and upheld by the Supreme Court.

[7] The appellant argues that he was not the bailee of the money, but only of the check, if anything. As the record above quoted shows, he obtained the money for a specific purpose. He was the agent of Rolatti to execute that purpose by depositing the money as bail, and as such he was the bailee of the money until it was deposited. He failed to so deposit it. He converted it to his own use, and claims it was paid as a fee, a claim which the jury discarded. He was the bailee under such circumstances not only of the check, but of the money. People v. Walker, supra.

It is contended that the instructions in the case were incorrect because the court, so it is said, did not instruct the jury concerning embezzlement by a bailee, nor give any instructions predicated on section 507 of the Penal Code, defining embezzlement by a bailee. The contention of the appellant that the court did not instruct the jury relative to the contents of section 507 of the Penal Code falls to the ground, for, as has been said, the prosecution must be taken to have been conducted under section 508 of said Code.

mitted prejudicial misconduct in stating that a lawyer who acts as his own attorney has a fool for a client. The statement of this adage of lawyers, which has in it as much of truth as of humor, could have done the defendant no harm, because the judge expressly disavowed any personal imputation of folly to the defendant.

[9-11] The refusal of the court to give the instruction offered by the defendant that a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to establish a fact favorable to the defendant's innocence, was not error. In the first place, the proposition as stated might have misled the jury into supposing that the defendant must establish his innocence by a preponderance of the evidence; whereas all that was necessary to his acquittal was that the evidence, taken as a whole, should leave a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to his guilt. Courts should be careful of giving such instructions, even when requested by the defendant. The court, upon the other hand, clearly instructed the jury with emphasis that the defendant need prove nothing, that all presumptions were in his favor, and that every fact necessary to a conviction must be established by the people beyond a reasonable doubt. This was all that should have been given in the way of instructions.

[12] The other strictures upon the conduct of the trial judge are not such, we think, as to call for comment. If they were, there is no record of any exception to them; or, if there is such record, our attention has not been called to them, and no request was made of the court to instruct the jury to disregard them. A trial court is entitled, if it is the intention of counsel to rely upon an appeal on the conduct of the trial court, to have the alleged transgressions called to the trial judge's attention, so that he may in a proper case, by an admonition to the jury or by some other suitable mode, immediately remove the prejudice possibly caused thereby.

[13] It is finally contended that the plea of the defendant was not stated to the jury. The clerk's minutes of the trial contain these words:

> "Thereupon an indictment was read and the plea stated to the jury by the clerk."

In the reporter's transcript the following appears:

> "A jury having been selected and sworn to try the case, the following proceedings were had:
> "Clerk, to the Court: Shall I read the indictment, your honor?
> "The Court: Yes.
> "The clerk thereupon read the indictment."

Under the circumstances, in support of the verdict, we must hold that the clerk's version showing that the clerk's duty was properly performed is controlling.

The judgment is affirmed.

LUNDY v. LETTUNICH. (Civ. 3441.)

1. Venue 🔑66—Affidavit of defense amendable.

An affidavit served and filed with a demurrer and a demand in writing for a change of place of trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 396, is amendable, under section 473.

2. Venue 🔑56—Filing of affidavit and demand all that is necessary to establish right to have venue changed.

A filing of an affidavit and demand at the time of the first appearance is all that is required to establish the right of a defendant in a personal action to have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395, 396, so that it is immaterial that affidavit of merits is insufficient, as it may be amended.

3. Venue 🔑58, 75 — Order of court necessary to change place of trial to residence of defendant.

The filing of the demand for change of place of trial to the county of defendant's residence and an affidavit do not operate ipso facto to change the place of trial, an order of court being necessary, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, 1003, and the defendant must make separate application or motion for such an order.

4. Venue 🔑63—Notice of application for order transferring cause to county of defendant's residence necessary.

Notice to plaintiff of application or motion for change of place of trial to the county of defendant's residence is necessary, unless waived, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, 1003.

5. Venue 🔑61—Motion for change to be made at earliest opportunity.

An application or motion for change of place of trial to the county of residence of defendant must be made at the earliest opportunity after the filing of the affidavit and demand, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, 1003.

6. Venue 🔑43 — Court properly considered second motion for change of place of trial to residence of defendant.

Court properly entertained a second motion for a change of place of trial to the county of defendant's residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, 1003, where the notice for the first motion was insufficient, and it was denied without prejudice, the motion based on the second notice, there being really only one motion and two notices, coming on at the first call of the calendar after the appearance, affidavit, and demand were filed.

7. Venue 🔑66—Objection to affidavit of defense on merits held supertechnical.

An objection that an affidavit on the merits accompanying a demand for change of place of trial to the county of defendant's residence was insufficient in that it failed to state that the person whose advice was sought was an attorney held technical and without merit.

8. Venue 🔑61—Motion for change need not be made at time demurrer or answer filed.

Motion by defendant for change of place of trial to the county of defendant's residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 396, 397, 1003, 1005, 1010, need not be made at the time the demurrer or answer is filed.

9. Venue 🔑77 — Right to change may be waived.

The right to have the place of trial changed to the county of defendant's residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, may be waived.

10. Venue 🔑34 — Statute giving right of change to be liberally construed.

The provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395–397, giving defendant right to have proceeding transferred to the county of his residence, are to be liberally construed to promote justice, and not to be technically warped to defeat a fixed right in view of section 4.

11. Venue 🔑56 — Defendant desiring change of place of trial to county of residence held not guilty of laches.

Defendant, proceeding for change of place of trial to county of his residence under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 396–397, held not guilty of laches in failing to file his demurrer affidavit and demand until five days after service.

Action by A. L. Lundy against E. B. Lettunich. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendant appealed. Defendant dying pending appeal, Stella E. Lettunich, as executrix of his will, was substituted in his place. Reversed.

Sans & Hudson, of Watsonville (Thos. W. Firby, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendant, E. B. Lettunich, appealed from an order denying a motion for change of venue. Upon his death Stella E. Lettunich, as executrix of his will, was substituted in his place.

[1-3] The action, which is personal in its nature, having been commenced in the city and county of San Francisco, summons was regularly served on June 16, 1919, in the county of Santa Cruz. The defendant appeared by filing a demurrer on July 16, 1919; service of the demurrer having been admitted by endorsement under date of July 11. With the demurrer was served and filed an affidavit showing, among other things, that the defendant was a resident of Santa Cruz county. At the same time the statutory demand in writing was served and filed that the trial be had in the proper county. Code Civ. Proc. § 396. It is contended by the respondent that the affidavit of merits was insufficient. The contention appears to be unfounded, but its consideration is unnecessary. The appellant in his brief asserts that whether or not it was sufficient is immaterial. This is true, because such an affidavit is amendable. Code Civ. Proc. § 473; Palmer, etc., v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 201, 28 Pac. 226; Pittman v. Carstenbrook, 11 Cal. App. 229, 104 Pac. 699; Jaques v. Owens, 18 Cal. App. 114, 122 Pac. 430. The filing of the affidavit and demand at the time of the first appearance is all that is required to establish the right of a defendant in a personal action to have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395, 396, but as was pointed out in Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 535, 129 Pac. 983, the remedy by which this right is to be enforced is a different thing. It was there said:

> "While an absolute right, if it is insisted on, it is one which a defendant may waive, and which he does waive unless he follows the procedure provided for asserting it."

Section 397 provides that the court may on motion change the place of trial. In the Bohn Case, 164 Cal. 536, 129 Pac. 983, the court said:

> "The filing of the demand and affidavit do not operate ipso facto to change the place of trial. They have no such force. The change can only be effected through an order of the court after its judicial action has been invoked, by bringing the matter on for hearing, where the right of the defendant to the transfer can be contested by the plaintiff. The court must be applied to for an order of transfer. Such application is a motion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1003), and under section 397 a motion for the change must be made in addition to the demand and affidavit, as one of the necessary steps in the procedure to obtain the order of transfer."

[4, 5] So far as the court is informed, there is no decision holding that the notice of motion must accompany the affidavit and demand. They are entirely separate matters. Section 396 requires only the demand and affidavit to be served and filed with the demurrer or answer. The motion could not be made at that time unless notice under section 1003 were waived. The proceeding, it is true, must be prosecuted with diligence. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 79. The motion should be made at the earliest opportunity. Pearkes v. Freer, 9 Cal. 642; Jones v. Frost, 28 Cal. 246. If it is made afterwards, the applicant must explain any seeming lack of diligence on his part. Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 401, 90 Pac. 932, 1135.

In the present case a notice of motion was served and filed with the demurrer and other papers, in which the time of presentation was fixed as July 18, 1919. There was no order shortening time. The time allowed was less than that required by section 1005, Code of Civil Procedure. There was no calendar called on July 18. On July 22 an order shortening time of service was made and a new notice of motion for July 25 was served and filed. On that day the record shows that an order was made, which, omitting immaterial matters, was as follows:

> "The motion to change the venue herein, the notice of which was filed July 16, 1919, coming on regularly to be heard, * * * it is now by consent of counsel for defendant ordered said motion be denied without prejudice. Thereupon the motion for change of venue, the notice of which was filed on July 23, 1919, came on to be heard and objection was made by plaintiff that the notice of motion was filed too late, and that it was not given at the time of the defendant's first appearance, and that defendant's affidavit of merits was not sufficient."

The court, over the plaintiff's objection, granted the defendant five days to amend the affidavit of merits. This was done; and the matter again coming on on August 29, after evidence and argument, it was submitted. On September 30, 1919, the motion for change of venue was denied.

[6] While in the respondent's brief the argument is divided into ten sections, there are really but two points involved in the appeal. They are, first, whether or not the court had power to consider the motion made on the second notice, and, if so, whether the showing of right on the part of the appellant was sufficient. Following the respondent's elaboration of these two points, a conclusion in favor of the appellant is reached on both.

1. The respondent relies on the decision in McNeill, etc., v. Doe, 163 Cal. 339, 125 Pac. 345, to support his proposition that the denial by consent of the motion insufficiently noticed exhausted the power of the court. In that case it was decided that unconnected and successive motions for change of venue could not be entertained because the statute contemplated a single and prompt assertion of the substantive right. Under the facts disclosed by the record in this case, the first notice being insufficient, the court could not properly have entertained the motion based upon it. The motion based on the second notice came on at the first call of the calendar after the appearance, affidavit, and demand were filed. There is no difference in substance between a statement that the single motion was made, as it was on the second notice, and the statement that the motion on the first and insufficient notice was denied without prejudice. The court immediately and properly entertained what was in effect the only motion presented for judicial action and the only one which the record shows was contested.

2. It has already been stated that whether or not the first affidavit of merits was sufficient is conceded by the respondent to be immaterial, and that it was amendable. Permission to amend was granted properly and the amendment made to meet the objections to the original, which objections appear to have been unfounded.

3. It is argued that the original affidavit was insufficient, but as the respondent states that is immaterial to this appeal.

[7] 4. It is contended that the amended affidavit is insufficient because it fails to state when the defendant stated the facts to his attorney, A. W. Sans, or when the latter advised him he had a good defense. The second notice of motion stated that it would be made on the papers, files, and records of the proceeding, and the bill of exceptions settled by the judge shows that on the hearing he had before him both the original and the amended affidavits. The original affidavit was verified on July 10, before any appearance in the action by the defendant. In it, after stating that he was the defendant and had been served with summons in Santa Cruz county, the defendant averred that he had fully and fairly stated the case to Sans & Hudson, his attorneys, and after such statement he had been advised by them, and he verily believed, he had a good defense on the merits to the action. He further alleged that he was then, at the time of the commencement of the action, and for a long time prior thereto had been, a resident of Santa Cruz county, and was not and never had been a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that under this affidavit it did not appear that Sans & Hudson were attorneys, nor which of them advised the defendant he had a good defense.

In the amended affidavit, which was verified on July 29, 1919, the defendant set forth the other necessary matters, and averred that he had fully and fairly stated the case to A. W. Sans, an attorney at law and one of the members of the firm of Sans & Hudson, and after such statement he was advised by him, and he verily believed, he had a good and substantial defense on the merits of said action. The amended affidavit in no way contradicts the original from which it appeared that the facts were stated and the advice given by both members of the firm before the demand for change of place of trial was filed. The objections appear to be supertechnical and without merit. Nolan v. McDuffie, 125 Cal. 336, 58 Pac. 4.

5. It has already been shown there is a clear distinction between the demand for change of place of trial which must be, and in this case was, served and filed with the demurrer and the motion which cannot then be made unless notice of hearing be waived

[8] 6. The foregoing statement answers the contention that the motion must be made at the time the demurrer or answer is filed. The statute requires nothing of the sort. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 396, 397, 1003, 1005, and 1010.

[9] 7. The right to have the place of trial changed may be waived, but in this case far from there being a waiver, the defendant at all times insisted, and still insists, upon the enforcement of this established right.

[10] 8. The proceedings are statutory, and in this case in all matters of substance the statute was followed by the defendant. The provisions of the statute are to be liberally construed to promote justice, not to be technically warped to defeat a fixed right. Code Civ. Proc. § 4.

9. There was really but one motion to enforce the right which vested in the defendant, although there were two notices. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 395 and 396.

[11] 10. The defendant was guilty of no laches. The conditions would not have been changed if he had filed the demurrer, affidavit, and demand on the day they were served instead of five days later. They were filed within the time permitted by the statute.

The order in this case cannot be upheld upon the presumption that the order of the trial court was made because of unreasonable and unexplained delay. In the case of Hart v. Forgeous (Sup.) 193 Pac. 764, there was such a delay, but in the present case the record shows the only motion which was effective was made on the first call of the motion calendar after the demurrer demand for change, and affidavit were filed.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to make an order granting the motion for change of place of trial.

SCHWEPPE v. SANDBERG. (Civ. 3629.)

Contracts 🔑131—Landowner may urge upon officers the adoption of a route for highway to or through his land.

One owning property within a region through which it is proposed to construct a public highway, the precise route of which has not been determined, may lawfully present or have his agent present to such public officials facts and arguments upon the merits of a particular route running to or through his property, and such a contract with his agent is not void as against public policy; since, where a contract can be performed legally, it will not be presumed that the parties intended to perform it in an illegal manner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by W. H. Schweppe against H. Sandberg. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg and Alex. W. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cunningham & Hays, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant after an order sustaining his demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint.

The action was one brought to recover the sum of $2,500 alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff for certain services rendered in representing the defendant before the California State Highway Commission in relation to the location of a certain route for the state highway which, if adopted, would bring said highway to or through the lands of the defendant, and also for procuring for the defendant a loan of $3,000, to be secured by a mortgage upon said lands, the amount to be paid for said services to become payable upon the procurement of said loan and upon the construction of the said highway along said proposed route to or through any portion of the defendant's land. The complaint, in pleading the agreement for the plaintiff's said employment, does not set forth in terms the writing embodying the same, but pleads said agreement in substance as follows: The plaintiff is alleged to have "agreed to perform certain services for and on behalf of the defendant in representing the defendant before the California State Highway Commission, and in presenting to the State Highway Commission, as the representative of the defendant, the merits of a route for the location of the state highway which would bring the said highway to or through the lands of the defendant above described." The plaintiff also agreed to procure for the defendant, within five days after said November 24, 1911, a loan of $3,000, to be secured by a mortgage on the land of defendant above described. That the defendant, in consideration of said agreement by the plaintiff and in consideration of services theretofore performed by the plaintiff at the special instance and request of the defendant, in appearing before said State Highway Commission as the representative of the defendant in presenting the merits of said route, agreed to pay to the said plaintiff the sum of $2,500 upon the securing of said loan of $3,000 within five days after said November 24, 1911, and upon the construction of said state highway to or through any part of the said property, as above described. The complaint further proceeds to allege that the plaintiff duly performed all the conditions of said contract on his part; that he secured the loan in question promptly; that he appeared before the State Highway Commission as the representative of the defendant, and presented to the said State Highway Commission the merits of the route for the location of the said state highway, which would bring said highway to and through the property of the defendant; that he procured and presented to the commission maps and profiles showing the location of said route, and the length of said route and the grades to be encountered; that said Highway Commission was informed that plaintiff appeared before it as the representative of a property owner along said proposed route and not on his own behalf; that the state highway was located on said route and was constructed through the property of the defendant on or about August 1, 1918. Then follow the allegations of the plaintiff's demand for payment and the refusal thereof by the defendant, and prayer for judgment for the amount alleged to be due.

The demurrer to said complaint was general, and was also special in one particular to be hereafter noted. The order sustaining the demurrer was general and was made without leave to amend. Judgment of dismissal of the action followed the entry of said order.

The contention of the defendant upon the hearing of said demurrer was—and it is also made upon this appeal—that the contract which the plaintiff had pleaded in substance and effect was one against public policy, and was therefore void. The trial court evidently adopted this view in its order sustaining the defendant's demurrer and in its judgment of dismissal. We are totally unable to perceive that there is any basis whatever to be found in the body of the plaintiff's complaint for the conclusion thus arrived at by the trial court. That the owner of property lying within a region through which it is proposed to construct a public highway, the precise route of which has not yet been determined upon by the public officials who are charged with the duty of selecting the same, may not honestly and in good faith present before such officials facts and arguments with relation to the merits of a particular route which, if selected, will run to or through his property, no one will for a moment question, and it follows necessarily that what such property owner may in good faith do in person in that regard he may do through another, and he may for that purpose select an attorney or agent to act as his representative in presenting the merits of the particular location of said highway which he desires to have selected, and hence, of course, he may agree to pay his attorney, agent, or representative a stipulated regard for the performance of such services. There is nothing illegal or immoral or against public policy in such a transaction or service. It is not necessary to go afield in the search for authorities to sustain this view. In the case of Bergin v. Frisbie, 125 Cal. 168, 57 Pac. 784, an agreement much similar to that presented in the instant case was pleaded and proven, and the Supreme Court, in passing upon its validity, used the following language:

> "We have carefully scanned the face of this contract, and find nothing whatever to justify a judicial declaration that it is against good morals. There was no secrecy, no deception, no fraud, no corruption. It was an ordinary, everyday contract. Thousands of similar import probably have been made and executed. * * * The means and manner to be employed are the all-important factors in marking the validity or invalidity of the contract. We see no one of its provisions that stamp it void as against public policy and good morals; neither do we find anything in the evidence indicating any act done by the plaintiff that to any degree could be construed improper. The employment of persons to influence legislation, or to influence decisions of the land department, or even the decisions of judicial tribunals, in a proper way, is not against sound public policy, and this, too, even though the compensation for the labor to be performed is contingent upon successful results. The means and methods to be used must be improper, or else such employment is perfectly legitimate in the eyes of the law."

An examination of the complaint before us shows that the means which the plaintiff was to employ in the performance of his stipulated service for the defendant were such as would serve to present to the State Highway Commission "the merits of a route for the location of the state highway which would bring the said highway through or to the land of the defendant." And the means which the plaintiff is alleged to have actually employed in the performance of his said agreement were those of appearing before the Commission to urge the merits of said route, and of procuring and presenting to the Commission maps and profiles showing the location of said route and the length of said route and the grades to be encountered. It thus affirmatively appears that the means which the plaintiff was to employ and which he actually did employ in the fulfillment of his said agreement were such as were "perfectly legitimate in the eyes of the law."

The case of Foltz v. Cogswell, 86 Cal. 542, 25 Pac. 60, is also quite in point in its bearing upon the case at bar, as is also the case of Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 335, 99 Am. Dec. 384, in both of which cases it is held that the appearance of a representative of an interested party before a public body to urge the adoption of a particular measure or policy is neither illegal nor improper when the means employed are open and have for their purpose the presentation of the merits of the advocated matter.

The case of Fites v. Marsh, 171 Cal. 488, 153 Pac. 927, has also its direct bearing upon the question before us since the Supreme Court therein declares that—

> "It is the universal presumption of law that where a contract can be performed legally, it will not be presumed that the parties intended to perform it in an illegal manner."

The cases from the courts of this state relied upon by the respondent herein have no application to the question before us, since they refer in each instance to the proposed performance of such illegal acts as the procurement of false witnesses or the presentation of evidence of nonexistent facts. Such contracts are, of course, illegal; but such is not the nature of the contract between the parties hereto so far as its contents are revealed in the complaint. The trial court was therefore in error in sustaining the defendant's general demurrer.

As to the special demurrer, the point made therein has no merit; but even if it were meritorious the plaintiff should have been permitted in that respect to amend his complaint.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the defendant's demurrer and require him to further plead to the plaintiff's complaint.

PEOPLE v. POWELL. (Cr. 721.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 16, 1920. Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1921.)

1. Indictment and information 🔑119, 129(1)—Information sufficient despite surplus statement prefacing second count; counts for extortion and bribery properly joined.

Information against a police officer of a city in two counts, the first charging the crime of extortion, while the second charged the crime of bribery, opening with the statement, "and for a further and separate cause of action, being a different statement of the offense set forth in count one hereof," etc., held legally sufficient in both counts, the offenses charged referring to one transaction being properly joined by virtue of Pen. Code, § 954, and the preliminary statement of the second count being a mere legal conclusion of the pleader which might be treated as surplusage.

2. Criminal law 🔑798½—Instruction defendant charged with extortion and bribery might be found guilty or not guilty on either count or both held erroneous.

In a prosecution under two counts charging extortion, in violation of Pen. Code, § 518, and bribery, in violation of section 68, instruction that defendant was accused of two separate offenses, naming them, and that he might be convicted of either of the offenses charged, etc., and that if the jury believed that the first count charging extortion was a different statement of the same offense charged in count 2, charging bribery, they might as to count 1 and count 2 find defendant not guilty on both, guilty on both, or guilty on one and not guilty on the other, held erroneous.

3. Extortion 🔑5—Obtaining money from violator of city ordinance by threat of arrest by policeman "extortion."

Under Pen. Code, § 518, obtaining payment of money from a violator of the rooming house ordinance of a city by a threat of arrest and detention if payment was not made was extortion by defendant policeman of the city without regard to the exercise of good faith in threatening to make the arrest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Extort—Extortion.]

4. Criminal law 🔑29—Defendant guilty of receiving bribe not guilty of extortion.

A defendant guilty of receiving a bribe, denounced by Pen. Code, § 68, cannot as a result of the same transaction likewise be guilty of the offense of extortion, denounced by section 518.

5. Bribery 🔑1(1)—Party solicited need not consent to give bribe; "asking a bribe."

To constitute the crime of "asking a bribe," denounced by Pen. Code, § 518, on any agreement or understanding the official conduct of the party asking shall be influenced, it is not necessary that the party solicited shall consent to give the bribe, or that there shall be a meeting of the minds, or mutual understanding or agreement between him and the party asking the bribe; it being sufficient if the latter is ready and willing to enter into the corrupt agreement or understanding that his official conduct shall be influenced.

6. Bribery 🔑11—Evidence sufficient to justify conviction of policeman for asking bribe.

Evidence held to justify verdict finding defendant policeman guilty of asking a bribe in violation of Pen. Code, § 518.

7. Criminal law 🔑507(1)—Complaining witness not an "accomplice" in policeman's crime of asking bribe.

Complaining witness in a prosecution of a policeman for extortion, denounced by Pen. Code, § 518, and bribery, denounced by section 68, held not an accomplice in the crime of asking a bribe, so that defendant could be convicted of the crime on the sole testimony of the witness; an "accomplice," under section 1111, being one liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accomplice.]

8. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Error in prosecution for extortion and bribery harmless.

In a prosecution under an information charging in two counts extortion, in violation of

Pen. Code, § 518, and bribery, in violation of section 68, instruction erroneous in that it directed the jury they might find defendant not guilty on both counts, guilty on both, or guilty on one and not guilty on the other, held harmless to defendant, so that there was no miscarriage of justice justifying reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Ralph E. Powell was convicted of bribery, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Swaffield & Swaffield and Herbert Moore, all of Long Beach, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMAS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of imprisonment upon a conviction of the crime of bribery, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The information charged defendant with being, at all times therein mentioned, a duly appointed, commissioned, and acting police officer of the city of Long Beach, i. e., an "executive officer," and was in two counts, the first count, by proper and apt allegation, charging the crime of extortion, while the second count charged the crime of bribery—opening with the following statement:

> "And for a further and separate cause of action, being a different statement of the offense set forth in count 1 hereof," etc. (Italics ours.)

A demurrer, both general and special in character, was interposed to the information and by the court overruled. On the issues thus presented the case was tried.

The jury returned two verdicts, one finding the defendant guilty of extortion as charged in count 1, and the other finding him guilty of bribery as charged in count 2. Defendant moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, the motions being granted as to the first count. Thereafter the court, on motion, dismissed the case as to count 1; and the judgment from which this appeal is taken was imposed and entered.

Upon the submission of the case as made, the learned trial judge gave the following instruction, among others, to the jury:

> "The defendant in this case is accused by the information filed herein of two separate offenses, to wit, the crime of extortion in count 1 thereof, and the crime of bribery in count 2 thereof. An information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses under separate counts. The defendant may be convicted upon either of the offenses charged, and each offense upon which the defendant is convicted must be stated in the verdict. You may find the defendant guilty or not guilty upon each of the separate counts of the information; and if you believe that count 1 is a different statement of the same offense as charged in count 2, you may as to said count 1 and count 2 find the defendant not guilty upon both, guilty upon both, or guilty upon one and not guilty upon the other." (Italics ours.)

Appellant claims: (1) That the giving of the foregoing instruction was error; (2) that the two verdicts rendered are inconsistent, and hence that a judgment entered on either cannot stand; and (3) that the complaining witness was an accomplice, upon whose uncorroborated testimony defendant cannot be convicted.

[1] As to the information, both counts were legally sufficient. Being connected together in their commission the offenses charged were, by virtue of section 954 of the Penal Code, properly joined in the information. The evidence relied on to convict upon both was the same, founded upon the same incident and referred to but one transaction occurring on the day charged in the information. Yet while it was proper thus to charge defendant with two offenses in separate and distinct counts, he could not be convicted of the crime of extortion under section 518 of the Penal Code and also of the crime of receiving a bribe under section 68 of the same Code; although, for reasons which will presently appear, we think he could be convicted of the crime of extortion and likewise of the crime of asking a bribe.

As to the preliminary statement with which the second count opens, and which we have italicised above, we think it entirely immaterial, being but a legal conclusion of the pleader, and for that reason it may be treated as surplusage. It adds nothing to, nor does it take anything from, the essential averments of the information. Such being the case, the language of the court in People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 546, 105 Pac. 780, 781, may be considered applicable here:

> "There is no claim put forward here that section 954 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1905, violates any provision of the Constitution, nor can we see how such a claim could be sustained if it were urged. As we have suggested, there is no ground for apprehending that any injury would result to a defendant from the method of criminal pleading authorized by section 954, for only one set of facts and circumstances, directed to a single act or event, could be proved, and, of course, it would not only be competent, but absolutely necessary, to prove those same facts and circumstances where but one offense was charged. Therefore, we can think of no principle forbidding the Legislature to authorize the setting out of two distinct offenses in as many counts in cases where the circumstances under which a criminal act is committed are such as to inspire in the prosecuting officer serious doubt as to which of two offenses the evidence would show had been committed. Such a method, while obviously innocuous in its effect upon any of the rights of the accused, must result in a just administration of the criminal law. For where, as under the old method, the result of not proving the specific charge would be the acquittal of the accused and to cause another trial of the same facts with its attendant trouble and expense, assuming that once in jeopardy and former acquittal could not be successfully pleaded at the subsequent trial, under the present method the jury, under the court's instructions, could return a verdict of guilty of that offense of the two charged which the evidence disclosed had been committed, and thus there would be avoided, in a large measure, the mistrials which too often result from a want of correspondence between the proof and the allegations of the indictment or information." (Italics ours.)

That extortion and bribery are two separate and distinct offenses is, we think, beyond dispute. The former is the obtaining of property from another with his consent, induced by fear or force, or under color of official right (section 518, supra); while the latter is defined by section 68, supra, as follows:

"Every executive officer * * * who asks, receives, or agrees to receive, any bribe, upon any agreement or understanding that his * * * action upon any matter then pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be influenced thereby, is punishable," etc.

For the violation of the former a punishment of not exceeding five years in the state prison is prescribed; while for the latter, not more than fourteen years, and the defendant, "in addition thereto, forfeits his office, and is forever disqualified from holding any office in this state." (Italics ours.) In the first, the victim of the extortion is not and cannot be an accomplice; in the latter, the one of whom the bribe is received, as we shall later see, may be. The former involves an element of coercion by one of the parties; the latter—receiving a bribe upon an agreement or understanding that the official conduct of the one receiving the bribe shall be influenced thereby—necessarily involves a willing co-operation by both.

[2] This brings us to the consideration of the instruction above quoted, and which is objected to by defendant. The instruction was clearly erroneous; but, for reasons presently to be stated, the error, in our opinion, was without prejudice. Defendant having been legally charged with two separate offenses relating to "the same act, transaction, and event," the proof whereof being dependent upon the same evidence, he could not, in the instant case—except as we shall hereafter see—be legally found guilty of both; but, after hearing the evidence, the jury, "under the court's instructions, could return a verdict of guilty of that offense of the two charged which the evidence disclosed had been committed." People v. Piner, supra; People v. Warriner, 37 Cal. App. 107, 173 Pac. 489.

[3] The next point urged by appellant is the inconsistency of the verdicts. If the defendant was guilty of the crime of extortion, the crime consisted in obtaining from the complaining witness the latter's property, viz., a certain sum of money, with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of fear produced by the threat to accuse the complaining witness of the crime of violating the rooming house ordinance of the city of Long Beach. The record discloses without conflict that the complaining witness was in fact guilty of a violation of this ordinance; and, this being true, he was subject to lawful arrest. Subdivision 1 of section 519 of the Penal Code recites that fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be influenced by a threat "to do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened, or to any relative of his, or member of his family." But we do not think that, merely because of the conceded guilt of the complaining witness, defendant is thereby relieved of the pains and penalties of the offense charged—extortion. In our opinion it cannot be said that the "injury" in such case was not an "unlawful injury." Under section 518, supra, obtaining the payment of money from a violator of the ordinance referred to by a threat of arrest and detention, if the payment be not made, is extortion, and this without regard to the exercise of good faith in threatening to make the arrest. People v. Beggs, 178 Cal. 79, 172 Pac. 152.

[4] Where property is obtained by extortion, the consent of the person who parts with the property is not free and voluntary, but is, in a measure, coerced, i. e., induced by the wrongful use of force or fear or under color of official right. Where a bribe is actually received, the property or money given by the briber is not obtained from him through any coercion of his will. It is given and received upon agreement or understanding that the official conduct of the person receiving it shall be influenced thereby. From this it follows that a defendant, if he be guilty of receiving a bribe, cannot as a result of the same transaction, likewise be guilty of the offense of extortion. For this reason we think the court erred in instructing the jury that they could find the defendant guilty of the two crimes as charged in the two counts of the information. But this error, for the reasons we are now about to state, did not involve a miscarriage of justice, within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[5] Under section 518 of the Penal Code one may be guilty of the crime of asking or of receiving a bribe, or of asking and receiving a bribe. In other words, bribery may consist of either one of two entirely different and distinct acts, namely, the act of asking a bribe or the act of receiving a bribe. To constitute the crime of asking a bribe "upon any agreement or understanding" that the official conduct of the party asking shall be influenced thereby, it is not necessary that the party solicited shall consent to give the bribe, or that there shall be a meeting of the minds or mutual understanding or agreement between him and the party asking the bribe. It is sufficient if the latter is ready and willing to enter into a corrupt agreement or understanding that his official conduct shall be influenced by the bribe. People v. Squires, 99 Cal. 327, 33 Pac. 1092; State v. Durnam, 73 Minn. 150, 75 N. W. 1127. In the case at bar, the count of the information that charged the defendant with bribery alleges that he did corruptly and feloniously "ask, offer to receive and receive" the sum of $70. The jury found him guilty of bribery as charged in the information. It thus will be seen that defendant was charged with asking, as well as receiving, a bribe, and that the jury, by finding him guilty of bribery as charged, found him guilty of asking as well as of receiving the bribe. The instant that defendant asked for a bribe, if he was then and there ready and willing to enter into a corrupt agreement or understanding with the complaining witness that his official conduct should be influenced thereby, he was guilty of the crime of bribery. It follows, therefore, that if the evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict finding the defendant guilty of asking the bribe, he was guilty of the crime of bribery, as defined in section 68 of the Penal Code, even though he immediately thereafter received from the complaining witness money or property under such circumstances that his obtaining the same constituted the crime of extortion and not bribery.

There is sufficient evidence, we think, to sustain that part of the verdict which, in effect, finds the defendant guilty of asking a bribe. As is usual in this class of cases, the defendant did not boldly and in direct language ask a bribe. His words and acts, however, as testified to by the complaining witness, unmistakably carried the import that it was a bribe that he was asking. The complaining witness testified that defendant asked him if he had any money with which to furnish bail. He testified that he took a five or ten dollar bill from his pocket and said to defendant, "This is all I got." Defendant, according to the witness, replied, "I am not that cheap." Afterwards, the defendant also said to the complaining witness: "Have you got any jewelry?" These statements, coupled with other circumstances disclosed by the record, are sufficient to indicate that the defendant did not intend to be understood as asking the complaining witness for bail money, but that he intended that the latter should understand that he was being solicited for a bribe with the understanding that if it were given he would not be prosecuted for a violation of the ordinance referred to.

[6] For these reasons we conclude that there is sufficient evidence to justify that part of the verdict which finds the defendant guilty of asking a bribe; that the crime of asking a bribe is committed the moment the bribe is asked and before any money or other thing of value is received by the one asking it; that the crime of asking a bribe may be consummated before any bribe money is obtained, and therefore, before the existence of the transaction that may constitute either the crime of receiving a bribe or the crime of obtaining property by extortion; whether it be one or the other depending upon whether the money or property is given on an agreement or understanding that the official conduct of the person receiving it is to be influenced thereby, or is obtained through a consent induced by the wrongful use of force or fear or under color of official right. It follows, therefore, that there is no inconsistency between the crime of extortion—which we are inclined to think was the crime committed by the defendant when he actually received the money from the complaining witness—and the crime of asking the bribe.

[7] Under these circumstances, we think, it logically and necessarily follows that the complaining witness was not an accomplice in the crime of asking a bribe, and therefore defendant can be convicted of that crime upon the sole testimony of that witness. People v. Beggs, supra. Under section 1111 of the Penal Code, an "accomplice" is defined to be one "who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant upon trial in the case in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." As we have seen, among other offenses charged against the defendant is the crime of asking a bribe. That offense could be committed without any co-operation on the part of the complaining witness, and was completed the moment the bribe was asked. It was not necessary, therefore, that the person of whom the bribe was solicited should consent to give it, or that he should have any kind of an agreement or understanding with the person asking for it. People v. Squires, supra; State v. Durnam, supra. The complaining witness, therefore, could not be convicted as an aider or abettor to the crime of asking a bribe, though he doubtless could be convicted as an aider or abettor in the crime of receiving a bribe.

[8] Viewing the case in the large, and upon the entire record before us, for the reasons above set forth, we cannot say that there has been a "miscarriage of justice" herein, within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

WALTER v. ARNOLD. (Civ. 3600.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑41—Lease of building held terminable by disposal of land or building or either.

Where lease of part of a building was terminable on sale or lease of the entire building to another, held, in view of the parties' construction of the words "building," and "entire building," that tenancy could be terminated by disposal of both the land and the building, whether by sale or lease of both, or a sale of one and lease of the other.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑94(3)—Notice to quit tenancy held sufficient in view of lease.

Where a notice demanding surrender of premises within 60 days after its receipt stated the premises had been leased, while the evidence showed the land was leased and the building sold, the notice was sufficient, the lease permitting termination on lease or sale.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑109(2)—Landlord's tender of agreed sum on sale of property not invalid because not deposited in bank.

Where landlord in writing made a tender to tenant for the remaining part of the term, to be paid upon vacation and surrender of premises, such money was not required to be deposited in bank by Civ. Code, § 1500, which relates to the extinguishment of an obligation to pay money, and not to the extinguishment of a tenant's right to occupy premises.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(9)—Denial of landlord's ability to comply with agreement for payment on sale of property held evasive.

In landlord's unlawful detainer action against a tenant, a claim that there is no evidence to comply with the terms of Civ. Code, § 1495, in showing that landlord was able and willing to perform her offer of payment is not well taken where there is no denial that she was so able and ready to pay, defendant's pleading that he "denied that she was able to pay it, pursuant to his contract so to do," being evasive.

Action by Hannah Walter against Max Arnold. From that portion of the judgment awarding possession to plaintiff, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. Ringole, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley and Edgar Sinton, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action in unlawful detainer to recover possession of the ground floor of a four-story building on Van Ness avenue in San Francisco. There was a directed verdict for possession of the premises, but the court submitted the question of damages to the jury. The defendant appeals from that portion of the judgment that awards such possession to plaintiff.

The lease under which appellant, Arnold, entered into possession contained the following reservation:

> "It is understood and agreed that the lessor reserves the right to lease or sell the entire building in which the leased premises are located, and in the event such a sale or lease of the entire building is made the lessee shall vacate and surrender the premises as soon as he conveniently can, but in any event within sixty (60) days after notice of such sale or lease."

During the occupation of the premises by appellant, and prior to April 29, 1919, the respondent agreed to lease the land with a new concrete building to be erected thereon in place of the old one to the Peacock Motar Sales Company for a period of 10 years from the completion of the building, which was to be constructed without delay and completed before January 1st following.

On April 21st the old building was sold to a wrecking firm. There is a dispute as to the date that the appellant was given notice of this sale, but on April 29th he received a written notice that the premises had been leased, that such notice was given in compliance with the written lease between her and Arnold, and that he was required to vacate within 60 days after receipt of the notice. This action was commenced after July 2d.

It appears that the upper floors of the old building were reached only by a stairway leading from the ground floor and through the main entrance, and that this made it difficult to obtain a tenant or tenants for the other floors. The lease in this case was made for a period of but one year at a monthly rental, payable monthly, of the sum of $200 per month and 1 per cent. of the gross sales in excess of $10,000 per month. No option of any kind was given to the lessee for a renewal, or to save his tenancy from forfeiture in case of a sale or lease, but if he was required to surrender possession on account of such sale or lease, respondent was to pay him the sum of $250 per month for the remaining months of his term.

Appellant has cited authorities to the effect that the word "building" mentioned in the reservation includes the land upon which it stands, and respondent concedes that such construction was placed upon the words "building" or "entire building" by the parties in executing the lease.

Appellant contends that he could not be required to vacate and surrender possession upon a lease of the land and sale of the building for wrecking purposes, and that his tenancy could not be terminated under the reservation unless respondent either sold both the land and the improvements, or leased both.

> "A grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, except that a reservation in any grant, and every grant by a public officer or body, as such, to a private party, is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor." Civ. Code, § 1069.

It may be conceded, as claimed by appellant, that his lease could not be terminated by a mere sale of the building for wrecking purposes. Likewise it may be conceded that it could not be terminated by a sale of the land only with a reservation of the building. Inasmuch as the parties in executing the lease intended that the words "entire building" should mean the land and the building, appellant could not have been misled by the statement claimed to have been made by respondent at the time and prior to the execution of the lease that she desired to cancel the lease only in the contingency "that if she was able to lease or rent the entire building" or "if she sold the property."

[1] In view of the construction that the parties themselves have placed upon the words "building" and "entire building," it must be held that appellant's tenancy could be terminated by a disposal of both the land and building whether it was affected by a sale or lease of both land and building, or by a sale of one and a lease of the other; for the essential thing that the reservation was intended to secure was an income from the entire land and improvements.

[2] It does not follow that, because the written notice to surrender the premises stated that they had been leased, while the evidence showed that the land was leased and the building sold, the owner was not entitled to possession. The lease contained no requirements as to the form or character of the notice. The lessee agreed to vacate and surrender within 60 days after notice of sale or lease. He, as a witness, testified that around or prior to April 15th he had knowledge or belief that the building was to be wrecked.

In the note to Pacific Warehouse Co. v. McKenzie Hunt Paper Co., Ann. Cas. 1916B at page 312, it is said:

> "The rule seems to be that a notice is not construed strictly; it being sufficient if the intention of the party to exercise the option to terminate the lease is fairly communicated."

The same language is quoted in 16 R. C. L. p. 1113. In Re Coatsworth, 160 N. Y. 114, 54 N. E. 665, the lease contained a provision that there should be a renewal of the lease unless the lessors gave at least 6 months' notice before the end of the term of their election to take possession of the premises at the expiration of the lease and to pay for the buildings, vaults, and sidewalks at the appraised value. The notice was:

> "We * * * hereby elect to take possession of the said demised premises, pursuant to the provisions of said lease," etc.

This was held to be a substantial compliance with the terms of the lease.

In the instant case the notice demanded a surrender of the premises within 60 days after receipt of the notice, and it stated that it was given in compliance with the terms of that certain lease, etc. Of course, respondent was required to prove at the trial that in good faith she had disposed of the property according to the conditions that required the tenant to surrender possession. We conclude that appellant had sufficient notice that the owner had exercised her privilege under the reservation in the lease.

[3] The respondent in writing made a tender of $1,000 to appellant for the remaining 4 months of the term, to be paid if he would vacate and surrender the premises. No objection of any kind was made to the tender. It is now claimed that this tender was insufficient to extinguish the tenant's interest in the property, because the money was not deposited in a bank, and that such deposit is made necessary by the provisions of section 1500 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "An obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is immediately deposited in the name of the creditor, with some bank of deposit within this state, of good repute, and notice thereof is given to the creditor."

This section does not purport to refer to the extinguishment of any obligation, other than one for the payment of money. When applied to the instant case it means that the obligation of respondent to pay to appellant the sum of $250 per month for the balance of appellant's term has not been "extinguished." It does not mean that the obligation of respondent to permit appellant to occupy the premises is not extinguished.

[4] It is claimed that there is no evidence to comply with the terms of section 1495 of the Civil Code in showing that respondent was able and willing to perform her offer to pay $1000. As to this, there is no denial "that she is and was ready * * * and willing to pay said sum of one thousand dollars." All the evidence indicates that she was at all times able to pay it, and there is none from which a different inference can be drawn, and out of the mouth of the appellant on the witness stand it appeared that she was wealthy. Moreover, the denial is evasive, as he "denied that she was able to pay it, pursuant to his contract so to do," and we cannot believe in view of the record before us that appellant intended to make oath in his answer that respondent had or has not the ability to pay this sum.

The judgment is affirmed.

W. J. SOMERS CO. v. SMITH. (Civ. 3284.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷553(2)—Party seeking relief from order denying certified transcript must show diligence.

A prime requisite for relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, by having a prior order denying a motion to have a transcript certified for use on appeal is that the party claiming injury from mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect shall show affirmatively his diligence after discovering facts.

2. Appeal and error ⚷553(2) — Appellant seeking relief from order denying motion to vacate prior order held not diligent.

Upon an appeal from an order denying a motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to vacate a prior order denying motion for certified transcript, record held not to show diligence on the part of appellant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by the W. J. Somers Company against J. L. Smith, trustee for the creditors of the Force Hewitt Company. From an order denying his motion to vacate a prior order denying a motion to have a certified transcript for use on appeal, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The defendant appeals from an order denying his motion, made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate a prior order denying a motion to have certified a transcript for use on appeal from a judgment dated May 15, 1917.

The appellant, as trustee for the creditors of the lessee of property of the plaintiff corporation, was used for rent of the premises during his occupancy after the original lessee had made to him a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. The judgment was for $970.85 and costs. Motion for new trial being denied, on August 21, 1917, the statutory notice was given the clerk of the court, and a copy thereof to the official reporter, for the preparation of transcript of the clerk's record and the trial proceedings. Notice of appeal was filed under the alternative method on September 15, 1917. No transcript was filed until April 4, 1918, when notice was given that it would be presented for settlement on April 8, 1918. Objections on several grounds to the settlement and certification of the transcript were presented to the judge before whom the matter was pending. The record fails to show formally when the matter was submitted, but, since it appears that the counter affidavits on behalf of the appellant in reply to the respondent's affidavits concerning the certification were filed in open court on June 5, 1918, and no further proceedings before determination appear, it may be assumed the matter was submitted on that day or shortly thereafter. Nearly a year later, May 14, 1919, there was a minute order denying the motion. The motion to vacate this order was noticed for June 20, 1919, on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. The hearing was partly had and postponed from time to time until November 14, 1919, when the motion was denied. Notice of appeal from this order was filed November 26, 1919. The typewritten transcript bears a filing date in the superior court, January 2, 1920. It was certified by the clerk and filed in this court on April 5, 1920, and the appellant's closing brief was not filed until September 7, 1920. It does not appear that any of the many delays in bringing up for review the judgment for rent entered 3½ years ago were caused by the respondent or its attorneys.

[1, 2] A prime requisite for relief under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is that the party claiming injury from mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect shall show affirmatively diligence on his own part after discovery of the facts. In the affidavits filed in support of each of the motions and in opposition to them are set forth at great length many immaterial and impertinent matters. The substantial statements relied on by the appellant on the motion to certify the transcript on the appeal from the judgment are that the reporter was inducted into military service shortly after the notice to prepare the transcript was given, and its preparation was thereby delayed; that the reporter, through ignorance or neglect, failed to prepare the clerk's transcript; that the appellant was compelled to employ outside help to have the transcript completed, when it was filed on April 4, 1918, 7½ months after the order for the transcript was given. He contended also that there was an agreement between himself and the reporter that the clerk's transcript and the reporter's transcript should cost only $225. According to the reporter's affidavit, that figure was given by him as an approximate estimate of what the reporter's transcript alone would cost. The reporter's transcript was delivered to the appellant on November 15, 1917, and in January, 1918, the appellant and the reporter, who were wrangling over the payment of the reporter's bill, adjusted between themselves their difficulties. The appellant was away from San Francisco a great deal of the time during the first 3 months of 1918. His stenographer, who copied the clerk's transcript, also copied for the appellant's use the reporter's transcript, and a considerable portion of the delay in filing the transcript was caused by this work undertaken for the appellant's benefit. No stipulation or orders were obtained by the appellant for extensions of the statutory 20 days for the filing of the transcript. No proceedings were instituted to compel the reporter to perform his duty, and no formal motion was made for relief because of inadvertence or excusable neglect. The element of surprise was wholly lacking. Because of the delay the certification of the transcript was opposed. The facts were before the judge when the motion for certification was submitted, and in the exercise of his discretion, on the conflicting evidence before him, he might have relieved the appellant from the consequences of delay. The certification was also opposed on the ground that the transcript was unreliable because for a period of something over 4 months it had been out of control of the court, and while no suggestion is made that it had been in any way altered it was argued that the statute contemplates the transcript shall remain exclusively under the control of the court, to the end that the certifying judge may rely upon the assurances of verity given by the reporter and the clerk. It was also maintained that for the same reason the statute requires the transcript prepared under the new method to be filed by the reporter. A fourth objection was that certain exhibits had been omitted from the transcript, but the respondent admits that this could have been obviated. It does not appear necessary at this time to consider the other objections. Upon the question of delay and its excuse, the judge, upon evidence susceptible of a construction favorable to either party, decided the matter against the appellant. If the decision had been made promptly and the motion to vacate the order had been made upon the showing now before the court, it could not be determined that there was an abuse of judicial discretion in denying the motion. Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 643, 72 Pac. 176; Miller v. American Central Ins. Co., 2 Cal. App. 274, 83 Pac. 289. No new matter of substance pertinent to the motion was presented by the affidavits on the second application. The only showing of mistake, inadvertence, and neglect was a repetition of what had been urged on the first motion, and apparently the only surprise was that the former decision was contrary to the appellant's expectations. There is no showing that during the long period of nearly a year that the first motion was under submission the appellant took any measures to bring about its determination. The entire record fails to show any diligence on the part of the appellant in bringing to hearing an appeal from a judgment which is presumably correct and of which the prevailing party was ostensibly entitled to the fruits nearly 4 years ago.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑959(1)—Pleading 🔑236(1)—Amendments allowed with great liberality.

The allowance of an amendent to pleading when not of course rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, and the appellate court will not interfere with this discretion unless it has been abused, but the policy of the law is to allow amendments with great liberality to the end that exact justice may be done and complete justice may be reached.

2. Eminent domain 🔑194—Plaintiff entitled to amend description of lands sought to be condemned.

The court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion to amend its description of the lands sought to be condemned so as to leave lands above high-water mark, thus waiving the right to condemn lands below the high-water mark, since Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, confers upon plaintiff right to abandon the proceeding at any time, although the plaintiffs set up in their answer a claim for damages by way of compensation for the taking the lands sought to be condemned if condemnation be granted.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action in condemnation. This action was brought by the appellant, a public service corporation, against defendants and some 200 other persons to condemn certain real property situated on the shores of Clear Lake, in Lake county, in this state. The action was dismissed as to all save the above-named defendants, respondents herein. After a trial by jury a judgment was rendered by the superior court of the county of Mendocino on the 22d day of October, 1917, condemning the lands sought by the appellant and fixing the damages at the gross sum of $105,600.

Clear Lake is a navigable body of water situated at a considerable elevation above the valley lands of Yolo county. Its only outlet is Cache creek. This stream, after leaving the lake, finds its way down a narrow and rocky canyon toward the valley, and its waters finally reach the ocean. The drainage of the lake covers a territory embracing some 500 square miles, and its shore line is about 100 miles in length. The land along this shore line is owned by a large number of farmers, stated to be about 200 in number. On the north shore of an arm of the lake, called Robinson Lake, are located the properties of the defendants. The normal fluctuations of the waters of the lake are from zero on the Rumsey gauge to 7 or 8 feet above that mark, while the extreme fluctuations are nearly twice that figure. This action was commenced in April, 1912.

The appellant has heretofore constructed in Cache creek an impounding dam of sufficient height to raise the waters of Clear Lake to the 10-foot mark on the Rumsey gauge. This height is sufficient to result in the inundation of a large area of lowlands around the margin of the lake, which lands during a large part of the year are free from water. This renders necessary the condemnation of such of these marginal lands as are reduced to private ownership. It appears from the evidence in the case that respondent Harriet Lee Hammond claims about 15.40 acres of land below the zero mark, about 50 acres between the zero mark and the 7:56 mark, and 7.04 acres between the 7:56 mark and the 10-foot mark. In the W. O. Edmands tract No. 1 there are about 164.61 acres between the zero mark and the 7:56 mark and about 10.47 acres between that mark and the 10-foot mark. In the W. O. Edmands tract No. 2 there are about 16.26 acres below the zero mark, about 41.81 acres between the zero mark and the 7:56 mark, and about 4.16 acres between that mark and the 10-foot mark. In the estate of C. M. Hammond tract there are about 25.43 acres below the zero mark, about 215.28 acres between the zero mark and the 7:56 mark, and about 13.66 acres between that mark and the 10-foot mark.

These figures aggregate 57.09 acres below the zero mark; 472.65 acres between that mark and the alleged high-water level at 7:56. This leaves but 35.33 acres above the latter mark. The action was brought to condemn the whole, but the plaintiff now seeks an amendment waiving as to all below the high-water mark.

This would restrict the condemnation to the above-mentioned 35.33 acres. The real controversy in the case is whether or not the plaintiff must be compelled against its wish to condemn and pay for the tract of 472.65 acres lying below high-water mark.

Before any jurors were sworn to try the case, the plaintiff asked leave to file an amended complaint, which differs in three particulars from the original complaint. First, it claims certain riparian rights, but, as the court exercised its discretion later in the case and allowed, in substance, this portion of the amendment, the point requires no further notice at this time. A second point is a claim of right to flood the lands up to the high-water mark, under the theory that these lands constitute in law a part of the bed of Clear Lake, and as such are inalienable by the state by means of the swamp land patents under which the defendants claim, and that therefore the defendants, having no title thereto, have no right to forbid the plaintiff from flooding them. The third point is a waiver by the plaintiff of all claim in this action to condemn any lands except the small tract of 35.33 acres lying above high-water mark. This waiver is based upon the assumption that the state owns all lands below the high-water mark in virtue of its sovereignty, as above set out (Churchill v. Kingsbury, 178 Cal. 554, 174 Pac. 329, and Maginnis v. Hurlbutt, 193 Pac. 606, No. 1594, October term, 1920, and earlier cases), and on the further assumption that the state, holding the same in perpetuity in trust for the benefit of the people of the state, could not, at least under the swamp land acts, convey any title, and that therefore the defendants have no title that could be condemned. It seeks by the amendment, in effect, to dismiss so much of its action as relates to these lands lying below high-water mark. The importance of this point is seen when it is recalled that the jury by its verdict awarded the very large sum of $105,600 as damages, and this, too, for lands which in the year 1912 and every year since have, in connection with 900 acres of other lands, making a total of about 1,400 acres, rented for the insignificant sum of $400 per annum. Less than 30 acres have been reduced to cultivation, and the income derived from this cultivation is not included within the above rental. The motion for leave to amend was denied.

Before offering any evidence, the plaintiff renewed its motion to amend, but in this last motion it asked only to amend its description of the lands sought to be condemned so as to leave only the above 35.33 acres, thus waiving the right to condemn in this action the tract of 472.65 acres. This motion also was denied.

[1, 2] Conceding, without deciding, that the action of the court in denying the first motion should be upheld on the ground that the plaintiff was seeking to raise conflicting claims to lands which in the same amendment it was excluding from condemnation, it is clear that the second motion to amend should have been allowed. It is true that the allowance of an amendment, when not of course, rests usually in the sound discretion of the trial court, and this court will not interfere with the exercise of such discretion unless it has been abused. But the policy of the law is to allow amendments with great liberality, to the end "that exact justice may be done" and "complete justice may be reached."

This motion differs from the ordinary motion to amend in that the plaintiff, instead of trying to support a defective allegation, is really conceding to the defendants a part of their claim as set out in their answer. The answer denies the right of plaintiff to condemn and the necessity for the condemnation.

The plaintiff to the extent of this 472.65-acre tract is conceding this. The motion is, in substance, a dismissal as to a portion of the property in controversy. The defendants are in no wise injured by the dismissal, since they are prevailing in their contention to the extent of the dismissal.

But condemnation proceedings stand in a class by themselves. Section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure confers upon a plaintiff in condemnation the unconditional right to abandon the proceeding at any time during the trial and even after judgment. And before the enactment of this section it was held in Pool v. Butler, 141 Cal. 46, 74 Pac. 444:

> "The proceeding in eminent domain is an exercise of the sovereign power of the state. * * * It is an adversary proceeding wherein the state appropriates the land for the use of the public. * * * But a plaintiff seeking to condemn land for a public use does not, by bringing the action to condemn, bind himself to take the land. * * * Hence a plaintiff * * * is conceded to have a right to abandon the proceeding and decline to take the land. * * * I think plaintiffs had the right to abandon at any time before the defendants were willing to receive it, or were in a position to demand it."

From the foregoing many portions of the opinion not relevant to this case are omitted. The Pool Case is mentioned with approval in Lincoln Northern, etc., v. Wiswell, 8 Cal. App. 578, 97 Pac. 536, wherein the court adds:

> "In the proceeding under the statute to condemn there is no element of contract."

The court in that case quotes from Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 656, as follows:

> "The weight of authority is that, in the absence of statutory provision upon the question, the effect of proceedings for condemnation is simply to fix the price at which the party condemning can take the property sought, and that even after confirmation or judgment the purpose of taking the property may be abandoned without incurring any liability to pay the awarded judgment."

It is true that the plaintiff in this case does not seek by amendment to abandon its entire claim, but the fact that it could at any time have done so argues that it might, in the same manner, by amendment seasonably offered, abandon a portion thereof.

In Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 1, 63 Pac. 1022, the court says:

> "Amendments to pleadings so as to enable the party to prove all the facts necessary to his cause of action or defense are favored. If by reason of such amendment the opposite party is taken by surprise, the cause can be continued, or time allowed to meet the amendment, or such other terms imposed as may be just under the circumstances. It can very rarely happen that a court would be justified in refusing a party leave to amend his pleading so that he may properly present his case"—and citing several cases in support thereof.

In the above case the amendment was allowed after the completion of the trial.

Although the defendants set up in their answer their claim for damages by way of compensation for taking the lands sought to be condemned, such claim is not a cross-demand nor is it in the ordinary sense a claim for affirmative relief, since they ask such relief only in the event that the prayer of the plaintiff in condemnation be granted. In no sense is it such an independent demand for affirmative relief as might be prosecuted to judgment either in this or any other action in the event that the plaintiff should be nonsuited. A dismissal of any portion of the demand of the plaintiff carries with it a corresponding portion of the claim of the defendants. With the reasons for the amendment by the plaintiff and the wisdom thereof we are in no way concerned. We conclude that it had a right to waive a portion of its demand. Since this amendment eliminates the entire tract situated below high-water mark from the action so far as concerns its condemnation, it eliminates also the claim of the plaintiff that it has a right, as agent of the state, to flood this tract. Such claim is not a part of the condemnation proceeding and cannot be litigated therein. The court would have power, if the occasion demanded that course, to determine conflicting claims to the land sought to be condemned, but not to go beyond that point and adjudicate claims to other lands not sought to be condemned.

[3] Other alleged errors do not require special notice. It may be added, however, that the court did not err in the then state of the pleadings, in denying to the plaintiff the right to introduce in evidence the various title papers, although on a retrial of the case on the amendment these documents should be admitted. The valuation placed upon the property by the assessor is not evidence of market value.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to permit the plaintiff to amend its complaint.

DANIEL v. CROSS.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 22, 1920, as Modified Jan. 3, 1921. Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 17, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⚷476—Title of adverse claimants not triable in foreclosure proceedings.

In a foreclosure proceeding, the court cannot try the title of those claiming adversely to both the mortgagor and the mortgagee, although, if the adverse claimants subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in the foreclosure suit, it being before a court of equity, complete justice may be done.

2. Mortgages ⚷465½ — In foreclosure proceedings court could not annul sale on execution in partition proceeding.

In foreclosure proceedings the court was without power, in ancillary proceeding on petition of the receiver in the foreclosure, to annul an execution sale of the premises in partition suit or restrain the purchaser, who was not a party to the original foreclosure proceedings, from selling or dealing with his claim, but could restrain the purchaser from interfering with the receiver's possession.

Arthur H. Brandt and R. H. Cross, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

George E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order by the superior court of the county of Kern on the action of Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co. vacating, annulling, and setting aside on execution sale of certain real property at which R. H. Cross, the appellant, was the purchaser, and permanently enjoining him from selling, mortgaging, pledging, hypothecating, or in any other way disposing of or attempting to dispose of the property, and from interfering or attempting to interfere with the possession of the receiver thereof. The proceeding which terminated in this order was a collateral proceeding in that action, and it is necessary to make a somewhat extended statement of the facts because of their complexity.

On the 11th day of March, 1911, the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Kern against the Sunset Road Oil Company and others for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage given by the Sunset Road Oil Company to the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco as security for a bonded indebtedness of $2,000,000. In that action John Daniel was on the 13th day of March, 1911, appointed receiver.

On the 20th day of December, 1916, the receiver filed in this foreclosure action a petition praying for an order adjudging the appellant here, who was not a party to that action, guilty of contempt of court, and for an order permanently enjoining him from interfering or attempting to interfere with the possession of the receiver of certain real property therein described, and from in any manner disposing or attempting to dispose of it. As a basis for such an order the receiver alleged that appellant had been the attorney for the plaintiffs in a certain partition action entitled Anita M. Dewey and D. W. Hobson v. H. A. Blodget, Sunset Road Oil Co., Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco, et al., which had been commenced in the superior court of Kern county on April 26, 1910; that a final decree had been made and entered in that action on the 6th day of August, 1913; that on the 10th day of December, 1913 appellant, acting as the attorney for the plaintiffs in that action, had caused an execution to be issued to the sheriff of the county of Kern directing him to levy upon and sell under execution certain real property belonging to the Sunset Road Oil Company, and which had been set aside to it in that action; that this execution was issued for the purpose of enforcing and satisfying a judgment for costs which had been fixed and imposed as a lien on that property by the final decree in the action; that a sale on such execution was had on January 23, 1914, at which appellant became the purchaser; that a certificate of sale had been issued to him; that thereafter, and on the 17th day of May, 1915, he had received a sheriff's deed; that said real property so levied upon and sold was a portion of the property covered by the mortgage given by the Sunset Road Oil Company to the Mercantile Trust Company, and a part of the subject-matter of the foreclosure action in which petitioner had been appointed receiver; that upon his appointment he had entered into possession of said property; that neither the plaintiffs in the partition action nor R. H. Cross had obtained leave from the court in the action of Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co. et al. to issue said execution, and that the same was issued without the knowledge and without the authority of the court having jurisdiction of that action; that appellant, acting under the sheriff's deed was claiming to own said lands, and was endeavoring to sell, mortgage, pledge, hypothecate, or otherwise dispose of them; and that he was interfering with the possession of the receiver and was threatening to dispossess him.

Upon the filing of this petition the court issued its order requiring appellant to appear before it on the 30th day of December, 1916, to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and permanently enjoined and restrained, as prayed for by the petitioner, and, without requiring any bond on the part of the petitioner, restrained appellant from interfering or attempting to interfere with his possession and from selling or otherwise disposing of the property. On January 22, 1917, to which date the hearing had been continued, appellant specially appearing for that purpose, moved that the petition and all proceedings on the receiver's application be dismissed on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction, and that any order made in conformity with the prayer of the petition would be in excess of the power of the court. Reserving his rights under his motion to dismiss, appellant then filed a demurrer and answer to the petition. The motion to dismiss was taken under submission and was thereafter denied, and the demurrer to the petition was overruled. The court, by its order, kept the restraining order in force until a final hearing should be had on the petition and order to show cause.

Upon the denial of his motion to dismiss appellant petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the lower court restraining it from further proceedings on the petition. An alternative writ was issued, but on the day before the writ was made returnable the lower court, upon the ex parte application of the receiver, vacated and set aside the order previously made, and entered a new order nunc pro tunc as of February 26, 1917, the date of the original order. By this last order appellant's motion to dismiss was in part granted, and the proceeding, so far as it sought a judgment of contempt against him, dismissed. The order restraining him from interfering with the possession of the receiver and from selling or otherwise disposing of the property was kept in force, however, and he was required to show cause why a permanent injunction should not issue as prayed. Thereafter the judge of the lower court filed a return to appellant's petition for a writ of prohibition, in which he set forth his action in vacating the prior order and entering the new order nunc pro tunc. Thereupon the Supreme Court, holding that an appeal would lie from any injunction which might be issued in said proceeding, discharged the alternative writ.

On June 21, 1917, appellant served and filed his affidavit and motion based thereon for an order transferring the proceeding to another department of the court, or that another judge be called in to hear it on the ground that he could not have a fair and impartial trial because of the bias and prejudice of the judge before whom it was then pending. The motion was noticed for the 29th day of June, 1917, to which date, by consent, the hearing had been continued. On that date, over the objection of appellant that they came too late, counter affidavits were filed and the motion was denied.

Upon the denial of the said motion petitioner, without having given any previous notice thereof to appellant, or to his attorney, and without having served his proposed amendments, moved the court for leave to file an amended petition and requested a new order to show cause and a continuance. Over appellant's objection, this motion was granted. The amended petition was accordingly filed, in which all allegations bearing upon the charge of contempt were omitted. Anita M. Yeo (formerly Anita M. Dewey) and B. W. Hobson were joined as parties, and the proceeding converted from one of contempt to a proceeding to vacate and set aside the execution sale which had been had in the case of Dewey and Hobson v. Blodget et al. The restraining order which had been issued on the filing of the original petition was dissolved, and the court immediately issued a new restraining order in the same form. Appellant demanded the filing of a bond by the petitioner before the issuance of the restraining order, but such bond was not required by the court.

Upon the hearing of the amended petition of the receiver, appellant renewed his motion to dismiss, and, subject to such motion, filed a demurrer and an answer. The rulings on the motion to dismiss and the demurrer were taken under advisement by the court, and a hearing upon the amended petition was had. Appellant then formally requested and demanded of the court that, in the event that the court should hold that the petitioner was entitled to question the execution sale in the case of Dewey v. Blodget in a summary proceeding, and that on the merits he was entitled to an order granting his petition, an order granting his petition be made conditional upon the receiver paying to the appellant the amount that was paid by him for the purchase of the property, and that the said R. H. Cross, the appellant here, have judgment for the amount stated by the receiver to have been tendered Mr. Cross, and that the court order and direct the receiver to deposit said sum with the clerk of the court for the use and benefit of Mr. Cross, or to retain it in his custody until the final determination of the proceeding.

The matter was submitted, and the court later made its findings and entered the order from which this appeal is taken. By this order the issuance of the writ of execution in the case of Dewey and Hobson v. Blodget, the sale thereunder, and the certificate of sale and deed delivered to appellant were annulled, vacated, and set aside; he was permanently enjoined from selling, mortgaging, pledging, hypothecating, or in any other manner disposing of said property or attempting to dispose of it, and was permanently restrained from interfering or attempting to interfere with the possession of the receiver thereof.

The appellant has filed most learned and comprehensive briefs, in which he makes many objections to the action of the trial court. We think, however, it will be necessary to discuss only his main objection, which is that the court in which the foreclosure proceedings were pending could not, on the application of its receiver, appointed in the foreclosure suit, in a summary proceeding, annul and vacate all proceedings on execution taken in another and distinct action, without in any manner preserving or protecting appellant's rights, and cannot strip the purchaser at said execution sale of every right and incident of ownership where no fraud has been charged or proven.

It seems necessary, at this point, to consider somewhat in detail the facts with relation to the partition suit, in which action the execution under which sale was made to appellant was issued. The facts with reference to this matter are uncontradicted, and many of them appear in the amended petition of the receiver and have heretofore been referred to. On the 26th day of April, 1910, Anita N. Dewey (whose name was subsequently changed to Anita M. Yeo) and D. W. Hobson commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Kern against H. A. Blodget, Sunset Road Oil Company, Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, Union Oil Company, Sunset Railroad Company, and others. This action was brought for the purpose of establishing in the plaintiffs a $^2/_{25}$ undivided interest in certain real property situated in the county of Kern, comprising about 480 acres, and for a partition of this property among the parties, according to their respective interests. At the time of the commencement of this action a lis pendens was filed in the office of the county recorder of Kern county. The action was assigned to department one of the court and was there determined. The cause proceeded regularly, and on June 5, 1912, an interlocutory decree was made and entered by which it was adjudged that the plaintiffs were the owners in fee simple absolute, share and share alike, of an undivided $^2/_{25}$ interest in the property, and that the defendant Sunset Road Oil Company was the owner in fee simple of an undivided $^{23}/_{25}$ interest, and that the interest of the Sunset Road Oil Company was subject to a bonded indebtedness of that company in the sum of $2,000,000, evidenced by certain bonds secured by a deed of trust to Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco dated July 15, 1905.

The referees appointed by the interlocutory decree in partition duly made partition and filed their report, which report was confirmed and final judgment entered. By this final decree a designated 36 acres were partitioned and set aside to the plaintiffs, free and clear of all incumbrances, and the balance of said land was set aside to Sunset Road Oil Company, subject to the mortgage of Mercantile Trust Company. The portion of the decree from which appellant's right flows, contains a provision for the recovery by plaintiffs of costs and attorney's fees, and the amount of such costs and fees is—

> "adjudged to be a lien upon the respective interests of the parties hereto in the following proportions, to wit: That $^2/_{25}$ part thereof be a lien upon the said lands set apart to plaintiffs as aforesaid, and that $^{23}/_{25}$ part thereof be a lien upon the lands set apart to defendant Sunset Road Oil Company, and that said $^{23}/_{25}$ of said sum be, and it is hereby decreed and adjudged to be, a lien on said lands prior to the said mortgages and liens hereinbefore mentioned and described."

After the commencement of the partition suit and on March 11, 1911, the foreclosure action hereinbefore mentioned was commenced by Mercantile Trust Company. The plaintiffs in the partition suit were not made parties to this foreclosure action. The foreclosure action was assigned to department 1 of the superior court (the same department in which the partition suit had been tried), but was later transferred to another department. On March 13, 1911, John Daniel, the petitioner here, was appointed receiver in said foreclosure action. By the order appointing him he was empowered and directed to demand, collect, and receive all personal property described in the deed of trust or mortgage, all rents due and unpaid or thereafter to become due, and all issues, income, and profits from the premises, and to keep the buildings and other personal property insured and to pay the rentals, taxes, and assessments which might accrue. The 480 acres, the subject-matter of the partition suit (and which were then held in undivided ownership by Anita M. Dewey, D. W. Hobson, and Sunset Road Oil Company), was one of the pieces which were included in the mortgage to the Mercantile Trust Company, and was a portion of the subject-matter of the foreclosure suit. Though the partition suit was then undetermined, the receiver did not intervene therein.

Mr. Cross, the appellant, was the attorney for Anita M. Dewey and D. W. Hobson in the partition suit. As such, during the pendency of the partition suit, he had considerable correspondence, which appears in the record, with the attorney for the receiver with reference to an amicable partition of the property and other matters in connection with such partition suit. Subsequent to the entry of the final decree in the partition suit, appellant, in the performance of his duty as attorney for the plaintiffs in that action, sought to effect collection of the judgment for costs which had been made a first lien upon the property involved in the partition suit. He called upon the trust officer of the Mercantile Trust Company and requested payment of the amount of the judgment. The trust company advised him that it had advanced in the case all money that it was going to advance, and that it did not know where he could procure the amount to satisfy the judgment. No further action was taken in the matter of the execution, however, until November, and at that time appellant secured a writ of execution and delivered the same to the sheriff for levy and sale. Appellant immediately notified the trust company of the issuance of execution and of the date of the sale. The sale was subsequently held on January 13, 1914, and, there being no other bidders, appellant purchased the property for $1,307.70. A sheriff's certificate was issued to him, and the sheriff returned the writ satisfied. A year having elapsed after the sale, and no redemption having been made, the sheriff, on May 13, 1915, delivered to appellant a sheriff's deed transferring the property to him, which deed was duly recorded. It was not until three years after the delivery of the sheriff's deed that the receiver in the foreclosure action filed his petition herein.

It is, of course, well settled that in a foreclosure proceeding the court cannot try the question of the title of one claiming adversely to both the mortgagor and mortgagee. Murray v. Etchepare, 129 Cal. 318, 61 Pac. 930; Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 Pac. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391. This question is one to be settled in another action after the adjustment of the relative rights of the mortgagor and mortgagee in the foreclosure proceeding. Murray v. Etchepare, supra. The order in the present case annulling the deed to appellant cannot be justified, therefore, upon the ground of an adjudication of title as between the appellant and the mortgagor and those claiming under it, because the lower court was powerless to make such an adjudication. But, in reality, the present case does not present a situation where the court attempted to try title as between the mortgagor and one claiming adversely. The action of the lower court here prevented the appellant from acquiring any title to the property, regardless of the force and effect of such title against either or both the mortgagor or mortgagee. The court in the foreclosure proceeding did not inquire into the merits of appellant's title as against the mortgagor or mortgagee; it did not try the question of title, but simply set aside whatever title or evidence of title appellant had, without any adjudication upon the merits, but apparently solely upon the ground that the acquisition of title by the appellant, whatever its value, without leave of the court appointing the receiver, was an interference with the possession of the receiver, and therefore might be annulled regardless of the equities between the parties. In the cases last cited the court said that the title of one claiming adversely to both the mortgagor and mortgagee must be passed upon in another and distinct action; but in the present case the action of the lower court in divesting the appellant of his title would preclude him from this right of an independent determination of the merits of his claim. He has nothing upon which to found a claim in an independent action, having been stripped of all his right, title, and interest in the property.

However, respondent does not maintain that the trial court could in a foreclosure proceeding settle adverse claims to the property, but seeks to sustain this order upon the theory that, regardless of the ultimate rights of the appellant or the value of the title which he had acquired at the execution sale, he could not sell under execution property in the hands of the receiver for the reason that such a sale would be an interference with the possession of said receiver which the appointing court would enjoin unless effected with the consent of said court. It is contended that this action would be taken by the court regardless of what might be the rights of the execution debtor after the foreclosure proceedings had been terminated; that, regardless of the general rule limiting the power of courts in foreclosure actions, any court appointing a receiver has power to do any and everything that is required to protect the possession of its receiver of the property consigned to his care, and that the action of the court in annulling the deed in the present case was the exercise of a power necessarily incident to the protection of the possession of its receiver; that the possession of the receiver was interfered with by the execution sale, and the vacating of the deed was a necessary and proper means to prevent such interference.

Appellant contends that the court in the foreclosure proceeding was without power or jurisdiction to annul the deed to him as a general proposition of law; that, if such power was necessarily incident to its larger power to protect the possession of its receiver, then such incidental power would only come into being when the possession of the receiver was being interfered with; and that a sale under execution is not an interference with such possession.

There is, of course, no dispute between the parties as to the general principles of law applicable in cases of receiverships, such as the nature of a receiver, his relation to the parties, and the power of the court over him, or the fact that he is entitled to be protected in his possession of the property intrusted to his management and control. There is, as we shall discuss later, no substantial evidence in the present case of any actual interference with the possession of the receiver, and the first question presented, therefore, is whether or not a sale under execution, by a prior lienor, without the permission of the court appointing the receiver, is, of itself, such an interference with the possession of a receiver in a foreclosure proceeding as to warrant the making of the order appealed from.

In an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage, the holders of paramount liens are neither necessary nor proper parties, the action being designed merely to cut off subsequent liens, and no portion of the proceeds of the foreclosure suit can be applied to the payment of such prior liens. Wiltsie on Mortgage Foreclosure, vol. 1, § 188, p. 266; Jones on Mortgages, vol. 2, § 1439; Beronio v. Ventura Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 237, 61 Pac. 958, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118. The purpose of the appointment of a receiver in such an action is that he may take charge of the mortgaged property during the pendency of the action where it appears that the property is in danger of being lost or materially injured, and the property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt. Section 564, Code Civ. Proc.; Title Ins. Co. v. Calif. Dev. Co., 164 Cal. 58, 127 Pac. 502. From the nature of a foreclosure proceeding and the duties of the receiver appointed therein it is apparent that a transfer of the legal title does not interfere with the possession of the receiver. "A receiver has no title to the property, and that is all that is affected or changed by a sale." High on Receivers, § 5; Hickox v. Holladay (C. C.) 29 Fed. 226, 234. A mere conveyance of the legal title to the property can have no effect upon the possession of the receiver nor embarrass him in carrying out his duties with relation to the same. Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co., 95 Cal. 353, 30 Pac. 555; Petaluma Savings Bank v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 500, 44 Pac. 177.

For, if the sale is under a lien subsequent to the lien for the protection of which the receiver is in possession of the property, then the sale is made subject to the prior mortgage and the possession of the receiver. If the sale is under a lien which is paramount to that under which the receiver was appointed, then this paramount right is one which could not in any way be curtailed by the foreclosure proceedings under the subsequent lien or the appointment of a receiver therein. The legal title and the right to the possession of the property may, of course, exist simultaneously in different persons, and the purchaser at the execution sale would purchase subject to the temporary possession of the receiver just as he would purchase subject to the possession of a lessee were there one in possession of the property. It is to be observed that no injustice can be caused by the operation of such a rule, for the subsequent lienor in whose interest the receiver is holding possession has the right, under the Code, to redeem from any sale made in satisfaction of a prior lien. He is a redemptioner, and as such fully protected. Because he fails to avail himself of this right does not entitle him to curtail the rights of the prior lienor. The mortgagee may proceed with his remedy against the mortgagor, and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale would succeed to all rights of the mortgagor in the property. The question of title as between such purchaser and one in the position of the appellant here is then one which remains judicially undetermined. It is not a matter properly before the court in the foreclosure proceedings, nor before this court here, and it cannot be foreclosed and settled in advance against the appellant here by the court in the foreclosure proceedings in annulling the deed to appellant.

It is admitted by appellant that in a certain class of cases, such as creditors' bills, insolvency proceedings, and the like, where a fund has been sequestered for the benefit of all creditors and is being administered by the court for all claimants who may come in, a levy and sale on execution against real property, without leave of court, is of no effect. But it is maintained that this is not because such levy would interfere with the possession of the receiver, but because the whole estate is being administered for the benefit of all creditors who may care to come in, and the proceedings involve a sequestration of all assets. On the other hand, it is pointed out that in receiverships such as those incidental to a divorce proceeding or mortgage foreclosure, which are for the sole benefit of the plaintiff and for his further security, and in actions over which he has exclusive control, the property is not sequestered for the benefit of creditors, and in such cases it is only an actual interference with the possession of the receiver which will be enjoined by the court, and that a sale under execution by one having a paramount right to the plaintiff in the action in which the receiver is appointed will be upheld. Whatever confusion or doubt may exist upon this question in other jurisdictions, we are of the opinion that this distinction is clearly made by the cases in this state. Adams v. Woods, 7 Cal. 187; Id., 8 Cal. 152, 68 Am. Dec. 313; Id., 9 Cal. 24. Petaluma Savings Bank v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 488, 44 Pac. 177; Klauber v. San Diego Street Railway Co., 95 Cal. 353, 30 Pac. 555. Also in the case of De Forrest v. Coffey, 154 Cal. 444, 98 Pac. 27, the distinction claimed by appellant is clearly recognized, where it is said:

> "A receiver in a divorce case only conserves the property of the husband for the purpose of securing the wife in her claim to alimony. He has nothing to do with claims of the creditors of the husband. In the case cited [Petaluma Savings Bank v. Superior Court, supra] no question of permission to sue the receiver was involved. No such application could have been made, as there was no suit to be brought against him, and the enforcement of the lien of the judgment obtained by the bank could not at all physically disturb the possession of the receiver. The bank was enforcing a pure, fixed, legal right, the exercise of which it was held the court appointing the receiver could not control. But in an insolvency proceeding the court sequesters the estate of the insolvent and its receiver holds it for the benefit of all the creditors. It has plenary power over the assets of the estate, and one who asserts a claim against them must not only apply for permission to do so, but under the authorities it is discretionary with the court to reserve to itself the determination of the validity of the claim, or to permit it to be litigated in some other competent tribunal, and as far as the nature of the claim asserted here is concerned, the opinion in the Petaluma Bank Case contains nothing contrary to the general rule as established by the authorities to which we have heretofore referred."

Respondent contends that a receivership in a mortgage foreclosure action is analogous to a receivership in insolvency, and not to a receivership in a divorce action. In so far as it is analogous to either, it appears to us, in its scope and purpose and legal effect, to be more nearly like the provisional remedy in a divorce action. It is not a sequestration of the assets of the defendant, but a mere administration of the assets covered by the mortgage for the sole and exclusive benefit of the mortgagor and mortgagee. It seeks not to protect other creditors, and in a foreclosure suit the rights of prior lienors cannot be barred. The foreclosure suit is under the control of the mortgagor—the plaintiff—and may be dismissed by him at pleasure without reference to the rights of any other creditor. In a divorce proceeding a receiver administers the assets of the defendant merely to conserve the same to satisfy a possible judgment for alimony, but the rights of those having prior claims cannot be barred or affected. Other creditors are not protected in such proceedings, and cannot, therefore, be deprived of their legal rights by such proceedings.

We are therefore of the opinion that, both upon reason and authority, there is a clear distinction between a receivership in a liquidation proceeding, and one which is but a provisional remedy for the sole and exclusive benefit of the plaintiff; and we are also of the opinion that the receivership in the present case falls within the latter class. This being true, and a sale under execution not being an interference with the possession of the receiver in the foreclosure action, the order of the court in that action annulling the deed to appellant and enjoining him from selling, mortgaging, pledging, or hypothecating or in any other way disposing of, or attempting to dispose of, the said real property, was erroneous.

However, in addition to said last-mentioned provisions of the decree, there was a provision permanently restraining and enjoining the appellant from interfering with the possession of the receiver in and to said real property. This portion of the decree was based upon the finding that the appellant was "interfering with the possession of the receiver in said lands, and is threatening to dispossess said receiver." Appellant attacks this finding as unsupported by the evidence. In view of the fact that the receiver himself testified positively that his possession had not been interfered with in any way since his appointment, it is somewhat difficult to understand upon what evidence the trial court predicated this finding, unless it be the testimony of the appellant that after his purchase at the execution sale he had driven over the property and had spoken to a man who was living in a house located thereon, and had told him if he paid any rent for the house to pay it to the appellant; that the man said he was not paying any rent to any one, and never did pay any rent to appellant.

Assuming that this testimony by appellant with reference to his actions was sufficient to raise a conflict upon the question of an attempted interference with possession, and that the finding of the court upon this subject was therefore one that cannot be disturbed upon appeal, this finding would warrant an affirmance only of that portion of the order of the trial court which restrains the appellant from interfering or attempting to interfere with the possession of the receiver. This portion of the order, however, is of minor importance under the facts here, because an affirmance of the same can in no way prejudice the appellant, he having taken the position that he never has interfered nor attempted to interfere with the possession of the receiver and does not intend to do so, and therefore such an order is not prejudicial to him. This is especially true in view of the fact that it is clear from all the cases, and indeed it is admitted by appellant, that, whatever the character of the receivership, the court appointing the receiver has power to restrain an actual interference with the possession of its receiver, and a recognition of this rule of law by appellant should have upon his future conduct the same force and effect as the restraining order already issued. Conceding, then, in support of the finding of the trial court, that there is a conflict in the evidence as to the interference or attempted interference with the possession of the receiver, the portion of the order restraining such interference must be affirmed.

There are several other matters ably urged by appellant in his briefs which seem to us to have much merit, but, in view of our conclusion upon the main question involved, a discussion of these other matters becomes unnecessary.

The portion of the decree appealed from which declares the sale under execution to be null and void, and the portion thereof which restrains and enjoins appellant from selling, mortgaging, hypothecating, or in any other way disposing of, or attempting to dispose of, the property involved herein, is reversed; the other portions of the order to stand affirmed.

BRITTAIN, J. (specially concurring). While I concur in the decision reversing the order appealed from in so far as it declared the execution sale to be void and in so far as it restrained the appellant from hypothecating or disposing of the property involved, I cannot agree with the grounds stated in the opinion by Mr. Presiding Justice LANGDON as those upon which the decision has been reached. In my view of the law and of the duty of this court that opinion is objectionable in three particulars:

[1] First. In the opinion of the presiding justice it is stated that it is well settled that in a foreclosure proceeding the court cannot try the question of title of those claiming adversely to both the mortgagor and mortgagee. Murray v. Etchepare, 129 Cal. 318, 61 Pac. 930; Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 Pac. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391. This rule is correctly applied in the further statement that—

> "The order in the present case annulling the deed to the appellant cannot be justified, therefore, upon the ground of an adjudication of title as between the appellant and the mortgagor and those claiming under it, because the lower court was powerless to make such an adjudication."

Based upon this statement and a review of cases, including the Petaluma Savings Bank Case (Petaluma Savings Bank v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 488, 44 Pac. 177), in the opinion of the Presiding Justice the conclusion is reached that a receivership in a mortgage foreclosure case "is but a provisional remedy for the sole and exclusive benefit of the plaintiff," and for that reason, a sale under execution not being an interference with the possession of the receiver, the order of the court annulling the deed to the appellant and enjoining him from mortgaging or disposing of the property was erroneous. This amounts to a decision that the execution sale was valid. In my opinion, such an adjudication was not necessary to the determination of this appeal; it is revolutionary in character and opens the door to vexatious litigation.

A lengthy argument was made on behalf of the appellant to show that under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Petaluma Savings Bank v. Superior Court, supra, a receivership in a foreclosure proceeding is differentiable from a general receivership. On the other hand, the respondent, in reliance upon the case of Grosscup v. German Savings & Loan Society (C. C.) 162 Fed. 947, maintains that the same rules apply to a receivership in a foreclosure proceeding as are generally recognized. It is wholly unnecessary and would be improper on this appeal to determine this question, because, even though the respondent's broadest contentions should be upheld, and all the rules applicable to federal receiverships applied, the order purporting to vacate the execution sale could not be sustained.

The general rules to which reference has been made not only permit, but require, a court to protect the possession of its receiver.

> "No other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction has any power or authority to interfere or meddle with the property in the hands of a receiver. * * * This rule is essential to the orderly administration of justice and to prevent unseemly conflict between courts whose jurisdiction embraces the same subjects and persons, and has no reference to the superiority of one tribunal over the other, nor to the superiority in rank of the several claims, in behalf of which the conflicting jurisdictions are invoked." 23 R. C. L. Receivers, § 71.

These general rules have been modified to some extent in this state in their application to receiverships granted in divorce cases. The Petaluma Savings Bank Case, in my opinion, does not support the conclusion reached by the presiding justice in this case. It is differentiable from the present case in three particulars: First, the receiver appointed in the divorce case was not in possession of any of the lands, but was claiming to be in possession and was actually endeavoring to take possession at the time of the execution sale; secondly, as was pointed out in the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Beatty, the sole authority for the appointment of a receiver in a divorce case is to enable the court to require the husband to give reasonable security for providing maintenance and making payments of alimony. In a foreclosure suit, subject to the rights of third parties, the court takes possession of the corpus of the property by a receiver for the purpose of conserving the rents, issues, and profits, for the benefit of any one who may in that proceeding establish a right thereto. Lastly, the final judgment in the divorce action involved in the Petaluma Bank Case (White v. White, 130 Cal. 597, 62 Pac. 1062, 80 Am. St. Rep. 150) was rendered before the recovery of the judgment of the Petaluma Savings Bank. As was stated also in the opinion of White v. White, the receiver had not taken possession of any property, and the functions originally vested in him terminated with the entry of the judgment. Any new duties conferred upon him by the judgment were in excess of the jurisdiction of the court.

If the Petaluma Bank Case is authority for the sale of property in the hands of the receiver in a divorce case under process issued out of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, it is an exception to the general rule, and the exception ought not to be extended to other cases of receiverships. To extend this exception to foreclosure receiverships would amount to an invitation for collusive sales pending foreclosure by which a mortgagee entitled to satisfaction upon a defaulted mortgage debt might be held in litigation for years during the pendency of appeals involving the determination of whether or not buyers at such sales acquired title. The effect of the rule stated in the opinion of the presiding justice amounts to an adjudication that the appellant in the present case acquired title under the execution sale. If the trial court on this proceeding had no power to adjudicate that the appellant did acquire title by the sale, this court is without power to adjudicate that the sale was good. Such an adjudication amounts to a determination of the question of title.

Second. In the suit pending for the foreclosure of the mortgage, in which a receiver had been appointed, the receiver, who is the sole respondent on this appeal, procured an order of the superior court in a proceeding instituted by him against the appellant, who was never made a party to that suit, in terms purporting to vacate and annul a sale under execution of another judgment to the appellant of certain real property included within the mortgage, and further enjoining the appellant from interfering with the possession of the receiver or dealing with the title to the property. The mortgage involved in the foreclosure proceeding was to secure the payment of bonds aggregating $2,000,000 issued by the Sunset Road Oil Company. The mortgagee was the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. The mortgage, among other property, covered certain lands held by the Sunset Road Oil Company and others as tenants in common. Prior to the commencement of the foreclosure suit, two of the tenants in common, Anita M. Dewey and D. W. Hobson, sued the other tenants in common and the mortgagee in partition, lis pendens being filed when the suit was commenced. While that suit was pending, the foreclosure suit was commenced, and John Daniel, the present respondent, was appointed and qualified as receiver of the mortgaged property. He did not seek to intervene in the pending partition suit, and it was not necessary that he should have been made a party to that suit.

The final decree in the partition suit awarded specific property free from all liens to the plaintiffs in that suit and awarded to the Sunset Road Oil Company other specific property subject to the mortgage of the Mercantile Trust Company. The decree provided that the plaintiffs were entitled to $1,182.75 and costs, of which the sum of $1,000 was allowed as an attorney's fee to the present appellant, who was the attorney for the plaintiffs in the partition suit. The decree further provided that $^2/_{25}$ of the amount so determined should be a lien on the land set apart to the plaintiffs, and that $^{23}/_{25}$ thereof should be a lien upon the land set apart to the defendant Sunset Road Oil Company "prior to the said mortgages and liens" theretofore mentioned in the decree.

None of the defendants in the partition suit appealed from the judgment establishing the priority of the lien so imposed. In legal effect, as between the parties, this was a consent judgment making the lien of the mortgage then in suit subordinate to the lien of the $^{23}/_{25}$ of the amount awarded in the partition suit. Except as thus stated, the judgment in the partition suit had no effect upon the foreclosure suit or the receivership. It must be borne in mind that the prior lien was the lien of the plaintiffs in the partition suit. The present appellant received nothing by virtue of that decree. The plaintiffs in the partition suit were simply prior lien holders.

In the foreclosure suit the prior lien holders were not necessary parties. They might have been made parties by their own intervention, and had they been made parties by proper pleadings, their right as prior lien holders would necessarily have been protected in the foreclosure suit, either by preliminary order or in the final decree. While it is generally the rule that claims adverse to both the mortgagor and mortgagee cannot be litigated in a foreclosure suit, if the adverse claimants subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in the foreclosure suit, it being before a court of equity, complete justice may be done. Van Loben Sels v. Bunnell, 131 Cal. 489, 63 Pac. 773; Dobbins v. Economic Gas Co. (Sup.) 189 Pac. 1073. The undisputed evidence shows that, instead of intervening in the foreclosure suit, the plaintiffs in the partition suit, through the appellant, as their attorney, sought to collect the amount of the lien upon the property involved in the foreclosure suit from the mortgagee and its attorneys, and that the appellant made no attempt to make such collection from the receiver, nor was any application made to the court in the foreclosure suit for leave to enforce the prior lien imposed on the mortgaged property by sale under execution issued on the judgment in the partition suit. Regardless of any reasons or excuses advanced for not applying to the court having jurisdiction of the receiver when payment was not made by or on behalf of the mortgagee, as a matter of fact execution was issued on the judgment in the partition suit and levy was made, followed by a sale under that judgment. The certificate of sale was duly recorded on February 18, 1914. In May, 1915, there having been no redemption nor offer of redemption, a sheriff's deed issued on the certificate and was duly recorded on May 17, 1915, sale being made to the appellant for $1,307.70.

On December 20, 1916, in the foreclosure suit the receiver filed a petition setting forth with some elaboration the foregoing facts, praying for an order directing the appellant to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of court for interfering or attempting to interfere with the possession of the receiver, also for a temporary restraining order to prevent him from interfering with such possession and from selling, pledging, mortgaging, hypothecating, or in any other way disposing or attempting to dispose of the property in question. The record shows that, when this matter came on for hearing, it was very definitely agreed between the parties that all proceedings for contempt be abandoned and the right to proceed for contempt for past acts be waived. Thereafter, by amendment, the proceeding was changed so that the restraining order was maintained in force until the order appealed from was made, and by amendment of the petition the court undertook to determine the validity of the execution sale. It is to be noted that the appellant at all times reserved his objections to the court proceeding with the hearing because of its lack of power to determine the question of title upon the amended petition, and that the allegations of the petition upon which the proceeding was based were wholly insufficient to warrant the relief sought by the petitioner. Upon this record, the receiver with the approval of the court having waived all right to proceed against the appellant for contempt based on past acts, the court was without power to make any order except one of injunction as to future acts. It certainly could not in this ancillary proceeding adjudicate upon the validity of the execution sale.

Third. In addition to the facts stated in the opinion of the Presiding Justice the record shows that of the properties mortgaged to secure the payment of the issue of bonds of $2,000,000, of which there were outstanding bonds of the value of $1,190,000, the appellant as the attorney for the plaintiffs in the partition suit caused to be sold to satisfy the lien of about $1,200 over 400 acres of the land which was the original refining property of the oil company, on which there were a number of buildings and structures, pipe lines, and all sorts of equipment necessary for a refinery. Under this sale the appellant bought all that property for $1,307.70. He made no application to the receiver, who had sufficient money in his hands to pay the prior lien, and who, after learning of the sale, tendered to the appellant all money he had expended, with interest, which tender was rejected on the sole ground that it was not made in gold coin. Neither did he apply to the court for leave to sue the receiver or to sell the property under execution. The receivers, relying upon the general rule prohibiting interference with receivers, could not in this proceeding take the opposing positions on one hand that the sale was void, and, on the other hand, that it should be set aside upon equitable grounds, if such grounds exist. If this court announces the rule that in a foreclosure suit property in the hands of a receiver may be sold under process of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, the bondholders, the mortgagee, the bondsman of the receiver, and the receiver himself, will be deprived of any possibility of litigating before a court having power to determine whether the execution sale was void or voidable, or valid, any question of equitable cognizance which might possibly be raised in such a suit.

[2] Solely on the ground that the trial court in this proceeding was without power to adjudicate on the question of title and in recognition of the fact that the appellant acquired at the sale something which eventually may or may not be determined to have vested him with title, I concur in the conclusion that the order appealed from, in so far as it purports to vacate the execution sale and in so far as it purports to restrain the appellant from selling or dealing with his justiciable claim of title acquired while the property was sub judice, must be reversed. The order appealed from should be affirmed in so far as it restrains the appellant from interfering with the possession of the receiver.

NOURSE, J. I concur in the judgment for the reasons stated in the opinion of Justice BRITTAIN.

DUERR v. SLOAN et al. (Civ. 3445.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1236—Facts held to warrant entry of judgment against sureties on appeal.

Where an appeal bond under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, stipulated that if appellant did not make payment within 30 days after filing of remittitur on affirmance by the Supreme Court judgment might be entered against sureties without notice, a stay of entry of the judgment against them could have been granted only on showing that these conditions did not exist, and an objection of failure to present the claim in the estate of appellant, since deceased, was another matter and could not be considered.

2. Appeal and error 🔑154(4)—Sureties on appeal bond, having consented to judgment on appellant's default, cannot appeal therefrom.

Sureties on an appeal bond, having by stipulation consented that judgment might be entered against them without notice if appellant failed to pay within 30 days after filing of remittitur, on affirming, cannot appeal therefrom.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1236—Entry of judgment on appeal bond by a judge other than the one to whom case was assigned held not error.

A rule of court that an order entering judgment against sureties on an appeal bond after filing of remittitur to the Supreme Court should be made by the judge to whom the case had been assigned is to save the various judges from imposition, and does not limit their jurisdiction, and the entry of such a judgment by the presiding judge, where the court is left no discretion because of sureties' consent to judgment and waiving of notice, was not error.

4. Appeal and error 🔑523(2)—Facts recited in affidavit supporting an unauthorized motion are not part of record.

Facts recited in an affidavit, filed in support of an unauthorized motion to suspend proceedings relating to judgment against the sureties on an appeal bond, were no part of the record.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1227—Sureties on appeal bond not relieved by failure to present judgment as claim against estate.

Where appeal bond sureties specifically promised to pay at a fixed time after filing of remittitur affirming the judgment upon the sole condition that the debtor had not paid, in view of Civ. Code, § 2844, providing that the surety has all the rights of a guarantor, sections 2825, 2840, relating to guarantor's exoneration, and section 2445, relating to right to demand that a creditor proceed against its principal, where no demand was made by the sureties on the creditor to present her claims against the estate of the deceased appellant, the sureties were not released by such failure.

6. Principal and surety 🔑125—Creditor's failure to file claim against principal's estate does not release surety.

Failure of a creditor to file his claim against the estate of the principal debtor does not release the surety.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1236—If judgment against sureties is valid on its face, independent equity suit is required to give relief.

Except by an independent suit in equity, the Code does not provide for motion to stay the entry of a judgment against appeal bond sureties, valid on its face and based upon the consent of the parties, or to set aside such judgment or to recall execution thereon, where such motions are based upon extraneous facts which, if true, would make the entry and enforcement of such judgment inequitable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy and George H. Cabaniss, Judges.

Action by A. C. Duerr against Sarah A. Bryan, in which, upon defendant's death, William R. Sloan and another, as her executors, were substituted as defendants, and against William R. Sloan and another as sureties on the appeal bond. From orders and a judgment denying motions to stay proceedings, entering judgment against the sureties on the appeal bond, denying sureties' motion to set aside the judgment and denying motion to recall execution, the defendants appeal. Appeal from the judgment dismissed, and the orders involved in other appeals affirmed.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Keogh & Olds, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. On the 9th day of April, 1914, plaintiff commenced an action against Sarah A. Bryan to recover the sum of $2,500 on an account stated; on the 14th day of May, 1917, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against the said Sarah A.

Bryan for the sum prayed for; on the 11th day of July of the same year the defendant Sarah A. Bryan served and filed her notice of appeal from said judgment, and on the following day filed a cost and stay bond in form prescribed by section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, with William R. Sloan and George A. Scott as sureties thereon. While said appeal was pending, and on the 2d day of April, 1918, said Sarah A. Bryan died, and after probate proceedings were regularly taken, William R. Sloan, her brother, and John S. Bryan, her son, were appointed executors of the estate, and duly qualified as such. On the 19th day of August, 1918, while said appeal was still pending, the said executors upon their own request and motion, were duly substituted as defendants in said action. On the 15th day of April, 1919, said judgment was affirmed by this court (Duerr v. Sloan, 40 Cal. App. 653, 181 Pac. 407), and on the 17th day of June, 1919, the remittitur affirming said judgment was duly filed in the superior court. Pending the appeal the executors duly and regularly caused notice to creditors to be made, and the time for presentation of claims against the estate of said Sarah A. Bryan expired on the 22d day of March, 1919, or about four weeks prior to the affirmanec of the judgment by this court. After the remittitur had been filed in the superior court as above stated, and on the 11th day of July, 1919, the executors of said estate and the two sureties on the appeal bond gave notice of their intention to move the superior court for an order staying further proceedings on the part of plaintiff by virtue of the judgment, said motion being made upon the sole ground that the plaintiff in said action had failed to file with the executors of said estate a claim based upon her said judgment. Said motion was duly heard by the superior court, and on the 16th day of July, 1919, denied. On the following day counsel for the moving parties called upon the judge presiding in department No. 3 of said superior court, to which department said cause had been regularly assigned, and persuaded said judge to agree with him that no judgment would be entered against the sureties upon the appeal bond without giving said counsel an opportunity to appear and make objection thereto. On the 18th day of July, which was after the expiration of the 30-day period from the filing of the remittitur, counsel for plaintiff appeared before the acting presiding judge of said superior court, who at that time was sitting in department No. 6 of said court, and made a motion that judgment be entered against the said sureties upon the appeal bond, said motion being based upon the bond and the record in said action. Said motion was granted, and judgment in favor of said plaintiff and against the sureties William R. Sloan and George A. Scott in the sum of $3,153.45, with interest and costs of suit, was regularly entered and recorded on the 19th day of July, 1919. Thereafter execution was issued upon said judgment. The sureties obtained a stay of said execution, and moved the superior court to set aside the judgment against them, and also to recall the execution, both motions being made upon the ground that no claim had been filed by plaintiff against the said estate, and upon the ground that the judgment against them was irregularly made by the acting presiding judge while sitting in department No. 6, as heretofore detailed. These motions having been denied, four appeals were prosecuted: (1) An appeal by the executors and the sureties from the order denying the motion to stay the proceedings; (2) an appeal by the sureties alone from the judgment entered against them; (3) an appeal by the sureties from the order denying their motion to set aside this judgment; and (4) an appeal by the sureties from the order denying their motion to recall the execution. These four appeals have been consolidated for hearing by stipulation of counsel.

[1] 1. The appeal from the order denying the motion to stay proceedings must be affirmed. The motion was based upon the sole ground that the plaintiff had failed to present a claim to the executors of the estate of the deceased defendant. The motion did not present a legal ground for the stay of the entry of a judgment against the sureties. In the bond which they executed in accordance with section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, they stipulated:

> "That if the said defendant and appellant does not make such payment within thirty days (30) after the filing of the remittitur from the Supreme Court in the court from which the appeal is taken, judgment may be entered in the said action on motion of the plaintiff and respondent, and without notice to the undersigned in her favor and against the undersigned and each of them."

This stipulation is a consent on the part of the sureties that judgment may be entered against them if the conditions contained in the stipulation exist, and without regard to any extraneous matters. Assuming, therefore, that the superior court had jurisdiction to entertain a motion to stay the entry of judgment against the sureties, a stay could have been granted only upon a showing that these conditions did not exist. The failure to present a claim against the estate of the principal raised an entirely new issue, an issue which could not be determined upon a mere motion to stay the entry of the judgment, but, if at all, in a suit in equity where the sureties, having sought equity, would be required to do equity. In other words, when a party has consented to the entry of judgment against him upon certain specified conditions and within a certain fixed time, he cannot delay the entry of said judgment upon a mere motion based upon the ground that same unrelated facts have arisen which would make the entry of said judgment inequitable.

[2] 2. The appeal of the sureties from the judgment must be dismissed. By the stipulation which they made in the appeal bond they consented that judgment might be entered against them without notice if the defendant and appellant in the main suit failed to pay within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the superior court. Thus, at the expiration of 30 days from the date of the filing of the remittitur, the plaintiff in the main suit was entitled to the entry of judgment against the sureties, without notice to them, upon presentation of the record in the case showing that said judgment had not been paid within the time stipulated. Having consented to the entry of such judgment, the sureties cannot be heard in an appeal therefrom. Erlanger v. S. P. R. R. Co., 109 Cal. 395, 42 Pac. 31; Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154, 158; Judnick v. Judnick, 190 Pac. 480. Nothing herein is inconsistent with Hawley v. Gray, 127 Cal. 560, 60 Pac. 437. Where, as in that case, a judgment is entered prior to the expiration of the 30-day period, it is not a "consent" judgment; that is to say, the judgment is not in accord with the consent given.

[3] 3. The appeal from the order denying the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment against the sureties must be affirmed. The first ground assigned—that it was improperly and irregularly entered by the presiding judge—is without merit. The facts alleged in the affidavit and upon which this ground was urged are that the cause was originally tried in department No. 13; that when the remittitur came down the judge of that department was absent on his vacation, and the cause was by the presiding judge reassigned to department No. 3; that the motion to stay the entry of the judgment was heard by the judge regularly sitting in department No. 3, and denied by him; that thereafter the record in the case was presented to the presiding judge, who at that time was sitting in department No. 6. The presiding judge ordered that judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff and against the sureties, and an amended order to that effect was duly and regularly entered in the records of department No. 3, with a recital that the presiding judge was "sitting for dept. No. 3." It is argued that the judge regularly assigned to department No. 3 of the superior court was present throughout the whole of this particular day when this order was made, and that it was unnecessary for counsel for plaintiff to appeal to the presiding judge for the order. The rules of the superior court are cited to the effect that motions connected with a case, if made in open court, shall be made in the department to which the case has been assigned, and that if the motion is made at the chambers it must be made to the judge of that department, except in case of his absence or inability to act. The clear purpose of this rule is to save the various judges from imposition; it does not limit their jurisdiction. In the present case, however, there is no discretion left to the judge, the duty of entry of judgment being mandatory. Appellants were not entitled to a hearing on the motion, and it could have been made at any time after the expiration of the 30-day period without notice. The court had to decide upon the record and files of the case the single question of law whether or not plaintiff was entitled to judgment. Meredith v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 60 Cal. 617, 621; Gray v. Cotton, 174 Cal. 256, 258, 162 Pac. 1019.

[4] Facts recited in the affidavit filed in support of an unauthorized motion to suspend proceedings were no part of the record. Appellants, therefore, have suffered no injury by the fact that the judgment was ordered entered by the presiding judge rather than the judge regularly sitting in department No. 3.

[5] The second ground upon which the motion to set aside the judgment was made, like the motion to stay the proceedings, raises a new issue, namely, the failure of the creditor to pursue her remedy against the estate of the deceased principal. This ground, which in fact is the basis of all four appeals, is that because respondent is unable to enforce her judgment against the estate of the appellant in the original case the sureties on the bond for that appeal are now relieved from all liability. Assuming that this question could be raised in the manner attempted by appellants in this case, it is sufficient to say that the great weight of authority is against the position urged by them. The bond which they signed was a definite and specific promise to pay at a fixed time after the filing of the remittitur affirming the judgment, upon the sole condition that the original debtor had not paid. No obligation was placed upon respondent to seek payment from the appellant prior to enforcing the obligation of the sureties. Section 2844, Civil Code, provides that the surety has all the rights of a guarantor. Section 2825 of the same Code provides that—

> "A guarantor is not exonerated by the discharge of his principal by operation of law, without the intervention or omission of the creditor."

Section 2840 of the same Code provides that—

> "A surety is exonerated: 1. In like manner with a guarantor; 2. To the extent to which he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security; or, 3. To the extent to which he is prejudiced by an omission of the creditor to do anything, when required by the surety, which it is his duty to do."

These sections must all be read together, and so reading them it must follow that the "intervention or omission" of the creditor referred to in section 2825 is such intervention of omission as is mentioned in section 2840—that is, a deliberate or unjustifiable act of the creditor which lessens the security or an omission of the creditor to do something which it is his duty to do when he is required to do so by the surety. The right to demand a creditor to proceed against his principal is very strictly defined by section 2845 of the same Code. It does not appear that any demand was made by the sureties in this case upon the creditor that she present her claim to the executors of the estate; but even if one were made, it is apparent that it would not come within the terms of section 2845, the failure to comply with which would result in exoneration of the sureties.

[6] The precise question was determined by the Supreme Court of North Dakota in Yerxa v. Ruthruff, 19 N. D. 13, 120 N. W. 758, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 139, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 809, where the court, in holding that the failure of the creditor to present a claim against the estate of the deceased principal did not exonerate the sureties, said:

> "It is no part of his contract that he will take active measures to collect the debt. The duty to act rests with the debtors. * * * Appellant could have paid the note and filed the amount she was obliged to pay as a claim against the estate of her codefendant, or she could, without paying it, have filed it as a contingent claim against the said estate, and thus have protected herself."

In the case at bar the sureties could have protected themselves in like manner. If they did not do so, it was no fault of the creditor. In any event, the great weight of authority is that the failure of a creditor to file his claim against the estate of the principal debtor does not release the surety. California cases supporting this general principal are: Sichel v. De Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493, 500; Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 60, 18 Pac. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235; Los Angeles v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 525, 534, 35 Pac. 153, 556; Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596, 604; London, etc., Bank v. Smith, 101 Cal. 415, 420, 35 Pac. 1027; Carver v. Steele, 116 Cal. 116, 119, 47 Pac. 1007, 58 Am. St. Rep. 156; Kinsel v. Ballou, 151 Cal. 754, 761, 91 Pac. 620; Whiting v. Clark, 17 Cal. 407, 411.

In Bull v. Coe, supra, 77 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 810, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235, the court said:

> "It was well settled in this state, as elsewhere, that mere delay of the creditor to proceed against the principal would not discharge the surety"—citing cases. "And this is still the law. Preston v. Hood, 64 Cal. 408; Civ. Code, § 2823. In extension of this principle it was held that the surety was not discharged, even if the delay of the creditor was such that his remedy against the principal became barred by limitation. Whiting v. Clark, 17 Cal. 407. And it was but a short step from this to the position that the loss of the creditor's remedy against the estate of the principal, by nonaction as to presentation of the claim, did not discharge the surety. This was the decision in Sichel v. Carrillo. And the point has been ruled the same way in other states."

In Carver v. Steele, supra, the court expressed the general rule as follows (116 Cal. 119, 47 Pac. 1008, 58 Am. St. Rep. 156):

> "In general, unless some agreement or special circumstance imposes diligence upon the creditor as a duty, he does not, by mere failure to pursue the person primarily liable, discharge the guarantor, surety or indorser, even though his passivity in this regard may result in barring his remedy against the original debtor."

In the case at bar there was no agreement or special circumstance imposing upon the creditor the duty to present her claim against the estate. So far as appears from the record the estate may have been insolvent and the presentation of such a claim would have been an idle and useless formality. Again, if she had done so, it is not at all unlikely that she would have been met with the argument that she had waived the right of payment of the claim within 30 days from the filing of the remittitur, and had consented to await payment of her claim in due course of administration. She was at all times entitled to rest upon the stipulations in the bond that the sureties would pay within 30 days from the filing of the remittitur if the judgment had not been paid by the principal debtor. It would not have been her duty to seek payment from the original debtor if she had been alive when the remittitur came down, and no process of reasoning can sustain the proposition that such a duty was imposed upon her by the death of the original debtor.

4. The appeal from the order denying appellants' motion to recall the execution is based upon the same grounds urged on the motion to set aside the judgment, and for the reasons heretofore given said order must be affirmed.

In affirming the orders involved in the three appeals heretofore discussed, it is proper to say that such action should not be taken as in any way indicating that any of said motions conform with our method of procedure. This statement seems necessary, because counsel have cited opinions of the appellate courts affirming similar orders, and have inferred therefrom that such opinions justified the procedure taken. The rules of procedure are to be determined from the Code of Civil Procedure, and not from inferences drawn from opinions of the appellate courts. When a party has recovered a judgment he should not be denied the fruits of that judgment by frivolous and vexatious motions not authorized by the prescribed forms of procedure. In Benning v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 296, 299, 167 Pac. 291, 293, it was said:

> "A judgment can be nullified by the court which rendered it only, first, on motion for a new trial; second, by a motion under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where the judgment is inadvertently made, and where application is made to set it aside within six months; third, by motion therefor at any time where the judgment is void on its face; fourth, by an independent suit in equity where the judgment is regular on its face, but extrinsically void for want of jurisdiction, or by reason of fraud or mistake."

[7] A petition for hearing in the Supreme Court in that case was denied, and the statement quoted can be taken as fairly declaring the law of this state upon that subject. Possibly, to be more exact, reference should be made to the provisions of section 663, Code of Civil Procedure, which covers the special case of a correction of the conclusions of law which are not supported by the findings of fact and a judgment which is inconsistent with a special verdict. But, except in the cases just noted, the Code does not provide for a motion to stay the entry of a judgment valid upon its face and based upon the consent of the parties, or to set aside such a judgment, or to recall execution issued thereon where such motions are based upon extraneous facts which, if true, would make the entry and enforcement of such judgment inequitable. For relief in such a case the parties must resort to an independent suit in equity.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The orders involved in the other appeals are affirmed.

1. States 🔑153—Board of Control and Treasurer must meet and determine that there is available money before purchasing bonds.

Where bonds were authorized by Const. art. 16, § 2, to which was added section 3, requiring unsold bonds to be canceled and others issued as therein stated, the Treasurer cannot successfully resist a mandamus proceeding to compel such cancellation on the ground that such bonds were sold to the Board of Control under St. 1913, p. 563, without showing that the Board and Treasurer met and determined, as required by section 2 as a condition precedent, that there is available surplus money with which the Board could purchase such bonds.

2. States 🔑153—Agreement to sell highway bonds to Board of Control when surplus money would be available not valid.

In view of St. 1915, p. 652, § 4, requiring a sale of highway bonds to the Board of Control must be made for cash to be paid immediately into the state treasury, an executory agreement to sell at a future time when surplus money should be available is not a valid sale such as would prevent the Treasurer's destroying the bonds and issuing others as required by Const. art. 16, § 3.

3. States 🔑153—State officers selling and purchasing bonds have no power except as expressly given by statute.

State's officers in exercising the power of sale and purchase of bonds conferred by Const. art. 16, §§ 2, 3, Stat. 1913, p. 563, §§ 2, 3, and Stat. 1915, p. 652, § 4, are agents exercising a special power over the state's property, and have no power in relation thereto except as expressly given by the statute.

4. Constitutional law 🔑121(1)—States 🔑153—Treasurer's agreement to sell bonds held not a "sale" within constitutional requirement of destruction of unsold bonds.

The Board of Control's bid for bonds, if accepted by the Treasurer, where there are no funds immediately available for transfer in payment and no transfer is then or subsequently made, is not a compliance with St. 1913, p. 563, and is not a "sale" of bonds within the meaning of Const. art. 16, § 3, requiring destruction of unsold bonds, and so setting aside such agreement impairs no obligation of any valid outstanding contract.

In Bank.

Petition by William D. Stephens and the State Highway Finance Board for writ of mandate against the State Treasurer and others. Writ granted.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

George D. Squires, of Redwood City, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. [1] Petitioners pray for writ of mandate directed to the State Treasurer requiring him to cancel certain bonds of the state of California prepared by him pursuant to the provisions of section 2 of article 16 of the Constitution of the state of California, which authorized the issuance and sale of 40,000 bonds of $1,000 each. Petitioners' prayer is based upon the amendment to the Constitution adopted by the people of the state at the election November 2, 1920, wherein a new section, No. 3, was added to article 16 of the Constitution which provided, among other things, as follows:

> "Sec. 3. * * * All of said forty thousand bonds which shall remain unsold at the time of the adoption of this section shall be canceled and destroyed by the State Treasurer, and in lieu thereof bonds in the same amount shall be prepared and sold as hereinafter stated."

The respondent Treasurer contends that the bonds in question have been sold and for that reason declines to cancel the same. Respondent's contention is based upon the fact that at the time when 12,000 of these bonds were offered for sale to the highest bidder for cash, in accordance with law, on February 26, 1920, the State Board of Control, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in them by the Legislature of the state (Stats. 1913, p. 563), bid for said 12,000 bonds par, and that subsequent to that bid from time to time bonds have been issued and delivered to the State Board of Control in pursuance of said bid. The question here relates solely to the portion of such 12,000 bonds as remain undelivered in the custody of the Treasurer and for which no payment has been made. The question, then, resolves itself into this proposition: Did the making of the bid by the State Board of Control for the 12,000 bonds and the acceptance of said bid by the State Treasurer constitute a sale thereof within the meaning of the constitutional amendment?

By the statute of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 563), the State Board of Control were authorized to use any surplus monies in the state treasury for the purchase of bonds of this state. The statute provides (section 2) the method of determining what funds shall constitute surplus funds within the meaning of the act and that—

> "Thereupon the state board of control shall proceed to invest the same in the purchase of bonds of any of the classes described in section one of this act."

It is further provided in section 3 as follows:

> "Any bonds purchased or held under the provisions of this act may be sold or exchanged for other bonds of any of the classes described in section one of this act, and the money received from any such sale may be reinvested by the state board of control in the purchase of any such bonds; provided, that no such sale or exchange shall be made at a price which will result in a net loss to the state."

[2] The State Board of Control cannot buy bonds for the state at all until after it and the State Treasurer have met and determined that there is "surplus money" which is available in payment of bonds so purchased (section 2, supra). This is a condition precedent to the power of the State Board of Control to make either a purchase or a contract of purchase of any bonds with public money. In the record before us there is no statement or intimation that any such meeting had been held or determination made or that there was any "surplus money" on hand at the time of the supposed purchase by the State Board of Control from the State Treasurer or any money available, either then or afterwards, to pay for these bonds claimed to have been purchased and now remaining undelivered. Furthermore, under section 4 of the act of 1915 authorizing the sale of the highway bonds (Stats. 1915, p. 652), such sale must be made for cash and immediately thereafter the Treasurer must pay the same into the state treasury. These provisions show clearly that it was not contemplated that there should be an executory agreement for the sale of the bonds on the condition that payment should be made at some time in the future when "surplus money" should be available, or at such time as might be convenient for the purchaser. The so-called sale and acceptance by the Treasurer were made in February, 1920. Up to the time of the passing of the constitutional amendment on November 2, 1920, there had been no payment of cash and no delivery of these bonds in controversy in pursuance of said supposed sale. From the facts stated in the record and advanced at the hearing, no other conclusion can be drawn than that the alleged sale was made on credit and that payment was to be made at a time in the future when "surplus money" should be duly declared to be available for their purchase.

[3] The officers of the state, in exercising the power of sale and purchase conferred by these statutes, are agents exercising a special power over property of the state. Such agents have no power except that which is expressly given by the statute, or is necessarily implied from the express provisions. The provisions of the statutes do not either expressly or by implication allow a sale to be made upon such terms as those which are here shown, or at a time when there is no "surplus money" with which to pay for the same, and by requiring the sale to be for cash, in effect prohibit a sale to either the State Board of Control or to private bidders on credit.

It necessarily follows that the contract of sale attempted to be made in this manner is utterly void as to the bonds still unpaid for and undelivered for the want of power upon the part of either party to make such contract.

[4] A bid for bonds by the State Board of Control, even if accepted by the State Treasurer, where there are no funds immediately available for transfer in payment therefor, and where no such transfer is then or subsequently made of such funds, is not a sale of such bonds within the meaning of the constitutional amendment of 1920, which requires the destruction of unsold bonds. Christensen v. Cram, 156 Cal. 635, 105 Pac. 950. The purpose of the constitutional amendment was to permit an increase of interest in accordance with the market rate so that bonds would be salable at par. In the argument for the adoption of the constitutional amendment mailed to each voter it was said:

> "State highway bonds are now unsalable as the law will not permit their being sold at less than par. No state bond bearing but four and one-half per cent. interest can hope to compete with the United States bonds now purchasable to yield seven per cent. nor with the many excellent industrial bonds which are selling to yield eight per cent. or more. * * * Like other commodities, money must be paid for when needed at the going market rate. Its value cannot be fixed by state legislation and the proposed plan appears to be well within the scope of sound business."

In the argument against the proposed constitutional amendment mailed to all the voters of the state it was said:

> "This measure should be emphatically rejected and defeated.
> "The foremost intent of the proposed amendment is to authorize an increase in the rate of interest rate on about $37,000,000 worth of unsold bonds of the third highway issue, from 4½ per cent. to a maximum of 6 per cent."

The $37,000,000 includes all of the 12,000 bonds not heretofore transferred and delivered to the State Board of Control. The argument in favor of the constitutional amendment would also point to the conclusion that the bonds yet undelivered by the State Treasurer to the State Board of Control should not be so delivered for the reason that if delivered they could not be sold as the law requires, namely, at a sum which will not net a loss to the state. Stats. 1913, p. 563. It is clear that the constitutional amendment contemplated the destruction of the bonds in question as "unsold" bonds and that when so construed the amendment does not impair the obligation of any valid outstanding contract of sale.

Let the writ issue.

TALCOTT LAND CO. v. HERSHISER et al.

1. Corporations 🔑312(1) — Distribution of assets to stockholders held made with "consent of stockholders."

Where all the stockholders sold their stock to purchaser of corporation's assets who paid for stock out of such assets, the stockholders consented to such distribution of the assets, within Civ. Code, § 309, as amended by St. 1917, p. 658, § 2, providing (subdivision 2) that directors should not be liable for distribution of capital to stockholders where corporation has no debts and where distribution is with stockholders' consent, though amount received was fixed by negotiation, and was not a pro rata proportion of the capital stock.

2. Corporations 🔑312(1) — Affairs must be wound up to exempt directors from liability for distribution of assets to stockholders.

Civ. Code, § 309, as amended by St. 1917, p. 658, § 2, exempting directors from liability for distribution of capital to stockholders where corporation has no debts or liabilities, is applicable only where the affairs of the corporation have been wound up by the consent of all parties.

3. Corporations 🔑312(1)—Obligation to convey land held a "liability" within statute exempting directors from liability for distributing assets.

The obligation to convey land under a contract is a "liability" of a corporation within Civ. Code, § 309, as amended by St. 1917, p. 658, § 2, exempting directors from liability for distribution of assets to stockholders where all debts and liabilities have been paid, though person other than party to such contract to whom land is conveyed assumes obligation of the contract.

4. Appeal and error 🔑877(5)—Appellant cannot complain of verdict in favor of his codefendants.

Where judgment was rendered against one of a number of defendants whose liability was joint and several, such defendant on appeal cannot complain of the verdict in favor of his codefendant.

5. Corporations 🔑312(1)—Director liable for distribution of assets, though codirectors did not share in unlawful intent.

A director is liable under Civ. Code, § 309, for distribution of assets to stockholders regardless of whether his codirectors shared in his unlawful intent.

6. Corporations 🔑312(1) — Assets held distributed to stockholders.

Where stockholders sold their stock to purchaser of the assets of the corporation, who paid for the stock with such assets, and in so doing distributed total amount thereof to the stockholders in return for their stock, there was a transfer of the corporate assets to the stockholders in violation of Civ. Code, § 309, making directors liable in such case.

7. Corporations 🔑312(1) — Statute authorizing distribution of land inapplicable to distribution of proceeds.

Civ. Code, § 309, permitting, prior to amendment of 1917, a real estate corporation to distribute land to stockholders in proportion to their holdings of stock, did not authorize such a corporation, after conversion of its land into money, to distribute such money to its stockholders, since in such case the corporation's creditors had no lien to protect them.

8. Corporations 🔑312(1)—Directors' liability for distribution of assets not dependent on injury.

Directors are liable for distribution of assets to stockholders under Civ. Code, § 309, regardless of whether any one has been injured by the transaction.

9. Corporations ⚷615½, New, vol. 14 Key-No. Series—Revival after dissolution for nonpayment of tax reinstated corporation with duties and powers.

Revival of corporation by payment of tax following its dissolution for nonpayment thereof reinstated corporation with all its powers, rights, duties, and obligations.

10. Attachment ⚷4—No attachment in corporation's action against directors for statutory liability; "action on contract, express or implied."

Corporation's action against directors to enforce liability prescribed by Civ. Code, § 309, as amended by St. 1917, p. 658, § 2, for distribution of assets to stockholders, held not an action on a contract, express or implied for direct payment of money within Code Civ. Proc. § 537, authorizing attachments in such cases only; the director's obligation being statutory, and not contractual.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the Talcott Land Company against W. A. Hershiser and others. From judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, and from the order taxing costs, named defendant appeals. Judgment reversed, and order taxing costs reversed.

Chapman & Trefethen and M. C. Chapman, all of Oakland, Frank J. Solinsky, of San Francisco, and Peck, Bunker & Cole and James F. Peck, all of Oakland (Charles W. Byrnes, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Street & Street, of San Francisco, C. M. Delameter, of Sonora, and Henshaw, Black & Goldberg and Thomas R. White, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action by the plaintiff corporation to recover from the defendants, its former directors, the amount of its entire capital alleged to have been illegally divided among the stockholders. Plaintiff claimed judgment for the full amount claimed, $122,750, against defendant W. A. Hershiser only, who appeals from the judgment and also from the order taxing costs. Both appeals will be considered together, as the latter appeal involves the costs for levying an attachment, and the ground of objection thereto is that the action is not one on a contract express or implied.

The section of the Civil Code (section 309) which prohibits the directors of a corporation from declaring dividends except from surplus profits arising out of the business, and from dividing, withdrawing, or paying to the stockholders or any of them any part of the capital stock, authorizes a recovery of the full amount of the capital stock so divided, withdrawn, paid out, or reduced from the directors under whose administration such distribution has occurred. The plaintiff claims that the division, although not made directly, was effected by means of a subterfuge, by which there was substituted for the assets of the corporation a worthless promissory note of one W. M. Martin for $237,623.55, given ostensibly as the purchase price of the corporate assets. The plaintiff corporation was organized in 1908. The appellant, W. A. Hershiser, was one of the original incorporators. His father-in-law, Henry F. Greer, was also one of the original incorporators, having 65,000 shares of the capital stock. On January 6, 1916, there were outstanding 122,750 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation of the par value of $1 per share. The appellant had purchased the shares of Henry F. Greer for $100,000, executing in payment therefor his promissory note for the payment of which the shares were pledged. In December, 1912, H. F. Greer died, bequeathing the note in question to his daughter, the wife of the defendant, and to her brother, F. A. Greer, both thereupon becoming directors of the plaintiff corporation. The other directors were M. T. Minnie, the appellant, W. A. Hershiser, Mr. Lowell, and F. A. Greer. In September and October, 1915, M. T. Minnie obtained an option to purchase all stock from all of the stockholders of the plaintiff corporation with a view of selling the stock to Mr. O'Bear. In connection with these options, in order to induce the purchaser to take the stock, it was agreed by some of the stockholders that they would purchase some of the lots belonging to the plaintiff corporation, which was engaged in the business of selling and subdividing land for the purposes of sale. The negotiations which were conducted by O'Bear resulted in P. B. Cross becoming a probable purchaser, but Cross decided that he would prefer to purchase the assets of the corporation rather than its stock. Thereupon the following plan was devised: The corporation plaintiff entered into a contract with Cross for the sale to him of the most of the assets of the corporation for $162,230.66 in cash and certain mortgages aggregating over $31,000. This contract, together with all the remaining assets of the corporation, except certain lots, was transferred to W. M. Martin, a brother-in-law of M. T. Minnie, who in payment therefor executed his promissory note as above stated. The remaining lots were transferred to M. T. Minnie as commission for making the sale to Cross. On the same date Martin secured options to purchase their stock from all the stockholders in the corporation at various amounts fixed in the respective options, paying therefor with the assets of the corporation turned over to him in pursuance of the agreement of sale to him in consideration of his promissory note. Martin paid each stockholder the amount called for by his respective option and took an assignment of the stock. By this method the entire assets of the corporation were distributed to the stockholders and in exchange therefor the several stockholders assigned their stock to Martin, who thus became the sole stockholder of the plaintiff, whose sole asset was his own promissory note. The transaction having been completed on February 25, 1916, Martin instructed the Central National Bank to deliver all the shares of capital stock of the plaintiff corporation to M. T. Minnie, and, in pursuance of his instructions 122,000 shares of the capital stock were so delivered. No consideration passed from Minnie to Martin, but the transfer of the stock was not made until Minnie had agreed with the defendant, W. A. Hershiser, to pay certain costs and attorney's fees, amounting to less than $5,000. The state corporation license tax was not paid, and so, on the first Monday in March, 1916, the charter of the plaintiff corporation was forfeited. Immediately thereafter, however, on March 14, 1916, the directors, W. A. Hershiser, Julia M. Hershiser, F. A. Greer, and M. T. Minnie, took the necessary steps to reinstate the corporate charter. Thereafter M. T. Minnie caused certain other corporations in which he was a large stockholder to convey to the plaintiff corporation for the nominal sum of $10 two new subdivisions of land known as the Hollywood tract and the Beverly tract. Both these tracts were subject to large mortgages, amounting to about $300,000, and the plaintiff corporation assumed and agreed to pay these mortgages. M. T. Minnie placed the 122,000 shares of stock upon the market and sold the stock to various purchasers. The new venture proved to be a failure, the corporation lost all its property, and the new stockholders transferred the stock to the present holders, on whose behalf the directors have begun this proceeding. It should be stated in passing that it appears from the evidence, and seems to have been the view of the court, that in the sale of the stock by Minnie he informed all the proposed purchasers fully in regard to the distribution of the assets of the corporation and solicited their purchase solely upon the faith of the new venture.

Appellant contends that the distribution prohibited by section 309, Civil Code, must be by corporate act of the board of directors, and that, as the jury in this case found that two of the directors did not participate in the unlawful intent, there was no corporate act looking to the distribution of the assets to the stockholders, and further contends that there was no distribution of the capital to the stockholders, for the reason that the very scheme of distribution by which the title to the assets of the corporation was vested in the stockholders called upon the stockholder to surrender his stock in payment therefor. In other words, he ceased to be a stockholder either before or at the time of the distribution to him. In furtherance of this view it is urged by appellant that the proceedings are penal in their nature, and that a strict construction should obtain with relation to the application of the law to the facts, and in the interpretation of the law itself. On the other hand, the respondent contends that the law will look to the substance of the transaction, and that the net result of the transaction in question was that the entire assets of the corporation were vested in the stockholders, and that the directors and Martin and Minnie, in securing the assignment of the stockholders' stock, must be deemed to be their trustees, and that the title really did not pass, but remained in the original stockholders. Of course, if this view were strictly applied, it would follow that the present stockholders have no interest in the stock unless Minnie may also be held to have been their agent in the subsequent sale of the stock. During the pendency of this action the attorneys for the defendant appealed to the Legislature for relief and succeeded in securing the passage of an amendment to section 309 of the Civil Code, whereby the stockholders of a corporation who had theretofore incurred the liability under the provisions of section 309 would be exonerated in the case mentioned in the proposed amendment. Section 2 of the amendment (St. 1917, p. 658) provided:

> "* * * The liability of a director of a corporation heretofore incurred shall not exist in any case where, all of the debts and liabilities of the corporation to creditors having been paid, the capital stock divided, withdrawn, or paid out constituted all of the capital stock of the corporation and the same was paid out, withdrawn, or divided with the consent of all of the stockholders to or among themselves."

[1] The respondent questions the constitutional authority of the Legislature to enact such a statute, and also claims that the statute is not applicable by its terms to the situation here for the reason that all the debts and liabilities of the corporation were not paid. It is also claimed that the stockholders did not consent to the distribution in the sense contemplated by the statute for the reason that each consented separately to take money for his stock, and the amount he received was fixed by negotiation, and was not a pro rata proportion of the capital stock of the corporation. Indeed, the contention of the respondent is that this whole scheme was devised in order that the defendant W. A. Hershiser might receive a larger proportion of the capital for his stock than was received by the other stockholders. In that regard it should be stated that the option agreements themselves between Martin and the various stockholders recited the purchase by P. B. Cross of the property of the corporation, the transfer of this contract to W. M. Martin, together with all the other assets of the corporation, and recite that Martin is desirous of purchasing the shares of capital stock and making payment for the same from the fund and in the manner and at the time thereinafter provided, namely, when P. B. Cross shall have made full payment and out of said funds. Whatever may be the rights of the stockholders as against the directors, or as against Martin because of the unequal division, it is clear that they consented to the distribution of the assets in the form in which they were distributed, and consequently it must be held that the distribution was with the consent of the stockholders.

[2, 3] The next question is: Have all the debts and liabilities of the corporation been paid within the meaning of the statute? In this regard it appears that there are now no debts or outstanding obligations of any kind other than the contracts of sale wherein the plaintiff corporation agreed to make title upon payment for some of the lots sold. These contracts were transferred to P. B. Cross together with the land therein agreed to be sold. The purchasers of such lots would be entitled to maintain an action for specific performance against P. B. Cross, the purchaser of the land and assignee of the contract, but it is claimed that there is a liability on behalf of the corporation to pay any damages suffered by reason of the failure of Cross to comply with these contracts if he should fail to do so. Appellant's reply to this contention is that such obligations were not liabilities within the meaning of the statute. Without considering the respective arguments of counsel upon this proposition, it is clear that the purpose of the Legislature was to excuse directors only in the event that the affairs of the corporation had been wound up by the consent of all parties; in other words, only where the parties by agreement had arrived at a conclusion which they could have as well reached by a formal application to the court for dissolution after the payment of the debts and obligations of the corporation. We think that the outstanding obligations of the corporation to convey these lands, although assumed by another party, constituted a liability to creditors within the meaning of this law and prevented the application of the saving clause therein to the particular facts of this case. Balfour v. Garrette, 14 Cal. App. 261, 111 Pac. 615; Bouvier, Law Dict. 3 Rev. 726. It is unnecessary, therefore, to pass upon the constitutionality of the amendment to section 309, Civil Code, as the facts do not bring this case within its terms. It may be observed in passing, however, that the contention of the respondent that the law, in so far as it relates to previous transactions, is unconstitutional, is based upon the theory that the obligations of the directors is one on an implied contract, and that a law attempting to modify or destroy this obligation would violate the provisions of the federal Constitution against statutes impairing the obligations of contracts. That same contention is also involved in the construction of the law previous to the amendment, as to whether or not it should be strictly construed, and also with reference to the propriety of the order of the court granting the plaintiff his costs for levying the attachments. The matter will be considered in connection with those contentions.

Was section 309, Civil Code, violated by the directors?

[4, 5] As to the first point advanced by the appellant, that the directors could not offend against the statute with reference to distribution of the corporate assets unless they all joined in the common intent so to do, and that the corporate act of the directors arranging for such distribution was had in pursuance of that common intent: The penalty is imposed upon the directors during whose administration the wrong occurred, and the method by which they can exculpate themselves is by an affirmative entry upon the minutes of the corporation of their dissent from the act. The argument of the appellant is largely based upon the verdict of the jury whereby they exonerated two of the directors in pursuance of an instruction to the general effect that, if these directors acted in good faith, believing that the sale to Martin was what it purported on its face to be, they should be relieved from the statutory liability. The appellant, however, cannot take advantage of an error in favor of his codefendants. The liability is joint and several, and, if the defendant is liable, he cannot complain of the verdict in favor of his codefendants, who are equally liable. Assuming for the purpose of deciding this point, that there was a distribution of the capital of the corporation in violation of the law, we have no doubt that the appellant, who brought about the distribution and was a director at the time, was liable under the provisions of section 309, Civil Code, whether or not his codirectors shared in his unlawful intent.

[6] In considering the second proposition of the appellant that the transfer was not made to the stockholders, we will also consider the theory of the respondent. Respondent claims that the court should look at the substance of the transaction and thus determine its effect. Viewed in this light, the net result of the transaction was that the stockholders had distributed to them the entire assets of the corporation, and it is claimed that this is as far as the court needs to go in analyzing the whole situation. Martin is characterized as "a dummy, a mere pipe or channel through which the corporate assets passed to the stockholders." All of the difficulties in this case arise from the fact that the stockholders, as a part of the plan of getting the assets of the corporation, gave up their stock, and that Martin, who had received the legal title thereof, subsequently transferred the same to others who transferred it to the present stockholders who have caused this proceeding to be instituted. It must be recognized that this resale of the stock of the corporation at once brings the case within the very mischief sought to be remedied by the law penalizing the directors. If we, for a moment, disregard the fact that in this particular case the stock was sold after a full disclosure of the previous transactions and wholly upon the value of new assets subsequently acquired, and for a moment assume that the new stockholders were wholly unadvised of the previous transactions, we would have the condition where one of the directors (M. T. Minnie) had secured the entire capital stock of the corporation by the method of selling the stockholders the assets in payment for their stock, and then, by reason of his possession of the stock certificates, proceeds to sell the same to the public at par. In such a case it is evident that no greater fraud would be possible than a fraud by which stock is sold by a director to new stockholders who purchase it on the faith that the corporation is a going concern with large assets and, in fact, only secure a pro rata interest in a note given by an insolvent. If, then, we regard the various transactions from the sale by the corporation to Cross to and including the transfer of the stock from Minnie to a new group of stockholders as one entire transaction, it cannot be doubted that such transaction comes within the purview of the law penalizing the directors for distributing the assets of a corporation to its stockholders. If, however, we pause at any point between these two limits to determine the rights of the parties at such intermediate point, we are met with various difficulties. For illustration, if we assume that the invalidity of the transaction results from the fact that the note of Martin was worthless and that he was insolvent, we would have the situation by which Martin as the sole stockholder could compel the directors to refund the entire capital stock on the theory that his note was worthless and thereby make note in fact worth par. He could thereupon dissolve the corporation, thus receiving back his unpaid note and at the same time the entire capital of the corporation for which he paid nothing. If we regard Minnie as the real mover in the transaction and Martin as his dummy, we would have a situation where Minnie, one of the alleged coconspirators and the owner of the entire capital stock of the corporation, can cause a suit such as this to be brought by the corporation against the directors, who are therein required to refund the entire capital stock to the corporation, and thus Minnie, who engineered the scheme, becomes entitled as the sole stockholder in the corporation to the benefit of a penalty imposed upon his fellow directors and coconspirators. If we regard the capital stock as belonging to Hershiser, the appellant, and consider Martin as his dummy or agent, then we have a case where, as the jury finds (as sole stockholder of the corporation), he is entitled to collect $122,750 of himself, and to the proceeds, less the attorney's fees necessary to obtain this judgment. If we regard the transfer from the stockholders to Martin as void and the original stockholders as still the owners of the stock, as the respondents claim the fact to be, we find that the corporation now in the control of those who have no title to its stock or its assets is seeking to enforce an obligation in its favor resulting from the contention that they never have gained title to the stock, but that it belongs to the former stockholders. On the other hand, if we look at the transaction as a whole, beginning with the time when Cross agreed to purchase the assets of the corporation and ending at the point where Minnie sold all the stock of the corporation, ignoring for the moment the transfer of assets from Minnie to the corporation, we see that the corporation has been denuded of all its real assets, its stock has been rendered worthless, and yet has been sold to the public for par. By these transactions the assets of the corporation have been distributed to the stockholders who were in control of the corporation through the defendant directors at the time the plan was formulated. If we consider the contention of the appellant that the distribution was not "to the stockholders" within the meaning of the statute, and for a moment leave out of consideration the subsequent assignment to the corporation through the agency of Minnie of other assets upon the supposed value of which the new stockholders purchased, we have a situation which was evidently intended to be remedied by section 309, Civil Code, before the amendment of 1917, namely, a situation where corporate stock has become valueless by the distribution of its entire assets and whose stock thereafter has been sold upon the market. The wrong sought to be remedied by the statute does not result from the distribution of the capital "to the stockholders as such," but in the depletion of the capital of the corporation; hence it seems clear that the distribution to those stockholders, who alone are represented by the directors, and who at the time of the distribution have the power, by appropriate court or corporate action, to prevent the distribution, and who, instead of preventing such action, receive their proportion of the assets, is clearly within the meaning of the law a distribution to the stockholders themselves, even if in the process of such distribution they transfer their stock to some agent of the corporation in the belief that they are selling the stock. We conclude that the jury were justified in finding that the transfer of the corporate assets came within the prohibition of the law.

[7] There remains another point advanced by appellant based upon the right to distribute the capital stock in certain cases. Before the amendment of 1917 to section 309 of the Civil Code was permissible under the terms of the section for corporations organized "for the purpose, among other things, of acquiring, holding, and selling real estate, water, and water rights, * * * with the consent of stockholders representing two-thirds of the capital stock thereof, given at a meeting called for that purpose," to "divide among the stockholders the land, water, or water rights so by such corporation held, in the proportions to which their holdings of such stock at the time of such division entitle them." Appellant claims that the plaintiff is a corporation organized for the purposes indicated, and that, as the division of the assets was with the consent of all the stockholders, this was at least equivalent to a called meeting at which two-thirds of the stock should consent to the distribution; that under this statute, the assets so distributed were necessarily subject to the debts and liabilities of the corporation, as no provision is made either requiring their payment or providing therefor in the event of such distribution; that, in any event, the distribution having conformed to this requirement of the Code, with the single exception that there was no called meeting of the stockholders, the consent of all the stockholders being sufficient under the amended law to authorize the distribution, the effect of this amendment was to waive the requirement for a meeting of the stockholders, and thus remit the liability of the directors where the corporation is of the type indicated in the statute for the subdivision of land, etc., although the debts and liabilities were not fully paid. The difficulty with the appellant's contention is that the facts do not bring the transaction within the exception in the law before or after the amendment, as the above provision concerning land and water corporations is omitted from the amendment. Before the amendment, section 309 of the Civil Code permitted the directors to divide among the stockholders "the land, water, or water rights so by such corporation held, in the proportions to which their holdings of such stock at the time of such division entitle them. All conveyances made by the corporation in pursuance of this section must be made and received subject to the debts of such corporation existing at the date of the conveyance thereof." Even if it be conceded that the consent of all the stockholders given to the division of the property of the corporation is equivalent to the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders at a called meeting, a point which we need not decide, it is clear that there is a marked distinction between the distribution of land and water rights among the stockholders of a corporation, subject to the debts thereof and the distribution of personal property. In the case of real property which remains subject to the debts of the creditors, they are thus fully protected by what is in effect a lien upon the real property in their possession, while in case of the personal property the stockholders could quickly dissipate the funds received and the creditors would be without adequate remedy. The reasonable conclusion from these provisions is that it is only where the corporation has land, or water, or water rights, which are mentioned in the section, that the stockholders may avail themselves of this exception. At the time of the transaction here in question the Talcott Land Company had sold all its land, with a few exceptions, and had received therefor the obligations of the vendee, and it was for the purpose of distributing the money and the obligation of the vendee that the transaction was consummated. The question involved here is not whether the Talcott Land Company could have distributed its land to its stockholders and thus come within the proviso mentioned, but whether, having converted its land into personal property, it could distribute this personal property to the stockholders. It is clear that such a division by such a corporation comes within neither the letter nor the spirit of the proviso. For this reason the transaction of the division of the property of the corporation is not covered by the exception in section 309, Civil Code, as it existed prior to the amendment of 1917, and the directors were liable for the penalty fixed in the law at the time of that amendment, and that liability was continued by the terms of the amendment, which remitted the liability only in the cases mentioned in the amendment where the debts and liabilities to creditors were paid. This view of the law makes it unnecessary to consider the contention of the respondent that the corporations referred to, in the exception in the law previous to the amendment, were only such corporations as dealt in both land and water.

[8] Does the fact that no one has been injured by the transaction exculpate the directors? It has been held that stockholders, even though they have benefited by the distribution of dividends, may force the directors to reimburse the corporation. Appleton v. American Malting Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 375, 54 Atl. 454; Loan Society of Philadelphia v. Eavenson, 248 Pa. 407, 94 Atl. 121; Kom v. Cody Detective Agency, 76 Wash. 540, 136

Pac. 1155, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1073; Stoltz v. Scott, 23 Idaho, 104, 129 Pac. 340. The reasons which justify the recovery from the directors, whether or not any injury is suffered by the individual stockholders or creditors, would require a similar recovery by the corporation, notwithstanding some or all of the new stockholders were aware of the unlawful distribution. The rule must be either that the corporation itself has the right to compel the directors to restore its capital, regardless of whether or not any particular stockholder or creditor has been injured by the distribution, or, on the other hand, that the right to require the directors to replace the capital depends entirely upon whether or not stockholders or creditors have been injured. The cases all seem to hold that the right is in the corporation itself, without regard to the actual injury to stockholders. The statute expressly gives the right of action to the corporation without reference to the wrongs of stockholders or creditors; the latter having a separate right of action. Indeed, if the remedy is punitive, as we have heretofore held (Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 472; More v. Lent, 81 Cal. 506, 22 Pac. 875; Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 785, 155 Pac. 90), and as was conceded in Freeman v. Glenn Co. Tel. Co., recently decided in 194 Pac. 705, it must be held that the right exists in the corporation, regardless of the rights and knowledge of the constantly changing stockholders thereof; otherwise it would be difficult to enforce the penalty, as the participating stockholders or their transferees with notice could not complain of the wrong. The right to compel the restoration of the capital is expressly excepted from the operation of the statute of limitations (Civ. Code, § 309), for the purpose, no doubt, of enabling future stockholders, after the lapse of years, to enforce the liability through the corporation, after it had passed from the control of the wrongdoers. To exculpate him, while in this particular case it would seem more just to relieve the defendant from the penalty, would open the door wide for fraud in other cases and would destroy the beneficial effects of the statute.

[9] The District Court of Appeal, First District, Second Division, in its decision of this case reached an opposite conclusion by several processes of reasoning not advanced by the parties. Their view was that upon the reviving of the corporation after its dissolution by operation of law, and the acquisition by that corporation of new assets and the transfer of the stock to new stockholders who were fully advised of the situation and purchased stock wholly in the faith of the new assets, the plaintiff corporation should be regarded as in substance and effect a different corporation, and therefore not entitled to enforce the statutory obligation of the old directors to replace its capital. Because we felt this view untenable, we transferred the case to this court for decision. Our view is that, the dissolution of the corporation having resulted as a penalty for nonpayment of the license tax, the revival of the corporation by the payment of the tax as authorized by law was intended to fully reinstate the corporation with all its powers, rights, duties, and obligations. The District Court of Appeal also adopted the view that the transfer by Minnie to the revived corporation of the two tracts of land, estimated to be worth more than the capital of the corporation, operated as a payment by Minnie, one of the wrongdoers, to the corporation, of an amount equivalent to the distributed capital, and that, as Minnie was jointly and severally liable as one of the directors for the unlawful distribution of the assets, his transfer of such land was to be regarded as a payment by him on behalf of the directors and thus to fully satisfy the obligation. This contention was not presented by the parties and was not pleaded by the defendant, who relied wholly upon the legality of the original transaction. The question of the value of the assets transferred was not litigated, and the only evidence thereof was the statement shown by Minnie to prospective purchasers of stock in which the assets so transferred were estimated to have a value of about twice the capital stock above the amount of the incumbrances thereon. Subsequently these assets were lost because of the incumbrances thereon. We need, therefore, not consider the effect of a bona fide payment, as no such question is here involved.

[10] The appeal of the defendant from the order taxing costs whereby the defendant was charged with the cost of levying attachment remains to be considered. Appellant's contention is that this is not an action upon a contract express or implied for the direct payment of money within the meaning of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing attachments in such cases only. The argument that the liability is contractual is predicated upon the proposition that the director upon assuming office enters into a contract to perform the duties of his office in a lawful manner, and that his failure so to do is a breach of this implied contract, and for such breach an attachment will lie upon the implied obligation to restore to the corporation the full amount of the capital so diverted. We think it clear that the obligation is wholly statutory, if not penal, as we have heretofore pointed out, and is in no sense contractual within the meaning of the attachment law. The unlawful act of the directors is also punished as a misdemeanor by either fine or imprisonment, and it might be argued with equal force upon the same basis that the recovery of the fine would be based upon the contract between the director and the corporation implied by law. In Walker v. McCusker, 65 Cal. 360, 4 Pac.

206, it was held that an attachment would not lie under section 537, where the action was based upon a statutory liability merely. In that case the purchaser of mortgaged premises brought suit for rent against a tenant in possession for the value of the use and occupation of the land from the day of sale to the making of the deed. The attachment was held unauthorized by section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that the contract was not express or implied within the meaning of that section. Notwithstanding the difference in facts, the language of the court in Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 39, 20 Pac. 147, 149, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17, is directly applicable here:

> "The existence of a contract, express or implied, is an essential basis without which no writ of attachment can properly issue, and as in this case the action was founded, not upon contract, but upon the fraud and wrongful acts of the defendant, we are of opinion the writ of attachment issued therein was absolutely void. * * *"

It follows that the allowance of these costs was improper.

The judgment is affirmed and order taxing costs reversed.

LITHERBURY v. KIMMET et al.

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1920. On Rehearing in Bank, June 19, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(5) — That overtaking driver did not notice defendant's vehicle held not to relieve defendant from failure to signal left turn.

Testimony by the driver of a motorbus in which plaintiff was riding that he did not notice defendant's truck, which turned to the left at a street intersection while the bus was passing it from behind, until just as he undertook to pass the truck, does not show that the driver would not have seen a signal for turning if defendant's employé had made such a signal, and does not prevent recovery for negligent failure to make such signal.

2. Trial 🔑296(11)—Erroneous instruction allowing jury discretion as to damages cured by correct instruction.

The giving of an instruction that the jury should allow as damages for personal injuries what in their discretion they think plaintiff is entitled to, which would be erroneous if standing alone, does not require reversal, where it immediately followed an instruction correctly stating that the measure of plaintiff's recovery is such sum as will compensate her for the injuries sustained.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑705(2)—Negligence to turn motor vehicle to left without signaling regardless of state law.

Regardless of the state law, requiring a vehicle driver to signify his intention to turn, the necessity for the driver of a motor vehicle to give such signal, particularly before turning to the left, is so great and the practice is so universal that the driver may be guilty of negligence who fails to signal without making certain that there is no one behind him.

4. Damages 🔑132(2)—$4,000 for painful and probably permanent injuries not excessive.

Where plaintiff's evidence showed great pain and suffering and injuries of a distressing and disabling character which would probably be permanent, the court cannot say that a verdict allowing $4,000 damages was excessive.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Nina J. Litherbury against Henry Kimmet, the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, and others. Judgment for the plaintiff against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, and that defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Paul Overton, Wm. A. Cheney, J. H. Powell, S. W. Guthrie, and Herbert J. Goudge, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph F. Graham, Russell Graham, and Minor Blythe, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant, Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, in the sum of $4,000, as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff because of the negligence of the defendant. It seems that the plaintiff was a passenger in a so-called jitney motorbus on East Seventh street in Los Angeles, when the bus collided with a small motortruck, owned and operated by the Gas & Electric Company, and the plaintiff was injured. Originally, the jitney driver, the jitney owner, and the latter's surety were all made parties defendant with the gas and electric company, but later the action was dismissed as to all except the last. The grounds upon which the defendant asks for a reversal are three: First, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; second, certain alleged erroneous instructions; and, third, that the amount of the verdict is excessive.

[1] As to the first point the evidence for the plaintiff was to the effect that while the bus in which she was riding was close behind the defendant's truck going in the same direction and was endeavoring to pass it on the left, the truck suddenly and without warning turned to the left to go down an intersecting street with the result that the bus ran into it. The defendant concedes that, the jury having found for the plaintiff, this evidence must be taken to be true, but contends that it does not establish any causal connection between the failure of the truck driver to give any signal to those behind of his intention to turn to the left and the collision which immediately followed. This contention is based on the testimony of the jitney driver that he first observed the truck just as he undertook to pass it, whence it is argued that, even if the truck driver had given the usual signal of intention to turn to the left, the jitney driver would not have seen it, the collision would have occurred anyhow, and ergo the failure of the truck driver to give the usual signal had nothing to do with the case.

This argument hardly needs discussion. It is based entirely on the assumption that the jitney driver would not have seen the truck driver's signal, if the latter had given one. But there is no foundation whatever for the assumption. It may be true that the jitney driver did not observe the truck until he undertook to pass it, but it does not follow that he would not have seen a signal by the truck driver in ample time to avoid a collision, if the latter had given one a reasonable time in advance of his turning.

[2] The erroneous instructions complained of are two. The first is as to the amount in which the jury might find for the plaintiff. It reads:

> "If from the evidence in the case and under the instructions given you by the court the jury shall find that the plaintiff has sustained damages by reason of any personal injuries as charged in the complaint, and that she is entitled to recover, then to enable the jury to estimate the amount of such damages it is not necessary that any witness should have expressed an opinion as to the amount thereof, but the jury should give her what in their discretion they think that she is entitled to under the proof in the case. The amount alleged in the complaint, however, is no criterion for you to go by, except that you cannot go beyond there—that is the limit—it is not even a guide to you in any other way. Anything within that amount you can find, if you find for the plaintiff."

If this were all, the instruction would be clearly erroneous as leaving the jury free to find any amount they might think for any reason the plaintiff was entitled to, provided only the amount prayed for in the complaint were not exceeded. It would come clearly within the rule of Fries v. American, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 610, 75 Pac. 164. But the instruction was immediately preceded by one which definitely and correctly informed the jury that if the plaintiff were entitled to recover, the measure of her recovery was such a sum as would reasonably compensate her for her pain and anxiety. This instruction reads:

> "If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the measure of her recovery is what is denominated compensatory damages; that is, such sum as will compensate her for the injury she has sustained; and in this case it would be such reasonable sum as the jury shall award her on account of pain and anxiety she has suffered by reason of her injury, or is reasonably certain to suffer therefrom in the future."

Reading the two instructions together, and, as we have said, they were actually given immediately together, it is plain enough to a lawyer that the very general language of the second instruction given (the first quoted above) has reference to a recovery measured by the specific rule of the preceding instruction and is controlled by it. This, however, might well not be so plain to a body of men, such as a jury, not trained in the construction of instruments and who may hear the instructions only and not have the advantage of seeing them together on the written page. It would have been better if the danger of such misunderstanding of the true effect of the instructions had been avoided as could easily have been done. While the instructions are open, we believe, to criticism in this respect, still the danger or probability of their having been misconstrued is not so great as to justify us in this case in setting aside the verdict.

[3] The second instruction complained of is one whereby the jury were charged that the state law requires the driver of a vehicle about to turn to give a signal of his intention if there are other vehicles whose movement will be affected by his turning. The defendant's point in regard to this instruction is that Los Angeles being a chartered city, the general laws of the state do not operate within its limits. It is not necessary for the purpose of this case, however, to determine this question. The point of the instruction was that it was the duty of the truck driver before turning to signal to any vehicle close behind, and that if he failed to do so he was guilty of negligence. This is true whether the state law applies or not. The necessity for the driver of a motor vehicle to signal before turning, and particularly before turning to the left, is so great, and the practice of signaling in such a case is so universal and so relied upon, that there is no room for a reasonable difference of opinion as to the conduct of a driver who fails to signal without making certain that there is no one behind him. He is guilty of negligence, and the court is justified in so charging the jury.

[4] As to the point of excessive damages it is enough to say that the evidence of the plaintiff and that given on her behalf which must now be taken as true, showed great pain and suffering, and the receipt of injuries of a distressing and disabling character which would probably be permanent. It is impossible in the face of this testimony to consider the sum of $4,000 allowed by the jury as excessive.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.

On Rehearing in Bank.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing is asked for in this case because of the claimed incorrectness of the following statement in the opinion:

> "The necessity for the driver of a motor vehicle to signal before turning, and particularly before turning to the left, is so great, and the practice of signaling in such a case is so universal, and so relied upon, that there is no room for a reasonable difference of opinion as to the conduct of a driver who fails to signal without making certain that there is no one behind him. He is guilty of negligence, and the court is justified in so charging the jury."

We are satisfied as to the correctness of this statement as applied to the facts of the particular case, where the motor truck, whose sudden turning from its course to the left caused the collision, was proceeding along a street of a large city, where the coming up of vehicles behind it was always to be anticipated, and therefore necessarily guarded against, and there was nothing to relieve the driver of his obligation to exercise care in this respect. The statement was, however, not intended as one of universal application, and it is not difficult to conceive of cases to which it would not be at all applicable.

Rehearing denied.

All concur, except WILBUR, J., not voting.

VEYSEY v. MORIYAMA. (L. A. 6389.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑171(3) — Surrender of premises necessary element of "constructive eviction."

Any disturbance of the tenant's possession by the landlord whereby the premises are rendered unfit or unsuitable for occupancy in whole or in substantial part for the purposes for which they were leased amounts to a constructive eviction, if the tenant so elects and surrenders his possession, but there can be no constructive eviction if the tenant continues in the possession of the whole, however much he may be disturbed in the beneficial enjoyment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Constructive Eviction.]

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑171(3) — Lessee could not avoid payment of rent where he continued in possession of entire premises.

Conceding that a failure of the water supply on 10 out of 460 shares of water stock, which lessor lost by reason of his failure to pay assessments, on a total acreage of 640 acres, is sufficient to constitute a constructive eviction, the lessee could not avoid his covenant to pay rent while he remained in possession of the entire premises and continued to cultivate the whole thereof and enjoyed the benefits of the remaining water supply, having an ample remedy in recouping the damages he might sustain in the accruing rentals.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Nettie B. Veysey against S. Moriyama. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Allen, of Brawley, for appellant.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an action for unlawful detainer of land after default of defendant in payment of rent.

Defendant at the time the action was brought was in possession of the land in question consisting of 640 acres of farm land in the county of Imperial, under a three-year lease which by its terms had yet over two years to run. Two installments of rent aggregating the sum of $5,500 were delinquent at the time of filing suit.

The only defense offered is a plea of eviction from a substantial part of the land and a resultant release of defendant from liability to pay rent. This claim of eviction rests upon the following circumstances: The land covered by the lease was dependent for its use and value upon the necessary water for irrigation. There was appurtenant to this land for 60 shares of water stock in the Imperial Water Company No. 8, the water company furnishing water for irrigation to this part of the Imperial Valley. By the terms of the lease it is provided that the lessee "shall have the right to use the water on said land provided that he shall pay for all water ordered and used by him as it becomes due and payable," and that the lessor "agrees to pay all assessments levied against the water stock located on said land as the same becomes due and payable, in order that the party of the second part (the lessee) shall have unrestricted use of the proportion of water to which said stock is entitled." The lessor soon after the execution of the lease defaulted in the payment of an assessment on this water stock, and in consequence thereof the water company caused 10 shares of the stock to be sold under the assessment. It is alleged in the answer that from the date of such sale defendant "has been unable to procure any water on the shares so sold," and that the lessors have ever since failed to "replace said water stock on said land, so that defendant might have the free and unrestricted use of the proportion of the water to which such stock was entitled, or to place sufficient water stock on said land to irrigate same," and that defendant "has been deprived of the unrestricted use of the water to which such stock was entitled." It is further alleged that because of these conditions the defendant has been evicted from the portion of the land upon which said stock was located.

There is no allegation showing what part or how much of the land was affected by the sale of this water stock, or what was the extent or amount of damage resulting to defendant.

The defendant remained in the actual occupancy of the whole tract and planted and harvested a crop from the whole of it. The evidence discloses that there was a partial failure of the crop on a fraction of this land said to have been served by this withdrawn water stock. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not there was an actual shortage of or insufficiency of water for the proper irrigation of the tract. The trial court found that this state of facts did not constitute an eviction.

Although not pleaded, it appears in evidence and is found by the court that defendant expended $391 in purchasing water stock to replace that sold under assessment against the lessors, and $220 of assessment on water stock appurtenant to the land, and that the water stock and water supply were thus restored by defendant himself prior to the commencement of these proceedings.

Defendant is relying in this case on a constructive eviction. It is not contended that he was at any time actually ousted from possession of any part of this land, or that he was not at all times from the beginning of the lease until some time after this suit was begun occupying and farming the whole of it. His interest under his lease in the water stock was not in the possession of the stock itself, but in the right to a supply of water incident to such stock, and while, if he was sufficiently deprived of his water supply to materially affect the purposes of his leasehold, he might be justified in treating such breach of the covenants of the lease as an eviction and thereupon terminating his occupancy of the part of the premises affected, or even all of them, yet he could not remain in the use and occupation of the whole of this property and claim exemption from paying rent on the ground of a constructive eviction.

There are cases in the decisions where a tenant who has been actually and forcibly ousted of possession of a part of the rented premises has been permitted to hold the remainder of the leasehold without paying rent, as where in a house consisting of several rooms the landlord had wrongfully taken possession of part of them, it has been held that the tenant could not be required while this partial eviction continued either to vacate the remainder of the house or pay rent for the part he occupied. Such is the application of Christopher v. Austin, 11 N. Y. 216, Colburn v. Morrill, 117 Mass. 262, 19 Am. Rep. 415, and other like decisions cited by appellant.

[1] The general rule, however, relating to a constructive eviction is that any disturbance of the tenant's possession by the landlord whereby the premises are rendered unfit or unsuitable for occupancy in whole or in substantial part for the purposes for which they were leased amounts to a constructive eviction, if the tenant so elects and surrenders his possession. 6 R. C. L. p. 686. There can be no constructive eviction if the tenant continue in the possession of the whole, however much he may be disturbed in the beneficial enjoyment. 16 R. C. L. pp. 686, 687; Keating v. Springer, 146 Ill. 481, 34 N. E. 805, 22 L. R. A. 544, 37 Am. St. Rep. 175; De Witt v. Pierson, 112 Mass. 8, 17 Am. Rep. 58; Boreel v. Lawton, 90 N. Y. 293, 43 Am. Rep. 170. For instance, the failure of the landlord to heat a leased building as agreed under the lease may constitute an eviction, but the tenant must abandon the possession. He cannot remain in possession and enjoy without paying the rent such supply of heat as is furnished, although so inadequate as to have warranted an abandonment of the lease had the tenant so elected. 16 R. C. L. p. 692; note 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1218; Minneapolis Co-op. Co. v. Williamson, 51 Minn. 53, 52 N. W. 986, 38 Am. St. Rep. 473; Berlinger v. Macdonald, 149 App. Div. 5, 133 N. Y. Supp. 522; Koehler v. Scheider (Com. Pl.) 4 N. Y. Supp. 611; Siebold v. Heyman (Sup.) 120 N. Y. Supp. 105.

[2] So in this case, conceding that a failure of the water supply on 10 out of 460 shares of water stock on a total acreage of 640 acres is sufficient to constitute a constructive eviction the tenant cannot avoid his covenant to pay rent while he remains in possession of the entire premises and continues to cultivate the whole thereof and enjoy the benefits of the remaining water supply. He has ample remedy under such circumstances in recouping the damages he may sustain against the accruing rentals. New York v. Mabie, 13 N. Y. 151, 64 Am. Dec. 358; McCoy v. Oldham, 1 Ind. App. 372, 27 N. E. 647, 50 Am. St. Rep. 208.

The evidence discloses that defendant harvested $25,000 worth of produce from this tract of land during the one cropping season he was in possession. If he had lost the entire use of the proportion of the land served with water from the 10 shares of stock sold from the total 460 shares, his proportionate loss would have been less than $600.

The finding of the trial court that the failure of the lessors to protect these shares did not amount to an eviction was justified under the evidence.

Although there was no pleading to support a judgment for damages, the court allowed the sum of $611 to defendant as a set-off against the rent due, as compensation for the amount expended by defendant for replacing the forfeited shares and for payment of water assessments, giving judgment for the balance claimed on the unpaid installments of rent.

The defendant surrendered possession of the premises during the pendency of the action. This action was maintained by the assignee and grantee of the original lessors, but there is nothing in the issues presented making that circumstance material.

I concur: LENNON, J.

WILBUR, J. I concur. The trial court found that there was no insufficiency or shortage of water for the proper irrigation of the tract, and, as the finding of the court is supported by sufficient evidence, it follows that there was no eviction from any substantial part of the premises. For that reason I concur in the judgment.

1. Trial 🔑165—Evidence interpreted against defendant on motion for nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, the evidence must be interpreted most strongly against the defendant.

2. Appeal and error 🔑997(2) — Nonsuit reversed, unless plaintiff's evidence is incapable of sustaining a decision in his favor.

Judgment of nonsuit must be reversed, unless the evidence for plaintiff is so weak as not to be capable of sustaining a decision in his favor.

Where an automobile owner, invited to carry his father and fellow guests to a place of entertainment, declined the invitation, and permitted his employé to drive the party to their destination, the inference that the father was in charge so as to be responsible for negligence of the driver was reasonable, and it was error to grant a nonsuit on the theory that the driver was a fellow guest.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by W. W. Gates against C. W. Pendleton, Sr., and another. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, C. W. Pendleton, Sr., and C. W. Pendleton, Jr., both of Los Angeles (C. C. Trott, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The only question on this appeal is in fixing the liability for damages to plaintiff for injuries suffered in an automobile accident. The plaintiff was run over and seriously injured by the reckless negligence of the driver of an automobile owned by the defendant C. W. Pendleton, Jr., and in which C. W. Pendleton, Sr., was a passenger. It is alleged that the driver at the time of the accident was in the employ of Pendleton, Jr., and under the direction and in the immediate service of Pendleton, Sr. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the trial court granted a motion for nonsuit as to both defendants. It is claimed by appellant that no grounds for the nonsuit were specified in the motion, but it sufficiently appears that the motion was submitted on the insufficiency of the evidence. At any rate no prejudice can have resulted from any failure to more specifically state the grounds of the motion. Plaintiff had introduced all his evidence and submitted his case, and the only point at all in controversy was as to whether both or either of the respondents here were liable for the negligence of the driver of the automoile.

[1, 2] The trial court granted the motion for nonsuit. Upon such a motion the evidence must be interpreted most strongly against the defendant, and unless the evidence for plaintiff is so weak as not to be capable of sustaining a decision in his favor the judgment must be reversed. The uncontradicted evidence bearing upon this point was that the senior Pendleton, with a number of other gentlemen, had been invited to a dinner tendered them by a mutual friend. The place of entertainment was at some distance away, and the host had informed Pendleton, Sr., that if he had a friend with an automobile who would bring him and two or three of the guests who were to accompany him, he could invite the automobile provider along also as a guest. The testimony of Pendleton, Sr., in this particular was:

> "Why, Gen. Last [the host] suggested that if I knew of any one who had a car who could take a part of his party down to the place where we were going he would invite him along as a guest. * * * I told him that my son [C. W. Pendleton, Jr.] had a car, and, while he was away, he was expected home early in the morning, the day on which the excursion was fixed, and I would ask him to take me down."

In pursuance of this arrangement Pendleton, Sr., sent word to his son by one Clarence Toll, who afterwards was the driver at the time of the accident. Toll was a clerk in the law office of Pendleton, Jr., and sometimes drove members of the family, including Pendleton, Sr., in his employer's automobile. He was not, however, employed as a chauffeur; the younger Pendleton having a regularly employed chauffeur. On this occasion, however, young Toll was to meet Pendleton, Jr., with the car on his return from the trip on which he was then absent. In the words of the elder Pendleton:

> "I sent word to him by Toll, as he left me by the corner, to tell my son about the party, and ask him if he would not go along and take a number of people that were there. Clarence came back alone, and said that my son, having just come home, had told him that he had some things to attend to, and would not go, but would let him have the car. Q. Did you send Toll to your son for the car? A. No. I told Toll, as I stated to you, about the matter, to tell my son on the way up, ask him if he would not go down and take a number of the party. That is the message that I give to Toll."

Pendleton, Jr., testified that he had no conversation with his father about the use of the machine. His statement of the matter is:

> "I had no conversation with my father about it; Toll told me what his connection was in a way. He wanted to know if I objected to the car being used for that purpose, and I said, No. I do not know of my own personal knowledge where they were going.
> "Question by the Court: I understand you to say, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Toll came and said —asked if you had any objection to your father using your machine. A. Yes. Q. And you said, No? A. That is true. Q. You knew that from your foreman, the machine was for him. You knew nothing about the matter at all? A. That is a fact. I had no concern in the matter. Q. All you know is your man came to you to get the machine for your father, and you let him have it?
> "The Court: That has been gone over. He has told what happened."

This is all the evidence produced in the case as to the circumstances under which the use of the car and the services of Toll as its driver were procured.

The party, including Pendleton, Sr., and two or three others of the invited guests with Toll as driver, went in this automobile to the dinner which was given in the afternoon. It does not appear that Pendleton took any particular charge of the trip or gave any directions to Toll. After the dinner the party started on their return at Pendleton's suggestion about dusk in the evening, and in passing a street car ran into several persons about to board the car, among whom was the plaintiff.

It is quite clear that the defendant C. W. Pendleton, Jr., was not liable for the negligent driving of the automobile by Toll on this occasion. At most he had but loaned his machine to Toll or his father, or both of them, in a matter of which he had no particular knowledge and no personal concern.

The connection of the defendant C. W. Pendleton, Sr., with the transaction is that he wanted his son to join the party as a guest and drive them to their destination. He sent a message to this effect to his son by Toll. Toll returned with the automobile, reporting that the son had declined the invitation, but had let him (Toll) take the car. Pendleton, Sr., testifies that he did not ask Toll to get the car, but only to ask the son to come and take them in it to the dinner. Toll acted on his own initiative in procuring the use of the car and bringing it for the use of the party. The statement of the son that he loaned the car to Toll and his father cannot bind the latter, unless he had authorized or requested Toll to get the use of it for him, or unless, with knowledge that the auto with Toll as its driver, had been furnished to him by his son, he accepted the use and service so tendered.

The theory of the defendants, apparently adopted by the trial court and District Court of Appeal, is that Toll, having procured the use of the automobile on his own responsibility from his employer, offered himself as a substitute for the younger Pendleton, and, in the rôle of a fellow guest, invited the Pendleton party to ride with him to the dinner.

[3, 4] We do not think that this conclusion can be reasonably entertained from the evidence. There is no dispute as to the facts. It is merely a question as to the inferences to be drawn from the undisputed testimony, and we do not lose sight of the rule that the decision of the trial court must stand if upon a consideration of all the circumstances defendants' theory of the case is reasonably supported.

From the testimony of the younger Pendleton it seems entirely clear that he was offering his automobile with Toll as a driver for the use of his father. It does not seem to us credible that the elder Pendleton understood the situation in any different way. It is true he had not asked for the use of the machine, but had sent an invitation to his son to join him and his friends as a guest and take them to the place of meeting. But when young Toll returned and reported that the son had told him "he had something to attend to and could not go, but would let him (Toll) have the car," the father must have understood, what was the fact as shown by the son's testimony, that the car and driver were furnished for his use.

There is no direct testimony that Toll was a guest or considered as such and such a conclusion is not consistent with the circumstances. The only testimony is the statement of Pendleton, Sr., in answering the question: "Was you wanting him to go merely as a guest, or driver of the machine?" that "I didn't want him particularly to go myself, but he was invited as a guest." The invitation referred to was apparently the suggestion of Gen. Last that they could bring as a guest any one who would bring them to the dinner in his automobile. This was a dinner party given by Gen. Last to old friends who had been members of his staff "many years ago." Some of them apparently were military men. One Col. Houston was a member of the Pendleton party. Although there is no specific evidence on that point the fair inference is that they were middle-aged gentlemen. Clarence Toll was a youth of 22 or 23 years. He was a clerk and law student in the younger Pendleton's law office, "a general utility man in the office," who sometimes acted as his employer's chauffeur. There is no evidence that he sat at the dinner table with the guests. Pendleton, Sr., the only witness on the subject, says he did not see him. He did make some suggestion to Toll about starting for home. He says:

> "When they all got loaded, I believe I suggested to him that everybody was going; let us go."

We assume that the somewhat ambiguous and equivocal reference to getting "loaded" has the automobile and not the passengers as its objective. That the driver had been imbibing, however, is indicated by his reckless driving on the return trip and the testimony of a witness who saw the accident, that the driver appeared to be under the influence of liquor, and that he smelled it on his breath. He drove the car with Pendleton and his companions at a rate of between 30 and 40 miles an hour, according to the evidence, past a standing street car and into a group of passengers about to board the car. Five of them were injured, including the plaintiff, and two afterwards died. Toll was arrested, tried, and convicted of manslaughter. Probably the extent and degree of Toll's culpability for the accident does not throw any light on his relations to the other members of the party, but all the circumstances taken together make exceedingly incredible the suggestion that he was acting as a fellow guest of these gentlemen, and conveyed them to the party on his own initiative and responsibility.

We think the conclusion could reasonably be reached from the evidence that C. W. Pendleton, Sr., was in charge of the expedition.

MASONIC MINES ASS'N TRUSTEESHIP et al. v. PARKER, Judge of Superior Court. (Sac. 3220.)

Exceptions, Bill of 🔑53(5)—Judge will not be compelled to settle bill of exceptions including matter not reviewable.

Where a new trial proceeding was never prosecuted beyond service and filing of notice of intention and other papers, it cannot be reviewed on appeal, never having been presented to the trial court, and should not be a part of the bill of exceptions, and the trial judge will not be required to include it by writ of mandate.

In Bank.

Petition by the Masonic Mines Association Trusteeship and others for a writ of mandate to Pat R. Parker, Judge of the Superior Court, to compel the latter to settle a bill of exceptions. Application denied.

Welles Whitmore, of Oakland, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of mandate to compel judge to settle bill of exceptions.

It appears from the letter of the trial judge set forth in the petition that he is willing and ready to settle the bill if there be eliminated therefrom all matter appertaining to the notice of intention to move for a new trial and all matter appertaining to a motion for new trial. This, so far as appears, is all that appellant is entitled to; the new trial proceeding never having been prosecuted beyond the service and filing of a notice of intention and other papers, and never having been presented to the trial court, and having been denied by operation of law because not brought to determination within three months after notice of entry of judgment. Under such circumstances the matter of the new trial proceeding cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, and bill of exceptions to be used on such appeal should not contain anything relative thereto.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

All concur.

CHAVEZ v. TIMES-MIRROR CO. (L. A. 6020.)

1. Libel and slander 🔑54—Truth a complete defense.

The truth of the charge is a complete defense in a civil action for damages for libel.

2. Libel and slander 🔑97—Demurrer to complaint alleging libel sustained if complaint shows truth of charge.

As the truth of the charge is a complete defense in a civil action for damages for libel, a demurrer to a complaint is properly sustained if the complaint itself shows the truth of the charge.

3. Pleading 🔑6 — Matters of judicial notice read into pleading.

In the consideration of a pleading the courts must read the same as if it contained a statement of all matters of which they are required to take judicial notice, even when it contains an express allegation to the contrary.

4. Libel and slander 🔑97—Court not at liberty to assume that attorney knew public defender was not a judge.

The court in considering a demurrer to a complaint in an action by an attorney for damages for libel is not at liberty to assume that plaintiff knew that the public defender was not a judge.

5. Evidence 🔑5(2) — Judicial notice has no application to persons.

The rule of judicial notice has no application to persons, and court cannot assume that a lawyer knew that a certain public defender was not a judge.

6. Libel and slander 🔑9(3)—Complaint held to state cause of action for libel.

A complaint by an attorney in an action for damages for libel, in that defendant newspaper stated the plaintiff had circulated postcards bearing his signature recommending certain judges for re-election, and that one of the judges so named was a public defender, and not a judge, and that the statement on the card was a deliberate lie, maliciously framed and deserved the bitterest condemnation, held to state a cause of action.

7. Libel and slander 🔑86(1)—Innuendoes cannot give meaning of which publication is not fairly susceptible.

One cannot by innuendoes ascribe to an alleged libel a meaning of which it is not fairly susceptible in the light of such extrinsic facts as are alleged.

Action by E. V. Chavez against the Times-Mirror Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

E. V. Chavez and J. W. Satterwhite, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel Poorman, Jr., Otis H. Castle, Hunsaker & Britt and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for libel, given on sustaining a demurrer to his complaint without leave to amend. The action was founded on a publication in the Los Angeles Times. The demurrer was both general and special.

[1, 2] Counsel have devoted themselves almost exclusively to the general demurrer for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the claim of respondent in this regard being in brief that, in view of certain matters of which it is said the court must take judicial notice, the complaint shows that the published article was in all substantial respects true. As the truth of the charge is a complete defense in a civil action for damages for libel, it is plain that, if the complaint itself shows the truth of the charge, the demurrer was properly sustained. Whether or not it does so show is the principal question on this appeal. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is, and has been for more than 11 years, an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession principally in the county of Los Angeles, and that he always, prior to the publication complained of, enjoyed a good name and reputation as an attorney. It further alleges that defendant is the owner and publisher of the daily newspaper known as the "Los Angeles Times," a paper of wide circulation in Los Angeles county and elsewhere. It then alleges:

> That on September 29, 1918, said defendant wrongfully and maliciously, and with intent to injure plaintiff, published in said newspaper "of and concerning him, in his said capacity and profession and as a man, the following false, libelous, malicious, and defamatory article, to wit:
> " 'It has been said that everything is fair in war, but even that statement is open to criticism. For instance, nobody but a Fritz would ever excuse the Kaiser for his atrocities in Belgium or for other innumerable fiendish acts. With this prelude, I want to say that neither is everything fair in politics. During the past few weeks post cards have been circulated within the city and county bearing the signature of one E. V. Chavez. The card is addressed to "Dear Friend" and says:
> " ' "As a member of the local bar and a practitioner before the superior courts of this county, I take great pleasure in recommending the following judges for re-election to the positions which they are now so creditably occupying, to wit: Judge James C. Rives, Judge Frederick Houser, Judge Charles Wellborn, Judge John M. York, Judge Paul McCormick, Judge L. H. Valentine, Judge Walton J. Wood."
> " 'Obviously this card was written and mailed for the purpose of helping the candidacy of Walton J. Wood. The statement on the card is a deliberate lie, maliciously framed, and deserves the bitterest condemnation. The incumbent judges named (without their permission) have reason to be sore and no doubt are. It seems to me that this instance furnishes good material for the investigating committee of the Bar Association. Walton J. Wood is the public defender. He is not a judge, and if all of his supporters are of the kind that evidently sent out this reprehensible document I pity him. As a public defender he has made a clear record, and he should be the first one to expose this sort of fake advertising.' "

This is followed in paragraph V by the innuendoes, being certain allegations as to the meaning intended by defendant as to four portions of the article, comprising all thereof except the statement on the card, and the understanding of the meaning of those portions on the part of the persons who read the article. Then comes paragraph VI, alleging "that said publication was false and defamatory," and that by means thereof plaintiff has been and is greatly injured and prejudiced in his reputation and business, and has suffered great humiliation and anguish of mind. He alleged his actual damage as being $5,000, and also asked for $20,000 exemplary or punitive damage.

[3] The statement on the card alleged in the article to have been circulated necessarily implied that "Judge Walton J. Wood" was, with the other judges named, an incumbent judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and, with such others, a candidate for re-election to the position which he and such others then occupied "so creditably." There is apparently no dissent from the proposition that in the consideration of a pleading the courts must read the same as if it contained a statement of all matters of which they are required to take judicial notice, even when the pleading contains an express allegation to the contrary. See People v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 234, 244–246, 50 Pac. 305; French v. Senate, 146 Cal. 604, 607, 80 Pac. 1031, 69 L. R. A. 556, 2 Ann. Cas. 756; 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1; 1 Abb. Trial Brief (2d Ed.) p. 107. In view of this rule it must be conceded that the superior court in considering the demurrer was required to take into consideration the fact that Walton J. Wood was not a judge of the superior court, and that one J. Perry Wood was such a judge (subdivision 5, § 1875, Code Civ. Proc.; 15 Ruling Case Law, 1105; San Joaquin Co. v. Budd, 96 Cal. 47, 30 Pac. 967; People v. Knoblock, 11 Cal. App. 333, 335, 104 Pac. 1012), that said Walton J. Wood was therefore not a candidate for "re-election," and that the statement on the card was, in this respect, untrue. It is upon this fact that learned counsel for the defendant base their claim that the published article contained nothing but the truth, and fair comment thereon.

But the published article goes further, declaring that "obviously this card was written and mailed for the purpose of helping the candidacy of Walton J. Wood," and that "the statement on the card is a deliberate lie, maliciously framed," deserving the bitterest condemnation. If the statement as to Walton J. Wood was intentionally and deliberately made by plaintiff with knowledge of its falsity, as this necessarily implies, the remainder of the published article would, in our opinion, be fully justified as fair and legitimate comment on a most reprehensible act, fully meriting all that is said in the article about it and about the person guilty thereof. In such event it could have been made only for the purpose of helping the candidacy of Walton J. Wood by misleading the electors as to the facts.

[4, 5] The real sting of the published article lies in the statement that the plaintiff had thus circulated "a deliberate lie, maliciously framed," necessarily implying full knowledge on the part of the plaintiff of the untruth of the statement on the card as to Walton J. Wood, and a deliberate expression thereof with such knowledge. The complaint, however, does not show any such knowledge on the part of plaintiff, and courts are not at liberty in considering the sufficiency of a pleading to assume that he had such knowledge, even though he was an attorney at law practicing in Los Angeles county. The rule of judicial notice has no application to persons. It is a rule of evidence for the government of courts (Raggio v. Southern Pacific Co. et al., 185 Pac. 171), and a person cannot be held to have knowledge of all those things of which a court may take judicial notice, in many cases by resort to appropriate books or documents of reference, simply because they are matters of which courts take judicial notice. While it seems extremely probable that plaintiff in fact did know that Walton J. Wood was not a judge, and not a candidate for re-election, it is possible that he did not, and in the face of the allegation in the complaint "that said publication was false and defamatory," which must be taken as meaning that the whole article was false and defamatory (Leonard v. McPherson, 146 Cal. 616, 620, 80 Pac. 1084), a court cannot on demurrer assume that he knew, and that the statement on the card was "a deliberate lie, maliciously framed." The difference in effect between a charge of uttering and circulating a mere untruth, perhaps in entire ignorance of the fact that the statement is untrue, or because of inadvertence, etc., and a charge of uttering and circulating "a deliberate lie, maliciously framed," for an improper purpose, is too obvious to merit discussion. In this respect the complaint does not show the truth of the published article, and it does sufficiently state a cause of action.

Whatever may be said as to a certain statement in one of the innuendoes constituting an admission that plaintiff sent out and circulated the postal cards, the same cannot by any possibility be construed as an admission that the statement thereon with reference to Walton J. Wood was "a deliberate lie, maliciously framed."

[6] Nor is the allegation of falsity of the published article in any way limited in its effect by anything contained in the innuendoes. The allegation of falsity goes to the whole article. In view of what we have said, the words actually used in the article are actionable entirely regardless of the innuendoes, by which it was sought to enlarge and extend the sense of those words.

[7] In view of possible future proceedings, we deem it proper to say, in so far as the innuendoes are concerned, that for the most part the meaning ascribed thereby to the words used in the article is one of which the words are incapable, and that for the remaining part the words used are only fair comment upon the matter discussed. It is a well-settled rule that one cannot by such an allegation ascribe to an alleged libel a meaning of which it is not fairly susceptible in the light of such extrinsic facts as are alleged. See Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 Pac. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766. In this case the allegations to the effect that the defendant by the introductory part of the article meant to say and was understood to mean that plaintiff was as cruel, treacherous, dishonorable, double-dealing, despicable, and inhuman as the Kaiser, etc., finds no support in the language of the article, alone or when considered in the light of the extrinsic facts. The language used is utterly incapable of any such meaning. The same is true as to the allegation that by other language used defendant meant to say and was understood as meaning that plaintiff had entered into a conspiracy or agreement with Walton J. Wood to help elect him by unlawful and corrupt means. So with the allegation that by the words, "It seems to me that this instance furnishes good material for the investigating committee of the Bar Association," defendant meant to say and was understood as meaning "that plaintiff is so unworthy, unprofessional, and corrupt * * * that he should be humiliated and disgraced by having the Bar Association of the state of California * * * suspend him * * * from practicing his said profession." It may properly be added that the language actually used would seem to be only fair comment on such conduct as was attributed to plaintiff by the article. The portion sought to be construed in the fourth innuendo is clear and explicit in meaning and constitutes nothing but fair comment, as also does the statement that "the incumbent judges named (without their permission) have reason to be sore and no doubt are." In short, the innuendoes alleged do not assist the pleading, and if without them the language of the article was not actionable, in view of the allegations of special damage, the complaint would not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. But, as we have seen, the complaint is sufficient without them.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the superior court to overrule the demurrer, with leave to defendant to answer.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟹335—Seller entitled to retain money paid on purchaser's default.

Where the buyer of land not only defaulted in the payment of future installments, but attempted to rescind because she had changed her mind, and did not desire to purchase, and the seller notified the buyer that by reason of her failure to pay installments due the contract was terminated, and her rights under the contract forfeited, and that by the terms thereof he was entitled to and would not return the purchase money paid, the seller was entitled to retain the money paid by the purchaser, and her rights terminated.

2. Evidence ⟹63—Presumption of sanity of agreed purchaser.

There is a presumption of sanity, as of the competency of one who contracted to purchase land.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Nourse against Katie A. Azvedo and John Doe Azvedo. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed, with damages for frivolous appeal.

H. H. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain real estate against the claims of the defendant growing out of a contract to purchase wherein the plaintiff was vendor and the defendant Katie A. Azvedo, vendee, who, by cross-complaint, seeks to recover $200, the initial payment upon the purchase price. Plaintiff recovered judgment quieting his title, and the defendant, having been defeated upon her cross-complaint, appeals from the judgment against her on the cross-complaint only.

[1] By the terms of the contract time was the essence thereof. The defendant not only defaulted in the payment of future installments, but attempted to rescind the contract by reason of the fact that she had changed her mind and did not desire to purchase. Respondent notified appellant that by reason of her failure to pay the future installments due the contract was terminated and her rights under the contract forfeited, and that by the terms thereof he was entitled to and would retain the purchase money so far paid. Under these circumstances the vendor was entitled to retain the money paid by the purchaser, and her rights in the property terminated. Newell v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 184 Pac. 659, 9 A. L. R. 993; Lemle v. Barry, 183 Pac. 150; Hymen v. Harbor View Land Co., 188 Pac. 828; Darter v. Schuyler, 190 Pac. 827.

[2] The appellant also seeks to rescind the contract on the ground that she was incompetent at the time she executed the same. The finding of the trial court is that she was competent. It is enough in that regard to say that the testimony of the appellant is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of sanity which is supported by respondent's evidence and by the circumstances attending the execution of the contract.

Judgment affirmed, with $25 damages for frivolous appeal.

1. Mortgages 🔑159 — Presumed from recital in trust deed that execution of mortgage preceded deed.

Where mortgage and trust deed bear the same date and were filed for record on the same day, it will be presumed, from a recital in the trust deed that it was made "subject to a mortgage for $6,000 filed concurrently herewith," that the execution of the mortgage preceded that of the trust deed.

2. Mortgages 🔑257—Assignee entitled to recover on mortgage executed without consideration in absence of knowledge.

An assignee of a note and mortgage executed without consideration is entitled to recover thereon where he had no knowledge of the lack of consideration.

3. Mortgages 🔑270 — Evidence held not to support finding that assignee had knowledge of lack of consideration.

In an action by assignee to foreclose a mortgage, evidence held not to support a finding that plaintiff had knowledge that the note and mortgage were without consideration.

4. Estoppel 🔑72 — Innocent vendor, permitting mortgage to fall into hands of innocent purchaser, must suffer loss.

Where vendors of real estate took trust deed reciting that it was subject to a mortgage of even date, permitting the vendee to mortgage premises for the purpose of making improvements, but such improvements never being made, and the mortgage fell into the hands of an innocent purchaser, the vendors could not claim that their trust deed was prior to the mortgage, and that the mortgage was executed and delivered without consideration, since where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer, under Civ. Code, § 3543.

5. Mortgages 🔑257 — Assignee had right to rely upon abstract company.

Assignee of mortgage, represented to him to be first mortgage, was entitled to the benefit of a recital in a trust deed of even date that the trust deed was subject to such mortgage, although he did not personally know of or rely upon such recital, having employed an abstract company to search the title, and such abstract company having relied upon such recital in passing the title.

6. Appeal and error 🔑837(10) — Certificate of title held to be considered as part of evidence.

A certificate of title, used on the trial of a case and appearing in the bill of exceptions as part of the evidence submitted on the trial, must be considered for all purposes to which it is relevant, although appellees object that it was not admitted in evidence.

7. Estoppel 🔑22(2)—Person permitting recital in trust deed estopped thereby.

Where beneficiaries of a trust deed permitted a recital in such trust deed acknowledging the priority of a note and mortgage of even date, they were estopped to set up as a defense in foreclosure by an innocent assignee of the note and mortgage that such note and mortgage lacked consideration to support them, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

8. Estoppel 🔑34 — Unnecessary to plead in complaint where arising from defense.

In a foreclosure proceeding, where assignee of note and mortgage brought action to foreclose, it was not necessary that he plead in the complaint that beneficiaries in a trust deed of even date were estopped to deny the priority of the note and mortgage by reason of a recital in the trust deed; the question of estoppel not arising until such beneficiaries set up the defense that the trust deed was a superior lien.

9. Pledges 🔑24 — Pledgee of mortgage can only claim to the extent of the mortgage loan and costs.

An assignee of a note and mortgage to secure a loan made to the mortgagee can only claim under the note and mortgage to the extent of the loan to the mortgagee, and the costs incident thereto, which it secures, and his priority of right by reason of his being an innocent holder only extends to the protection of such claim as against the lien of a trust deed of even date, which was in fact a superior lien.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Samuel R. McCreery against H. W. Charlton and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lloyd W. Moultrie, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Behymer & Craig and Elliot Craig, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage securing a note for $6,000, which note and mortgage was assigned to him as collateral security for a cash loan of $1,250 made by him to the mortgagee. There was no defense by the mortgagors, but the defendants, respondents here, interposed the claim of a trust deed on the same property, which was alleged to create a lien superior to the mortgage. The trial court found in accordance with the claim of the respondents, and this appeal is taken from the judgment subordinating the mortgage to this deed.

[1] The uncontroverted facts in the case appear to be that respondents, Marie Otto and Charles E. Otto, sold the land in question to defendant Charlton, receiving therefor $600 in cash and four notes for $500 each. To secure these notes Charlton and wife executed the trust deed mentioned to the defendant and respondent Guaranty & Trust Company for the benefit of the Ottos, payees of the notes. This trust deed contains a recital that it is made "subject to a mortgage for $6,000, filed concurrently herewith." The mortgage thus referred to is the one sought to be foreclosed in this action. The mortgage and trust deed bear the same date and were filed for record on the same day; there being nothing other than the above recital to show which, if either, had priority of recordation. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it would be presumed from this recital in the trust deed of the existence of a mortgage that its execution preceded that of the trust deed. The mortgage and note secured thereby were executed to one Anna L. Giles. No immediate consideration passed therefor. The purpose of the note and security was to enable Charlton, the purchaser, to obtain money for the erection of a house on the land which he agreed to build at a cost of $7,500; the note and security having been executed to raise money for that purpose. This was never done, and as between Charlton and Mrs. Giles and the Ottos the note and mortgage are without consideration. Instead of raising money for such building purposes Mrs. Giles hypothecated the securities for a personal loan of $1,250 with one A. L. Bank, and later secured the money from the plaintiff to repay Bank, and had Bank reassign the note and mortgage to plaintiff as security for the $1,250 thus advanced by him. Both Mrs. Giles and Bank knew the purpose for which the note and mortgage had been executed, but they did not impart that information to the plaintiff. No part of the unpaid purchase-price notes, nor of the $6,000 note, has been paid. The $6,000 note, however, at the time of its assignment to plaintiff, had indorsed upon it the payment of accrued interest in the amount of $210. It appears that this interest had never been paid, but the payment was apparently indorsed for the purpose of indicating to the plaintiff that the interest payments were being met.

The findings of the trial court are an elaboration upon this state of facts, with the further finding that the plaintiff, in accepting an assignment of the note and mortgage, did so with knowledge that the note was originally made without consideration, and that he did not in entering upon the transaction know or rely upon the recital in the trust deed making it subordinate to the mortgage. The language of the finding in the last-mentioned particulars is as follows:

> "That plaintiff accepted said assignment of said note and mortgage and said note and mortgage, and each of them, with full knowledge on his part that there was no consideration for the execution of said $6,000 note and mortgage, or either of them, and with full knowledge and belief on his part, after personal inspection and investigation by him, that the real property described in said mortgage was of the value of about $2,500, and no more,"

—and, further, that:

> "Said plaintiff knew that there was a trust deed of $2,000 upon said real property, but plaintiff did not know or have any information or belief of the fact that said $2,000 deed of trust contained the said recital, to wit, 'Subject to a mortgage for $6,000 filed concurrently herewith,' and the court finds that in making said loan and taking said assignment plaintiff did not in any way or manner whatsoever rely upon said recital in said deed of trust."

[2] It is only on these findings, that plaintiff had knowledge of the failure of consideration for his note and mortgage, and did not receive his assignment in reliance upon the recital of this priority in the trust deed, that the judgment can be upheld. The contention of the appellant is that these findings are unsupported by the evidence.

[3] We have examined the evidence in this case, with the result that we fail to find any substantial support for the findings in either of these particulars. Not only is there nothing in the record to indicate that the plaintiff had any knowledge or information which would lead him to question the sufficiency of or consideration for the security offered him, but, on the contrary, his own testimony and the circumstances of his part in the transaction indicate perfect good faith on his part in the validity of the security; and, while it is true that he testified that he did not know, at the time of making the loan, of the recital in the deed subordinating it to the mortgage, or rely upon such recital, the evidence does show that it was represented to him, and he relied upon the fact that the mortgage was a first lien on the property, and the abstract company to which he had intrusted the search of title, as his agent, must have known of and relied upon such recital in passing the title. The certificate of title thus furnished at the request of the plaintiff contains a notation of this trust deed, and of the recital making it subject to the mortgage. The collateral note executed to plaintiff by Mrs. Giles on this loan recites that the collateral security is a note for $6,000, secured by first mortgage on this property. The Los Angeles Title Insurance Company, which was handling the escrow in the matter of this loan for plaintiff, took the precaution of calling upon the original parties to the note to state if there were any outstanding equities against the note. To these inquiries Charlton, the maker of the note, replied that he had "received the consideration for the full face value of the note," and that there were no legal defenses to it. Plaintiff's assignor answered that no additional advances had been made upon the note in addition to the original amount, and that "the interest on said note is paid to October 25, 1916," the date of assignment to plaintiff. Our attention is called to an alleged erasure of the word "no" in the statement of the mortgagor, Charlton, that "there are no legal defenses to the note," but the record is so unintelligible as to whether such erasure was actually made, or, if so, why or when or by whom, that we cannot give it any consideration here, though it might have some weight as notice to put the plaintiff on inquiry of possible equities, if the erasure existed when the information was received.

The fact that the trial court pointed out in its findings that the plaintiff personally inspected the property covered by the mortgage and estimated its value at not to exceed $2,500 may indicate that it attached some significance to the fact that property of so small a value had been accepted as security for a $6,000 indebtedness. The note might have been accepted without any security at all without being open to suspicion. There might be other collateral security. At any rate, there is nothing in the circumstance to suggest that the transaction was in any way invalid or in bad faith between the original parties.

[4] It is very apparent that the original vendors of this real property were victimized in consenting to deferring their purchase money security to this mortgage, but it was in pursuance of a legitimate business arrangement which was only weak in its fulfillment and not in its purpose. The very object of respondents in inserting in their trust deed the recital of the priority of the mortgage was to enable their vendee to so negotiate the security as to obtain money for the proposed improvements. They could easily have safeguarded themselves by including in the recital a statement of the purpose for which the mortgage security was to be used. As it was, they made a record title which was an invitation to any one without actual notice of the facts to deal with this mortgage in good faith as an unlimited and assignable security. It is not necessary to cite further authorities to the rule that "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer," than the enactment of this rule into the Codes. Civ. Code, § 3543.

[5, 6] Even if it be true, as the trial court found, that the plaintiff did not in making his loan personally know of or rely upon the recital in the trust deed, as it was probably justified in finding, although the plaintiff attempted to correct his testimony in this respect, it does not follow that, having entered into the transaction in the belief that he was getting a first mortgage, he might not rely upon the fact as it existed, even though he may have based his faith upon something else.

But, as has already been pointed out, the abstract company which he had employed to search the title knew of and relied upon this recital, and he, as he had a right to do, relied upon the abstract company. Respondents object that the certificate of title was not admitted in evidence. It was used on the trial of the case, and appears in the bill of exceptions as part of the evidence submitted on the trial, and must be considered for all purposes to which it is relevant.

[7, 8] Under our view of the conclusive effect of the evidence in this case it is clear that the respondents were estopped, by the recital permitted by them in the trust deed acknowledging the priority of the $6,000 note and mortgage from now attempting to subordinate such security to their claim.

The law covering this case is very aptly set forth in the decision of this court in National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881, and in the decision of the first District Court of Appeal, Division 1, in Burrows v. Durflinger (Cal. App.) 187 Pac. 752, in which latter case a petition for hearing in this court was denied. The facts under which both of these decisions were made are very closely in point with the case before us. While it is recognized in both of these opinions that the notes in question were nonnegotiable, and open to the defense of a failure of consideration in the hands of assignees, yet it is held that such defense was not available to other lien claimants who had expressly and by matter of record acknowledged the priority of the disputed security over their own. This rule is sufficiently fortified by the provisions of section 1962, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, that—

> "Whenever a party has by his declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

As this question of estoppel arose upon respondents' defense to plaintiff's foreclosure, it was not necessary that it should have been pleaded in the complaint.

We cannot imagine what further precautions plaintiff could have been expected to take in protecting himself from defenses to his security than were resorted to in this case. The response made to the inquiries of the abstract company by the maker of the note and mortgage were such as would estop him from any defense, even if it were shown that the erasure claimed had appeared in his response as originally received. The trustee and beneficiaries under the trust deed had already waived, by the very terms of the instrument on which they rely, any preferential right as against this note and mortgage, and there surely was no occasion to verify this solemn declaration.

[9] The plaintiff here is only claiming under this note and mortgage to the extent of the loan and costs incident thereto which it secures, and his priority of right, of course, only extends to the protection of such claim.

The judgment is reversed.

CUTHBERT et al. v. WOODMAN, Mayor, et al. (L. A. 6359.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑122(2)—Presumption indulged in favor of validity of ordinance.

Every presumption is indulged in favor of the validity of a city ordinance, and it must be very clearly obnoxious to objections made before it will be declared invalid by the courts.

2. Constitutional law 🔑48—Construction of statute adopted which upholds validity.

A court, between two permissible constructions of a statute, will always give the construction which upholds its validity.

3. Statutes 🔑184—Construction adopted which will give effect to legislative purpose.

If there is room for two constructions of a statute, both equally reasonable, the court must, in deference to the legislative act, adopt the construction which will give effect to the obvious legislative purpose.

4. Licenses 🔑7(2)—Ordinance relating to licensing of collection agencies construed.

An ordinance of Los Angeles, imposing license tax as follows: "For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing or carrying on the business of collecting debts, claims or demands and known as a collection agency, $100 per year, payable quarterly"—intended payment of license by all persons and firms engaged in the collection business, and there was no intent to distinguish between persons known as a collection agency and those in the same line of business and not known as a collection agency.

5. Licenses 🔑7(1)—Ordinance held not void for not specifying proportion of license payable each quarter.

A section of a city ordinance of Los Angeles imposing a license tax for every person, firm, or corporation carrying on the business of collecting debts, and known as a collection agency, $100 per year payable quarterly," is not void by reason of its failure to specify what proportion of the $100 per annum shall be payable each quarter, since no intelligent person would question that the quarterly payments called for were equal quarterly payments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by W. R. Cuthbert and others against F. T. Woodman, Mayor of the City of Los Angeles, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and Wm. P. Mealey, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The city of Los Angeles has appealed from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, enjoining the mayor, chief of police, and members of the council of said city from enforcing section 54, and the penalties pertaining thereto, of an ordinance of the city providing for licensing and regulating certain trades, professions, and occupations.

The section in question imposes a license tax as follows:

> "Sec. 54. For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing or carrying on the business of collecting debts, claims or demands and known as a collection agency, $100 per year, payable quarterly."

The judgment of the court is based upon a finding that this section of the ordinance is "unjust, unreasonable, unconstitutional, discriminating and void," for the reason that it singles out for the imposition of the tax those "known as a collection agency," without stating by whom they shall be so known, and that it attempts to distinguish between persons known as a collection agency and those in the same line of business who are not known as a collection agency, and that said ordinance fixes a license tax for engaging in such business, of $100 per annum payable quarterly, without specifying what proportion of said $100 per annum shall be payable each quarter.

In order not to reflect too severely upon the perspicuity of Los Angeles business men, it may be conceded that the section complained of is not as free from ambiguity in its literal and grammatical construction as it might be, but in behalf of the legal acumen of Los Angeles lawmakers, we are constrained to hold that the natural and obvious meaning of the provision is not so obscure as to render it unjust, discriminating, unconstitutional, or void.

[1-3] The matter at issue here is not the construction of a penal indictment or information, but the interpretation of a statute, and the law in such a case indulges every presumption in favor of the validity of the enactment. A municipal ordinance must be very clearly obnoxious to such objections as those made, or some one of them, before it will be declared invalid by the courts. Every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and a court, between two permissible constructions of a statute, will always give the construction which upholds its validity.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

If there is room for two constructions, both equally reasonable, the court must, in deference to the legislative act, adopt the construction which will give effect to the obvious legislative purpose. Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527; Ex parte Anixter, 166 Cal. 762, 138 Pac. 353; Grenada, etc., Supervisors v. Brogden, 112 U. S. 261, 5 Sup. Ct. 125, 28 L. Ed. 704; Golden & Co. v. Justice Court, 23 Cal. App. 788, 140 Pac. 49.

Now it is quite clear that what the city council was attempting to do in framing this section, and the thing they legitimately could do, was to impose a license tax upon persons engaged in the business of conducting a collection agency, as contradistinguished from those who might as an incident of their business casually make collections, as, for instance, lawyers or bankers, who might be subject to taxation under some other classification; and it would be a reflection upon the legislative intelligence of the council to presume that they were attempting to limit the application of this law to persons in the collection agency business, but only to those so engaged who were known either to their intimate friends or to the general public as conducting that line of business.

[4] With these conditions in view, is it not very reasonable and logical to construe this section as though it read: "For every person, firm or corporation managing or carrying on the business known as a collection agency, and consisting of the collection of debts, claims or demands?" There is nothing much more common in the English language than the qualification of some more or less technical or even general name or descriptive term by reference to the common designation by which it is known. The word "known" is used in this connection as synonymous with "called" or "designated." Indeed, in this instance, the words "known as a collection agency" might be rejected as surplusage, as the designation of those subject to the tax as "persons conducting the business of collecting debts, claims and demands" would sufficiently identify the particular class of business intended.

[5] The same rule of construction applies to the part of the ordinance fixing the license rate at $100 per annum "payable quarterly." The requirement as to quarterly payments is indefinite and incomplete as a matter of literal accuracy, but no intelligent person, in view of common usage, would question for a moment that the quarterly payments called for were equal quarterly payments. In any event, it is difficult to see how the complainants could be made to suffer by the ambiguity. If all they are called upon to do is to pay the $100 tax in four separate payments without the proportionate amounts of each payment being fixed, it certainly would be optional with them to divide them up into installments most convenient to them, aggregating $100 per annum.

In re ROSS' ESTATE. (L. A. 6604.)

1. Descent and distribution 🔑14—Separate property of husband descends to his heirs on surviving wife's death.

Separate property of husband, on subsequent death of wife, who inherited such property, descended to husband's surviving brother and to the descendants of husband's deceased brothers and sisters, under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑314(12)—Judgment reversing order directing final distribution held not to preclude filing of new claim.

Supreme Court's judgment reversing order of distribution and remanding the case for hearing on the administrator's petition for final distribution, without directing the manner of distribution, and without prohibiting a claimant from appearing on the new hearing and setting up a claim, did not preclude a claimant who had not filed claim at the previous hearing from filing claim prior to the new hearing.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑314(7)—Claimant failing to object to petition for distribution prior to hearing not absolutely barred.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1668, requiring objections to petition for distribution to be filed at the time fixed for the hearing, or to which the hearing may be postponed, does not absolutely bar the right of a claimant who has failed to file his written objections prior to the actual commencement of a hearing, but merely empowers the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to refuse to allow the filing of such objection after the commencement and during the course of the actual hearing.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑314(12)—Objections to petition for distribution filed prior to new hearing following remand are in time.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1668, providing that any person interested in the estate may appear and contest the petition for decree of distribution "at the time fixed for the hearing or to which the hearing may be postponed" by filing written objections thereto, heirs had a right to file objections to administrator's petition prior to the commencement of the new hearing held pursuant to Supreme Court's judgment remanding the matter, notwithstanding failure to file objections prior to original hearing; the effect of the Supreme Court's judgment being to postpone the hearing.

5. Executors and administrators 🔑314(12)—Laches inapplicable to filing of objections to petition for distribution after remand by appellate court.

Delay in filing objections to petition for final distribution until the order for distribution has been reversed by the Supreme Court and a new hearing ordered did not preclude heirs from asserting their claims at such new hearing; the doctrine of laches being inapplicable in such case.

In the matter of the Estate of Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased. From an order and decree of final distribution, Mary E. Ross and others appeal. Reversed.

J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, and Robert B. Murphy, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by a large number of claimants from an order and decree of final distribution. The petition of these claimants, who alleged a right of inheritance under subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, was stricken from the files by the superior court, and whether or not the court erred in doing this is the only question necessary to be considered on this appeal.

The material facts down to a certain point were stated in the opinion filed July 1, 1919, in Estate of Ross (L. A. 5864) 180 Cal. 643, 182 Pac. 755, as follows:

"On May 9, 1917, this court affirmed the judgment in favor of plaintiff in the action of said Maggie G. Steinberger against said administrator, one Scanlan, and various persons found to be the only heirs of deceased, decreeing that subject to the debts, charges, and expenses of administration of said estate, said Maggie G. Steinberger was entitled to all the property of the estate by virtue of a contract between herself and her stepfather and deceased, under which she was to be the sole heir of deceased. See Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432. After the affirmance of this judgment, viz., on June 23, 1917, the administrator presented his final account, together with his petition for final distribution of the estate, as is authorized by the law. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1634, 1665; Estate of Sheid, 122 Cal. 528, 531, 55 Pac. 328. The estate proceeding had then been pending for over seven years, and the estate was in condition for final settlement and distribution. By the petition distribution was sought in favor of said Maggie G. Steinberger, according to the judgment in Steinberger v. Young, supra, all of the next of kin of deceased, alleged to constitute her only heirs, having been parties defendant in that action and their rights as heirs at law being barred by the judgment therein. Notice of the time fixed for settlement of the account and hearing of the petition for distribution was duly given. When the matter came on for hearing the only appearance in opposition was that of Maggie G. Steinberger, who, claiming to be entitled to all of the distributable assets, as alleged by the administrator, objected to various items of his account. The matter was heard by the court, evidence being received both as to the account and as to the petition for distribution; the evidence on distribution being to the effect that the only heirs at law were the next of kin of deceased who were parties defendant in Steinberger v. Young, supra. On February 18, 1918, the court made an order settling the final account, allowing certain credits which had been objected to by Maggie Steinberger.

"Two days later, February 20, 1918, one Scanlan appeared, opposing distribution pending payment to him of a claim of $8,000, alleged to be due under a compromise with the administrator, approved by the probate court, and seeking payment of this claim. A hearing was had on this and on March 15, 1918, an order was made overruling Scanlan's opposition and denying his petition. On the same day Maggie Steinberger appealed from the portions of the order of settlement of the account disallowing her objections to certain specified items thereof. The hearing on the petition for distribution having been regularly continued from time to time and finally to March 16, 1918, and there being apparently no further bar to final distribution to Maggie Steinberger, except possibly her own appeal from portions of the order settling the administrator's final account, a new claimant made her first appearance on the field of action, viz., Mary E. Ross, the surviving widow of one Albert E. Ross, deceased, who was alleged to have been a brother of R. E. Ross, the deceased husband of deceased, and to have survived such deceased husband of deceased. On March 16, 1918, more than eight years after the institution of the proceeding for the settlement of the estate of deceased, and nearly nine months after the filing of the final account and petition for distribution, and after the hearing on such settlement and petition for distribution was practically completed, she appeared at the hearing on distribution, and opposing distribution to Maggie G. Steinberger, instituted the proceeding provided for by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by filing a petition praying the court to ascertain and declare in the manner provided by that section the rights of all persons to the estate and all interests therein, and to whom distribution should be made. The theory of her claim to heirship was substantially that all of the property of deceased was the same property, 'or the proceeds or avails thereof,' which she, the deceased, had received under a decree of final distribution made in the year 1885 in the matter of the estate of her deceased husband, R. E. Ross; that all property received by her under such decree was separate property of said R. E. Ross at the time of his death; that deceased having died intestate, leaving no issue, the property of deceased should go to next of kin of her deceased husband, R. E. Ross, who also left no issue, as provided in subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code; that claimant Mary E. Ross, the surviving wife of Albert E. Ross, who was a surviving brother of R. E. Ross, and various other unnamed persons who were heirs at law of R. E. Ross, none of whom has appeared herein, were entitled to share in this estate as heirs, by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 1386. Neither said Mary E. Ross nor any of the next of kin of the deceased husband of deceased, R. E. Ross, if any there were surviving, were parties to the action of Steinberger v. Young, and it is conceded that their rights, if any they had, were not concluded by the judgment in such action.

"Upon the filing of this petition, the hearing on final distribution was continued to April 2, 1918, at which time Maggie G. Steinberger made a motion for an order dismissing the petition of Mary E. Ross, or such other order as might be proper, on the ground substantially that the estate was then in condition for distribution and would be unreasonably and unnecessarily delayed if deferred pending the proceeding provided by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the question of the heirship of Mary E. Ross and all other persons should be heard and determined on the hearing on the pending petition for distribution. The court having heard the motion, made an order on May 24, 1918, denying the motion to dismiss the petition of Mary E. Ross, and also denying the petition for final distribution, without prejudice, however, to the rights of Maggie G. Steinberger. This is the order appealed from by the latter. At the same time the court made an order on the petition of Mary E. Ross directing the notice required by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the meantime, viz., on May 3, 1918, Robert E. R. Scanlan had taken an appeal from the order denying his claim. This is the appeal entitled Estate of Ross, post, p. 651, 182 Pac. 752; the order appealed from being affirmed. It may also be noted that the appeal of Maggie G. Steinberger from parts of the order settling the account was decided December 5, 1918 (Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 359, 182 Pac. 303, 56 Cal. Dec. 521), and that all questions in regard to such account are now finally settled."

In that opinion it was further shown that the petition of Mary E. Ross stated no right of inheritance in her, under subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, she being simply the widow of a deceased brother of the deceased spouse of Elizabeth B. Ross, and therefore not within the terms of said subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code. Nor was any sufficient showing made as to the rights of the unnamed claimants, who, she alleged, were also entitled to inherit under said subdivision.

Upon that appeal, the order was reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with the views expressed in the opinion.

Immediately upon the going down of the remittitur on that appeal, there was filed, without leave of court, a document styled "Answer and objections to petition of Milton K. Young, as administrator for decedent," on behalf of said Mary E. Ross, not as widow of Albert E. Ross, a deceased brother of the deceased spouse of Elizabeth B. Ross (her former position), but as assignee of two children of said deceased brother; and also on behalf of a brother of said R. E. Ross, the deceased spouse, and various children of deceased brothers and sisters of said R. E. Ross. These persons were alleged to be the heirs of the deceased Elizabeth B. Ross under subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, on the theory that all of her property was the separate property of her deceased spouse at the time of his death, and came to her from him under the decree of distribution in his estate. The allegation of facts in this behalf was as follows:

> "That these contestants are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief so state and represent to the court, that all the property, both real and personal, which comprised the estate of said R. E. Ross, deceased, and which was distributed under and by said decree of final distribution of his estate, as aforesaid, was his separate property, and that all the property, both real and personal, which was distributed to said Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased, as the surviving widow of said R. E. Ross, deceased, under said decree of final distribution of his estate, was likewise the separate property of said R. E. Ross, deceased, and that all the property, both real and personal, which now comprises and is designated and described in said petition of said administrator as the estate of the above-named Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased, was and is the same property, or the proceeds or avails thereof, which was distributed to said Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased, as the surviving widow of said R. E. Ross, deceased, and received by her under and by said decree of final distribution of his estate."

[1] If the facts were as alleged herein, all of the property of the estate of Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased, was succeeded to under subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, by the surviving brother of said R. E. Ross and the descendants of his deceased brothers and sisters.

Motion was thereupon made in behalf of Maggie G. Steinberger that the document so filed be stricken from the files on the grounds that the same was not filed within the time prescribed by section 1668, Code of Civil Procedure, nor within the time allowed by law for the appearance of persons claiming to be heirs or entitled to distribution; that the document was filed more than 24 months after the time fixed for the hearing on the administrator's petition for distribution and more than 14 months after the time to which hearing was last postponed and the hearing completed; that the document was filed without any leave of court; and that the filing and permitting the same to remain on file is not in conformity with and is inconsistent with the judgment of the Supreme Court, rendered on the appeal in Estate of Ross (L. A. 5864) supra. The motion was argued and submitted to the court upon the affidavit of one of the attorneys as to the prior proceedings in the matter, the records and files in the matter of the estate of deceased, and the decision of this court on the appeal in the matter of the estate. The motion was thereupon granted, and distribution ordered to Maggie G. Steinberger.

[2] We see no force in the claim that consideration of the objections to distribution to Maggie G. Steinberger filed on behalf of Mary E. Ross et al. would have been inconsistent with the judgment of this court rendered on the appeal in Estate of Ross (L. A. 5864) supra, or with the views expressed in the opinion filed in rendering such judgment. In that matter the lower court had denied the administrator's petition for distribution because of the initiation by Mrs. Ross of the proceeding provided by section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, for the determination of heirship, and was about to go ahead with the heirship proceeding. We held that under the circumstances the superior court should not have entertained the petition of Mrs. Ross as one under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the utmost effect to be given to it was to treat it as a claim to be determined in the pending proceeding for distribution; and, further, that the trial court erred in terminating the pending proceeding for distribution by denying the application of the administrator for distribution. We therefore reversed the order and remanded the matter for proceedings not inconsistent with our expression of views. There was no direction as to the manner of distribution or that the same must be determined on the issues theretofore made or the evidence theretofore received. The effect of this was to send the matter back for hearing on the administrator's petition for final distribution, which, naturally, would have to be from the very beginning and regardless of the evidence that had been introduced on the former hearing. That hearing had been concluded and an improper order made therein, which was reversed, and in substance and effect a new hearing ordered. The opinion contains nothing precluding any possible claimant on distribution from appearing on the new hearing and setting up his or her claims. Whether or not upon the record then before us we might properly have ordered the lower court to make distribution to Maggie G. Steinberger upon the evidence adduced on the former hearing, we did not do so.

[3, 4] As to the claim that Mrs. Ross' objections and petition were not filed within the time prescribed by section 1668, Code of Civil Procedure, nor within the time allowed by law for the appearance of persons claiming to be heirs or entitled to distribution, the only provision of statute which can be claimed to bear on the matter of limiting the time for such appearance is one contained in section 1668, Code of Civil Procedure. That section, after providing that the decree of distribution may be made on the petition of the executor or administrator or any person interested in the estate, that when such a petition is filed the clerk must set the same for hearing and give notice by posting, and that on the hearing the judge may order further notice to be given, provides:

> "At the time fixed for the hearing, or to which the hearing may be postponed, any person interested in the estate may appear and contest the petition by filing written objections thereto."

This sentence was incorporated in the section by amendment in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 993), there being prior to this time no express statutory provision for written objections or the time of filing thereof, and it is claimed that thereby the time within which written objections to a petition for final distribution may be filed is definitely prescribed, and that unless presented within such time they must be ignored. It is further urged that the language used requires the filing to be before the actual commencement of the hearing. We are of the opinion that the provision is not to be construed as absolutely barring the right of a claimant to be heard on written objections if he fails to file the same prior to the actual commencement of a hearing on a petition for distribution. It is to be observed that there is no provision for the entry of a default of all not appearing, as in the proceeding under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, to determine heirship, and no express provision which may fairly be construed as effectuating a forfeiture or barring of the claim of one whose claim has not been presented prior to the actual commencement of the hearing on such a petition. The plain object of the amendment was to provide a statutory method by which issues as to conflicting claims of right on distribution might be made, and, of course, in the nature of things the issues should be made prior to the actual commencement of the hearing. But there is nothing in the statute to preclude the trial court from allowing such objections to be filed at any time during the course of the hearing when it is made to appear that the proper protection of the rights of apparently bona fide claimants so demand. It seems to us that the utmost effect that can be given to the provision in line with respondent's contention is that the trial court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, refuse to allow the filing of such objection, or the remaining of the same on file, when attempted to be filed after the commencement and during the course of the actual hearing. What would constitute an abuse of this discretion we are not called upon here to consider, for we think the objections were filed within the time prescribed by the statute, i. e., prior to the time to which "the hearing" was postponed. Satisfied as we are that the provision as to time was simply in the interest of an orderly procedure to enable the issues to be tried on the hearing to be clearly defined when the hearing commences, and not in the nature of a statute of limitations, the fact that there was a partial hearing on the administrator's petition before the objections were filed is immaterial under the circumstances of this case. That hearing was ineffective for any purpose, in so far as distribution was concerned; the trial court concluding that in view of the initiation of a proceeding to determine heirship under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, the distribution proceeding could not be further heard, and therefore denying the administrator's petition and terminating the proceeding. If this order had been affirmed, undoubtedly the statute could not be held to bar these claimants from appearing upon any subsequent petition for distribution that might be filed. The effect of our reversal of this action of the trial court was to require a new hearing to be had upon that petition, just as though no hearing had been had, and prior to the commencement of such hearing the objections were filed. In the meantime the hearing upon the administrator's petition had been as effectually postponed as it would have been under an express order of postponement. We are satisfied that in so far as the statutory provision invoked is concerned, a reasonable construction requires us to hold that the objections filed prior to the commencement of the hearing ordered by this court were filed in time.

From what we have said it follows that the objection that the objections were filed without leave of court is without force. No such permission was essential.

In the formal decree of distribution made after the making of the order striking out the answer and objections the lower court in its recitals stated that "said answer and objections was not filed within the time allowed by law, and that said contestants are guilty of laches in failing so to do," although laches was not one of the grounds upon which the motion to strike was based. It is urged that we have here a finding of laches on the part of the appellants in presenting their claim, and that this finding is sufficiently sustained by the proofs and sufficiently justifies the action of the court in refusing to give them a hearing. As we have noted, this recital was inserted in the formal decree after the order granting the motions to strike had been made. The laches found is declared to be in failing to file the answer and objections "within the time allowed by law." Certainly no other laches was found by the trial court, and in view of our conclusion that they were filed within the time allowed by law, the finding of laches furnishes no support to the decree of distribution.

[5] But, regardless of this, we see no foundation in the facts for a conclusion that appellants were guilty of laches in presenting their claims for adjudication. As we have seen, the answer and objections were filed by appellants within the time allowed by law, and alleged matters which, if true, made them the successors of the deceased as to all the property at the moment of the death of the deceased. It is conceded that they are not bound by the decree in the action brought by Maggie G. Steinberger against the administrator and the relatives of deceased under which she claims to be entitled to have distributed to her all the property of the estate. If their allegations be true they are the sole "heirs" of deceased, in view of the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code. On the other hand, respondent claims to be entitled to have all the property distributed to her on the theory that the next of kin of deceased against whom she recovered judgment in her action in equity constituted all of the legal heirs of deceased and succeeded to the property at her death. We thus have a contest, on distribution, as to who are the heirs of deceased with relation to the property left by her, under our statutes of succession, and the claims as to the respective rights were presented and filed within the time allowed by law, for determination by the court in the proceeding provided by statute for that very purpose. We do not see how the equitable doctrine of laches can have any application under such circumstances. A proceeding on distribution is not in the nature of a suit between party and party in which one seeks to recover something alleged to be withheld by another, but is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, provided for the purpose of judicially decreeing the succession to the property of a deceased person. A procedure is provided under which any person claiming a right of succession may appear and present his claim of succession, and upon the hearing the court must determine in whom the property of the deceased has vested. The claimants in such a proceeding occupy no such relation one to the other as may fairly be held to impose upon one in favor of another any obligation of diligence in the matter of presenting his claim. All claimants are upon an equal footing in this regard, required only to present their claims at the time and in the manner required by law. We are speaking, of course, of cases of mere delay, and without regard to a possible situation in which it might be held that one was estopped to urge his claim as against another. The doctrine of laches has been held applicable in certain proceedings in probate in this state, but always, so far as we have found, where the proceeding was in its nature one against parties, and where it might fairly be held that the obligation rested on the claimant in favor of such parties to diligently assert his claim. On principle we see no room for its application in any other case. The cases in this state, such as Estate of Crosby, 55 Cal. 574, 586, hold it applicable in proceedings for the sale of real property of a decedent for the payment of debts of the deceased, and this conclusion is reached upon the theory, as stated in Estate of Hume, 179 Cal. 341, 176 Pac. 681, 682, that—

> "An application to sell real estate of a decedent is a proceeding against the heirs in whom the property vested at the death of the ancestor."

See, also, Estate of Freud, 131 Cal. 673, 63 Pac. 1080, 82 Am. St. Rep. 407.

Much as we deplore the protracted and varied litigation in the matter of this estate, we see no good answer to the contention that the appellants were entitled to have their claims of heirship considered on the hearing of the petition for distribution.

The order and decree appealed from is reversed.

VAN CALBERGH v. EASTON et al.

Adverse possession ⚷57—Evidence held insufficient to prove continuous possession for five years preceding action.

In action to quiet title in which plaintiff claimed to have acquired title by adverse possession, evidence held to warrant assumption by Supreme Court on plaintiff's appeal from judgment for defendants that trial court found that plaintiff did not continually use, improve, or cultivate the land during the five years preceding the commencement of the action.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by E. Van Calbergh against Alice A. Easton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Prescott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles Lantz, Howard F. Shepherd, and Samuel M. Garroway, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff brought this action against Alice A. Easton, and several others under fictitious names, to quiet title to lot 22 in block 3 of the subdivision of the south half of lot 5 in block F of Hancock's survey in the city of Los Angeles.

It was alleged that for five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action plaintiff has been the owner, in possession, and has paid the taxes on the property, that defendants claim and assert interests adverse to plaintiff, and that they are without any right whatever, "and that the said defendants have not * * * any estate, right, title or interest * * * in said land." The defendants—Alice A. Easton, appearing by J. M. Moyer, her successor in interest, and said J. M. Moyer, one of those sued under a fictitious name—for answer, and by way of cross-complaint deny that plaintiff is the owner or that he "has been in possession of said property, accompanied by payment of taxes thereon for any period of five years, admit that * * * J. M. Moyer claims an estate and interest in said property adversely to the plaintiff," and allege that J. M. Moyer is the owner in fee simple of said lot of land, and that neither the plaintiff nor the said other defendants own any estate or interest whatever therein. The allegations of the cross-complaint were denied.

In support of his claim of title to lot 22 plaintiff offered and there were received in evidence certain deeds and tax receipts for the years 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1911, and produced a number of witnesses. Among the deeds admitted in evidence was one from W. B. Judson and others to one C. D. Warden, dated and recorded September 30, 1907; a quitclaim deed from C. D. Warden to A. Lunnim, dated November 1, 1907, and recorded November 19, 1907; and a deed from C. D. Warden and his wife to the plaintiff, dated November 6, 1907, which was recorded on April 27, 1908. On November 25, 1907, the Southern California Title & Abstract Company, of which C. D. Warden was manager, issued to plaintiff a certificate of title to lot 22.

It was stipulated that on April 22, 1889, the fee simple to lot 22 vested in Alice A. Easton. It was shown that on December 30, 1909, W. J. Davis conveyed the property to J. M. Moyer, the deed being recorded May 20, 1911. The wife of the grantor joined in the deed. A decree quieting J. M. Moyer's title as against Alice A. Easton and others was entered on July 8, 1910.

J. M. Moyer produced certain tax receipts, which were admitted in evidence, showing payments made by W. J. Davis on January 27, 1908, and April 27, 1908, and for the second installment of the year 1911, paid by J. M. Moyer on February 7, 1912.

The cause was tried by the court, a jury having been waived. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law. It was found that J. M. Moyer, as successor in interest of Alice A. Easton, was the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of the lot, and that "plaintiff has no estate, right, title, or interest in or lien upon the property or any portion of said property." The court made and entered a decree accordingly. A motion for a new trial was interposed and denied. The plaintiff appeals.

The court made no findings on the deed from C. D. Warden to plaintiff, and the latter makes no point on this, nor does he assert on appeal that he has title to lot 22 by virtue of such conveyance. He does, however, claim that he has acquired title to such property by adverse possession.

This is the second trial of the action. On the former trial judgment went for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed to the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, and the judgment was reversed on the grounds that plaintiff had failed to prove possession for the time required to establish title by prescription, and that he had failed to prove payment of all the taxes levied and assessed against the property during the period in which he claimed to have held possession thereof. A petition for hearing was filed in this court and denied, without, however, "approving the portion of the opinion relative to the matter of the payment of the second installment of taxes for the year 1911." Van Calbergh v. Easton, 32 Cal. App. 796, 800, 164 Pac. 1113, 1115.

The plaintiff claims that continuously for five years next preceding the filing of the complaint he had occupied and used the property, and that he "has proved an undisputed adverse possession and payment of all taxes for five years." No specific finding was made as to when plaintiff first entered upon lot 22, and we shall first consider whether it is to be implied the court found plaintiff was not in possession of the lot for five years next preceding the bringing of the action.

The complaint was filed on November 12, 1912. Plaintiff testified:

> That he went to the abstract company, met Warden there, and purchased lot 22 from him, having been told by a stranger that Warden was the owner thereof. "He told me he had the lot for sale. I paid Mr. Warden for the deed in cash money. I did not draw it from the bank. I had it on hand at the time. I did not keep any account or records of business transactions at that time. Q. Have you any record of when the fund came into your hands, or when you paid it out? A. No; nothing like that. Q. How long after you paid the money to Mr. Warden did you get the deed? A. I think I got it right after. Q. What do you mean right after? A. I don't quite recollect if it was the next day; I think it was the next day. Q. Did you get the certificate or abstract of title with the deed? A. No, sir. * * * I received the deed * * * about November; it must have been about the 6th or 7th, 1907, that I received it."

On the former trial, plaintiff stated that he received the deed in the "latter part of November." We quote from the decision on the former appeal:

> "The deed from Warden to the plaintiff was introduced in evidence. It bore date of November 6, 1907, but the plaintiff testified he did not receive the deed until the latter part of November, 1907. By that testimony we take it to mean that the transaction was completed, and the deed delivered in the latter part of 1907. Plaintiff testified that he immediately took possession of the lot after receiving the deed, built a fence around it, and had used it continuously up to the date of the trial which occurred in March, 1914."

When plaintiff's attention was called to the variance in his testimony as to when he received the deed, he made several indefinite statements, but finally said it was delivered on the date it bears. When asked why he was so positive after a lapse of 4 or 5 years between the trials, and more than 10 years after the transaction, he replied he did not refresh his "memory at that time in court when I happened to say that."

It also appeared that plaintiff bought lot 22 and paid the purchase price without any examination of title; that he did not get a certificate thereof until November 25th, 19 days after he claimed he received the deed and took possession, and that the conveyance was not recorded until April 27th of the following year. There is nothing in the testimony of the other witnesses for plaintiff to indicate that any of them had any knowledge as to when he first took possession of the land, and, in view of the variant statements of plaintiff himself before he finally declared he made the entry on November 6th, we think it clear the court found he did not assume possession before "the latter part of November"—the time fixed by him on the former trial—or at least not prior to November 12th.

It was said in Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 77, 31 Pac. 742, 744 (22 L. R. A. 257):

> "The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon, and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment. The trial court in this case had before it the opinion of this court on the former appeal, and must be deemed to have made its findings of fact from the evidence before it in the light of what was then held to be essential to a recovery by the plaintiffs."

See, also, Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 512, 42 Pac. 986, and Perkins v. West Coast Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 427, 62 Pac. 57.

And in the absence of a finding to the contrary it must be assumed the court found plaintiff did not inclose, improve, or cultivate lot 22 for the period of five years next succeeding November 12, 1907. He testified that he first saw the lot when he went into that neighborhood in June, 1905. At that time he bought lot 21 adjoining lot 22 on the east. He built a house on lot 21 in 1906 and has been living there with his wife and some relatives of hers ever since. It is also suggested in plaintiff's brief that he acquired lot 20 to the east of lots 21 and 22, but when he did so does not appear. He also testified:

> That after receiving the deed he, with the aid of his brother-in-law and one of the help, leveled up some knolls and filled in some holes on the lot, and cut off some heavy brush. "I began to do that from the 6th of November." He used to stake out his horses on the lot. Besides leveling off the lot he made some chicken coops and raised vegetables for the kitchen. He continued using the lot for chickens right along; "I should judge five years." After he entered upon the lot he constructed a fence; "I guess it must have been six or seven or eight months—something like that."

George W. Barr testified:

> That he had lived in the same neighborhood as plaintiff since 1909; that the lots on each side of plaintiff's house had been inclosed all of the time he had lived in the neighborhood; that plaintiff has been using the lot for pasturing his horse and chickens; that he had no house on lot 22. "He has kept poultry there since disposing of his horse. There is no chicken house on that lot. The chickens just ranged over it. There was no wire fence that I know of. I believe there was nothing to keep the chickens on that particular lot."

Mrs. C. F. Stein testified:

> "I have known plaintiff since 1909, since we moved over there. * * * He has a vacant lot on each side of his residence. The home place of Mr. Calbergh, where he lives, is occupied by a house and inclosed by a fence. The lot west of that between his house and the river, as far as I remember it, has been inclosed on the side and the back."

She also testified that horses were pastured on the lot.

Mrs. M. Bretz testified:

> That she was living in the neighborhood with her family when plaintiff first came there. "We built first, and he came about two years afterwards. That would be in 1906 is my recollection. I know he has made use of the lots on east side of him. He had horses and chickens, and he built a fence around on each side. * * * He has had an inclosure on the lot to the west. * * * He had a wooden fence around the lot on the west side. That fence was put in about two years after he moved into his own house, nearly as I can remember. * * * He had his horses and chickens there on the west side of his house."

John A. W. Sterlzriede testified he had known the plaintiff about 11 years, and that the plaintiff occupied and made use of and has had horses on lot 22. This witness, like the others, was not definite as to when the plaintiff first entered on lot 22.

It appears then that, while these witnesses testified to a partial enclosure of lot 22, and that plaintiff had possession and improved, used, and cultivated the land at specified times during the statutory period of five years, no one of them testified, nor is there in the entire testimony considered together any foundation for an inference, that before November 12, 1907, he took possession and for five years thereafter continuously used, improved or cultivated lot 22. The determination of this issue, therefore, must rest alone on the testimony of plaintiff himself that he began work on lot 22 on "November 6, 1907," and in the face of what we had said as to when he first entered upon the property it must be held that the court resolved such testimony against him.

Having disposed of plaintiff's contentions as to the first two elements of his asserted adverse possession, it becomes unnecessary to consider the remaining question whether the taxes were paid by plaintiff for five years next preceding the commencement of the action, or to pass upon the assignments of error in rulings on evidence.

The defendants moved to dismiss the appeal, but as we have reached the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed on the merits, it is not necessary to consider the motion.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: SHAW, J.

OLNEY, J. I concur in the conclusion reached by Justice LAWLOR for the following reasons:

It was conceded at the trial that the defendant was the owner of the record title and the plaintiff's claim was solely one of title by adverse possession. The action was commenced November 12, 1912, but the defendant was not made a party by name nor was summons served upon her so far as appears. So far as appears, she did not become a party until July 25, 1913, when she voluntarily made herself one by filing a so-called answer and cross-complaint. I am not at all certain but that under these circumstances the action was not commenced, so far as the defendant is concerned, until the later date, so that the plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment against her if he had shown adverse possession for the five years preceding that date, even if he failed to show it for the five years preceding the earlier date of the original commencement of the action.

But the finding of the court was a general one against the plaintiff, and implies a finding against the character of the plaintiff's possession as sufficient to give a title by prescription, even if maintained for the statutory period. Even if we assume, therefore, that the plaintiff could depend upon a possession commencing five years before the defendant's appearance in the action, that is, a possession which commenced on or before July 25, 1908, instead of upon one commencing on or before November 12, 1907, the finding cannot be overturned unless the evidence shows unmistakably a possession by the plaintiff after July 25, 1908, of such a character as would ripen into a title by prescription. While perhaps it may be that the evidence was sufficient to have sustained a finding that plaintiff's possession was of that character, yet it did not, I think, show that fact so unmistakably as to preclude a contrary conclusion. This being the situation, the finding of the trial court is final.

1. Brokers 🔑31—If broker for seller purchased for himself, no contract of sale resulted.

If the purchaser of a ranch was not acting as the agent for the seller to effect a sale to his uncle, but in his own behalf, there was no meeting of minds, the seller believing to the contrary, and hence no contract of sale.

2. Brokers 🔑31—That broker directed deeds to be executed to himself not notice validating purchase by him.

The mere circumstance that an agent to sell a ranch directed deeds to be executed to himself and wife, and that the seller acquiesced therein, was not such full notice to the seller of the circumstance that the agent was to buy for himself as would validate such purchase.

3. Specific performance 🔑17—Agent to sell not entitled to enforce contract for self.

An agent to sell a ranch who effected sale for the owner was entitled to the agreed commission, but not entitled to enforce the contract of sale in his own behalf.

4. Specific performance 🔑117—Evidence held to amount to variance.

Where the agent to sell land suing for specific performance of the contract effected by him alleged that the contract of sale was between himself and two sellers, defendants, he did not sustain such allegation by proving the contract was between one of such sellers and plaintiff's uncle, or between such seller and plaintiff agent.

5. Specific performance 🔑97(1) — Buyer in default who failed to pay price or secure release of deposit from lien of execution cannot prosecute action.

Where the buyer of land defaulted because of failure to comply with the sellers' demand either for the purchase money due or for the return of the deeds, and no subsequent tender was made by the buyer, who also failed to release the purchase money from lien of an execution, he cannot prosecute action for specific performance.

6. Pleading 🔑8(3)—Allegation of buyer's complaint that contract was just and reasonable insufficient without facts.

In an action for specific performance of contract to sell and convey land under Civ. Code, § 3391, the facts showing the contract was just and reasonable should have been alleged in the buyer's complaint; mere allegation that the contract was just and reasonable being insufficient.

7. Appeal and error 🔑799—Admissions of respondent's attorney as to service of notice sufficient to sustain appeal on motion to dismiss.

Admissions by respondent's attorney in a letter to appellants' attorney before time for appeal had expired that notice of appeal had been served on him by appellants are evidence the appeal was properly taken and sufficient to sustain it on motion to dismiss.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Frank M. Salisbury against Edwin Yawger and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Allen E. Rogers, Ward, Ward & Ward, and R. C. Springer, all of San Diego, for appellants.

R. D. McPherrin and McPherrin & Nichols, all of Imperial, and Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff brought this action to obtain the specific performance of a contract for the sale of 160 acres of land, 80 acres of which stands of record in the name of Edwin Yawger and 80 acres in the name of Altie S. Yawger, the defendants and appellants, and to compel the delivery of deeds, mortgages, and stock certificates held in escrow by the defendant Southern Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego. The record on appeal is prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. For sake of brevity Edwin Yawger will be referred to as the "appellant" and the Southern Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego as the "trust company" or the "escrow holder."

On October 19, 1914, appellant signed a written contract of employment wherein he appointed respondent, doing business under the name of the Salisbury Realty Company, as sole agent for 60 days from date for the sale of the 160 acres above referred to and agreed to pay a regular commission of 5 per cent. on the price. The terms of payment therein stated were $1,000 cash, balance $5,500 in five years, and $5,500 in eight years, at 7 per cent. interest, payable semiannually; possession to be given July, 1915. December 2, 1914, the respondent mailed to appellant a check for $50 deposit on the 160 acres, stating that—

> "The $450 is ready for you as soon as your final certificate comes, at which time we will close the deal and draw up the notes, mortgage, and transfer the water stock, etc. The balance of the $1,000 we will fix up the first of March if that is satisfactory with you * * * regarding possession of the ranch we can talk that over at some future date."

On December 5, 1914, appellant wrote two letters to the respondent, in the first of which he states:

> "I am inclosing herewith my formal acceptance of your deposit. I have only the preliminary receipts from the land office. * * * The numbers of these entries are Altie S. Yawger 018689—Edwin Yawger 01126 (E Y's former number 0778). I will be glad to learn more of the particulars of the sale. * * * Hoping to hear from you further and congratulating you on your success, I am, etc."

The formal acceptance above referred to is, in part, as follows:

> "Your favor of the 2d inst. inclosing check for $50.00 is at hand. I am accepting this deposit on the understanding that you have contracted for the sale of the described property for not less than $12,000.00, $500 to be paid on execution of the transfer, $500 to be paid on March 1, 1915, $5,500 to be paid in not less than five years after date of transfer, $5,500 to be paid in not less than eight years after date of transfer. Interest on deferred payments to be paid semiannually at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. While I cannot at this writing, guarantee the date of purchasers possession earlier than July 1, 1915, I will use my good offices in meeting his desires in this particular."

In view of the contention of the appellant that the relation between appellant and respondent at all times was that of agent and principal, it will be observed that up to this point in the correspondence the appellant is apparently accepting a proposal made to his agent, the plaintiff. In the reply of December 14th the respondent restates the terms of sale in accordance with the letter of appellant, and discloses the fact that respondent's uncle in Oklahoma was the purchaser of the ranch. The language is a follows:

> "Among others who I put the proposition up to in the past month or so, I wrote to my uncle in Oklahoma, who I have been trying to get interested in the valley for several years. I gave him full particulars and told him he had better buy a ranch before he arrived here. If he didn't feel like handling it all I told him I would go in with him on it. He has a large income every month and I have been trying to get him to invest part of it here. A few days before I wrote you I received a letter from him to go ahead on it. * * * I will probably hear further from my uncle in a few days regarding his ideas of handling the place."

It will be observed that this is the first intimation in the correspondence that the agent might become or was interested in the proposition. And the extent of this information is that he had informed his uncle that he would go in with him on it if the uncle did not feel like handling the whole thing. There is no statement, however, that the uncle was unable or unwilling to carry out the contract which the nephew was executing on his behalf. The next letter is January 15, 1915, in which respondent notifies appellant as follows:

> "Have had a couple of telegrams from my uncle and he will be unable to reach here before the last of the month, so I will not keep you waiting on his arrival. Shall I make the notes and mortgage here, or will you have them drawn up and sent over to be signed? * * * If you want to draw them up there make them read Frank M. Salisbury and Mary E. Salisbury, and send them over and we will get the deal closed up."

On January 21st appellant notified respondent that the letter had been mislaid and requesting for a copy. In reply the respondent notified the appellant as follows:

> "You can make the papers out to Frank M. and Mary E. Salisbury. If you will have the Mtg. & notes made out the way you want them & send them over we will send them with the money to the Southern Trust & Savings Bank. The deed you can turn into the bank there. We can close it up at any time. If you would rather wait until my uncle gets here and see if he will make a larger cash payment it will be all right with me. Has the water stock been transferred yet?"

It will be observed that this proposition, in the light of the former correspondence, amounted to the proposal of an arrangement by which the respondent would take the title in himself and his wife for and on behalf of the uncle, hence the proposal that if the appellant desired he could wait until the uncle gets here. On January 29th the appellant wrote the respondent that he had placed in escrow with the trust company the deeds, water stock, notes, and mortgages, and stated, among other things as follows:

> "I understand the customary commission in this state is 5 per cent. on the first $5,000 and 2½ per cent on the balance. This would figure $400. * * * As it is now nearing the 1st of March I think it would simplify matters if you would complete the 1st payment of $1,000 between now and Mar. 1st at which time the bank would turn over to you the deeds, the water stock, the title guarantee and the note for $400 without interest. Receiving from you the notes, the mortgage and your check for $950.-00."

This proposition of the appellant was, in effect, to allow a commission of $400, which was to be paid by surrendering the note of the respondent for $400, which, apparently, had resulted from some previous dealings between the parties. On February 1st appellant wrote respondent stating that the stock should be handled a little differently, owing to the small amount of the first payment.

> "We will assign the stock to you and instruct the bank to hold the same in escrow in your name until payment is made on the first note [$5,000] when the stock is to be delivered to you or your assign."

It will be observed that this proposal called upon the respondent to wait five years before he received possession of the stock certificates. On February 9, 1915, appellant writes respondent that he wishes to know "whether we are in agreement on the details of the transfer of the No. 5 highline property," and asks:

> "Can you not write me at once giving me your decision on the points outlined in my letters of Jan. 29 and Feb. 1?"

On February 12th a letter was written on behalf of the respondent by Elta B. Turbett containing the following statement:

> "The way he understood the deal was $12,000 for the ranch. The regular commission for selling land in Imperial Valley is 5 per cent. straight, and the contract you signed on it you agreed to pay 5 per cent. That would make $600 commission or a balance due on the first payment of $350.00. But Mr. Salisbury thought you would probably want a little more cash, as the first payment was small, so made the proposition to pay $500 cash and then deduct the $100 balance of commission when the horse note was paid."

It will be observed that this answer does not meet the proposal of the appellant, who is asking for $950 cash by March 1st. The counter proposal is to pay $500 cash and no more, the $600 commission taking care of the other $500 and extra $100 thus paid by plaintiff was to be deducted from the "horse note," which, apparently, was the $400 note. On February 25th respondent sent the trust company notes and mortgages executed by himself and wife for $11,000 and a check for $450 "balance of first payment on said land," with instructions to turn over the mortgages on the receipt from him of a "deed to me for said property, also a certificate for 150 shares of Imperial Water Company No. 5 stock either made out in my name or endorsed to me." On February 27th appellant sent a second letter to the trust company, stating that notes and mortgages were inclosed, and adding, "If there is anything else necessary on my part to close the deal, please let me know." On March 5th appellant wrote respondent, stating that he did not understand how he intended to handle the settlement of "our account."

> "When you forwarded $450 as first payment I supposed you would pay the note in the regular way, leaving a balance of $500 as your commission. I did not remember the wording of the commission clause in my original agreement with you, but supposed it would be in line with the rates charged in San Diego. However, if the agreement calls for 5 per cent. on the whole amount I will stand by it and you can either pay the note in full ($410) and I will hand you back check for $100, or you can have the note returned to the Southern Trust & Savings Bank together with your check for $310 and I will surrender the note along with the other papers. I understand that it is usual to surrender the water stock when same is used for collateral, and have a proper notation on same made by the water company."

It appears from this proposition that the appellant was willing to accept a cash payment of $500, to concede a commission of $600, and to accept $310 in payment for a $410 note heretofore referred to, and expected to retain the certificates of stock as pledgee. The letter of appellant the next day urged respondent to complete the deal, and added, "I think as my agent you had better get 'Mr. Salisbury' to come across." On March 9th appellant again wrote respondent:

> "I regret that you did not grant me the courtesy of notifying me beforehand of your intentions in regard to the payment of your note. I gather from your letter and from your telephone conversation that part of your hesitation is due to alleged defects in the horses, and on this assumption I feel warranted in taking whatever measures are in my power for my protection."

On March 26, 1915, appellant notified the trust company that they had possession of the two deeds in question; that "150 shares of water stock is in the hands of 'Imperial Title Guaranty and Bonded Abstract Company,' which they will have transferred to Mr. Salisbury with myself as pledgee, as soon as the March 10, 1915, water assessment is paid." The assessment amounted to $90.71.

> "I understand you now have from Mr. Salisbury the sum of $450 in cash; one promissory note for 5 years at 7 per cent. payable semiannually; one promissory note for 8 years with interest at 7 per cent. payable semiannually; notes secured by mortgage on the property, all dated Jan. 1st, 1915. * * * I therefore request that you turn over to me the cash and papers above referred to, reserving an amount sufficient to cover the back taxes, which in my opinion will not exceed $100.00."

This was not done. On April 14th respondent wrote the trust company directing them to close the deal in accordance with the letter of February 25th. This letter, as above stated, requires "a certificate for 150 shares of Imperial Water Company No. 5 stock either made out in my name or endorsed to me to be delivered to the escrow holder." But the letter of April 14th contained the following modification:

> "You can take an order from Mr. Yawger, also from Altie S. Yawger if it seems necessary to the Abstract Company or the parties holding the stock, instructing them to transfer the stock to me as soon as I have paid the assessment, so that the stock is transferable on the companies' books. Please also get from Mr. Yawger an agreement whereby he will agree to pay all taxes which may be assessed to said property covering the period up to January 1st, 1915, when due."

It will be observed that according to respondent's letter of April 14th the water stock was to be assigned to him and left with the abstract company until he had paid an assessment on the stock, which, it appears, amounted to $90.71, and that therefore it was to be transferred to him, while the proposals of the appellant were that the stock should be issued to appellant as pledgee of respondent and that the certificates should remain with the bank for five years. At this point it will be seen that up to April 14, 1915, there had never been a complete meeting of minds between the appellant and the respondent for the following reasons:

First, the respondent had never informed the appellant that he was purchasing for himself and not for his uncle.

Second, appellant was insisting that his $400 note be paid as a part of the transaction, which increased the amount of the cash payment $310.

Third, the proposition of the appellant that the stock should be reissued in the name of the appellant, as pledgee, and retained in the possession of the escrow holder, was never accepted, and counter proposals were made and pending on April 14, 1915.

Fourth, the parties had agreed on the payment of $90 water assessment by respondent, but the appellant had not consented to a postponement of the transfer of the stock, due to respondent's delay in paying the assessment, if any.

Fifth, the date fixed in the proposals of the appellant for the payment of the $310 had expired on March 1, 1915, and no other arrangement had been made for such payment.

[1, 2] If we assume, as respondent contends, that he was not acting as agent but in his own behalf, there was no meeting of minds, for the reasons stated, and hence no contract. But the correspondence makes it clear, not only that the respondent was appellant's agent for the sale of the land, but also that he claimed to have effected a sale as such agent and was claiming full commission therefor. The mere circumstance that respondent directed the deeds to be executed to himself and wife and that appellant acquiesced therein is not such full notice of the circumstances as would validate a purchase by the agent himself. Burke v. Bours, 92 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 57; s. c. 98 Cal. 171, 32 Pac. 980. Moreover, appellant in the letter of March 6, 1915, had informed respondent that he had received a better offer for the ranch which would make him "come out $1400 ahead," thus indicating that at that date he was only continuing negotiations because of his belief that a sale had been made to the uncle. It remains to consider whether the subsequent dealings between the parties constituted a contract. On April 19, 1915, the first symptoms of trouble appeared. On that date appellant notified Salisbury as follows:

> "In view of the fact that C. P. Vandenberg who I understand to be the purchaser for my ranch has defaulted in one of the two payments of $500 due respectively on date of execution of the transfer and on March 1, 1915, I feel that I have the right to cancel the negotiation and shall be obliged to do so unless you deposit for escrow within five days the additional sum of $500 in the Southern Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego notifying me at Brawley of your action."

On April 24th plaintiff wired $500 to the trust company and telegraphed appellant as follows:

> "Have deposited five hundred dollars with Southern Trust & Savings Bank, San Diego, as per your letter of nineteenth, and paid assessment on stock."

On the same date plaintiff wired the trust company that he had made the deposit in response to a demand of Yawger and stated:

> "This in direct violation of his oral agreement here, but I am complying to protect escrow. Please be advised I will require you protect my interests in this escrow as no default made by me."

On the same date appellant wrote the trust company as follows:

> "I presume the deed, etc., will have to be made out to another party, and until this is determined I suggest you hold my part of the escrow subject to my order."

We will pause in the statement of facts to say that the trial court found that the contract for sale of the land and water stock was entered into December 5, 1914, between respondent and Edwin Yawger and Altie S. Yawger, in accordance with the allegation of the complaint to that effect, although this allegation was amended by stipulation at the time of the trial as to substitute the date October 19, 1914, as the date of the contract, which is the date of the contract of employment above mentioned. The court further found that the escrow was fully completed on April 24, 1915, and that thereupon the title of the land and water stock passed to respondent, and the right to the money vested in Edwin Yawger and Altie S. Yawger. The court found as a fact and decreed in accordance with the finding that the plaintiff was the owner of the land in fee, and in the same decree directed the delivery of the above-mentioned conveyance by the escrow holder wherein the respondent and Mary E. Salisbury were grantees. The significance of these conclusions will appear from the fact that on May 7, 1915, while the money was still in the possession of the escrow holder, a writ of execution issued upon a judgment in favor of W. W. Wilkins and against the plaintiff was levied upon all the money ($950) and stock of respondent in the hands of the escrow holder. Thereafter on the same day appellant demanded of the escrow holder the return to him of the deeds and certificate of title, owing to the fact that by reason of the levy of the execution the deal could not be carried out. On May 11th respondent telegraphed to the escrow holder that the money in its hands was not subject to attachment. On May 22d appellant made another demand on the trust company for the delivery of the money deposited by F. M. Salisbury, "or the return of my papers to me," and stated:

> "I shall have to insist that one or the other be done within three days from the date of the receipt of this letter by you, as I cannot allow the matter to drag on indefinitely, believing it has already been allowed to drag beyond all reasonable time."

On May 29th appellant notified respondent that he had demanded that the escrow holder return all papers belonging to him and cancel proposed deal, and added:

> "I still hold your note for $400.00 and interest which is past due, and in addition my claim against you for conversion of my property. I also reserve the right to put forward a reasonable claim for damages in connection with your proposed purchase of my ranch in the event it appears such damages have been occasioned by your default."

This letter was answered on June 7, 1915, by the respondent's attorneys, who stated that the last $500 payment had been made under their advice and that thereupon "it was the duty of the bank and yourself to make and accept delivery of the funds and papers under the terms of the escrow instructions." After stating that the appellant had caused the attachment to be levied, the following is added:

> "While it is true that you hold Mr. Salisbury's note which is past due in the sum of $400.00, it is also true that you owe him $600.00 for commission for the sale of the property involved in the escrow; you also have a claim for damages or compensation for his mistaken use of your personal property. These latter matters, while not involved in the escrow transaction, we will be willing to discuss and adjust with you at any time and place."

[3] From the foregoing it will be observed that the nearest approach to an agreement was reached on the 24th of April, at which time the respondent acceded to the demand of the appellant that the sum of $500 in addition be paid to the escrow holder. Up to that time the parties had been dealing on the theory that a commission was to be allowed and arranged in the deal itself and while, as already stated, the details thereof had not been fully arranged, the new demand of appellant for the deposit of $500 was based upon the assertion of appellant that the transaction was one between appellant and C. P. Vandenberg. The immediate compliance with this demand was an acknowledgment by plaintiff that Vandenberg was the purchaser and that the contract was one between appellant and C. P. Vandenberg. So that if it can be said, as the trial court holds, that the minds of the parties met on April 24th and the deal was then fully consummated, the agreement was between the appellant and Vandenberg for the sale of the property. On such an agreement the plaintiff as the selling agent was entitled to the agreed commission, but, of course, was not entitled to enforce the contract, on his own behalf. Burke v. Bours, supra. In passing it should be noted that the plaintiff alleged and the court found as a fact that the levy of the execution of May 7th was made at the instance of the appellant. It is claimed by the appellant in his brief that there was absolutely no evidence to support this finding and the respondent does not print any such evidence in his brief, and we may therefore conclude that no such evidence is contained in the record. However that may be, the fact of this levy under judgment against the plaintiff is an apt illustration of the difference between the contract the appellant made and the one which is sought to be enforced here. If the transaction was one between appellant and Vandenberg, an execution against Salisbury would have no effect. Furthermore, the sale was made largely on credit, and the responsibility of the purchaser was of vital moment. After deducting commissions, only $400 was to be received by the owner for the transfer of land and water stock valued at $12,000. Possession of the premises were to be delivered and the deferred payments were to be made in five and eight years.

[4] The respondent did not prove the contract he alleged. He alleged that the contract was between himself and the two appellants Edwin and Altie Yawger, while the contract proved was one between Edwin Yawger and C. P. Vandenberg, or, accepting plaintiff's view, between Edwin Yawger and the plaintiff. Altie Yawger was not a party to the contract. The deposit of her deed merely placed Edwin Yawger in a position where he could carry out his agreement to convey the entire 160 acres. The court found the fact in accordance with the allegation of the complaint.

[5] Appellant contends that the wife, Mary Salisbury, should have been a party plaintiff, and that the judgment creditor, Wilkins, and the sheriff should also be made parties. It is clear that Mary Salisbury should have been a party because the effect of the judgment is not only to direct a conveyance to her, but also the delivery of a mortgage executed by her for $11,000. The respondent claims it is unnecessary to bring in the judgment creditor for the reason that the levy of the execution was ineffectual and invalid because the title to the money had passed to appellant at the time of the levy of the execution, and for the further reason that the stock, although assigned to the respondent, was held in pledge and the rights of the appellant as pledgee had already attached and no tender of the amount of the pledge was made. It is clear that the judgment creditor should have been made a party. It does not appear, however, that any request of any kind was made of the court that such parties be brought in, and their absence does not invalidate the judgment. We may therefore consider the effect of the levy as between the parties before the court. The plaintiff's theory that the title to the money had passed to the defendant is erroneous, for the contract was never consummated. It follows that the plaintiff was in default because of a failure to comply with appellant's demand of May 22d for either the money or for a return of his deeds. No subsequent tender was made by plaintiff, and, having also failed to release the money from the lien of the execution, plaintiff cannot prosecute this action. Appellant has not made his points clearly in his opening brief, but it sufficiently appears that he is claiming that there could be no contract between respondent, who was acting as agent, and the appellant, his principal, "without full knowledge of his principal, and such purchase will always be set aside at the option of the principal," citing Burke v. Bours, supra, and similar cases. In his reply brief appellant, instead of flatly claiming that there was no contract of sale between appellant and respondent, analyzes the correspondence for the purpose of showing that there was no contract on October 19th or December 5th, and no ratification. However, the general drift of the claim is that there was never a time when it could be said that the minds of the parties had met, particularly in view of the respondent's position as agent. We make these observations to forestall the usual claim in a petition for rehearing that the case is decided on points not raised.

[6] In the appellant's brief filed in this court after transfer from the District Court of Appeal the point is made that the complaint is insufficient for the reason that it "does not contain facts showing that the contract is as to the defendants just and reasonable; that their assent was not obtained by misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention or unfair practices of the respondent, or by any promise of the respondent which has not been specifically fulfilled; and that the assent of respondent was not given under the influence of mistake, misapprehension or surprise. Appellants also contend that no proof was offered nor any finding made to the effect that the defendants received an adequate consideration for the contract, if any contract there was." This claim is based upon the provisions of section 3391 of the Civil Code. The complaint contains an allegation that the contract is just and reasonable; but there is no allegation as to the actual value of the land and no other circumstances alleged showing that it was just and reasonable or that the consideration was adequate. This is clearly insufficient under the authorities cited by the appellant. The facts showing that it was just and reasonable should have been alleged. White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193; Herzog v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 153 Cal. 496, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Young v. Matthew Turner Co., 168 Cal. 675, 143 Pac. 1029. There is no finding and no proof offered on the question of the adequacy of the consideration.

This cause was transferred to the district court of appeal of the second district for decision. The court, of its own motion, made an order dismissing the appeal on the ground that no valid notice of appeal had been filed. The respondent had not made or presented any motion to dismiss and the matter had not been suggested by either of the parties. The merits of the case had not been considered. The order of dismissal was set aside by the supreme court and the cause transferred to this court for further consideration.

[7] Within sixty days after the judgment in the superior court was entered the defendants filed in the office of the clerk of that court a notice which they intended as a notice of appeal. The only notice appearing in the record before us relating to an appeal is a notice appearing to have been drawn as a notice under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was filed within sixty days after the judgment, but as a notice of appeal it was slightly defective in form. The record does not affirmatively show that no other notice purporting to be a notice of appeal was filed. Nor is there any proof that no such notice was filed. The papers filed in this court in opposition to the dismissal of the appeal show that the respondent's attorney, in a letter to the appellants' attorney before the time for appeal had expired, admitted that a notice of appeal had been served on him by the appellants. His conduct throughout the case prior to the decision by the district court of appeal dismissing the case indicates that he fully understood and believed that an appeal had been duly taken, and that if there was any defect in the form of the notice, he had waived it. Such admissions are evidence that the appeal was properly taken and are sufficient to sustain the appeal on a motion to dismiss. Merritt v. Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 48, 120 Pac. 1064; Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 184, 86 Pac. 603. Where, as in this case, the parties originally submitted the case without raising the point and the question arises solely because of a suggestion from the appellate court, we are not disposed to be critical of the evidence produced in support of the appeal. We think the showing that the appeal was properly taken is sufficient.

DUNLAP v. COMMERCIAL NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES.

DUNN v. SAME.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of conclusion as to purpose of check not reversible error, where witness also detailed what was said and done.

In an action on a check brought after the death of the drawer on the theory that it was an assignment of the deposit, the admission of plaintiff's answer to a question as to the purpose for which the check was signed, over the objection that the question called for a conclusion, was not reversible error, where the witness also testified at length as to what was said and done when the check was drawn and delivered.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding as to giving of check by a decedent for services held conclusive.

In an action on a check brought after the death of the drawer, in which plaintiff testified to facts showing that the check was given for services and as an assignment of the deposit, the general unsatisfactory character of evidence of beneficiaries of such transactions after the death of the other party was a matter for the trial judge's consideration, and not the appellate court.

3. Assignments 🔑137—Evidence held to support findings that check was for valuable consideration, and was intended as assignment of deposit.

In an action on a check brought after the death of the drawer, evidence held sufficient to support findings that the check was given in consideration of valuable services, and was intended as a complete assignment to plaintiff of the drawer's title and interest in the deposit.

4. Gifts 🔑54—Delivery of check for services intended as assignment of deposit not gift causa mortis.

Where a check drawn and delivered shortly before the depositor's death was given for valuable services, and was intended as a complete assignment of the deposit, the transaction was not a gift causa mortis.

5. Assignments 🔑49—Check is assignment of debt if so intended by parties notwithstanding statute.

Though Civ. Code, § 3265e, as added by St. 1917, p. 1559, provides that a check does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds, and that the bank is not liable to the holder, if it was the intention of the parties to a check to pass title to the chose in action, then as between them there was an assignment of the debt of the bank to the payee of the check.

6. Executors and administrators 🔑56—Bank deposit is not part of estate if check thereon was intended as assignment.

If a check given shortly before the drawer's death was intended as an assignment of the deposit to the payee, the debt due from the bank never became a part of the estate, and the drawer's administrator had no right to it, or any part of it.

7. Assignments 🔑121—Executors and administrators 🔑224—Holder of check operating as assignment not required to present claim or make administrator party to suit against bank.

Where a check, delivered shortly before the drawer's death, was intended as an assignment to the payee, in payment of her debt against the drawer, she had no claim against the drawer's estate, and it was not necessary for her to present a claim against the estate, or make the administrator a party to her suit against the bank.

8. Executors and administrators 🔑61—Title to deposit assigned by decedent before death is held in trust.

Where a depositor shortly before his death signed and delivered a check intended as an assignment of the deposit to the payee in payment of a debt, if the apparent title to the deposit was in the drawer's estate, it was held by the estate as trust property.

9. Taxation 🔑866—Check, constituting assignment of deposit in payment of debt, not subject to inheritance tax.

Where, in satisfaction of a debt, a depositor shortly before his death drew a check, intending it as an assignment of the deposit, the inheritance tax law did not apply to the transfer.

10. Appeal and error 🔑883—Consent order consolidating actions, being within court's jurisdiction, cannot be attacked for error.

It was within the jurisdiction of the trial court to consolidate actions pending therein by different plaintiffs against the same defendant; and the order of consolidation, having been made by consent of the parties, could not be attacked as erroneous.

11. Appeal and error 🔑199—Claim of surprise by order requiring complaint to be treated as cross-complaint in consolidated action held too late.

Where, by consent, the trial court consolidated actions by the payee of a check and by the drawer's administrator against a bank for the amount of a deposit a considerable time before the trial, and at the trial ordered that the administrator's complaint be considered as a cross-complaint in the payee's suit, the administrator's claim of surprise by such order came too late when not presented to the lower court.

12. Action 🔑59—In actions consolidated by consent, evidence in favor of party held admissible against another party.

Where actions against a bank by the payee of a check and the administrator of the drawer of the check were consolidated by consent, there was no error in admitting evidence in favor of the payee as against the administrator.

13. Action 🔑59—In consolidated actions for the same debt, determination for one plaintiff necessarily required judgment against the other.

Where actions against a bank for the amount of a deposit brought by the payee of a check and by the drawer's administrator were consolidated, the determination that the payee was entitled to the deposit on the theory that the check was an assignment thereof necessarily required a judgment against the administrator.

14. Costs 🔑31—In consolidated actions for same debt, judgment against one plaintiff for costs in favor of other parties held proper.

Where the payee of a check and the drawer's administrator brought separate actions against the bank for the amount of the deposit, and the court, instead of making a formal order of interpleader, consolidated the actions and ordered the administrator's complaint to be considered as a cross-complaint, a judgment against the administrator for costs in favor of the bank and the payee was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Frank E. Dunlap, as administrator of John W. Kenton, deceased, and by Bettie B. Dunn, against the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles. From an adverse judgment, Dunlap appeals. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart and L. B. Stanton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. M. Harker and S. M. Bernard, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Dunn.

James, Smith & McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for respondent Commercial Nat. Bank of Los Angeles.

BRITTAIN, J. From a single judgment and on a single transcript the administrator of the estate of John W. Kenton appeals in these consolidated cases. The record shows that the respondent Dunn sued the respondent bank, claiming that Kenton in his lifetime had made an equitable assignment of the entire balance to his credit with the bank, and had given her a check for the entire balance, payment of which was refused by the bank when it was presented after his death. After the Dunn suit was commenced Dunlap, as administrator of Kenton's estate, sued the bank on another check drawn by him as administrator for a portion of the amount on deposit.

The bank answered in each case, setting up the facts, and sought by motion to be permitted to pay the amount for which it admitted it was liable into court, and to have the two claimants interplead. Under the circumstances, this would seem to have been the proper course, but for some reason which does not appear the motion was denied. The bank does not appeal, and the appellant does not attack this order. Its only importance at this time is as an explanation of the subsequent proceedings which are attacked.

When the motion for interpleader came on the parties in both suits were present in court, and in each case an order was then made, reciting that it was made by consent of the parties and by the consent of the plaintiff in the corresponding case. Each order directed that the case in which it was made should be consolidated with the other, and the two cases tried together. Such trial was had, and the trial court in construing the consent order of consolidation, which had been made by another judge of the same court ruled that the complaint of the administrator should be considered as a cross-complaint in the Dunn case. The court found the fact of assignment as alleged in the Dunn complaint. Judgment was accordingly entered for Miss Dunn for the amount of the fund in dispute. It ordered the bank to pay the money into court and the bank's dismissal when this should be done. Costs were awarded to both the bank and Miss Dunn, to be paid from the estate in due course of administration. So far as the bank was concerned, the judgment required it to do exactly what it sought to do in the first instance. At the trial the administrator on the one side and the respondent Dunn on the other introduced and were offered an opportunity to introduce the same evidence which would have been pertinent and material had they formally interpleaded.

The appellant attacks the judgment on the merits and also because of the procedure adopted, which he claims inextricably tangled the rights of the parties. In his brief, no doubt because of his reliance upon the second ground of attack, he has mingled his argument on both grounds. There is no difficulty in disposing separately of the questions presented, and the second ground of attack may be better understood by considering first the case on its merits.

The trial court found that Kenton, for valuable services rendered to him by the respondent Dunn, made and delivered to her the check which the bank refused to pay after the drawer's death; that as between Miss

Dunn and Kenton the transaction was complete at the time of his delivering the check to her, and that the delivery was made, and by them was intended to be a complete assignment to her by Denton of all his right, title, and interest in and to the whole amount of the deposit. There is evidence to support these findings, and they are conclusive of the facts upon this appeal, unless the appellant's attack upon them is to be sustained. The attack on the ground of error in admitting any evidence on behalf of the claim of the respondent Dunn as against the appellant will be considered with the second phase of the case. For the present it may be passed as without substance.

[1-4] While Miss Dunn, who was the niece of Kenton, was on the witness stand, and after the check given her had been identified, she was asked: "For what purpose, if you know, did he sign it?" An objection on the ground that the question called for her conclusion was overruled, and this is assigned as reversible error. In view of the fact that she immediately afterwards testified at length concerning what was said and done when the check was drawn, signed, and delivered to her, it does not appear that the appellant was injured by the ruling. She testified that her uncle said:

> "I am here sick. I don't know how long I will be sick or how sick I will be. When I asked you to take care of me little did I think you would have to go through what you have. I never can pay you enough for what you have done for me. Fill the check out for the full amount in the bank."

It is contended that this evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings, which have been summarized, and authorities have been quoted upon the general unsatisfactory character of the evidence of beneficiaries of such transactions after the death of the other party to them. These matters were for the consideration of the trial judge. The appellant did not cross-examine Miss Dunn, no evidence of any kind was offered to contradict or discredit her, and the evidence supports the findings. The argument that the transaction constituted a gift causa mortis rather than a payment is but the same attack in another form on the evidence and the findings. It is without force.

[5-9] A lengthy argument is made on the effect of that provision of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law embodied in section 3265e of the Civil Code as added by St. 1917, p. 1559, which provides that a check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check. The provisions of the section are in accord with the law of this state prior to the adoption of the present Negotiable Instruments Law. Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co. v. S. P. Co., 138 Cal. 183, 71 Pac. 93, 94 Am. St. Rep. 28. These rules concerning negotiable instruments, standing alone, do not militate against the doctrine of equitable assignments of specific property accompanied either by the delivery of a check or evidenced in whole or in part by other means. All parties to this appeal agree that the relationship of the bank to the drawer of the check was that of debtor and creditor. Despite the effect of the Code section on the rights of the bank, if from the entire transaction between Kenton and Miss Dunn it clearly appeared that it was their intention to pass title to the chose in action, then as between Miss Dunn and Kenton there was an assignment of the debt of the bank. Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 129 Pac. 462. From the evidence submitted the court found there was such an assignment, and that as between Kenton and Miss Dunn the transaction was entirely closed when the check was delivered. If she became the owner of the debt, it never became a part of Kenton's estate and his administrator had no right to it nor to any part of it. Her suit against the bank was not merely on the check but on the assigned debt of the bank to Kenton. Kenton's debt to her had been satisfied by the assignment. She therefore, had no claim against Kenton's estate, and it was not necessary for her either to present a claim against the estate or to make the administrator a party to her suit against the bank. After Kenton's death the administrator of his estate claimed the chose in action which the trial court found had been assigned to Miss Dunn by Kenton in his lifetime. The bank admitted its liability on the debt, and the only real dispute was between Miss Dunn and the administrator. It is argued that under the probate laws Miss Dunn might have presented a claim to the estate, and sued on the debt which by the assignment Kenton had satisfied. It was not necessary that she should do so. She had no claim against the estate, and it is well settled that one who claims as his own adversely to an estate specific property held and claimed by the estate cannot be called a creditor of the estate within the meaning of the probate law. If there was an assignment by Kenton, regardless of anything which the books of the bank may have shown, the property was the property of Miss Dunn. If the apparent title was in the estate, it was held by the estate as trust property. Either under the claim of ownership or of trust she might have sued the administrator without presenting any claim against the estate. Estate of Dutard, 147 Cal. 253, 256, 81 Pac. 519. The argument based upon the provisions of the inheritance tax law has no bearing on the case. If Kenton in satisfaction of his debt transferred the property in his lifetime, and the trial court so determined, the inheritance tax law did not reach that property. On the merits, the judgment following the conclusions of law based on the findings, and they in turn being supported by the evidence, the appellant's attack upon the first ground must fail.

[10] On the matters of procedure, the appellant contends that the trial court had no power to make the order of consolidation because the Code section concerning consolidation of actions provides, in substance, that whenever several actions are pending between the same parties in the same court upon causes of action which might have been joined, the court may order the actions to be consolidated into one, and that the suit of Dunn and the suit of Dunlap, as administrator, each being against the bank, were not between the same parties. The question is not one of jurisdiction. Until the consolidation the trial court had jurisdiction of both actions, and any order it may have made in either regarding its trial would have presented a question of error and not of power. The record shows that the order made in each case was made by consent of the parties to that case and of the plaintiff in the corresponding one. If the order was erroneous, the appellant cannot attack for error an order made with his consent.

[11, 12] Despite the consent order of consolidation, in his briefs the appellant has insisted on considering the two cases separately, and not as a single case. If the formal order for interpleader had been made instead of the consent order for consolidation, the appellant administrator and the respondent Dunn would have tried the single issue of whether or not there was an assignment. At the opening of the trial, all the facts being pleaded but no formal order having been made designating Dunlap, as administrator, defendant in the Dunn suit or Dunn as defendant in the Dunlap suit, the court ordered the Dunlap complaint to be considered as a cross-complaint in the Dunn suit. It is argued that by reason of this order the appellant Dunlap was taken by surprise, and was not prepared to meet the issue of assignment. That contention was not presented to the lower court, but only the technical contention that no formal pleading had been filed tendering the only issue in the case directly to the administrator. The consent order of consolidation was made a considerable time before the trial, and the appellant could not have been misled. The claim of surprise made in this court in the first instance comes too late. There was no error in the court admitting evidence in the consolidated action binding on the appellant as on other parties to the consolidated action concerning the assignment. Under the evidence and findings respondent Dunn was entitled to judgment.

[13] The contention that the judgment should be reversed because the court concluded that Dunlap, as administrator, should take nothing is entirely without merit. It is based on the contention that, because an employé of the bank made a transfer on its books of the single debt for which it was liable, Dunlap, as administrator, should have had judgment against the bank regardless of whether or not the bank paid its single debt to Miss Dunn as Kenton's assignee. In the single consolidated case the determination that Kenton had transferred to Miss Dunn all his rights against the bank necessarily led to the correlative conclusion that his estate had no claim against the bank.

[14] Lastly, it is contended that the judgment for costs was erroneous. In effect the same end was accomplished by the consent order of consolidation as would have been accomplished by the formal order of interpleader. If the formal order of interpleader had been made, the bank, as purseholder, would have been relieved of costs, and the respondent Dunn, being entitled to the fund, would have been awarded costs against the administrator to be paid in due course of administration. An examination of the entire record fails to show any failure of substantial justice under any contention of the appellant.

FRANCISCO et al. v. SCHLEISCHER.
(Civ. 3628.)

1. Contracts 🔑346(7)—Mistake or fraud in written contract must be pleaded.

In an action on a written contract, defendant could not, without any affirmative allegations in his pleading to that effect, attack the written agreement upon the ground of mistake or fraud in its procurement.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1058(1)—Exclusion of evidence harmless.

Party cannot complain of exclusion of evidence where he was subsequently permitted to introduce it.

3. Trial 🔑396(1)—Finding not open to attack by reason of allegation of technical conversion.

In an action to recover value of hay for defendant's failure to turn it over to the plaintiff, which he was unable to pay for and agreed to return, a finding that defendant had failed and refused to deliver it in accordance with his agreement was not open to attack on the ground that a technical conversion was alleged and not proven.

4. Sales ⚷92—Promise to return property purchased sustained by consideration.

Where personal property was sold, to be paid for in installments, and purchaser defaulted in his payments, release of the purchaser by the seller from all further obligation under his contract, with right given purchaser to retain possession and use of the property for a specified time, was a sufficient consideration for the purchaser's agreement to return the same.

5. Contracts ⚷155—Courts do not by forced construction relieve from unreasonable agreements.

Since many persons enter into unreasonable contracts, it is no function of the courts, merely because the contract was unreasonable, to relieve persons from obligations by giving words used in the contract a meaning which they do not ordinarily possess.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Herbert Francisco and another against George Schleischer. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hogan & Carlson, of Bishop, for appellant.
A. H. Swallow, of Bishop, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $3,008.15.

The controversy between the parties grows out of a contract entered into by them on September 21, 1917, by which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendant a large quantity of personal property, constituting a teaming and grading outfit, and including approximately 200 head of horses and mules, wagons, scrapers, plows, a grading machine, and many other articles, and also approximately 200 tons of hay. The contract was in writing, and the payments were to be made at stated intervals; title to all of said property being retained in the vendors (plaintiffs) until its terms had been complied with. The defendant being in default in his payments, the plaintiffs threatened legal proceedings for the recovery of the property. All parties being desirous of avoiding such proceedings, and the defendant being unable to comply with the plaintiffs' demand for a further payment in accordance with the terms of the contract, the latter on September 2, 1918, signed and delivered to the plaintiffs the following writing:

> "I hereby agree to turn over to H. Francisco on the 15th day of September all real and personal property bought of H. Francisco and Katherine Francisco on the 21st day of September, 1917, and forfeit all payments made on said property."

The defendant having also failed to comply with the terms of this agreement, the present action was brought.

The plaintiffs in an amended complaint, upon which the action was tried, after setting up the execution of the contract of September 21, 1917, alleged that in consideration of their releasing the defendant from the further performance thereof he executed the writing of September 2, 1918, above recited, but that he had failed and refused to return a large portion of the personal property referred to therein (the details of which are set out in paragraph 3 of the amended complaint), and converted the same to his own use. The reasonable value of said articles of personal property is alleged to be $3,203, for which sum judgment was demanded. In a separate cause of action the plaintiffs alleged that they also, about the time of entering into the contract of September 21, 1917, made a lease of certain real property to the defendant, upon which the sum of $400 was due and unpaid, and this amount is also included in their prayer for judgment. The recovery of the plaintiffs included this unpaid rent, but no controversy arises with respect to it.

The answer of the defendant denied the material averments of the amended complaint and set up various counterclaims, including one for the value of growing crops on said leased land when he surrendered it to the plaintiffs, and another claim for the sum of $500 claimed to be due for labor performed for the plaintiffs.

The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus made up, but at the conclusion of the first day of said trial the defendant requested, and was granted, leave to amend his answer. The following is the amendment thus made:

> "(Defendant) admits that he did on the 2d day of September, 1918, agree in writing to return to the plaintiffs on the 15th day of September, 1918, all property sold to him by them on the 21st day of September, 1917, and to forfeit all payments made on the same; but alleges that said agreement was and is unsupported by any consideration whatsoever, that he made the said agreement under a misunderstanding of the facts therein contained, and that he was induced to make said agreement by fraudulent acts and misrepresentations as to the meaning and purpose of the same done and made by the plaintiff Herbert Francisco."

The trial of the cause was resumed and concluded on the following day. Thereafter the court made and filed its findings, these being in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant, except upon certain of his counterclaims, the amount of which was deducted from the sum otherwise due to the plaintiffs, and judgment in their favor was entered for the balance. On the counterclaim of the defendant for the sum of $500 for work and labor performed for the plaintiffs the court found that at the request of the defendant the plaintiff H. Francisco had invested this sum for him in a mining property, and negatived the contention of the defendant that said plaintiff had failed and refused to deliver to him the certificates of stock therefor.

[1, 2] The defendant in support of his appeal first urges that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to a number of questions put by him to the plaintiff Herbert Francisco upon his cross-examination as a witness. It is not necessary to detail these questions, but is sufficient to say that they were all asked upon the theory that the defendant, without any affirmative allegations in his pleading to that effect, could attack his written agreement of September 2, 1918, upon the ground of mistake and fraud in its procurement, or such questions were incompetent for other reasons. Later, after the defendant had been permitted to amend his answer in the respect heretofore mentioned, he was allowed full latitude to examine and cross-examine said plaintiff, and to testify in his own behalf, so that even if the questions to which objections were sustained had been proper, he was not finally precluded from showing what he thereby sought to elicit, and did in fact take the stand and testify to such matters without objection.

The next contention of the appellant is that there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiffs had originally delivered to the defendant the articles of personal property described in paragraph 3 of the amended complaint and for the value of which they were awarded judgment. This contention is not tenable, for the reason that the record does in fact contain such testimony, and the appendix to the defendant's own brief also sets it up.

In connection with these articles of personal property the point is made by the appellant that the complaint charges that they were converted by him, whereas the evidence shows that the main item in value of this property was 105 tons of hay, and that this hay had come rightfully into the possession of the defendant under the terms of the contract of September 21, 1917, and had by him been fed to the stock acquired by him from the plaintiffs at the same time, and which use of hay was contemplated by said contract; that the defendant therefore had been guilty of no wrongful act in regard to it such as is essential to the proof of a conversion.

[3] It is true that the complaint, in charging the defendant with his failure and refusal to deliver this hay, also alleges that he converted it, but the trial court made no finding against the defendant upon the allegation of conversion, but found merely that he had failed and refused to deliver it in accordance with his agreement of September 2, 1918. As this finding is amply supported by the evidence, it is not open to attack upon the ground that a technical conversion had not been proven.

The appellant also attacks as unsupported by the evidence a finding of the court that a certain quantity of hay left by the defendant upon the premises of the plaintiffs, when redelivered to them in accordance with the terms of the agreement of September 2, 1918, was delivered to the plaintiffs as part of the 200 tons of hay that he was obligated thereby to return; it being the contention of the appellant that he had no intention of parting with his title to said hay in thus abandoning it to the plaintiffs. We discern no merit in this contention. The court, having found that the defendant had undertaken to deliver to the plaintiffs 200 tons, was justified in construing the defendant's act of surrendering the quantity of hay in question to the plaintiffs at the time of his redelivery of the real property as a performance pro tanto of his obligation to deliver 200 tons of said commodity, notwithstanding his subsequent demand upon the plaintiffs for said hay. He was given credit for its value, and the amount of the judgment which the plaintiffs would otherwise have recovered was diminished thereby.

[4] It is next contended by the appellant that there is no evidence of any consideration moving to him for his agreement of September 2, 1918, to return to the plaintiffs the personal property in question. This contention is based to some extent upon the fact that at the time of negotiating and signing it the plaintiff Herbert Francisco and the defendant did not use the term "consideration" or speak of it. As to this, it may be said that it would be very unusual to find two laymen, in negotiations with each other, using legal terms, and conducting them upon the hypothesis that they were later going to have a lawsuit over them. The facts developed at the trial showed quite clearly that the consideration moving to the appellant for his undertaking of September 2, 1918, was his release by the plaintiffs from all further obligation under his contract of September 21, 1917; in other words, the rescission of said contract by mutual agreement. The evidence also shows that the defendant, being in default, was expressly, by said later agreement, granted the right to retain the possession and use of the property for a specified time after such default, with the right to receive the income therefrom. This alone was a sufficient consideration.

[5] It is also urged by the appellant that the trial court erred in construing his agreement of September 2, 1918, as an undertaking to return all of the personal property received by him under the former agreement; but, as to this, the appellant had ample opportunity, under his amended pleading setting up mistake and fraud, to offer evidence that the contract did not mean what it said. Having failed to substantiate the allegations of his amended answer, the trial court was left with no option but to give to the words of the contract their ordinary meaning. It is urged that such construction makes the undertaking of the defendant quite unreasonable, but it ought not to be necessary to observe that many persons enter into unreasonable contracts, and it is no function of the courts to relieve them from the effects of their foolishness.

Finally the point is made that the finding of the trial court to the effect that the defendant had authorized the plaintiff Herbert Francisco to invest for him the sum of $500 in certain mining stocks, which stocks said plaintiff had not refused or failed to deliver to the defendant, is unsupported by the evidence. The record, however, shows that said plaintiff testified directly to the facts as found by the court, and such evidence, being accepted as true by the court, is amply sufficient to support its finding in that regard.

We find no error in the record; consequently the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CALIFORNIA ORANGE CO. v. RIVERSIDE PORTLAND CEMENT CO.

1. Nuisance 🔑9—Owners of cement mills discharging dust not joint tort-feasors.

Separate companies who wrongfully operated their cement plants so that deposits of cement dust were incrusted on the leaves of plaintiff's orange trees were not joint tortfeasors merely on account of the commingling of the dust from their plants; each being liable only for its particular proportion of the damage resulting from the dust emitted into the atmosphere from the plants of both.

2. Damages 🔑6—Amount of damages by commingled dust from cement works may be estimated.

In determining the amount of damages assessable against a cement works for coating the leaves of plaintiff's orange trees with cement dust, the trial court was at liberty to estimate as best it could from the evidence how much of the damage caused by the operations of defendant's plant and that of another company was occasioned by defendant's plant, and in so doing might measure with a liberal hand the amount of damage caused by defendant's mill.

3. Appeal and error 🔑931(1), 1010(1)—Appellate court cannot disturb findings supported by substantial evidence.

All presumptions are in favor of the findings of the trial court, and the appellate court cannot disturb them if supported by any substantial evidence.

4. Damages 🔑6—Estimate of damages proper when actionable injury is indistinguishable from other injury.

If it is impossible to distinguish the damage to land arising from defendant's actionable injury from cement dust and damage having another origin, the jury, or the trial judge, if the cause be tried without a jury, should be left to make from the evidence the best possible estimate and to award plaintiff compensatory damages for the actionable injury.

5. Nuisance 🔑49(5)—Evidence held to show orchard suffered damage attributable to cement dust.

Evidence held to show that plaintiff's orange orchard suffered substantial damage directly attributable to defendant's wrongful operation of its cement plant whereby cement dust in quantities sufficient to cause material injury was precipitated on plaintiff's citrus trees.

6. Nuisance 🔑50(1) — Measure of orange grower's damages by cement dust stated.

Under Civ. Code, § 3333, the measure of plaintiff orange grower's damage from defendant cement company's wrong in permitting dust from its plant to settle on plaintiff's trees is the amount that will compensate it for all detriment proximately caused by defendant's wrongful operation of its plant from the time it commenced operations until it installed treaters preventing the escape of dust.

7. Nuisance 🔑50(4)—Orange grower entitled to recover from cement works for continuing injuries.

An orange grower, in addition to other damages against defendant cement works, which caused dust to settle on his trees, was entitled to compensation for the continuing injury to the trees due to dust from defendant's plant settling on them in two years, at the end of which dust-confining treaters were installed, the effects of which would manifest themselves in the crops for two subsequent years, making it necessary to give the trees an increased amount of fertilizer and care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; M. T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by the California Orange Company against the Riverside Portland Cement Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Carnahan, of Los Angeles, and W. G. Irving and McFarland & Irving, all of Riverside, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Rohe, Jeffers & Devin, of Los Angeles, and Purington & Adair, of Riverside, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action at law to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's orange orchard, caused by the deposit on the trees of cement dust from defendant's cement mill. Plaintiff recovered judgment for a total of $6,300, of which $3,500 was for loss and injury to the crops for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, $300 was for the increased labor and cost in the care of the trees, and the balance, $2.500, was for injury to the trees. From that judgment defendant appeals.

The orange orchard is located on a piece of high bench land situated on the northerly bank of the Santa Ana river in Riverside county. It lies about midway between defendant's cement mill and the cement mills of the California Portland Cement Company. Defendant's mill is about one and a half miles southwesterly of plaintiff's grove. The two mills of the California Portland Cement Company are northwesterly of the grove and distant therefrom about 1½ miles. There is no question but that cement in considerable quantities from the mills of the California Portland Cement Company, as well as from defendant's mill, settled upon plaintiff's orange trees, coating the leaves with a white, ashen dust, which, incrusting from the action of dew and moisture, so that it can be neither washed off by the rains nor blown off by the winds, remained on the leaves for the period of their life—that is, from two to three years. There is an abundance of evidence in the record tending to show that cement dust that thus is incrusted upon the orange leaf seriously interferes with the leaf's respiration and the formation of the starch foods upon which the tree lives. As a result, the tree becomes greatly weakened, the leaves stunted, and the internodes shortened, so that the tree, in its weakened condition, blossoms more profusely, and the fruit falls off before maturing, thus greatly decreasing the yield of every tree the leaves of which are thus coated with the cement dust.

Dust-catching apparatus, commonly known as "treaters," designed to prevent, so far as possible, the escape of cement dust into the atmosphere, were installed in defendant's plant in January, 1913. The action was commenced August 14, 1913, and was tried in May, 1917.

[1, 2] The California Portland Cement Company and defendant were not joint tortfeasors. Their respective torts—wrongfully operating their respective cement plants in such manner that deposits of cement dust, blown from the plants toward plaintiff's orange grove, were incrusted upon the leaves of plaintiff's trees—were several when committed, and did not become joint merely because of a commingling of the dust from the respective plants and a union of the consequences proceeding from the several and independent tortious acts. Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., 87 Cal. 430, 25 Pac. 550, 22 Am. St. Rep. 254; Wm. Tackaberry Co. v. Sioux City, etc., Co., 154 Iowa, 358, 132 N. W. 945, 134 N. W. 1064, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 102, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1276; Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 1059. Defendant is liable for only such proportion of the total damage resulting from the commingled dust emitted into the atmosphere from the plants of the two cement companies as was caused by its own plant. Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., supra. In determining the amount of damage that should be assessed against this defendant, the trial court was at liberty to estimate as best it could, from the evidence before it, how much of the total damage caused by the operations of the two cement companies was occasioned by defendant's plant, and in doing so might measure with a liberal hand the amount of damage caused by defendant's mill. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; Jenkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 67 N. J. Law, 331, 51 Atl. 704, 57 L. R. A. 309; City of Mansfield v. Bristor, 76 Ohio St. 270, 285, 81 N. E. 631, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 806, 118 Am. St. Rep. 860, 10 Ann. Cas. 767. Though in cases of this sort entire accuracy is impossible, and the difficulty of accurately proportioning and assessing the damage done by defendant's mill is great, still that difficulty would have been avoided had defendant but taken care that no occasion should arise requiring such proportioning and assessing of the whole damages. In Ogden v. Lucas, 48 Ill. 492, which was an action to recover damages for the destruction of corn by trespassing cattle, where it appeared that a part of the cattle was the property of others than the defendant, the court said:

> "In cases of this sort, entire accuracy is impossible. The jury had a right to consider from the evidence how much corn had been destroyed, and what proportion of the cattle in the field were turned in by the defendant, and thus arrive at as near an estimate of the damages as the nature of the case would permit."

To the same effect is Harrison v. Adamson, 86 Iowa, 693, 53 N. W. 334. Washburn v. Gilman, 64 Me. 163, 18 Am. Rep. 246, was an action upon the case for a nuisance occasioned by casting refuse material out of the defendant's sawmill into a natural stream, whence it was carried by a spring freshet upon plaintiff's land. The court held the defendant liable for the damages arising from his own wrongful or negligent act, but not for those arising from the negligent acts of others, saying:

> "The difficulty may be great of accurately proportioning and assessing the damages done by the defendant, but that difficulty the defendant could have avoided had he taken due care that no occasion should arise requiring such assessment of damages."

To the same effect is City of Mansfield v. Bristor, supra, where the court said:

> "True, it may be difficult to determine how much dirt came from each colliery, but the relative proportions thrown in by each may form some guide, and a jury in a case of such difficulty, caused by the party himself, would measure the injury of each with a liberal hand."

Appellant does not contend that the lower court charged it with more than its proportion of the total damages caused by the plants of the two companies. That point is not raised in the briefs. Appellant's contention is stated in its opening brief as follows:

> "The evidence is insufficient to show that any material discharged from the cement mill of appellant was precipitated upon the lands of the plaintiff in any appreciable amount."

The trial court found that from about the early part of the year 1910 until the installation of the "treaters" in January, 1913, defendant maintained and operated its cement mill in such a manner that "large quantities of noxious and filthy dust, smoke, gases, vapors, and cement continuously escaped from said manufactory and were continuously discharged therefrom into the atmosphere and thence upon the land of this plaintiff"; also that, after defendant commenced to operate its mill, it operated it in such a manner that "a large amount of dust and matter arising from the various stages of the manufacture of cement therein were discharged therefrom into the atmosphere and were thence discharged and precipitated upon said land and premises of plaintiff in quantities aggregating many tons per annum," and, further, that "throughout said period said dust and matter settled upon plaintiff's said land, and upon the trees and crops growing theron, and coated the leaves, foliage, and fruit thereof with an ash-colored deposit of dust and matter, and damaged the trees growing upon said land, thereby retarding and weakening their growth and rendering them less vigorous and less productive, and damaging the fruit and other crops above mentioned growing upon said land, both by lessening the quantity and by impairing the quality and value of such fruit crops."

[3] Defendant claims that these findings are not supported by the evidence. All presumptions are in favor of the findings, and under the well-settled rule we cannot disturb them if there is any substantial evidence to support them.

The gravamen of appellant's contention seems to be that the evidence is insufficient to show that cement dust from its mill settled upon respondent's orange grove in "large" quantities. It seems to be conceded that some dust from appellant's mill was precipitated upon respondent's orange grove. If, as we believe, enough dust from appellant's plant was deposited upon respondent's trees to cause them some damage, then, since appellant does not claim that it has been charged with more than its proportion of the damages caused by the dust from the plants operated by the two companies, the judgment, in so far as it rests upon the above-mentioned findings, must be affirmed, regardless of the quantum of dust from appellant's mill.

A number of witnesses testified that they frequently saw clouds of cement dust from appellant's plant float over and settle upon respondent's grove. One witness, L. V. W. Brown, describing his observations, said:

> "I observed the operation of the cement plant [defendant's cement plant] since it started in 1910. I observed the smoke and emissions from it. Of course, there was a great deal of dirt emitted previous to the time the treaters were put on, and that followed the direction of the wind. At other times, when there was no wind, there would seem to be a great pall of dirt that would be thrown into the air, and would hang more or less continuously over that district until the wind took it away. This pall of dirt or dust or smoke in the air seemed to extend three miles, in every direction."

Another witness, Prof. Babcock, who made a number of measurements of the cement dust carried into the air from the mills of these two cement companies, testified that, as a result of his experiments and measurements, he calculated that in the years 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912 there fell per year at least 150 tons of cement dust on plaintiff's 163 acres. He further testified that his calculations showed that, of the amount so falling annually on plaintiff's property, about one-fourth came from the mills of the California Portland Cement Company, and the balance from "some other source." Defendant's plant was the only other possible source whence the dust could have come. This and much other evidence that could be referred to if necessary is sufficient to justify the finding that cement dust "in large quantities" was discharged into the atmosphere from defendant's plant, and thence precipitated on the trees in plaintiff's orange orchard.

To cause injury to plaintiff's trees, for which he would be entitled to recover damages, it was not necessary that great quantities of the cement dust from defendant's mill should have settled upon the trees. A slight coating of the dust on the leaves of an orange tree will cause serious injury and consequent damage. Prof. Peirce, of Stanford University, testified that the hard opaque crust that forms on the leaf when the cement dust is affected by moisture in the atmosphere interferes with the action of sunlight on the plant. Sunlight, he said, is the one thing that the plant requires to produce the necessary starch and sugar, which is the plant food upon which the trees thrive. This plant food, he testified, is stored up in the daytime when the leaf is at work, and consumed during the night. From an experiment conducted by Prof. Peirce in the courtroom during the trial, it appeared that, if a leaf were only partially covered with the opaque crust formed by the ash-colored deposit of cement dust, so that a part only was shaded thereby, more starch would be found in the unshaded than in the shaded part of the leaf.

[4] Appellant calls our attention to the fact that during the operations of its plant throughout the period complained of by respondent the orange grove was subject to other and natural causes of injury and deterioration, such, for instance, as lack of vitality due to want of proper care in the early stages of the orchard's growth, killing frosts, and high winds blowing directly from the north through the Cajon pass—referred to by the witnesses as "northers." Prof. Peirce's expert testimony, if accepted as true, justified the lower court in inferring that any discernible amount of cement dust, incrusted on the leaves of the orange trees, by its inevitable interference with the free action of sunlight, will cause appreciable damage to the trees. In cases of this sort, the law is that, if it be impossible to distinguish between the damage arising from the defendant's actionable injury and damage which has another origin, the jury, or the trial judge if the cause be tried without a jury, should be left to make from the evidence the best possible estimate, and to award the plaintiff compensatory damages for the actionable injury. In Jenkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra, the rule was stated as follows:

> "It many times happens that the damage arising from an actionable injury, chargeable to the defendant, is, in the nature of things or from the circumstances of the case, indistinguishable from other damage occurring at the same time, attributable to the acts of an independent tort-feasor or to natural causes. In such cases, since the injured party cannot supply the materials necessary to enable the jury to make an exact computation of the damages in suit, the approved practice is to leave it the good sense of the jury, as reasonable men, to form from the evidence the best estimate that can be made under the circumstances, as a basis of compensatory damages for the actionable injury."

The evidence here shows that plaintiff's grove, though not subject to any greater damage from the elements than other groves situated outside the zone of falling cement dust, did not produce as did the groves similarly situated outside the dust zone. W. B. Gregor, who had a grove about a mile and a half north of defendant's property, testified that there was no deposit of grayish substance on the trees in his grove, and that the blossoms on his trees did not fall off as they did from the trees in defendant's grove.

[5] From the foregoing we think it clear that the evidence shows that plaintiff's orchard suffered substantial damage, directly attributable to defendant's wrongful operation of its cement plant, whereby cement dust, in quantities sufficient to cause material injury, was precipitated upon plaintiff's citrus trees, and that therefore the evidence is sufficient to support the findings of which appellant complains.

There was ample evidence to justify the finding (appearing in the conclusions of law) to the effect that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $300 for increased labor and cost in the care of its orange orchard. Teams were used in the cultivation of the grove. The ranch foreman testified that the cement dust got on the horses' shoulders, under the harness, from brushing against the trees while dragging the cultivator, thereby causing their shoulders to become sore and necessitating extra care, whereby an hour a day was lost—a daily loss of about 45 cents for each team that was in use during the season in each of the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, and totaling more than $300.

Finally, it is contended that plaintiff is not entitled to damage for injury to the trees in addition to damage for loss of crops and increased labor. It will be recalled that the lower court found that plaintiff is entitled to recover: (1) The sum of $3,500 for loss of and injury to the orange crops during the years 1910, 1911, and 1912; (2) the sum of $300 for increased labor in the care of the land; and (3) the sum of $2,500 for injury to the trees. Appellant claims that, if respondent be allowed compensation for loss of and injury to the 1910, 1911, and 1912 crops, together with compensation for the increased labor and cost in caring for the grove while those crops were growing and maturing, it is not entitled, in addition to those items, to compensation for injury to the trees. Appellant, to quote from its brief, bases this contention "on the fact that the trees in plaintiff's grove are in as good condition now as they would have been had no dust ever been precipitated thereon."

[6] A number of witnesses testified that, subsequent to the installation of the dust "treaters" in defendant's plant in January, 1913, and prior to the trial in May, 1917, plaintiff's trees had completely recovered. But it does not therefore follow that plaintiff's injury was confined to deterioration in the crops that matured in 1910, 1911, and 1912, and the increased cost of bringing those crops to maturity. The measure of plaintiff's damage is the amount that will compensate it for all the detriment proximately caused by defendant's wrongful operation of its plant from the time when it commenced operations in January, 1910, until it installed the "treaters" in January, 1913. The measure of damages in cases of this character is found in section 3333 of the Civil Code, reading:

> "For the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not."

[7] The 1912 crop was the last crop picked and packed prior to the commencement of the action in August, 1913. Since early in 1913 defendant, by the installation of dust treaters, has collected about 95 per cent. of the dust that otherwise would have escaped into the atmosphere from its cement plant and settled on plaintiff's trees. But the dust that incrusted on the leaves that were newly put forth by plaintiff's trees in the year 1912 would remain on those leaves for the period of their life, which is between two and three years, meanwhile seriously interfering with plant respiration and the formation of starch and sugar, thereby tending to tree starvation. The injury caused by the dust that settled on the trees in the years 1911 and 1912 would therefore naturally tend to decrease the 1913 and 1914 crops. And though the trees may have "come back" when observed by the witnesses who testified that they saw them shortly before the trial in May, 1917, still it can readily be seen that there would be some continuing injury to the trees, and some loss due thereto, after the picking and packing of the 1910, 1911, and 1912 crops. For these reasons we conclude that, in addition to compensatory damages for loss due to diminution of and deterioration in the crops for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, and in addition, also, to the increased cost in the care of the land due to the dust galling the shoulders of the animals used in cultivating the grove during those three years, plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the continuing injury to the trees due to the dust from defendant's plant that settled on them in the years 1911 and 1912, by reason of defendant's wrongful operation of its plant in those two years—tortious conduct, the effects of which would manifest themselves in the 1913 and 1914 crops, thus making it necessary to give the trees an increased amount of fertilizer and care in order to mature as much of the 1913 and 1914 crops as possible.

There was ample evidence to sustain the court's finding that $2,500 is the amount necessary to compensate plaintiff for this continuing injury to the trees. It may be inferred from the testimony of several witnesses whose experience qualified them to testify as experts that the care and fertilization necessary to bring the trees back to a normal condition in the years 1913 and 1914 would be about double the amount that it would have been necessary to expend on the grove if the trees had suffered no injury continuing after the harvesting of the 1912 crop. The amount actually expended for the care, cultivation, and fertilization of the trees for the years 1913 and 1914 averaged $55.39 per acre. It is a reasonable inference from the testimony of the witnesses that one-half of this sum, $27.69 per acre, is the additional amount made necessary by the continuing injurious effects of the dust that settled on the trees in the years 1911 and 1912—injurious effects that would naturally continue to manifest themselves in the 1913 and 1914 crops, and, possibly, in the 1915 crop also. This additional amount necessary to be expended for increased care and fertilization totals considerably more than the sum of $2,500 allowed by the court, besides which this sum does not take into consideration another element of loss for which plaintiff was entitled to compensation—the inevitable deterioration of and diminution in the 1913 and 1914 crops. This continuing injury, and the damages resulting therefrom must inevitably have decreased by the amount of such damages, the vendible value of plaintiff's grove. There is no reason to believe that the $2,500 allowed for injury to the trees included any of the damage covered by the two other items of injury allowed by the court—$3,500 for injury to the 1910, 1911, and 1912 crops, and $300 for increased labor in maturing those crops. Every intendment is in favor of the action of the court a quo; and, unless appellant specifically calls our attention to something in the record overcoming this presumption, we are bound to assume that the award to plaintiff of $2,500 for injury to the trees included only such injury as might affect one or more of the crops subsequent to the 1912 crop—the last crop for injury to which plaintiff was specifically awarded a recovery. This conclusion is further fortified by the following excerpt from the opinion of the learned judge who tried the case, printed in appellant's closing brief:

> "Had it not been for this freeze [the freeze of 1913], with the elimination of the cement dust nuisance which took place in December, 1912, when the treaters were installed, the plaintiff's grove would have required no more care and attention than a 50 per cent. increase of fertilization and some added cultivation. Such a percentage, based upon the expenditures made by the plaintiff on these items during the years both before and subsequent to the commencement of this action, would not exceed $2,500, which figure I consider a just proportion of the injury to the grove suffered by reason of the total cement dust emitted from both plants."

Appellant has failed to point out any reversible error, and the judgment therefore is affirmed.

We concur: THOMAS, J.; WELLER, J.

NILES SAND & ROCK CO. v. MUIR et al. (Civ. 3604.)

1. Sales ⚷77(1)—Contract held not to require payment by measure but by weight.

A contract for the sale of sand and gravel which stated that 2,400 pounds was accepted as the average weight per cubic yard for all materials, and that bills would be paid for on that basis at the rate of 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, was a contract for purchase and sale by weight, and not by measure, especially where the parties had so construed it by keeping an accurate record of the weight of materials furnished, but not of the measure.

2. Appeal and error ⚷907(2)—Evidence not in record presumed not to support finding denied to appellant.

On assignment of error to the refusal to sign findings proposed by appellants, where none of the evidence taken at the trial was before the court, but the record merely stated that each party introduced evidence on each and all of the allegations, it must be presumed in support of the court's ruling that the evidence introduced by appellant to support its allegations referred to in the proposed findings was insufficient.

3. Sales ⚷353(6)—Complaint held to show compliance with condition as to weight of sand.

In a complaint for balance of purchase price of sand and gravel, sold by weight, the contract providing that a cubic yard of material should be of a specified weight, an allegation that plaintiff fully complied with every condition of the contract is sufficient allegation of compliance with the condition as to weight.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1170(3)—Failure to allege performance of condition of contract held harmless.

The failure of a complaint to allege performance of a condition of the contract does not require reversal under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, prohibiting reversal unless the defect was prejudicial where the denial of performance of that condition raised the principal issue to be determined at the trial which lasted 27 days, and the evidence was not in the record, so that it would be presumed it fully established performance of the condition as found by the trial court.

5. Appeal and error ⚷932(1)—No presumption indulged to avoid excessive recovery that findings embraced charge on both sides of account.

In an action for breach of contract for the sale of sand and gravel, where the court found the quantity of material delivered as established by the evidence, but computed the price thereof at an amount in excess of the correct figures, it cannot be presumed that the finding of amount due embraced a charge entered on both sides of the account, though the court also found a payment by defendant exceeding the amount claimed by him by substantially the same sum as the value of the sand exceeded the correct value.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Niles Sand & Rock Company against Robert B. Muir and another, doing business under the firm name and style of R. C. Storrie & Co. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John L. McNab and Byron Coleman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendants for $15,195.51 and interest thereon, and they have appealed upon the judgment roll.

The court found that the contract between the parties was made in two letters, marked respectively A and B; that A was written by Mr. Ford, the president of the plaintiff company, following a discussion of the terms of the proposed contract held at the office of defendants; that B was written following a telephone conversation between Mr. Ford and Mr. Robert B. Muir, acting for the copartnership defendants, in which Mr. Muir rejected the letter as a proposal for a contract because, he asserted, it did not express all of the terms; that on the same day, December 14, 1914, the two letters were signed by Mr. Ford for the plaintiff corporation, marked "Accepted," and presented to Mr. Muir, who signed for the defendants below the word "Accepted." The bodies of these letters are as follows:

"A.

"We herewith submit our proposal to supply all of the concrete gravel and crushed gravel and sand for use in the construction of the Twin Peaks tunnel, San Francisco, at 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds f. o. b. cars San Francisco; railway weights to govern as shown on freight bills. This price includes all freight charges to San Francisco, but does not include switching charges or trackage charges, if there be any."

"B.

"Confirming conversation of even date in reference to our contract with you for supplying all of the sand, gravel, and crushed gravel for concrete in constructing the San Francisco Twin Peaks tunnel, we hereby mutually agree that, when estimating the amount due us on each shipment made, the weights of materials as shown on freight bills of Southern Pacific Company will be acceptable to both parties to this contract or agreement, and that 2,400 pounds will be accepted as the average weight per cubic yard of all of the above-mentioned materials, and that bills will be paid for on that basis, at the rate of 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds f. o. b. cars, which price includes all railway freight charges from Niles to San Francisco, but does not include any additional charges, such as switching charges or trackage charges, if there be any, at destination.

"Payments to be made at Niles Sand Gravel & Rock Company by Storrie & Co. not later than the 20th of each month and every month for all material shipped from Niles to and including the last day of the preceding month."

The court found that by virtue of the terms of the agreement plaintiff agreed that the average weight per cubic yard of said material should be 2,400 pounds.

Further, there are findings that plaintiff duly performed all the conditions of the contract on its part to be performed, that it delivered 135,564.26 tons of said material to defendants in full compliance with said agreement, for which defendants agreed to pay $103,116.19; that the reasonable value of said materials was 75 cents per ton for 2,000 pounds f. o. b. San Francisco, and that no part thereof except $87,920.68 had been paid, which left a balance of $15,195.51 owing to plaintiff.

There is further finding that plaintiff delivered all said material at the railroad spur tracks in San Francisco and paid all the freight charges thereon to said railroad spur tracks.

The principal ground of error claimed here is the refusal of the court to make certain findings in support of defendants' answer and counterclaim. Defendants in substance requested that the court find that the plaintiff warranted that the average weight of the materials would not exceed 2,400 pounds to the cubic yard, while in fact the sand delivered averaged in weight more than 3,000 pounds to the cubic yard, and all other materials averaged in weight more than 2,800 pounds to the cubic yard; also that the total number of cubic yards of sand delivered was 10,464.83, and the total number of cubic yards of other material delivered was 85,619, making a total of 96,083.83 cubic yards, and that because of the excess weight of sand and materials defendants paid out and were damaged in the sum of $7,603.31 for hauling, transportation, and carriage in excess of the amount they would have been obliged to pay if the sand and materials had not exceeded an average weight of 2,400 pounds per cubic yard.

[1] The theory of the defendants is that, as plaintiff was to be paid 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, and the weight was to average 2,400 pounds per cubic yard, this, in effect, was an agreement that the purchase price should be 90 cents per cubic yard, and that the court should have made a finding as to the number of cubic yards delivered, as well as the number of tons. The trouble with this theory is that the parties contracted for the purchase and sale by weight, and not by measure; and, with this idea in view, apparently an accurate account was kept of each and every ton delivered, while there is no suggestion that a measurement was ever made or an account kept of every cubic yard delivered. It is more than likely that the only evidence before the court related to the weights of various and separate cubic yards measured and weighed out by way of sample. The court, however, found that 135,564.26 tons of material was delivered, and this, taken in connection with the finding that it performed the condition of the agreement as to the average weight of 2,400 pounds per cubic yard, is in effect a finding that approximately 113,000 cubic yards was delivered, and not 96,083.83 cubic yards, as appellant requested the court to find.

[2] There is another reason why no error is shown on the part of the court in refusing to sign the findings proposed by the defendants. None of the evidence taken at the trial is before this court. The record merely shows "that plaintiff and defendant introduced evidence on each and all of said allegations." In the absence of such evidence as might have sufficed to sustain a finding of the court upon the issues raised by the answer and counterclaim, we are unable to determine whether or not it was incumbent upon the court to make the findings which the defendants proposed. As against the presumption in favor of the judgment upon appeal it must be made to affirmatively appear that the evidence introduced was sufficient to authorize such a finding as would "have the effect of invalidating a judgment fully supported by the findings made." Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098. "Such a finding," says the Supreme Court in Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504, "would not be authorized if the evidence introduced was insufficient to sustain the allegations presenting the issues, any more than it would if there were no evidence introduced in reference thereto." Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 526, 51 Pac. 848; Estate of Barclay, 152 Cal. 758, 93 Pac. 1012.

[3] It is urged that the complaint is insufficient to support the judgment because it appears therefrom that plaintiff guaranteed that the average weight of the materials should not exceed 2,400 pounds per cubic yard, but that no facts are alleged showing that this condition of the agreement was performed. There is an allegation, however, "that plaintiff fully complied with this and every other condition of the contract."

[4] Assuming that there was a defective allegation in the complaint, section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that no judgment shall be reversed by reason of any defect unless it appears that the defect was prejudicial, and that by reason thereof the appellant suffered substantial injury, etc.

The contrary not appearing, we may assume in support of the judgment that no objection was made to the admission of evidence proving that respondent had complied with this condition of the contract. The answer alleged that the sand weighed more than 3,000 pounds per cubic yard, and that all other materials averaged in weight more than 2,800 pounds per cubic yard. The question as to the average weight of the materials per cubic yard was in substance the real issue presented by the pleadings and upon which evidence was introduced by the parties during a trial which lasted 27 days. There is nothing to indicate that appellants suffered any injury because of the claimed defect in the pleading, and it must be disregarded.

[5] It is urged that there is an error in mathematical calculations, and consequently that the findings do not support the judgment. It is undisputed that plaintiff delivered 135,564.26 tons of material at 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, which amounts to only $101,673.19. The court found that the defendants agreed to pay $103,116.19, and that the reasonable value of the materials was $103,116.19, and was and is 75 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, and that no part of said sum had been paid except $87,920.68, leaving a balance of $15,195.51. Manifestly from these figures it appears that the balance due plaintiff is only $13,752.51, or $1,443 less than the amount found due by the findings.

The answer alleged that the total amount of money that became due to plaintiff under the contract was $86,475.68, and that they (defendants) paid to plaintiff $86,478.18 in full satisfaction of the claim, which was an overpayment of $2.50 made by mistake. It will be observed that the findings show that the defendants paid $1,442.50 in excess of the amount alleged in the answer. It is claimed by respondent, but disputed by appellants, that the error represents charges of $1,442.97 on respondent's ledger which were afterwards credited on the other side, which did not affect the balance due. The record shows conclusively that the actual tonnage delivered was 135,564.26 tons, just as the court found it to be, and which at 75 cents per ton amounts to only $101,673.19. The findings declare that $87,920.68 has been paid. It is true that the court found that defendants agreed to pay $103,116.19, but there is not an intimation to be found anywhere that defendants agreed to pay for anything other than the 135,564.26 tons of materials. Furthermore, it cannot be presumed, in the face of the court's finding that $87,920.68 had been paid, that any part of that sum represents a credit of some kind the nature of which is unexplained, and the fact disputed, or that it represents anything other than cash or its equivalent. Presumably the evidence established the fact that defendants paid more than the amount alleged in their answer.

From what has been said it follows that the findings do not support a judgment in excess of $13,752.51. It is therefore ordered that the judgment for the sum of $15,195.31 entered herein be modified by reducing the amount thereof by the sum of $1,442.80, leaving as the proper balance due said plaintiff the sum of $13,752.51, and that as to said last-named sum the judgment should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

1. Venue 🔑68—On motion for change counter affidavits as to judge's bias need not be filed within five days.

Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, requiring counter affidavits on the question of a judge's disqualification by bias to be filed not more than five days after the filing of the affidavit, does not apply to a motion under section 397 to change the place of trial to another county on the ground of bias and prejudice on the part of the judge.

2. Venue 🔑72 — No error on motion for change because judge was sworn as witness.

Conceding that a motion to change the place of trial on the ground that the judge was biased should have been heard on affidavits, no error was committed because the judge was sworn as a witness apparently for the purpose of submitting himself to cross-examination where he only testified in effect that the matters set forth in his affidavit were true.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Z. B. Stuart against Rose Everly. From an order denying a motion to change the place of trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. B. Stuart, C. W. Byrer, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph C. McComish, of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing plaintiff's motion to change the place of trial in an action wherein the plaintiff seeks to recover, in payment of professional services rendered as an attorney at law, a specified interest in certain real property to which he alleges he is entitled under the terms of a contract between him and the defendant.

Plaintiff demanded that the place of trial of the action be changed from Monterey county to San Benito county, basing his motion upon the ground that he could not have a fair trial in Monterey county: First, for the reason that the citizens thereof were prejudiced against him, and, secondly, on account of the alleged bias and prejudice of the judge of the superior court of that county against him. The motion was denied, and the plaintiff appeals.

As the allegation of the motion based upon the alleged prejudice of citizens against the plaintiff, the court's action, in so far as it has reference to that phase of the motion, is not attacked, nor could it well be, no proper showing having been made or attempted on that ground.

[1] As to the other allegation, concerning the state of mind of the judge of the superior court toward the plaintiff, the appellant urges that the trial court should not have considered the affidavit of the defendant for the reason that it was not filed within five days after plaintiff's affidavit was filed. Subdivision 4 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, when it is sought to show that the judge before whom the case is about to be tried cannot give either party a fair and impartial trial by reason of prejudice or bias, said judge shall forthwith secure the services of some other judge of the same or another county to preside at the trial of the action, and that the affidavit alleging the disqualification of a judge must be served upon the adverse party at least one day before the day set for the trial of such action, and that the counter affidavit "may be filed at least one day thereafter, or such further time as the court may extend the time of filing such counter affidavit not exceeding five days. * * *"

Passing the point that this provision of the Code of Civil Procedure is directory only, a complete and simple answer to the appellant's position is that the present proceeding is not based upon subdivision 4 of section 170, for it is not sought to have the trial judge select another judge from the same or another county, but the motion is for a change of the place of trial from one county to another, and therefore is controlled, not by those provisions, but by the provisions of section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and these include no such limit of time. Dakan v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. App. 52, 82 Pac. 1129. It is clear that the motion was not based upon the last-mentioned section through inadvertence, for the plaintiff demanded, not merely a change of judges, but that the trial of the action be transferred to another county, supporting his demand by an allegation of bias and prejudice on the part of the citizens of the county of Monterey, and the same conclusion is indicated by the circumstance that at the completion of the hearing upon this matter the plaintiff in effect declined to consent to the suggestion of the trial judge that the judge of the superior court of San Benito county be called in to preside at the trial, who is the judge before whom the case would have been tried if the case had been transferred to the county demanded in plaintiff's motion.

[2] Conceding that the rule is that a motion of this character must be heard upon affidavits (Mercantile T. Co. of S. F. v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 173 Cal. 487, 160 Pac. 545, it was not violated in this proceeding, for, while the presiding judge was sworn as a witness, all he testified to in effect was that the matters set forth in his affidavit were true. In being sworn as a witness, it would appear that he merely intended to submit himself to cross-examination.

The order is affirmed.

1. Evidence 🔑208(6)—Witnesses 🔑392(1)—Superseded pleadings admissible as admissions or to impeach party on cross-examination.

Where a party is a witness, pleadings that have been superseded by amended pleadings are available as admissions or on cross-examination for purposes of impeachment.

2. Witnesses 🔑387—Cross-examination of plaintiff as to why he did not allege fact in complaint held argumentative.

Where plaintiff suing for injuries testified on cross-examination that he knew a belt was split at the time of the accident, a question as to why he did not so allege in the original complaint was properly excluded as argumentative.

3. Witnesses 🔑280—Question on cross-examination calling for inference or answer to argument properly excluded.

A question on cross-examination which does not call for a fact, but for an inference on the part of the witness or for an answer to an argument contained in the question, is properly excluded.

4. Evidence 🔑528(1)—As to finding of pus in injured arm several months after accident and cause thereof held competent.

In an action for personal injuries, testimony of a doctor who examined plaintiff about three months after the accident as to finding pus, and that such condition might result though the treatment was skillful and proper, was competent and it was a question for the jury whether it was one of the natural consequences of the accident.

5. Appeal and error 🔑232(2) — General grounds of objection to evidence does not raise question of proper foundation.

An objection to evidence on the general grounds of incompetency, irelevancy, and immateriality does not authorize consideration on appeal of the objection that a proper foundation had not been laid for the question.

6. Master and servant 🔑289(28)—Employee's negligence in shifting belt by hand held a question for the jury.

In an employee's action for injuries sustained in shifting a belt by hand, where there was evidence that it was the custom not only in defendant's workshop, but generally, to so shift the belt, and that it was safer to do so than to shift it by the use of a stick or tool, the question of plaintiff's negligence in using his hand to shift the belt was one of fact for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by August Schuh against the Oil Well Supply Company and the R. H. Herron Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Herron Company appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, and Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kuster & Salisbury and Earle Smith, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant R. H. Herron Company from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was injured while operating a lathe in a machine shop owned by the appellant. While operating the lathe the plaintiff, in order to make it run faster, attempted to shift the belt by which the lathe was turned, and in doing so his left hand and arm were seriously injured. The facts of the case are fully stated by Mr. Justice Shaw in the opinion rendered upon a former appeal of this case (Schuh v. R. H. Herron Co.), and which is reported in 177 Cal. at page 13, 169 Pac. at page 682.

[1] There is a difference in the averments of the first and second amended complaints as to how the accident happened, and at the trial plaintiff's testimony was in accord with those of the later pleading. With reference to these changes and the contradictory accounts given by plaintiff of the causes of the accident, the appellant claims that it was denied permission to cross-examine him. It is true, as asserted by the appellant, that the rule is established in this state that, where a party is a witness, pleadings that have been superseded by amended pleadings are available as admissions, and for use on cross-examination for purposes of impeachment (Schuh v. R. H. Herron Co., supra); but here no objection or ruling was made against the exercise of that right, nor was there any misunderstanding as to the law on the subject, for it had been stated on the former appeal in this case. The objection which brought about the ruling here complained of was upon the ground that the question was argumentative, and it was sustained upon that ground alone. From the record it appears that immediately before the ruling assigned as error the plaintiff's attention had been directed to the difference between the allegations of his first and second amended complaints, and between the former and his testimony in support of the latter, and upon being asked to explain this difference he replied that he left the matter of pleading to his attorneys. Upon this reply being made the following proceedings occurred:

> "Now, as a matter of fact, Mr. Schuh, was it not an afterthought of your own that the belt was split, and the fact is you did not know it was split until long after you were injured?
> "The Witness: I knew it was split the very instant of my accident.
> "Mr. Kemp: Then why did you not allege in your complaint that the belt was defective, was split, and that your hand was caught in there and you were thereby injured?
> "Mr. Salisbury: Just a moment;— we object to that as argumentative.
> "The Court: Objection; very well, objection sustained. You can argue that to the jury."

[2, 3] As before stated, the question was argumentative, and the objection thereto on that ground was correctly sustained. A question on cross-examination which does not call for a fact, but for an inference on the part of a witness, or for an answer to an argument contained in the question itself, is properly rejected. People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 21, 65 Pac. 9. Appellant did not reframe the question or make any attempt to follow this line of cross-examination, for the reason, doubtless, that he had already succeeded in getting before the jury the inconsistent statements.

[4] A further ruling complained of as error was the admission of the testimony of Dr. Clayton J. Hinman, who had not examined the plaintiff until about three months after his accident. The witness was asked to tell the jury in what condition he found the plaintiff's arm the first time he examined it. Over the general objection that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, he replied in part that plaintiff's left arm was shrunken, that he could not lay his left hand back down, that his grip was weak, and that the injury was permanent. He also testified that he had found the wound discharging both serum and pus and some blood with a foul odor; that upon probing the sinus he had discovered a spicule of dead bone in there, and further testified:

> "I cannot say that the condition that I found was part of or resultant from any improper treatment prior to the time he came to me. I would say that sometimes we have with a fracture, as this bone had been fractured, not a good apposition of the ends. There will be portions of the dead bone come off. I always endeavor to get good apposition, but I do not always succeed."

Appellant's attack on the answer of the witness is directed to that portion thereof which refers to the pus condition of the wound; and, if we understand the argument, it is to the effect that the proper foundation was not laid for the question in that it was not shown that the pus condition might not have resulted from the carelessness of the plaintiff or some of his attendants. It is true that the pus condition might be the result of improper care or carelessness; but, on the other hand, the witness said that such condition might result when the treatment was skillful and proper. The evidence was competent. Whether or not this condition was one of the natural consequences of the accident was, we think, a question for the jury.

[5] But, to address ourselves to the appellant's contention that the proper foundation for this evidence was not laid, a sufficient answer to this claim is that the objection was not made upon that ground. When the objection is, as was the case here, upon the general grounds of incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, the objection that a proper foundation had not been laid for the question will not be considered on appeal. Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271.

[6] We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in permitting evidence tending to show that it was the custom of the appellant's employees to shift the belt of the lathe by hand. There is evidence in the record not only that such was the custom in the appellant's workshop, but that it was a general custom. There was also evidence to the effect that this is a safe method; that it is safer than to shift the belt by the use of a stick or tool. Under the circumstances of this case it is not obvious that to shift the belt by the use of the bare hand is negligence. It was not, therefore, a question of law, but one of fact for the jury, and it was so decided in the former appeal in this case.

[7] The appellant further complains of a ruling of the court on the admission of evidence, but the objection to the proffered testimony was placed on no specific ground, counsel merely saying, "I object." No ground of objection being stated, the rule is well settled that the objection is insufficient. People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 428, 24 Pac. 1006; Hutchinson v. Whitmore, 95 Mich. 592, 55 N. W. 438. Moreover, the question called for the witness' opinion as an expert on a matter with reference to which such testimony is competent, and for that reason also there was no error in the ruling of the court.

Two certain instructions are complained of. As to the appellant's contention under this head it is sufficient to say that from a careful consideration of said instructions in connection with the record we are of the opinion that the appellant's claim of prejudicial error is not well founded.

STIEGLITZ v. SETTLE. (Civ. 3612.)

1. Attorney and client 🔑123(1) — Attorney who deals with client must show fair and just conduct.

In dealing with his client, the highest degree of fairness and good faith is required of an attorney, and courts view such transactions with suspicion and examine them with the utmost scrutiny; in any attempt to enforce such an agreement the burden being on the attorney to show his dealing was fair and just, and that his client made the contract freely and with full knowledge of all facts.

2. Attorney and client 🔑123(1)—Attorney in partition suit acting for owner in sale of land bound by rule of good faith.

An attorney, who acted for the owner of land in partition suit and was also her attorney in the matter of the sale of the land, was bound by the rule of good faith and just dealing in making the sale through the owner's attorney in fact, an obligation which he did not perform by agreeing with the attorney in fact, without knowledge of the owner, to divide an amount of money received from a buyer, or any commission received.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Henry Stieglitz against Maria Encarnacion de Sepulveda Settle. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. C. Petchner, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. A. Alderson and K. A. Miller, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action instituted by the plaintiff to recover commissions as a broker for services rendered in the sale of the interest of the defendant, Mrs. Maria E. de Settle, in a certain tract of land consisting of 886 acres. The plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $12,581.20, and the defendant appeals, the ground for reversal urged being that the trial court, by its instructions to the jury, based upon what it deemed to be the law of the case, practically withdrew the question at issue from their consideration. We think this contention must be sustained. A reference to some of the testimony in the case will show the grounds upon which we base this conclusion.

Prior to and at the time of said sale the plaintiff was attorney at law practising in San Pedro, and the defendant, being the widow of one Aurelia W. Sepulveda, also resided in that locality. Later she married Henry Settle, and the latter for that reason has been joined as a party defendant. The deceased husband of Maria E. de Settle left a large estate, consisting principally of land; his only heirs being said defendant and his daughter. Part of the estate coming to said defendant was an undivided one-half interest in the tract of land above referred to. She was unable to speak the English language, nor could she read or write any tongue. At the time of the transaction here involved she had given a general power of attorney to one Richard Mahar, who had been the administrator of her deceased husband's estate, and the plaintiff had acted as attorney for the administrator. The plaintiff had also represented the defendant in important litigation, and was also acting as her attorney in a partition suit instituted by said daughter against her for the division of said 886-acre tract, which suit was pending at the time of the sale by him of the defendant's interest in said land. The defendant, being indebted, decided to sell said interest, and after talking the matter over with her attorney in fact, Mahar, directed him to secure a purchaser therefor. The record does not show when this conversation took place, but later, and in the month of February, 1912, Mahar reported to the plaintiff that the land had to be sold, and that the highest offer he had been able to secure for the defendant's interest therein was $250 per acre. Thereupon the plaintiff stated as his opinion that the price offered was too low and that he thought he could secure a purchaser at a better price. He accordingly requested Mahar to see the defendant, and ascertain whether she would authorize him to sell the land and pay him the usual commission. Mahar, according to his testimony given at the trial, took the matter up with the defendant, and reported to the plaintiff that she was willing to permit him to sell the property and to pay him a commission. Plaintiff thereupon began negotiations with one Geo. H. Peck, also a resident of San Pedro, with the result that on the 19th of March, 1912, plaintiff effected a sale of defendant's interest in the land for $400 per acre to Peck.

According to the testimony of the plaintiff and Mahar, the original authority from the defendant to the plaintiff to sell the property was verbal but when plaintiff was informed by Mahar that there would be some delay in paying the commission he requested that the authority theretofore given be put in writing. Thereupon plaintiff prepared such a contract, dating it two days earlier than the agreement of sale with Peck, and it was executed by plaintiff and by Mahar as attorney in fact for the defendant. Touching this phase of the case the defendant testified that Mahar had no conversation with her in which she promised to pay plaintiff a commission in the event he should secure a purchaser for the property. As an incident of the sale, on account of which the plaintiff is suing for a commission, is the giving of a check for $500 by the purchaser to Mahar, and its division between the latter and the plaintiff. As to this the plaintiff testified that after the contract of sale had been consummated, Peck called on him and offered him a check of $500 as a fee for preparing the written contract of sale. This the plaintiff declined to accept, saying: "I don't want anything at all. You can draw it to Richard Mahar if you want to." This was done. Mahar upon receiving the check, remarked to the plaintiff that they each had reduced their fees as administrator and attorney for the administrator, respectively, $350 and $375, that it would be fair to accept this check for $500, and to divide the amount thereof equally between them, which was done. The plaintiff's testimony is that this $500 was not paid as a fee, and Peck testified that this payment was made by him for the purpose of binding the contract and for no other purpose.

According to the testimony of Mahar, there was an understanding between him and the plaintiff to divide between them any commission collected by plaintiff on account of the sale of the property, and this is denied by the plaintiff. A witness for the defendant testified that he had, on behalf of a real estate concern, representing a prospective purchaser, about two weeks before the contract of sale to Peck was executed, made an offer to Mahar to purchase defendant's interest in the property at $400 per acre net, without liability on the part of the vendor to pay a commission; that Mahar rejected this offer, saying that the property had already been sold to Peck. According to the testimony of Mahar, the plaintiff must have been aware of this offer, for Mahar as plaintiff's witness, testified that he had submitted every offer received by him to the plaintiff. Other witnesses testified that on a certain occasion plaintiff, when asked why he had not given a certain real estate agent a chance to sell the property, replied that he had nothing to do with the matter at all, that he was merely the defendant's attorney.

From the evidence it can fairly be said that the plaintiff was the attorney for the defendant, not only in the partition suit, but also in the very matter out of which this litigation sprang, that is, the sale of the property. Mahar must have considered him as such, for he reported to and conferred with him about all offers received for it made to him either before or after the sale to Peck. We have already referred to the statement of the plaintiff that his only connection with the sale was as defendant's attorney. At the conclusion of the trial the court, taking the view that what the Supreme Court had said on the former appeal was the law of the case, virtually instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

[1] The relation of attorney and client has always been regarded as one of special trust and confidence. Therefore in dealing with his client the highest degree of fairness and good faith is required, and courts view all such transactions with suspicion, and examine them with the utmost scrutiny, and in any attempt to enforce such an agreement the burden is upon the attorney to show that the dealing was fair and just, and that the client entered into the contract freely and with full knowledge of all the facts connected with the transaction. Felton v. Le Brenton, 92 Cal. 469, 28 Pac. 490; Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 123, 33 Pac. 836. In the first of these cases cited, the Supreme Court said:

> "While an attorney is not prohibited from having business transactions with his client, yet, inasmuch as the relation of attorney and client is one wherein the attorney is apt to have very great influence over the client, especially in transactions which are a part of or intimately connected with the very business in reference to which the relation exists, such transactions are always scrutinized by courts with jealous care, and are set aside at the mere instance of the client, unless the attorney can show by extrinsic evidence that his client acted with full knowledge of all the facts connected with such transaction, and fully understood their effect; and in any attempt by the attorney to enforce an agreement on the part of the client growing out of such transaction, the burden of proof is always upon the attorney to show that the dealing was fair and just, and that the client was fully advised."

Some of the features of this case, if the evidence and inferences fairly deducible therefrom are to be credited, are too strongly marked to admit of any doubt of the applicability to it of the rule just announced.

[2] Notwithstanding that Mahar held defendant's power of attorney, and had authority thereunder to make the contract with plaintiff here in question, still plaintiff was the defendant's attorney at law in the pending partition suit, and there is ample in the evidence to warrant the conclusion that he was also her attorney, in the matter of the sale of this property. Consequently he was bound by the rule just stated. The mere fact that he was dealing with her through her attorney in fact did not excuse him from acting through the transaction in the highest good faith toward her. How can it be said that he observed this obligation if he, without the knowledge of his client, agreed with her attorney in fact to divide with him the $500 received from Peck, or any commission received by him from a sale of her property? Can it be doubted that the prospect of profiting through such a division would naturally influence the conduct of the defendant's attorney in fact, in the discharge of his duty to his principal? And there can be no doubt that the plaintiff acted in bad faith and to the prejudice of the defendant if, according to one of the witnesses for the defendant, he, before the sale to Peck, permitted an offer of $400 per acre net to be rejected without investigation as to the character of the offer. It is quite apparent that if Mahar, the defendant's attorney in fact, had a bona fide offer of $400 per acre net, and this was known to the plaintiff before entering into the agreement of sale with Peck (as the jury from the evidence would be warranted in believing), it was an act of gross bad faith on the plaintiff's part in concerting with Mahar to ignore such offer, and conclude a sale to another person at the same rate per acre, but upon which they were to receive and divide a large sum of money as commission.

As was said in the former appeal (175 Cal. 131, 165 Pac. 436), an attorney at law is under no actual incapacity to deal with or purchase from his client. All that he is required to do when the relation of attorney and client exists, and when the questioned transaction has a bearing upon the relationship, is to make a clear showing that there has been no abuse of confidence, no advantage taken. It may be that in the case at bar the jury would find that the plaintiff did act towards the defendant with the required high degree of good faith and without concealment. All we have endeavored to show in the foregoing references to the testimony is that, taking the evidence favorable to the defendant, a case was made out for the consideration of the jury, just as the Supreme Court in the former appeal demonstrated that considering the evidence favorable to the plaintiff, the court committed error in granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit. As to the former opinion in this case, it cannot be held that what the court there said is the law of the case. Here we are not considering an appeal from a judgment following the granting of a nonsuit, and there is a substantial difference in the evidence in the two trials.

WINBIGLER v. SHATTUCK. (Civ. 3439.)

1. Executors and administrators 🔑517 — Without authority outside jurisdiction of government under which appointed.

It is fundamental that, as expressly provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1913, the authority of an executor or administrator does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the state or government under which he is vested with his authority.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑519(1)—Foreign executor may not present claim against estate.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1494, 1496, and 1500, relative to the presentation of claims against decedents' estates, a foreign executor has no authority to present a claim against an estate being administered in California in favor of the estate of which he is executor.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑519(1) — Payment of claim to claimant's foreign executor does not discharge from liability.

Payment of a claim against a decedent's estate to the claimant's foreign executor is not an acquittance protecting the estate from which payment is made against the claims of possible creditors within the state of the claimant's estate.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑431(2) — Presentation of claim by foreign executor will not support action by domestic administrator subsequently appointed.

The presentation of a claim against a decedent's estate by the claimant's executor acting under foreign letters of administration would not support an action on the claim by the administrator with the will annexed of the claimant subsequently appointed by a California court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Theo. A. Winbigler, as administrator with the will annexed of D. Willard Beam, deceased, against George B. Shattuck, as executor of C. E. Shattuck, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. M. Davis, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Head & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of defendant. D. Willard Beam, a resident of New York, and C. E. Shattuck, a resident of California, were joint indorsers of certain notes issued by a New York corporation designated the Hemlock Lake Canning Company. Both parties died, leaving these notes unpaid. Proceedings were had in the courts of the state of New York, wherein Otis A. Beam was appointed and qualified as executor of the last will and testament of D. Willard Beam, deceased. As alleged in the complaint, which allegation, for the purposes of this decision, we will assume to be true, a claim based upon the indorsement of the notes by D. Willard Beam, deceased, was presented to his executor, who, after approval and allowance, paid the same out of the assets of the estate, as alleged in the complaint, and which we likewise assume to be true.

Beam's co-indorser, C. E. Shattuck, died at his place of residence in California, and letters testamentary were duly issued to George B. Shattuck, who qualified as executor of his estate. Thereafter Otis A. Beam, in his capacity as executor of the estate of D. Willard Beam, deceased, and under and by virtue only of his appointment as such by the courts of New York, presented to George B. Shattuck, as executor of the estate of C. E. Shattuck, deceased, for allowance a claim in the nature of a demand for contribution, which claim was based upon the fact that said claimant had, as executor of the Beam estate, paid the notes so jointly indorsed by D. Willard Beam, deceased, and C. E. Shattuck, deceased. This claim was rejected on the 18th day of May, 1917. Thereafter proceedings were had and taken in the superior court of Orange county, Cal., wherein Theo. A. Winbigler was, by an order of court made on July 27, 1917, duly appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate of D. Willard Beam, deceased, and upon qualifying he, as such administrator and in the absence of presenting any claim himself, instituted this action for contribution, basing it solely and alone upon the claim so presented by Otis A. Beam in his capacity as executor of the estate of D. Willard Beam under and by virtue of the appointment so made by the court in the state of New York.

Upon this statement of facts, clearly shown by the record, we are of the opinion that plaintiff in no event was entitled to maintain the action; hence no purpose could be served in discussing other rulings of the court assigned as error.

[1-3] It is fundamental law that "the authority of an executor or administrator does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the state or government under which he is vested with his authority"; and while a foreign executor may receive property voluntarily given to him, he cannot by suit in the courts of this state enforce the right of the estate thereto. Section 1913, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Rawitzer, 175 Cal. 585, 166 Pac. 581. Indeed, as we understand counsel for appellant, he concedes this proposition, but, without citing any authority in support thereof, insists that a distinction should be drawn between the authority of such foreign executor to present a claim for allowance and the right to maintain such an action. Under section 1500, Code of Civil Procedure, a necessary prerequisite of enforcing the payment of a debt against the estate of a deceased person is that a claim based thereon and supported by an affidavit (section 1494, Code Civ. Proc.) shall be duly presented to the executor or administrator for allowance, and thereafter, if allowed by the executor, it shall be presented to the judge for his approval, which, if given, shall be indorsed thereon, and then, upon the filing of the same, it "shall be ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration." Section 1496, Code Civ. Proc. On the other hand, if rejected by the executor or administrator, upon a proper presentation by one entitled to have it allowed, an action may be brought, the effect of which, upon obtaining judgment, is to establish the claim against the estate, to be likewise paid in due course of administration. The act of Otis A. Beam in presenting the claim, as shown by the letters testamentary issued out of the New York court, was in his representative capacity as executor of the estate of D. Willard Beam, deceased, but such letters possessed no extraterritorial force outside of that state. Under and by virtue of them Otis A. Beam was vested with no power to exercise the functions of the office of such executor in this state, or take any of the statutory steps to collect the debt alleged to be due his testator. Schouler on Executors, §§ 164 and 173. Outside of the state of New York the letters testamentary issued to Otis A. Beam constituted no evidence of his authority to act here in a representative capacity. His relation to the estate of D. Willard Beam, deceased, was, as to defendant, that of an entire stranger, and hence entitled to no recognition as having authority to deal with the property as assets of the estate in California in any manner whatsoever. Had the claim been allowed and paid, his receipt therefor could not be deemed an acquittance to defendant in protecting him from the claims of possible creditors of D. Willard Beam in this state.

[4] Moreover, the action was brought by plaintiff herein upon a rejected claim not presented by him, but by another party, between whom and himself there existed no privity. Low v. Bartlett, 8 Allen (Mass.) 259; Richards v. Blaisdell, 12 Cal. App. 101. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

HOWARD et al. v. WORTHINGTON.
(Civ. 3432.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚿706(8)—Plaintiffs suing for injuries in automobile collision entitled to instruction on last clear chance.

In an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiffs through negligent operation of defendant's automobile, in view of the evidence, plaintiffs held entitled to an appropriate instruction in the terms proposed by them or the legal equivalent thereof on the doctrine of last clear chance.

2. Municipal corporations ⚿706(3)—Burden on defendant, automobile operator, to show contributory negligence.

In an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiffs through negligent operation of defendant's automobile, the burden was on defendant to prove his allegations of contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, and plaintiffs had no burden to prove that they were not guilty of such negligence.

3. Trial ⚿296(1)—Specific erroneous instruction not cured by correct general charge.

Where the court in the instructions first correctly states a rule in general terms, and then directly states the contrary rule in language pointed specifically to the instant case, it is not appropriate to hold the error is cured by a general view of the instructions as a whole.

4. Municipal corporations ⚿706(8)—Instruction stating rule of sudden danger erroneous as not limiting doctrine to case of plaintiff's negligence.

In an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiffs through negligent operation of defendant's automobile, in stating the rule of sudden danger the court in specifying the duty of defendant's driver should have limited application of the rule to a case where the danger or emergency was caused through the negligence of plaintiff.

5. Municipal corporations ⚿705(2)—Driver approaching street intersection from right has superior right.

Under the Motor Vehicle Act of 1917, in its provisions that the operator of an automobile approaching the intersection of a public highway shall yield right of way to a vehicle approaching the intersection from the right, the driver approaching from the right has the superior right if both persons reach the intersection simultaneously.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by A. F. Howard and the State Compensation Insurance Fund against A. J. Worthington. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action plaintiffs seek to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff Howard by reason of alleged negligence in the operation of an automobile of the defendant. Additional damages are claimed for injuries to the plaintiff Howard's automobile. The injuries complained of were the result of a collision between the automobile of the plaintiff Howard and the automobile of the defendant. The collision occurred at the intersection of Brand boulevard and West Sixth street in the city of Glendale, while the plaintiff was driving his automobile southerly on Brand boulevard and while the defendant's automobile, driven by his employee, one Lucas, was traveling westerly on Sixth street. The defendant by his answer denied the negligent operation of his own automobile, and alleged that at said time and place the plaintiff Howard was himself negligent and that the injuries complained of by him, if any, were directly and proximately caused solely by the negligence of said Howard. In accordance with the jury's verdict, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The errors claimed and relied upon by appellants consist in the court's refusal to instruct the jury as requested by the plaintiffs, and in the giving of certain instructions to the jury.

[1] The plaintiffs requested and the court refused to give the following instruction:

> "Doctrine of last chance. Although you may find that plaintiff, by his negligence, got into a place of danger, yet if the defendant discovered in such danger and thereafterwards by the use of ordinary care could have prevented the accident, then it was his duty to have done so and a failure on defendant's part to have thus prevented the accident was negligence, and if such negligence was the sole proximate cause, then you will find for the plaintiff."

The court not only refused the proposed instruction, but it gave no other on the same subject. The instruction itself is not criticized by respondent. The only question presented is whether or not the evidence was such that appellants were entitled to have the jury instructed as requested on the topic stated. Brand boulevard in the central part thereof is occupied by the double-track railroad of the Pacific Electric Railway Company. That street is 100 feet wide from curb to curb, with a 40-foot roadway on each side of the railroad tracks. The street is used as a double street; that is, vehicles travel north and south on both sides of the car tracks. The evidence is conflicting with respect to the questions of speed of the automobiles of plaintiff Howard and of the defendant while approaching and crossing the intersection, and upon the further question concerning their relative positions at the time when the plaintiff Howard entered upon the intersection. According to some of this evidence, the jury might have reached the conclusion that when Howard was crossing into West Sixth street the defendant was on the westerly car track, and that the distance between the two automobiles was 30 feet or more; that Howard's machine swerved to get out of the way and he was doing all that he could in that emergency to avoid the collision; that the defendant was in a position to see and did see that unless defendant's machine was stopped a collision would occur; that the defendant could have stopped his machine in time to avoid the accident, but voluntarily did not do so. In this condition of the evidence the plaintiffs were entitled to an appropriate instruction in the terms proposed by them or the legal equivalent thereof. Starck v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 277, 156 Pac. 51, L. R. A. 1916E, 58; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85.

[2, 3] The court correctly instructed the jury that the burden was upon the defendant to prove his allegations of contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence. But the court gave the following additional instruction:

> "In order, therefore, to find a verdict for the plaintiff, you must not only find from a preponderance of all the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff; and you must further find that the evidence shows, by a preponderance thereof, that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, however slight, contributing proximately thereto; otherwise, your verdict should be for the defendant."

The court thus in its later instruction shifted from the defendant the burden of proving plaintiff's contributory negligence, and imposed upon plaintiff the burden of proving that he was not guilty thereof. This is not the law, and the giving of such instruction to the jury was erroneous. Where, as here, the court first correctly states the rule in general terms, and then directly states the contrary rule in language pointed specifically to the instant case, it is not appropriate to hold that the error is cured by a general view of the instructions as a whole. The case is not like that of Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 Pac. 1117, cited by respondent, where, after holding that a certain general instruction was erroneous, the Court of Appeal said:

> "We are satisfied, however, from a consideration of the instructions as a whole, that this general instruction did not operate to mislead the jury, for the correct rule relative to contributory negligence was, in several other instructions, stated and restated, and thereby the effect of the erroneous instructions was palliated, if not entirely negatived."

[4] The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "A person suddenly confronted with danger through the negligence of another, is not required to use that calm, dispassionate judgment and action that is required in calmer moments and when not under a stress of circumstances. Therefore, if you find in this case that the plaintiff Howard was suddenly confronted with danger, caused through the negligence of the defendant, which was either caused by the excessive speed, if any, of the defendant, or his being on the wrong side of the highway, if you find he was on the wrong side of the highway or his failure, if any, to control the movement of his automobile, then the plaintiff Howard, in attempting to escape impending danger, was only required to use the care that an ordinarily prudent person would use under the same or similar circumstances, and not that degree of care that is required when not thus confronted with danger. If you find that he did use the care, under the circumstances proven, that an ordinarily prudent person would have used, then he was not guilty of contributory negligence. On the other hand, if the driver, Mr. Lucas, was confronted with danger, suddenly, of a collision between the automobile driven by him and the plaintiff's automobile, then he was required at that time to use only ordinary care to prevent such collision; that is, the care that an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under stress of circumstances, in danger of impending collision; and the care then required is not that degree of care that persons are expected to exercise in calmer moments and where they have time for deliberation; and if you find that the said Lucas was then confronted unexpectedly with danger of a collision with the plaintiff's automobile, and if you find that under those circumstances he used the care that an ordinarily prudent person would have used to avoid the collision, then he was not guilty of negligence, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

It will be observed that in stating this rule with reference to the plaintiff Howard the court, very correctly, gave him the benefit thereof only in the event that he was confronted with danger caused through the negligence of the defendant. But in specifying the duty of the defendant's driver, the court gives defendant the benefit of this rule, if confronted with sudden danger, without the limitation that it must have been caused through the negligence of the plaintiff. It is not questioned that the rule should have been applied alike in both instances. The only defense offered by respondent for this discrimination is that the instruction as a whole could not have misled the jury. The instruction as given was erroneous.

[5] Referring to the Motor Vehicle Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 382) and the provision therein to the effect that the operator of an automobile approaching the intersection of a public highway shall yield the right of way to a vehicle approaching said intersection from the right of such first-named vehicle, the court said:

"That means what it says, and it means that, other things being equal, the driver approaching the intersection shall yield the right of way to a vehicle approaching such intersection from the right of such first-named vehicle; but the one reaching the intersection first has the right of way, and if the one approaching from the left reaches the intersection, gets into the intersection, first, other things being equal, he has the right of way, and others will approach with sufficient care to permit the exercise of such right, without danger of collision, and a failure of such person so to do will constitute negligence. Of course, they do not have to stop their machines, unless that would be necessary; but, even though the law says that the one approaching from the right has the right of way, that means if they get there first; if the other gets onto the street first, he has the right of way. * * *"

The criticism presented by appellants upon this instruction refers to the last-quoted clause, and it is insisted that it wrongfully excludes and contradicts the proposition that the driver approaching from the right has the superior right if he gets there even simultaneously with the driver from the left. Other things being equal, it is undoubtedly true that, under the provisions of the statute, the driver approaching from the right has the superior right if both parties reach the intersection simultaneously.

We are satisfied that these several errors in the instructions may not be disregarded. In their probable effect upon the minds of the jurors, they are of serious import, and may have had controlling influence upon the decision.

The judgment is reversed.

MATHIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3749.)

1. Justices of the peace 🔑159(9)—Undertaking on appeal uncertain as to whether it is filed in behalf of one or both defendants held insufficient.

An undertaking, on an appeal from a judgment of a justice court against two defendants, which refers to a judgment against only one of them and uses the singular and plural in designating the defendants and appellants in such a way as to render it uncertain whether it is filed in behalf of both or only one, is ineffective.

2. Justices of the peace 🔑159(13)—Filing of undertaking on appeal may be waived by respondent.

Under Civ. Code, § 3513, providing that one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit, the respondent on an appeal from justice's court may waive the filing of an undertaking for costs by appellant.

3. Justices of the peace 🔑159(13)—Filing of undertaking within five days is jurisdictional, and subsequent waiver by respondent is ineffective.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, requiring the undertaking on an appeal from justice court to be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal, if this is not done the superior court has no jurisdiction, and no subsequent waiver by the respondent of the filing of the undertaking can confer jurisdiction.

4. Justices of the peace 🔑161(5)—Failure to file undertaking not waived by filing notice of motion to set case for trial.

The filing within 30 days after the entry of a judgment of a justice court of notice of a motion to set the appeal for trial before the superior court could not excuse the failure to file an undertaking on appeal, even though treated as a waiver of the failure to serve notice of appeal.

Original application by Laura E. Mathis for a writ of mandamus against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and others. Writ granted.

Faulkner & Faulkner, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Elmer E. Robinson, of San Francisco (Joseph O'Rourke and Fabian D. Brown, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is a petition in mandamus to require respondents to dismiss an appeal from a judgment rendered by the justice's court. On the 21st day of June, 1920, petitioner herein, as plaintiff, recovered a judgment against Belle Benett and John C. Orcutt in the justice's court in the city and county of San Francisco on an assigned claim for taxi hire in the sum of $187.75. On the 25th day of the same month counsel for defendants filed in the justice's court a notice of appeal on behalf of both defendants. On the 29th of June there was filed what purported to be an undertaking on appeal from said judgment, but which refers to a judgment against John C. Orcutt only, and states that "said defendants are dissatisfied with said judgment and desirous of appealing therefrom," and that "said appellants claim a stay of proceedings," and that "said appellants will pay the amount of the judgment so appealed from." Numerous interlineations appear upon the face of the undertaking, which would indicate an intention of some one, either before or after its execution, to change it to a bond in favor of the defendant Orcutt alone and at the same time to convey the impression that it was a stay bond for both appellants. No objection was made to the form of the undertaking or to the sufficiency of the sureties thereon by the plaintiff in the justice's court action within the time allowed by law, but thereafter and on the 21st day of July, 1920, she gave notice of a motion to set the cause for trial before the superior court, said motion being noticed for hearing at a date after the expiration of the time within which the appellants in said action might have perfected their appeal. Thereafter the plaintiff in said action, and petitioner herein, moved said court for an order dismissing said appeal on the ground that it had not been perfected as required by law. This motion was denied and petitioner now asks that the court be directed to enter its order dismissing said appeal.

[1] The purported undertaking is clearly insufficient for any purpose. The interlineations and alterations appearing thereon are of such a nature as would avoid liability on the part of the sureties. It was apparently filed in support of a notice of appeal given on behalf of both defendants in a judgment against both, yet it refers to a judgment against one of the defendants alone and the singular and plural are used in designating the defendants and appellants in such a way as to render the bond ineffective within the rule of Zane v. De Onativia, 135 Cal. 440, 67 Pac. 685; Title Ins., etc., Co. v. Cal., etc., Co., 168 Cal. 397, 405, 143 Pac. 723; Brownell v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 227, 162 Pac. 419; Little v. Thatcher, 151 Cal. 558, 91 Pac. 321; McAulay v. Tahoe Ice Co., 3 Cal. App. 642, 86 Pac. 912; Hibernia, etc., Society v. Freese, 127 Cal. 70, 59 Pac. 769; Bergevin v. Wood, 11 Cal. App. 643, 105 Pac. 935.

[2, 3] In view of section 3513 of the Civil Code, the respondent in a justice's court appeal may waive the filing of an undertaking of costs by the appellant, since the filing of such an undertaking is a matter provided for his sole benefit. To be effective such a waiver must, however, be made within the time within which such an undertaking might have been filed. By the provisions of section 978a, Code of Civil Procedure, an undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal. If this is not done the superior court has no jurisdiction of the appeal and any action which the parties may thereafter take which may be treated as a waiver of these mandatory provisions of the statute cannot confer upon the court jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Niles v. Gonzalez, 152 Cal. 90, 92 Pac. 74; Perkins v. Cooper, 87 Cal. 241, 25 Pac. 411; Crowley, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 10 Cal. App. 342, 101 Pac. 935.

In addition to this, it is alleged in the petition that the plaintiff in the justice's court action was not served with either a notice of the appeal or notice of the filing of the undertaking as required by law. Respondents deny that notice of appeal was not served, but the record which is presented as evidence in support of the respondents' case substantiates the allegations of the petition. No denial is made of the allegation that the plaintiff was not served with notice of the filing of the undertaking.

[4] Notwithstanding the great number of authorities which require the service of a notice of appeal in the justice's court and the filing of a valid undertaking in support thereof, respondents argue that all these matters were waived by petitioner's motion to set the cause for trial before the superior court, which it was claimed was made within 30 days from the entry of the judgment in the justice's court. The record, however, does not support respondents' argument. A notice was filed on July 21, 1920, the thirtieth day after the entry of judgment in the justice's court that on a future day the plaintiff in said action would move the superior court to set said cause for trial. It does not appear when this motion was made, but there is sufficient in the record to show that it could not possibly have been made within the 30-day period. No authorities are cited to the point that service of notice of appeal or the filing of a sufficient undertaking may be waived merely by the filing of a notice of motion to set a cause for trial. And even though it could be treated as a waiver of the failure to serve notice of appeal, it cannot excuse the failure to file a valid undertaking within the time required.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

STEVENS v. SOUTHERN PAC. LAND CO.
(Civ. 3224.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1921.)

1. Public lands 🔑35(1)—Rights through homestead entry can vest only in lands subject to disposition.

Before any rights can vest through a homestead entry, the government land sought to be thus acquired must be subject to disposition under the homestead laws.

2. Public lands 🔑29—Land held not open to settlement at time party claimed homestead rights were vested.

In a proceeding to establish a trust under a claim of homestead rights in public lands, held, that the land was a part of that included in the federal act creating the Smiley Commission (section 3), and was in reserve under executive order of May 15, 1876, and was not restored to the public domain by said commission's order of December 29, 1891, so that plaintiff acquired no homestead rights therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Suit by Buell V. Stevens against the Southern Pacific Land Company. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Needham and L. L. Dennett, both of Modesto, for appellant.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Plaintiff instituted suit in the superior court of Riverside county seeking to have it decreed that certain lands in that county which had been patented to the defendant by the United States were held in trust for plaintiff, by reason of irregularities in the actions of government officials through which the patents were issued.

Chronologically, the events which enter into the history of the land in controversy transpired in the following order:

On May 15, 1876, by executive order, certain lands (including the lands in controversy) were set apart for the use and benefit of the Mission Indians. An act of Congress approved January 12, 1891 (26 Stat. 712), provided for the appointment of a commission of three persons to select a reservation for each band or village of the Mission Indians residing in the state of California, the selection to include, as far as practicable, the lands and villages which had been actually occupied by the Indians. The commission submitted its report to the Secretary of the Interior on December 5, 1891, and, among other things, recommended that the land here in controversy should be restored to the public domain. On December 28, 1891, the report of the Smiley Commission was approved by an order reading as follows:

> "Executive Mansion, December 29th, 1891. The report of the Mission Indian Commission, appointed under the act of January 12, 1891 (26 Stat. 712), is hereby approved, except so much thereof as relates to the purchase of lands from and exchange of lands with private individuals, which is also approved subject to the condition that Congress shall authorize the same. All of the lands mentioned in said report are hereby withdrawn from settlement and entry until patents shall have been issued for said selected reservations, and until the recommendations of said Commission shall be fully executed, and, by the proclamation of the President of the United States, the lands or any part thereof shall be restored to the public domain. Benj. Harrison. Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C., December 29th, 1891. Under the act of Congress as provided. Approved: John W. Noble, Secretary."

No proclamation has ever been made restoring any of the lands to public entry.

In a letter of date February 17, 1911, addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs expressed the opinion that the lands described in the complaint had been restored to the public domain, and on April 1, 1911, the register and receiver of the United States land office at Los Angeles, Cal., were directed to note upon their records that the land was subject to disposition in accordance with the provisions of the law relating to public lands.

On April 24, 1911, the plaintiff, being in all respects qualified to acquire public land, made a homestead application to the register and receiver of the United States land office at Los Angeles for the N. W. ¼ of Sec. 24, T. 5 S., R. 7 E., S. B. M., being a part of the land described in the recommendation of the Smiley Commission for restoration to the public domain. After complying with all the prerequisite details, plaintiff entered into the possession of the land, and proceeded to cultivate and improve it as required by law.

April 26, 1911, the Secretary of the Interior ordered the land withdrawn from entry, and, on May 2, 1911, the Commissioner of the General Land Office notified the register and receiver at Los Angeles by telegram that the land was reserved from public entry. By order dated June 15, 1911, the Department of the Interior suspended the entry of plaintiff, pending a determination as to whether the land was subject to homestead entry by plaintiff, which was followed by an order from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on July 6, 1911, canceling plaintiff's entry. Plaintiff appealed from the action of the General Land Office, and, after a hearing, the Secretary of the Interior affirmed the decision.

On December 11, 1914, a patent was issued by the United States conveying to the defendant the land claimed by plaintiff. This conveyance was made in exchange for certain odd-numbered sections which had theretofore been patented to the Southern Pacific Railway Company as part of the general grant to that company by the act of March 3, 1871. The complaint alleges that the sections surrendered had been occupied by the Mission Indians from time immemorial as a home, and that therefore the railroad company obtained by the patent the bare legal title, to be held in trust for the Indians, and the consideration given by the company for the land involved in this litigation was valueless.

Defendant demurred to the complaint on the general grounds, and at the same time gave notice of motion for judgment on the pleadings. When the demurrer and motion were argued, copies of all the proceedings affecting the title to the land in question were presented and considered by the court. In due time the demurrer was sustained, and 10 days' time given plaintiff to amend, in default of which the motion for judgment was granted, and the judgment entered from which this appeal is taken.

It is conceded that appellant must succeed by the strength of his own title; and unless he can show title in himself he cannot avail himself of any defect in defendant's title to the property.

[1] Before any rights can vest through a homestead entry, the land sought to be thus acquired must be subject to disposition under the laws applicable to such proceedings. Plaintiff recognizes this principle, and seeks to show that the land entered by him was restored to public purchase by the approval of the report of the Smiley Commission. Such, in fact, is the sole basis of his contention; for, if the land was not restored to the public domain by the order of December 29, 1891, it was still in reserve under the executive order of May 15, 1876. The controversy, therefore, must be resolved by a construction of the order approving the Smiley Commission report.

[2] Reverting to this order, it will be noted that it provides that "all the lands mentioned in this report are hereby withdrawn from settlement and entry." The land claimed by the plaintiff was mentioned in the report, and consequently is included in the expression "all the lands." The order certainly could not have been intended to mean that only lands to be set apart for the Indians were withdrawn, because it was the purpose of the Commission to provide a permanent reservation for their use; and it was not contemplated that their lands should ever be thrown open to settlement or entry. The withdrawal covered lands which had been selected pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of the act creating the Smiley Commission, and was to remain effective until patents had been issued in conformity with the Commission's recommendations. The paragraph of the executive order above quoted indicates the intention to hold in reserve all of the lands described in the report of the Commission until such time as adequate provision had been made for the accommodation of the Indians and the President satisfied that any part of the land was no longer necessary for that purpose. Subsequent proceedings demonstrate the wisdom of this action; for some of the lands allotted to the Indians were within the limits of the railroad grant, and, in accordance with section 3 of the act, the railroad company selected the lands recommended for restoration by the Smiley Commission in lieu of the portion of its grant set apart by the Commission for the Indian reservation. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs erred in the conclusion expressed in his letter of February 17, 1911, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the approval of the report of the Smiley Commission carried with it the recommendations of the Commission regarding restoration. This erroneous opinion was adopted by the General Land Office, and the officers at Los Angeles notified to note the land as available for public entry. On further consideration, however, the Commissioner of the General Land Office decided that the conclusion was unauthorized, and ordered plaintiff's entry canceled. On appeal to the Secretary of the Interior this action was upheld. We entertain no doubt that the later decision was correct, and that the cancellation of plaintiff's entry was justified.

Plaintiff attacks the proceedings by which defendant acquired title to the premises; but, as we have seen, he shows no title in himself, and hence is in no position to defeat defendant's claim to the property.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in the defendant's favor in an action for divorce, dismissing said action; the defendant's special plea of res adjudicata being sustained by the trial court. The facts of the case are undisputed and are briefly these:

The parties to this action intermarried on April 26, 1898. On September 26, 1917, the plaintiff's wife, who is the defendant in the present action, commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, against her husband for separate maintenance, and in her complaint therein set forth several alleged causes of action for divorce, accusing the defendant therein of failure to provide, of extreme cruelty and of adultery. The defendant in that action appeared and answered, specifically denying each and all of the averments of said complaint, and in addition thereto alleging by way of further and separate defense certain asserted delinquencies on the part of the plaintiff, as tending to show cruelty on her part, and as tending to justify whatever acts the said defendant was alleged to have committed in the way of nonsupport. That cause went to trial upon the issues presented by the detailed averments, denials and recriminations of the parties. Evidence pro and con was taken, and at the conclusion of the trial the court called the counsel for the respective parties into his chambers in an apparent effort to arrive at an amount for which a judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff upon her demand for separate maintenance. There was some discussion in relation to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain averments of the plaintiff's complaint, particularly with respect to his alleged wrongful relations with another woman. The trial judge suggested that the parties should consent to an allowance of $50 a month to be paid to the plaintiff for a period of two years, and upon the respective counsel signifying their willingness to accept that amount as a basis for the judgment they returned to court, whereupon the court ordered, and there was presently entered, the following judgment:

"The above-entitled cause came on regularly to be heard on the 22d and 23d days of May, 1918, both parties being in court, represented by their respective counsel. * * * Evidence is taken. The court calls counsel for the respective parties into his chambers; whereupon both parties consent, and in open court stipulate, that plaintiff shall have a judgment against the defendant in full settlement of all matters of support and property the sum of $50 per month for a period of 24 months, and no more. Both plaintiff and defendant are in open court, and each personally consents to such a judgment, and that the defendant pay to plaintiff, for and on account of her attorney fees, the sum of $50. Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant pay the plaintiff the sum of $50 as attorney fees, and the sum of $50 per month for 24 months commencing June 1, 1918, and that each party pay his and her respective costs. Done in open court this 4th day of June, 1918."

In ordering and entering the foregoing judgment no findings were made, nor was any objection made by either of the parties to said judgment upon that ground, nor was any appeal taken therefrom. Thereafter, and on June 8, 1918, the present action for divorce was commenced by the plaintiff, who, as we have seen, was the defendant in said former action.

The complaint in this action was based upon the charge of extreme cruelty, and proceeded to set forth as the probative facts supporting said charge much of the same matter which was embraced in the affirmative defense set forth in the defendant's answer in the former action. Other matters of the same general nature were added, all of which, however, were alleged to have occurred prior to the commencement of said former action. The defendant in this case presently filed her answer, denying specifically the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, and then proceeding to set forth as a further and separate defense and plea in bar the foregoing facts with reference to said former action and to the judgment rendered and entered therein, and that such judgment had become final. Upon the trial of the instant case the matter was first heard upon the defendant's plea in bar, in support of which there was presented the judgment roll in said former action; and in addition thereto the trial court further permitted the introduction in evidence of the remarks of the trial judge in said action made in chambers just prior to the entry of the judgment therein. Upon the submission of this particular matter to the court upon the evidence thus presented the court found and decided that the judgment in said former action was a bar to the further prosecution of this action, and having so found, entered a judgment of dismissal. It is from that judgment that this appeal has been taken; and the sole question presented upon said appeal is as to whether said former judgment in said action for separate maintenance, considering the circumstances under which it was entered, constitutes a bar to the maintenance of this action for divorce, based as it is upon averments of matters of fact existing prior to the date of the entry of said former judgment and to some extent at least made a part of the pleadings and is such therein.

The appellant herein contends that said former judgment was a judgment by consent, and hence could not be available to the defendant herein as a bar to the present action. In support of this contention the appellant urges the admitted facts that the trial judge in said former action at the conclusion of the trial therein called counsel for the respective parties into his chambers, and there made certain remarks, wherein he indicated some doubt as to whether the plaintiff's case had been fully made out as to her charge of cruelty, and that as to the averments of her complaint accusing her husband of wrongful relations with another woman, these had not been sufficiently proven. The appellant argues from these facts that the issues raised in said former action had never in fact been determined, and that the judgment which the court rendered therein was merely a compromise judgment unsupported by anything else than the agreement of the parties made in adopting the suggestion of the court, and without any finding on the part of the latter as to the merits of the case.

[1] We are unable upon the record before us to sustain this contention. The action in which said former judgment was entered was an action instituted under the provisions of section 137 of the Civil Code which, at the time of the institution of said action, read as follows:

> "When the husband willfully deserts the wife or when the husband willfully fails to provide for the wife or when the wife has any cause of action for divorce as provided in section ninety-two of this Code, she may, without applying for a divorce, maintain in the superior court an action against him for permanent support and maintenance of herself or of herself and children."

It was essential to the maintenance of said action under said section of the Civil Code that the plaintiff should have alleged facts showing willful desertion or willful failure to provide on the part of her said husband, or showing the existence of any other of the causes for divorce specified in section 92 of the Civil Code; and it was further necessary in order to entitle her to a judgment for separate maintenance that she should establish by proof her averments in the above regard. These averments on her part tendered issues which the defendant, her husband, was bound to meet with denials on his part, or with special averments of facts in the nature of recrimination which would constitute a bar under section 122 of the Civil Code. The defendant in that action embraced in his answer both forms of defense, and by way of recrimination undertook to set forth substantially the same facts as those upon which he now relies to sustain his action for divorce. The cause came on to trial upon the issues thus presented, and said trial was concluded so far as the testimony in the case was concerned at the time when the trial judge called the counsel for the respective parties into consultation as to the amount for which judgment should be rendered upon the plaintiff's demand for separate maintenance. Having agreed with counsel as to what that amount should be, and as to the time during which it should be paid, the court proceeded to render its judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the agreed sum. No findings of fact were made, but since no appeal was taken from said judgment, and since the same has become final, we are bound to assume in support of said judgment that the court rendering the same found in the plaintiff's favor upon every issue necessary to be determined in order to support said judgment, and found against the defendant upon every such issue, and hence necessarily upon the issues presented by him in that affirmative portion of his answer wherein he pleaded by way of recrimination facts in bar of the plaintiff's asserted grounds for divorce. This being so, we can perceive no difference between this case and a case wherein upon similar pleadings, but without any conference or agreement between the parties as to the amount of the judgment to be rendered, the trial court had upheld the plaintiff's cause of action for separate maintenance. In such a case it would seem to be beyond question that such a judgment would be a bar to a later action for divorce instituted by the defendant therein and predicated upon facts in existence prior to the entry of said former judgment, some of which were pleaded, and all of which were pleadable by him in said former action.

The case of Greer v. Greer, 142 Cal. 519, 77 Pac. 1106, is similar in certain of its features to the case at bar. The plaintiff in that case brought an action for divorce upon the ground of desertion. The defendant pleaded by way of abatement a judgment which had been rendered in a former action between the same parties wherein the plaintiff had sought to recover permanent alimony, alleging as a basis for said action desertion on the part of the defendant. In both actions there was also involved the question of the validity of a deed to certain of the defendant's separate property which the plaintiff alleged the defendant to have made for the purpose of preventing said property from being subjected to a lien for the plaintiff's support and maintenance. In said former action the court found against the plaintiff upon the issue of desertion, and hence also found that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover permanent alimony. The court also found that since the defendant had not deserted plaintiff, she could not in said action question his right to dispose of his separate property, and hence found in favor of the defendant also upon that issue. In the second action the trial court found against the defendant upon his plea in bar, but upon appeal the Supreme Court reversed this finding, holding that the judgment in the former action for permanent maintenance was a bar to the maintenance of the second suit.

In so holding the Supreme Court cited with approval the case of Miller v. Miller, 150 Mass. 111, 22 N. E. 765, in which an adverse judgment in favor of the wife in an action for separate maintenance while living apart from her husband for justifiable grounds, was held to be a bar to a subsequent suit by the husband for divorce on the ground of the alleged desertion of the wife. In the Estate of Bell, 153 Cal. 333, 95 Pac. 376, the Supreme Court declared the rule to be as follows:

"An adjudication is final and conclusive not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated and have had decided as incident to, or essentially connected with, the subject-matter of the litigation, and every matter coming within the legitimate purview of the original action, both in respect to matters of claim and defense"—citing Harris v. Harris, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 88; Gray v. Daugherty, 25 Cal. 266.

See, also, Suisun Lumber Co. v. Fairfield School Dist., 19 Cal. App. 587, 127 Pac. 349, and cases cited.

[2] The appellant's contention that the former judgment between the parties hereto did not render matters involved therein res adjudicata, for the reason that it was a consent judgment, is not borne out to the extent claimed by the appellant; for while it appears that the trial judge, in an informal interview with the parties, gave expression to some doubts as to the sufficiency of the evidence in the case, these doubts were not carried into the formal judgment, and it has been repeatedly held that the remarks of a trial judge made during the progress of the case, even though they amount to the giving of his reasons for his decision, become no part of the judgment, and cannot be held to control or alter its substance and effect. So far as the record herein discloses, the only matter embraced in said judgment, to which it was suggested that the parties give their consent, was that of the amount and duration of the separate maintenance to be allowed the plaintiff therein. As to all other matters involved in the case the judgment became res adjudicata, and hence properly relied upon by the respondent herein to defeat the present action.

Judgment affirmed.

ELLIOTT v. BAILEY et al. (Civ. No. 3649.)

Joint adventures ⚿8—Evidence held to sustain findings that promoters were liable on agreement for services and advances.

In an action for services rendered and advances made to the promoters of a mining venture, evidence held to sustain findings that the agreement was with defendants individually, before formation of a mines company by defendants, and that plaintiff was to be paid whenever defendants received enough money from the promotion of the enterprise, and that they had received such funds as amounted to such fulfillment of the conditions as to render them liable to pay plaintiff.

Action by Alexander T. Elliott against James H. Bailey and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Theodore Stensland, of San Diego, for appellants.

Charles P. Huey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought by the plaintiff on his own behalf and also as the assignee of certain other parties to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due for services rendered and advances made.

The facts were substantially these: The defendants, who were copartners in a real estate business, which included, among other activities, the promotion of mining enterprises, undertook to promote the development of certain mining claims lying in the vicinity of Las Vegas, Nev. These mining claims had been located by a number of persons, among whom were J. K. Mildebrandt and H. F. Christie. The plans of the defendants contemplated the formation of some sort of organization to exploit these claims. Prior to the formation of this organization, and in a sense essential to its successful operation, it was necessary to have certain assays made of the ores and minerals of these claims. The plaintiff, Alexander T. Elliott, was a professor of chemistry, and as such was an expert analytical and chemical assayer of ores and minerals, and to him the defendant Cox, representing his firm, applied for the purpose of securing his services in making such assays. An agreement was made between Cox and the plaintiff by which, for the services he was to render in that behalf, he was to be paid at the rate of $50 a week, of which $20 was to be paid weekly in cash, and payment of the balance of $30 per week was to be deferred until the said partners were enabled to realize some money from the sale of stock or otherwise in the course of the promotion of said enterprise. The next step in the course of said promotion proposed to be taken by said defendants was that of going to the place of location of said mining claims for the purpose of completing their organization; and in order to pay the expenses of the trip they applied to said Mildebrandt and Christie for the advance of sufficient money to meet said expenses, and received from each of said parties the sum of $187.45. Having thus been enabled to reach Las Vegas, Nev., the defendants, together with said Mildebrandt and Christie, and certain other persons who were also holders of some of said mining claims, proceeded with their organization. They selected the name of "Radio Mines Company." They did not organize a corporation, but instead thereof undertook to create some sort of a trust, and for that purpose arranged with one Walter T. Casey for the transfer to him, as trustee, of these several mining claims, and for the issuance by him as such trustee of certificates, supposed to represent the extent of the ownership of the holders thereof in the properties covered by said trust. There was thereupon issued to said Walter T. Casey certificates representing $50,000 as the par value thereof, purporting to be his recompense for professional services rendered by him. These certificates were later transferred by said Casey to the defendants, who sold and disposed of the same from time to time, and realized from the proceeds thereof the sum of about $3,600. The enterprise apparently languished and came to naught; and when the plaintiff applied to the defendants for the balance of the payments due him for his services as an assayer, and when said Mildebrandt and Christie also applied to the defendants for payment of the sums respectively advanced by them, each of these was referred to the Radio Mines Company for the payment of their claims; but, receiving nothing from that source, the present action was instituted by the plaintiff, on his own behalf and also as assignee for Mildebrandt and Christie. There was another party of whom the plaintiff was also assignee, but as to his claim no recovery was had. On the trial of the cause judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $445 upon his own account, and also for the sum of $374.90, the aggregate of the assigned claims of Mildebrandt and Christie.

It is the contention of the defendants that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a judgment against them, or either of them, upon any of these claims, for the reason that each of these claimants was to look to the Radio Mines Company for payment. We have examined with some care the rather voluminous record in this case, and, without undertaking to detail the testimony, we have reached the conclusion that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court to the effect that the services performed by the plaintiff, and the moneys advanced by his two assignors, Mildebrandt and Christie, were in each instance services performed and moneys advanced to the defendants prior to the formation of any such organization as the Radio Mines Company, and that the plaintiff and his assignors were to be reimbursed by the defendants whenever the latter had received sufficient money so to do as the result of the promotion of said enterprise, and that the sum of $3,600 or thereabouts, which the defendants had received from the sale of the certificates transferred to them by said Walter T. Casey, amounted to such a fulfillment of the conditions under which they had received the services of the plaintiff and the advances of his assignors as to render the defendants liable to pay for such services and advances.

The trial court so held, and we think the evidence amply sufficient to sustain its findings in that regard.

No other contention being urged by the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

JACKSON v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3756.)

1. Master and servant ⟹416—Findings as to disability of aged compensation claimant held not conflicting.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for injury to and loss of a toe, a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that the applicant was 66 years of age, and by reason of his advanced age and other systemic condition previous to the injury was afflicted with hardening of the arteries which materially interfered with a sufficient blood supply to the injured member and caused gangrene to set in and greatly retarded a normal recovery, but that the disability resulting, combined with the previous physical condition, was the legitimate and proximate result of the injury, and is compensable as such, was not in conflict with a finding that the injury had resulted in a permanent disability, and that the disability was 19¾ per cent. of the total disability.

2. Master and servant ⟹372—Disabilities, not traceable to injury, not compensable.

Disabilities of a servant due to his general physical condition, and not directly traceable to the injury, are not compensable under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Proceeding by Charles Jackson under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the Maryland Casualty Company. There was an award of compensation and an order releasing insurance carrier from further payments, and applicant brings certiorari. Writ denied.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. The petition for a writ of certiorari is denied. It appears that the order releasing and discharging the insurance carrier from further payments to petitioner, which is sought to be reviewed here, was made upon a finding that the injury forming the basis of this proceeding had resulted in a permanent disability, consisting of the loss of the fourth toe of the right foot at the proximal joint, with a chronic discharging sinus; that the disability, in view of the age and occupation of petitioner, is 19¾ per cent. of total disability, and that the insurance carrier has paid to applicant, as indemnity under a previous temporary disability order of the commission, a sum in excess of the total sum due as compensation for a permanent disability of 19¾ per cent. of total disability.

It also appears that the petitioner himself contends here, and also maintained before the commission, that his disability was permanent. The finding on this point is therefore in conformity with his contention. His position, however, is that he is unable to compete in the open labor market or to earn anything at all, and therefore his disability is total under the intendment of the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

Respondents have stated the evidence to be that petitioner is 66 years of age and is suffering from syphilis, hardening of the arteries, and heart disease, all of which necessarily enter to some extent into his inability to compete in the open labor market.

[1] Further objection of petitioner to the order sought to be reviewed is based upon the fact that a prior order of the commission, made at the time temporary disability compensation was allowed, was based upon a finding:

> "That the applicant is of the age of 66 years and upwards, and, by reason of his advanced age and other systemic condition previous to said injury was afflicted with hardening of the arteries, which materially interfered with a sufficient blood supply to the injured member, and caused gangrene to set in, and greatly retarded a normal recovery from said injury, but that the disability resulting, combined with the said previous physical condition, was the legitimate and proximate result of the injury, and is compensable as such."

inal injury was slight, and it is conceded that in a younger and healthier subject it would have healed readily and completely. That the entire toe was lost was a result obviously contributed to by the systemic condition of the patient, and no deduction has been made on this account by the commission, but full compensation has been allowed for the total loss of a toe, although the condition making the amputation necessary was indisputably contributed to by pre-existing systemic ailments. However, any disabilities of petitioner, due to his general physical condition, and not directly traceable to the loss of this toe, are clearly not compensable under the Compensation Act.

It is stated in the answer of the respondent that the percentage of disability was arrived at by the commission by the use of a table adopted by respondent under the provisions of section 9, subdivision 11, of the "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917." Under this method of computation, it appears that a much larger percentage of disability was allowed for the loss of the toe than would have been warranted had there been no other matters taken into consideration except the amputation of the toe. It is fair to assume, therefore, that the larger percentage allowed was due to the evidence relied upon by petitioner indicating that the surgical wound due to the operation has not entirely healed, and that the muscles of the foot have become stiffened as an indirect result of the injury and amputation.

Under the statement of the evidence contained in the petition and the answer of respondents, we are of the opinion that the Industrial Accident Commission has acted within the powers conferred upon it.

The petition for a writ of certiorari is denied.

RICE et al. v. UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN DIEGO (THOMAS et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3653.)

1. Bills and notes ⚷499—Possession without indorsement of payments raised presumption of no payment.

Possession of a note by defendant bank without payments indorsed thereon raised a presumption that no part of the note had been paid.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where there was a conflict in the evidence on the issue of payment of a note involved in action to enjoin sale under a trust deed, the appellate court cannot disturb the finding of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. C. Rice and others, as trustees of the Rice-Landswick Company, against the Union Trust Company of San Diego, wherein Charles E. Thomas and others intervened. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Charles B. McCoy, of San Diego, for appellants.

R. C. Springer and William G. Mirow, both of San Diego, for respondent Union Trust Co. of San Diego.

Doolittle & Morrison, William L. Morrison, and Patterson Sprigg, all of San Diego, for interveners Thomas and others.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to enjoin a sale under a trust deed made by Rice-Landswick Company to the defendant. Judgment went in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

The plaintiffs are the trustees of Rice-Landswick Company, a defunct corporation. On May 2, 1914, said company, at that time in active existence, borrowed $2,000 from Joseph W. Thomas, executing and delivering to him its promissory note in that amount, secured by 35 shares of the preferred and 17½ shares of the common stock of said corporation, standing in the name of the Central Mortgage Company. On May 8, 1915, there was due as interest upon said note the sum of $142, at which time it was arranged that Joseph W. Thomas should lend to Rice-Landswick Company an additional $4,000, and take the corporation's note for $6,241. This was done, the note for $2,000 being surrendered. To secure payment of the new note the corporation conveyed certain real property to the Union Trust Company of San Diego, and the trust company executed its declaration of trust to that effect.

On May 15, 1919, the trust company gave notice of its intention to proceed to sell the said real estate to pay the principal sum of $6,142, with interest due thereon from the date of the note. Thereafter the plaintiffs, as trustees of the defunct concern, brought the present action to enjoin such sale upon the ground, as alleged in the amended complaint, that the sum of $1,000 had been paid upon the note, and that there was not due thereon the full amount of principal and interest as claimed by the defendant. The allegations of the complaint as to part payment were put in issue by the answer of the defendant, and also by the complaint in intervention served and filed by the executors of the estate of Jos. W. Thomas (who had in the meantime died). Another issue in the case was as to whether or not the plaintiffs had any interest in the real property the sale of which they sought to enjoin.

[1, 2] The court, on what appears to be sufficient evidence, found that the plaintiffs have no right, title, or interest of any kind in said property. This finding is not attacked by the appellants, and it would seem to be fatal to their appeal. The only ground urged for the reversal of the judgment is that the evidence shows that the sum of $1,000 was paid on account of the note—$300 in cash at a certain time and $700 by check upon another date. The witness Rice testified to this effect, and also that he had taken receipts for these alleged payments, but he did not produce such receipts nor the returned check for $700. This doubtless impaired the weight of his testimony. The defendant, on the other hand, produced the note, which bore no indorsements of any payments. The possession of the note by the defendant having no payments indorsed thereon raised a presumption that no part of the note had been paid. 8 Cyc. 248; 30 Cyc. 1268. It thus appears there was a conflict in the evidence on the issue of payment, and under a familiar rule we cannot disturb this finding of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

PARISH v. STUDEBAKER et al.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑132(1)—After termination of lease lessee could not recover damages for interference with possession.

Where, on July 17th, a lessor exercised her option to terminate a lease because of the nonpayment of rent on demand, the lessees' possession thereafter was wrongful, and the lessor's interference therewith could furnish no legal basis for the recovery of damages because the lessees were compelled to sell their merchandise at a loss and move from the premises.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑171(3)—No eviction by trespass not causing vacation of premises.

Trespasses by a lessor not causing the lessees to vacate the premises could not support a recovery of damages as for eviction.

3. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑29(2)—Tenant's damages for landlord's interference with possession proper counterclaim in ejectment for default in rent.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, relative to counterclaims, in a lessor's action of ejectment in which she seeks to recover damages for the tortious withholding of the property, the lessees' cause of action for damages from the lessor's interference with the possession may be set up by counterclaim as a cause of action connected with the transaction.

4. Damages 🔑81—Forfeiture of deposit for rent not enforceable when damages not incapable of definite calculation.

Where a lessee made a deposit to be applied on the rent for the last two months of the term, a provision in the lease, that if it was terminated or forfeited by the lessees the deposit should become the property of the lessor without affecting her right to damages, could not be applied unless the lessor's damages could not be calculated with reasonable definiteness, and, in the absence of any such showing, the lessees were entitled to the deposit.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑285(9)—Lessor bringing ejectment because of nonpayment of rent entitled to attorney's fees.

Where a lease provided that, if the lessor should commence any action to enforce the lease, a reasonable attorney's fee should be included in the judgment, and, rent not having been paid according to the lease, the lessor brought ejectment, she was entitled to recover attorney's fees which she had incurred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Julia A. Parish against W. B. Studebaker and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Henry E. Carter, J. A. Adair, and Henry O. Wackerbarth, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Warden D. Isenberg and W. A. Martin, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to secure judgment of ejectment against the defendants; to recover certain specified rents, and to recover damages for the alleged unlawful withholding of the real property. The court made findings awarding plaintiff a money judgment, declined to make a judgment for the possession of the premises because at the time of the trial it appeared that such possession had been surrendered to the plaintiff, and, further, upon a cross-complaint and supplemental cross-complaint, allowed judgment to the defendants for a sum in excess of that demanded by the plaintiff. It is from this judgment upon the alleged cross-complaint, and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment and enter a different judgment on the findings, that the appeal is taken.

The plaintiff, prior to the commencement of her action, had leased to defendant Studebaker one-half of a storeroom on a business street in the city of Los Angeles. The rental agreed to be paid under the written lease was the sum of $800 per month. The rental which became due on the 1st of July, 1917, for that month was not paid, and on July 13th plaintiff demanded payment thereof and gave notice to the defendants that unless such payment was made by July 16th she would exercise her option to terminate the lease without further notice. The rental was not paid, and the court finds that the defendants "thereby forfeited all right, title and interest in and to said premises, and every part thereof, under said lease, and plaintiff was entitled to re-enter and possess the same, and on the 17th day of July, 1917, plaintiff exercised her option to terminate such lease and did terminate the same, * * * and then and there demanded possession of said premises thereunder, but defendants did not surrender or quit the possession of said premises thereunder, but continued to hold, use, and occupy the same until September 8, 1917." The complaint in this action was filed on July 19, 1917. The court further determined that there was due to the plaintiff as rent and as the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the premises from the 1st day of July to the 8th day of September, 1917, the sum of $1,813.35; that the reasonable value of the use of the premises from July 17th to September 8, 1917, was the sum of $800 per month. As to the correctness of the calculation, no question is made by the plaintiff. It may be here mentioned that defendant Studebaker and the Studebaker Quality Shop, a corporation, were one and the same, so far as the real ownership of the business conducted by Studebaker is concerned. The defendant Studebaker Quality Shop was owned by W. B. Studebaker and the corporation was organized only for the purpose of business convenience. The court so found the fact to be. Defendant filed, in addition to an answer containing denials of the issues proposed by the complaint, a statement of an alleged counterclaim, which was made up of two things: First, an alleged cause of action to recover a $1,600 deposit made to cover the rental for the last two months of the lease term; second, an alleged cause of action for damages of interference with the possession of the premises occupied by the defendant. In the form of a cross-complaint, all these matters were re-asserted, and a large amount of damages was prayed for against the plaintiff. This cross-complaint was filed on the 3d day of August, 1917. It will already have been noted that, according to the findings of the court, the defendants were at that time in possession of the premises, unlawfully so, and that they continued in such unlawful possession up to the 8th day of September, 1917. On September 14th, the cause came on for trial. Whereupon the defendants offered, and the court allowed to be filed, an alleged supplemental cross-complaint, wherein it was asserted that by reason of the acts complained of in the counterclaim and cross-complaint first filed, and continuance thereof after the filing of the cross-complaint, defendants had been compelled to retire from business and had been compelled to sell (on September 8, 1917) their merchandise at a loss of 25 per cent., which loss was asserted to be in total the sum of $2,500. The court in its findings determined the issues in favor of the defendants on the supplemental cross-complaint and determined that defendants had been compelled to sell their merchandise and that it had been sold to Margaret Studebaker, wife of defendant Studebaker, and that the stock of merchandise was of the value of $8,500 and the price for which it was sold to Studebaker's wife was $7,500. The court then calculated the total loss as arising under all of the allegations in the affirmative pleadings of the defendant as being the sum of $1,300. At the time the supplemental cross-complaint was filed, plaintiff objected, on the ground that it did not constitute proper subject-matter for a cross-complaint.

[1] The findings are not sufficient to support the judgment as to the cause of action set up in the supplemental cross-complaint. While the findings as made by the court are, in part, conflicting and uncertain, it is quite clear that in making up the computation of the amount of $1,300 damages which the court found had been suffered by defendant, $1,000 was included as being the loss suffered by the sale of the merchandise from the defendant Studebaker to his wife. The court had already found that the defendants were not lawfully possessed of the premises after July 17, 1917, and their occupancy thereafter, under that finding, was wholly without right, and it could not be said that any acts committed by the plaintiff after said 17th of July furnished legal basis for a claim that on the 8th day of September defendants were compelled to sell the merchandise at a loss and move from the premises. Had they obeyed the requirement of the law, they would have moved on the 17th of July. It is also uncertain as to whether the court intended to apportion the $300 of the $1,300 found as damages on account of the acts set forth in the original counterclaim and cross-complaint, they being acts wherein the plaintiff molested and annoyed the defendants in the conduct of their business. For that reason alone the judgment would necessarily have to be reversed. There are other questions, however, to be decided.

[2, 3] Appellant asserts that in this action of ejectment no recovery could be had under the allegations of the counterclaim and cross-complaint because of alleged acts of the defendants, for the reason that no damages could be recovered unless an eviction, actual or constructive, had been worked against the tenant of appellant; in other words, that unless the acts complained of had caused the defendants to leave the premises, there would be no constructive eviction, and admittedly there was no actual eviction. This rule relating to damages for eviction is undoubtedly the correct one. Counsel have cited many cases affirming the same, among them Kinney v. Libboy, 54 Misc. Rep. 595, 104 N. Y. Supp. 863. And it is further asserted by appellant that, under the facts stated, whatever interference was made by the plaintiff with the possession of the defendants amounted to a trespass merely and was as though it had been committed by a stranger to the lease. This general proposition appears, also, to be sound and to be supported by the authorities. The action here was, in part, for tort and, in part, upon contract. Section 438, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to counterclaims, provides that a counterclaim may be made of:

> "(1) A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) in an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action arising also upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action."

The trespass found to have been committed by the plaintiff against the defendants was, of course, a tort, but we think that it was such a tort as would be connected with the subject of the action, as defined in subdivision one of the section quoted. It must be admitted that separate torts cannot be set up in complaint and counterclaim. Wigmore v. Buell, 116 Cal. 94, 47 Pac. 927. The court has never decided, however, that torts may not be set up one against the other, so long as they fall within the Code classification as being connected with the subject of the action or arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint. Van Bibber v. Hilton, 84 Cal. 585, at page 589, 24 Pac. at page 310, opinion denying rehearing. Were the action to recover possession of the property only, the authorities cited to the effect that there could be no counterclaim or cross-complaint for damages for tort would be directly in point, as Yorba v. Ward, 109 Cal. 107, 38 Pac. 48, 41 Pac. 793, where it is said:

> "The only transaction there set out [in the complaint]—if it could be so denominated—is that defendant withholds from plaintiff the demanded premises, claiming some title to it. The cross-complaint does not show any right or title to the demanded premises in defendant. By it defendant asserts no rights with reference to the land, nor any claim save his alleged right to demand from plaintiff four thousand six hundred and fifty dollars. This demand is not connected with the 'subject of the action,' however that phrase be defined."

In that case the demand was upon a count entirely distinct and in no wise connected with the subject-matter of the action. Here a claim for damages was made for a tortious withholding of the property, and we are of the opinion that the trespass alleged to have been committed by the plaintiff may be properly set up in favor of the defendants by counterclaim as being a cause of action connected with the transaction alleged by the plaintiff.

[4] Up to this point we have not referred to the further claim which was allowed to the defendants for the sum of $1,600, with $96 interest. This claim, we think, was properly allowed as an offset. The court found that on the 27th day of December, 1913, the lessee delivered to the plaintiff the sum of $1,600, which was delivered under a written agreement which recited that the lessee had paid to the lessor $1,600 as payment of rents for the months of December, 1918, and January, 1919, for the premises leased, and that the $1,600 so advanced was to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The agreement, which was set forth in the findings, further provided that in the event the lease was terminated or forfeited by Studebaker, or his successors, the money should become the poperty of plaintiff without affecting her right to damages which she might be entitled to. Clearly this money was to be applied on the last two months of the lease term as payment for the use of the premises, and the forfeiture provision could only be made applicable by a showing that any damages which the plaintiff had suffered could not with reasonable definiteness be calculated. Such payments have become common to lease contracts. The record shows no ground for inferring that plaintiff's damage by reason of the forfeiture of the lease could not be calculated, or that by the judgment herein her damages were not fairly ascertained and awarded to her. In conditions of the kind involved in the agreement last referred to, when a forfeiture is declared, the lease contract becomes at an end and the right of the tenant to further possession of the premises is lost. Such being the case, the situation would be that a lessee must either have forfeited the amount paid for the last two months of the term or be entitled to recover it. That such a recovery, under circumstances which this case illustrates, should be allowed, is held in Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 527, 168 Pac. 156. And so we think that the counterclaim for the $1,600 and interest, as against the demand for rent, was properly allowed.

[5] Another complaint made by appellant is that the court should have allowed attorney's fees to her. The lease agreement contained the following condition:

> "It is further agreed that in the event said party of the first part shall commence any action to enforce any of the provisions of this lease, or any of its rigbts hereunder, that in any judgment recovered by it a reasonable attorney's fee shall be included."

The lease agreement further provided that if the rental payments were not made within ten days after the first of the month, the party of the first part should have the right to declare the lease terminated without notice. By this action plaintiff did seek to enforce rights which the lease contract gave her. The complaint properly alleged that plaintiff had incurred a charge on account of attorney's fees and such allowance should have been made, assuming that evidence was offered to sustain that claim.

From the conclusions announced it follows that the judgment should be reversed.

The judgment is reversed.

CONRAD v. HAUSER. (Civ. 3243.)

1. Corporations ⚷92—Answer, in action by indorser against maker of note for stock, alleging fraud, must show damage.

In an action for the amount paid by the indorser of a promissory note against one of the makers, an answer, alleging that a note was given for the purchase price of corporate stock and that defendant was induced to buy the stock by fraudulent representations of plaintiff and another as to the amount of stock outstanding and as to the indebtedness of the company, but not alleging that the stock was not worth the amount defendant agreed to pay for it, does not show that defendant was damaged by the misrepresentations, and is insufficient.

2. Corporations ⚷92—Subscriber held to have received title to stock, so that he could not defeat recovery by indorser of his note therefor.

Where a certificate for stock purchased by defendant in payment for which he gave his note was issued by the corporation and placed in an envelope marked "to be called for," the title to the stock had vested in defendant, and it was his fault that he did not secure possession of the certificate, so that he cannot defeat on that ground recovery from him by an indorser of his note, who was forced to pay it.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Findings of the trial court on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Julius Conrad against H. J. Hauser. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler and Dockweiler & Mott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James Donovan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. On December 31, 1915, at Los Angeles, Cal., this defendant, together with two others—Charles W. Fox and F. H. Evans—made, executed, and delivered a certain promissory note by the terms of which each promised to pay to the Halberg-Mier Automatic Press Company, or order, the sum of $18,000; the note being set out in hæc verba in the complaint. On the same day this note was transferred, by the payee therein named, to the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles. Prior to the actual transfer, however, the bank refused to discount or to accept the note unless the same was indorsed by some person or persons in whose financial ability it had confidence. Plaintiff, having previously been requested by the makers of the note to act in the capacity of indorser, and admittedly fulfilling the requirements above referred to, signed his name on the back thereof, thereby guaranteeing payment of the same. Upon maturity of the paper, defendant refused to pay it, or any portion thereof, although the other two makers, Fox and Evans, paid their proportionate share, i. e., each the sum of $6,000. Thereupon the bank called upon plaintiff to make good on his indorsement to the extent of the amount remaining unpaid on the note, and, rather than stand a suit thereon, the latter paid the sum of $6,000 to the holder thereof. The action is brought, not upon the note, but to recover of Hauser the amount so paid by plaintiff in the former's behalf.

The board of directors of the Halberg-Mier Automatic Press Company was composed of the following named persons: J. T. Merrill, Julius Conrad (plaintiff), H. S. Ryerson, Charles W. Fox, and F. H. Evans, the first three of whom were also the president, vice-president, and secretary-treasurer, respectively, of that company. By his answer, defendant admits the execution of the note, but attempts to avoid payment of the sum so paid in his behalf by plaintiff on the ground that the two officers first above named, as such officials, directors, and agents of said company, procured defendant's signature thereto, together with the signatures of Fox and Evans, by means of the following false and fraudulent representations, to wit: That there were 550,005 shares of the capital stock of said company issued and outstanding, and that there were still 449,995 shares of the same stock undisposed of; that said company was "free from debt and that it had no liabilities whatever"; that said company owned and controlled the patent of a certain printing press known as the Halberg-Mier automatic press; that the company was in need of money and that it would require a large amount for the purpose of purchasing machinery and equipping a plant for the purpose of manufacturing and selling such printing press; that it was the intention of said company to sell a portion of the treasury stock, using the money so obtained in placing its product on the market; that if this defendant, together with Fox and Evans, would purchase 30,000 shares of such treasury stock at a price of 60 cents per share, executing their note in payment therefor, they, the officers mentioned, had arranged with the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles to discount the note for said company, and that the latter would deposit the money so received with said bank to its credit, such sum to be used in purchasing and installing machinery in a plant to be operated for the purpose of manufacturing and marketing the printing press, the patent to which was controlled by it; and that in the event the money was so secured, the machinery necessary to fully equip the plant would be purchased and installed within 90 days, whereupon the company would commence operations. The answer further avers that defendant relied upon these representations, and, believing them to be true, was induced to and did, together with Fox and Evans, 'purchase said shares of stock, and executed the note in question in payment therefor, whereupon the note was by the bank discounted and the money received therefrom deposited to the credit of said company.

Defendant further alleges, upon information and belief, that at the time said representations were made all of the capital stock of said company was issued and outstanding, and that said Merrill, the president, and this plaintiff, as vice president thereof, well knew that there were not at that time 449,995 shares of said company's capital stock still unissued; that at said time the company had outstanding liabilities to the extent of several thousand dollars; that said company did not own or control the patents to the printing press aforesaid; and that each and all of said representations and statements were made to induce this defendant and others to buy said stock and to sign the note in controversy, but for which false and fraudulent representations that instrument would not have been executed.

Finally, defendant contends that no stock has ever been issued to him, or to Fox or Evans, and that no portion of the money received from and deposited in the bank referred to has been used by said company for all or any of the purposes for which it was represented that it would be used; but that, on the contrary, said Merrill, the president, and this plaintiff, caused the same to be diverted and used for purposes other than as stated, and that the directors of said company neglected their duty as such, allowing the moneys to be so misappropriated.

The court found in favor of plaintiff on all the issues, and judgment was entered accordingly. There was a motion for new trial, which was denied. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] It may be observed that defendant's answer fails utterly to allege any injury to or detriment sustained by him. It is not charged that there was any want or failure of consideration, or that the stock was worth less than the price paid for it, or that it would have been worth more had the alleged false representations been true. Nor is it alleged that defendant tendered or offered to return that which he had received. "Where fraud is attempted to be pleaded as a defense, no defense to a note is shown by answer alleging that, by false representations of plaintiff's officers, defendant was induced to make the note * * * given, * * * no damage being shown." Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Richards, 6 Cal. Unrep. 19, 53 Pac. 439. There was no evidence offered tending to show that the stock purchased by Hauser was not worth the amount for which he executed his note in payment therefor.

[2] Appellant argues that no stock was delivered to him. The evidence shows that three certificates, each for 10,000 shares, were issued, one to Fox, one to Evans, and one to Hauser; that said stock was treasury stock; that each stock certificate was inclosed in an envelope with the name of the respective owner thereon; and that the envelope containing appellant's certificate was further marked, "To be called for." When Hauser signed the note, he became entitled to 10,000 shares of the corporate stock —which was in fact issued in his name and held subject to his order—and if it was not delivered to him, it was his own fault. At any rate, the certificate is evidence of ownership of such shares, and, under the facts of the case, title thereto undoubtedly was in him.

[3] Appellant contends that he was to receive 10,000 shares of the treasury stock, but that the company had none. Plaintiff, however, maintains that the company did, in fact, have such stock at that time. The evidence sustains plaintiff's contention, it appearing that there were 450,000 shares of such stock in the treasury at the time of the execution of the note. In fact, all of the issues of fraud tendered by defendant's answer were resolved in favor of the plaintiff, on conflicting evidence; and under these conditions, we cannot disturb those findings.

We fail to find anything in the record which appears in any way to have prejudiced appellant's rights.

Judgment affirmed.

GAMMON v. McKEVITT et al. (Civ. 2219.)

1. Mandamus 🔑90—Not issued to control discretion of commission in selecting portions of highway work.

Under the Good Roads Act, § 9, requiring the county highway commission to prepare detailed specifications for the work to be done or for such parts of it as they deem advisable to have done separately, mandamus will not issue to compel the commission to make specifications for a portion of the highway selected by petitioner, since, while it may be invoked to compel the exercise of discretion, it cannot compel such discretion to be exercised in any particular way.

2. Highways 🔑103—Road held not "durable road," intended by a Good Roads Act.

The purpose of the Good Roads Act was to obtain roads of a durable or permanent character, and durable is not limited to roads capable of withstanding the wear of the traffic upon them, but must be considered in reference to availability for public travel and general road purposes, so that a road which would be subject to inundation at periodic intervals, and which would be buried by proposed levee work in connection with a drainage district and reclamation project, cannot be considered durable.

3. Evidence 🔑48 — Court takes judicial notice of reports of débris commission and of state engineers.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3, requiring the court to take judicial notice of the public and private acts of the departments of the state and the United States, courts take judicial notice of the reports of the California débris commission and of state engineers which have been adopted by state statutes.

4. Mandamus 🔑90 — Initiation of highway work on levee which must be changed not enforced.

Mandamus will not be issued to compel the county highway commission to initiate work on a highway authorized by vote under the Good Roads Act, where the highway was located along an existing levee which was below the flood plane, and which would be raised and changed in location at points in the carrying out of work for the reclamation of lands in a drainage district, and to improve the navigation of the river under the plans of the California débris commission.

5. Highways 🔑103 — Substantial compliance with route of adopted plan sufficient.

The route of a proposed highway as stated in the plan adopted by the electors of the county under the Good Roads Act need be only substantially complied with, and slight departures therefrom, made necessary to obtain practical and economic results, are not legally objectionable.

6. Mandamus 🔑7, 16(1)—Writ within judicial discretion not granted where act commanded would be useless.

A writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies within the sound judicial discretion of the court, and will not be issued to compel an act the right to which would otherwise be clear, where change of conditions contemplated in the near future would render such act useless, and especially where the petitioner's interest was to cast upon the road fund the burden which his land would otherwise have to bear for construction of drainage levee on which the highway was to be located.

Original application for mandamus by E. A. Gammon, on behalf of himself and all other citizens and taxpayers of Sacramento County, against Frank B. McKevitt and others, as members of and constituting the Sacramento County Highway Commission. Petition dismissed.

Hugh B. Bradford, of Sacramento, for respondents.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. The county of Sacramento, in 1916, elected to bring itself within the benefits conferred by the provisions of an act entitled "An act providing for the laying out, constructing, straightening, improvement and repair of main public highways in any county, providing for the voting, issuing, and selling of county bonds and the acceptance of donations to pay for such work and improvements, providing for a highway commission to have charge of such work and improvements, and authorizing cities and towns to improve the portions of such highways within their corporate limits and to issue and sell bonds therefor" (St. 1907, p. 666), and amendments thereto. Said act is commonly known as the "Good Roads" Act, and future reference will be made to it as such. The county highway commission's report and recommendation that bonds issue in the sum of $1,750,000 to be expended in the improvement and repairing of the highways of said county, was adopted by the board of supervisors, and subsequently ratified by the electors of said county at an election held for that purpose.

The report of the highway commission, as adopted by the board of supervisors, designated certain main highways, aggregating 124.42 miles, and divided said highway mileage into districts or sections. The court's attention in this proceeding is directed specifically to a certain selected portion of the main highway designated "No. 14, River Road." The full length of this section or division is 34.10 miles, and the total cost of said improvements, as planned, was estimated to be $570,410. This sum has been set aside and is available for use. It is the complaint of petitioner, who is a resident and taxpayer of said Sacramento county, and an owner of real property abutting on the highway to be improved in said "River Road" district, that respondents, who constitute the county highway commission of said county, have refused, and still refuse, to proceed to "initiate proceedings to prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the improving" of a portion of the public highway included in said "River Road" district or section, and described in said petition, notwithstanding demand made by petitioner on said commission on June 15, 1920, to comply with the mandate of the statute.

The language of the act with which compliance is sought by the aid of a peremptory writ of mandate is as follows:

> "Sec. 9. The doing of the work for which said bonds are issued shall be under the supervision and direction of the highway commission; provided that the final acceptance thereof shall be by the board of supervisors. As soon as the funds raised by the sale of said bonds are in the treasury the commission shall proceed to prepare detailed specifications, plans and profiles for the work to be done, or for such parts of it as they deem it advisable to have done separately, if they have not already done so, and for this purpose they may hire assistants, with the consent of the board of supervisors; and they shall then present said specifications, plans and profiles, with their recommendations in regard to the doing of the work and letting of contracts to the board of supervisors, who shall either adopt or reject the same as presented. If the board adopt the same they shall thereupon advertise for bids for doing the said work, or any part thereof which the highway commission recommend should be done separately, in accordance with said plans, profiles and specifications, by publishing a notice for ten days in a daily newspaper or two weeks in a weekly newspaper published at the county seat. * * *"

It further provides that the board may authorize the highway commission to make contracts without advertisement for any part of said work, the cost of which does not exceed $1,000. Aside from mandatory duties expressly imposed upon said commission, the board of supervisors may, at its discretion, delegate to it other duties.

[1] It will be observed that section 9 of said act requires the highway commission to proceed to prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the work to be done, or for such parts of it as the commission deems it advisable to have done separately. The work to be done means, of course, the whole work. The commission may, it is true, in its discretion, have parts of it done separately. Petitioner, as a matter of fact, has made for the commission a selection of the part or portion which he would compel the commission to act upon. To compel the making of specifications, etc., as selected by petitioner, for the portion of the work described in the petition would destroy the right of the commission to exercise the discretion given by statute. While mandamus may be invoked to compel the exercise of discretion, it cannot compel such discretion to be exercised in any particular way. 26 Cyc. 160.

The regularity of the proceedings leading up to the refusal or failure of said highway commission to act as demanded is admitted. The initiation of the work by the highway commission by preparing detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the improvement of a designated portion of said "River Road" is all that petitioner seeks. The performance of other duties necessary to a completion of the work which are or by direction of the board of supervisors may be cast upon the commission is not sought.

Without considering whether an attempt to merely compel the "initiation of the work" falls within the rule laid down in Boyne v. Ryan, 100 Cal. 265, 34 Pac. 707, and carried forward in later decisions, the question will be discussed on equitable principles.

The general courses of the highway as described in the petition follow the easterly bank of the Sacramento river. The crown of the reclamation levee, constructed to shut out overflow waters from said river, furnishes a base for the roadbed. In its original state, and before the construction of any levees, the area now covered by the base of said levee formed the roadbed. As the levee was raised from time to time to greater heights the roadbed, of course, was correspondingly elevated. When changed the highway followed the levee. The levee served a dual purpose, and has since been thus jointly used. Such use is common in areas subject to overflow.

It is the admission of petitioner that the levee which the highway now traverses "has never been raised nor constructed to conform to the standards heretofore adopted by the Reclamation Board of the State of California, and does not now conform to the standards fixed by said Reclamation Board."

[2] The purpose of the "Good Roads" Act is, unquestionably, to obtain roads of a durable or permanent character, and thereby prevent a waste of public funds by inefficient road construction. Its requirements are therefore that all main highways to be constructed and all improvements to be made by virtue of its provisions shall be of a "durable and lasting character." Permanency or durability of construction does not mean in the sense used in the statute, as contended for by petitioner, merely impregnability to any sort of an attack that may be made upon the work. These terms have, however, a well-understood meaning in the public mind and in the minds of those engaged in the construction of roads adequate to meet the requirements of modern vehicle traffic. A highway subject to be inundated by flood waters during the period of its greatest need or likely to be overlaid with great depths of earth in the execution of state or federal authority, or rendered inaccessible from inevitable cause, would not be such a road as the act contemplates. Durability and lasting character must be considered in reference to availability for public travel and general road purposes. The character of the materials used in the construction of a durable roadbed would amount to nothing if it was to become overlaid with masses of earthen material to the extent that it is rendered inaccessible.

[3] The highway described in the petition lies, as above stated, in a vast drainage district known as the "Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district." The controlling jurisdiction of the State Reclamation Board over the same order to carry into effect the plans of the California débris commission for the control of the flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries is fully defined in Gray v. Reclamation District No. 1500, 174 Cal. 622, 163 Pac. 1024. It is there declared to possess very plenary powers. The power of reclaiming swamp and overflowed lands being in the lawful exercise of the police powers of the land, is one of the most essential powers of government, one that is the least limitable. It is further said that navigability of the Sacramento river is inextricably associated with flood control conditions. Upon these matters the nation and state are acting not only in harmony, but, it may be fairly said, under contract. Gray v. Reclamation Dist. No. 1500, supra. The report of the California débris commission, known as House Document No. 81 of the Sixty-Second Congress, has been approved by the statutes of this state as the plan and, in fact, forms the basis of the Sacramento valley flood control plan and the State Reclamation Board Act. This report fixes the standard for the levees of the Sacramento river south of the city of Sacramento at a required height of 3 feet above the adopted flood plane, 23.5 feet at the head of Grand Island, and 35 feet at American river. The crown-width, slopes, grades, etc., are standardized. Levees already constructed are subject to reconstruction and realignment. Where physical conditions require it the river is to be widened, and, of course, this means that levees in such cases are to be entirely rebuilt. The so-called "maximum assumed flood plane" as part of the plan of flood control is founded upon experience and exhaustive engineering investigation by experts of the highest skill, and has the sanction and approval of both national and state governments. It cannot be presumed that momentous plans thus adopted will be readily changed. It at least possesses some of the inherent qualities of permanency. Whatever uncertainty, if any, that may attend the permanency of the flood plane as now fixed is overshadowed by the certainty that the levees upon which the roadbed now rests must be raised beyond the present height. Also changes in placement, realignments, and a number of other requirements are pointed out in an official notice given by L. H. Rand, colonel, corps of engineers, executive officer of the California débris commission, to the state reclamation board, dated July 12, 1918. The date set for the completion of this work is December 1, 1922.

> "The reports of the California débris commission and of state engineers have been adopted by state statutes. This court takes judicial notice of them. * * * In addition to this, the history of the state, its topographical and its general conditions, including notorious facts concerning its rivers, are all matters of judicial cognizance." Gray v. Reclamation Dist. No. 1500, supra.

Courts will take judicial notice of the public and private official acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this state and the United States. Subdivision 3, § 1875, Code Civ. Proc.

Gov. William D. Stephens, as the executive head of this state, and the department of the Secretary of War of the United States have, for several years past, been joined in earnest co-operation in an effort to carry forward the plans of the California débris commission and the several flood control acts affecting the Sacramento river. To this end vast sums of money have been raised and expended by both state and nation in promotion of the project. The state has declared through its legislative voice that the "state of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest in having erected, maintained and protected on the banks of the Sacramento * * * river * * * good and sufficient levees and embankments or other works of reclamation, adequately protecting the lands overflowed by said streams," etc. Stats. of 1913, p. 252, § 7. The Governor of the state in a public document, dated June 19, 1917, and addressed to the Secretary of War, says:

> "The state is bound, therefore, in honor, by legislative enactment and by her own interest as well to carry out the terms of the contract, and the provisions (a), (b) and (c) of the flood control act, quoted in your letter are included in the obligation imposed upon her."

[4] Provision (c), above referred to, contains the requirement of the California débris commission (which has been expressly adopted by the Legislature) that said levees shall be constructed to such grade and section and within such time as may be required by said commission. The day fixed for the completion of said work is December 1, 1922. It is to be presumed that the Governor will insist by messages to the Legislature and through other official channels that the statutory agreements of the state with the federal government be complied with. Unquestionably it is to be presumed that the Legislature will provide the ways and means and that both branches of the state government, its executive and legislative, will co-operate in redeeming through specially created agencies, the solemn obligations of the state, which are surely in accord with our declared legislative policy. If this be done the levees upon which the proposed durable main highway is to be constructed will, beyond doubt, be raised, with probable necessary realignments occurring, and it is likely to be otherwise disturbed. If the work contemplated be now forced a waste of public funds would inevitably follow. Surely no contention is made that the writ of mandate may be employed to compel such a result. Neither is it to be employed to accomplish a useless or vain thing.

Petitioner's claim is that the highway commission has taken no step to "prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles," a preliminary prerequisite for the completion of the improvements. The work, indeed, must therefore stand still until detailed specifications, plans, etc., are prepared by the highway commission, and it should be compelled to act unless it can find legal justification in so refusing.

It must be presumed that the statutes and the well-defined policy of the state will be carried out, and that said levees will be raised to prescribed heights and realigned or reconstructed or set further away from the river banks as necessity or safety shall require.

The work of preparing detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the improvement of the highway would doubtless be done at a considerable cost. After such preparation it is quite certain that they would prove to be valueless for any purpose. The elements necessary for a calculative basis would be exceedingly uncertain, if not wholly lacking. Without knowledge of the full details concerning the proposed levees, including height and width to be added to the present levees, realignments to be made, and a score of other important details, a reasonably accurate knowledge of which would be essential for an intelligent result, the demanded specifications, plans, and profiles would necessarily be founded on speculation and vagaries and of no practical value. For the highway commission to prepare its specifications it must first know in detail what the state is to require in its levee construction.

[5] While the general course of the road was described by the commission in its adopted plan there could be no very serious legal objection, as suggested by petitioner, to slight departures therefrom made necessary to obtain practical and economic results. A substantial compliance is all that the law would require in this respect. It is not beyond hope that the same co-operation that has heretofore existed between levee builder and road builder will continue. There can be no doubt but that the whole plan of highway improvement was formed and adopted on the theory that the moneys raised by the issuance and sale of bonds was to be only applied and used, except in a few minor instances, in constructing durable roadbeds. It was but a fair and natural presumption that the levees as now constructed, or hereafter to be raised, would furnish support for the finished roadbed or pavement surface. There was no reason for the electors of the county who voted on the issuance of bonds to believe that the general custom of the county would be departed from in this particular instance. The amount of money provided to meet the cost of the proposed improvements refutes a contrary theory. Levees are ordinarily constructed at the expense of the landowners who are benefited therefrom. It scarcely requires the aid of testimony to show that $570,410 would not construct 34.10 miles of durable roadway upon embankments or levees to be erected at a safe height above flood plane and in addition build expensive bridges across broad streams. Petitioner does not claim that it will. He only insists that the fund provided is sufficient to build a durable road and argues that a durable road is one that possesses from the character of the material used in its construction inherent wearing strength or durability. Inferentially, however, the highway is to be built on the present levee grade, which is below the flood plane.

The petition is silent as to whether the rights of way to be secured by Sacramento county, as shown by the report of the highway commission, over the lands of certain named private landowners which lie within the "River Road" section have yet been acquired; and also as to the result of the proposed joint construction by the supervisors of Sacramento and Solano counties of a bridge across the Sacramento river at Rio Vista.

The argument that the highway having been established before any levee was built, and that the dominant easement therefore goes with it for highway purposes, and that this right cannot be lost except by direct provision of the Legislature that it be subject to uses for reclamation purposes or unless taken by condemnation proceedings, is not important in the light of the facts presented by the issues. The writ of mandate may not be employed to aid in the unnecessary or wanton destruction of property, even though its loss may be made whole to the owner. Equity abhors wanton waste. The reasonable certainty that a durable highway constructed upon the levee at its present grade would within a reasonable period become inextricably lost or rendered inaccessible for use would be a sufficient reason for a denial of the writ.

[6] The road construction cases cited by petitioner are not wholly in point here. The obstacles to be overcome in those cases were the natural incidents to the building of roads in the particular localities in which they were constructed, and were obviously within the contemplation of their projectors. Cuts or tunnels through mountains or causeways across swamps and morasses are difficulties to be surmounted in districts in which they are known to exist. Such difficulties are quite patent, however, and are always reckoned with in such projects of construction. In the instant case, however, the facts are different. Here it would be but natural to suppose that the levee, if raised to a height to insure safety against overflow, would be so raised at the expense of the landowners and others directly benefited thereby; secondly, if not raised, it would still serve reasonably well as a subgrade for the highway as it had served for many years past. Its height was sufficient as a roadbed, but insufficient for levee purposes.

> "The writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies, to a considerable extent, within the sound judicial discretion of the court where the application is made; * * * and no court should allow a writ of mandamus to compel a technical compliance with the letter of the law, where such compliance will violate the spirit of the law. * * * The writ of mandate should not be used to wrongfully wrest a statute from its true purpose." Wiedwald v. Dodson, 95 Cal. 450, 30 Pac. 580.

A well-known principle of law is announced in State ex rel. Southern New England Tel. Co. v. Towers, Commissioner, 71 Conn. 657, 42 Atl. 1083, to the effect that where the city council had in contemplation and under consideration a plan to be worked out within a reasonable period of time that would change an established system of stringing telephonic, telegraphic, fire alarm and electric light wires to a new and improved system, a writ of mandate would not lie to compel the street commissioner to grant permission to a telephone company to lay wires under the old system, although the right was absolute, and would have been compelled but for the contemplated change. This is surely a sound principle of equity, and has its application to the instant case.

It is the claim of respondent that the only interest that petitioner has in this proceeding that may be differentiated from the interest of any other taxpayer of the county is an ulterior interest of profit by shifting a burden that belongs to him and his associates to those who would not otherwise be called upon to contribute to the construction of levees for the protection of himself and other abutting landowners. It is true that petitioner's legal grievance is not greater than that common to other taxpayers of the county. He is not denied a privilege by delay that he had ever enjoyed. The means of egress and ingress to his property remain unchanged and no complaint is made as to its adequacy. If the levee is raised to the flood height at the expense of the bond fund, it will directly relieve him of a burden that would otherwise be his. As a matter of law, he cannot be said to be any more beneficially interested in the improvement of the designated portion of the highway sought to be improved than in any other part, or the whole thereof, or than any other citizen taxpayer should be.

The delay complained of has not lagged beyond state highway construction or similar public work in other counties of the state. The highway commission, by resolution, as shown by the petition, gave as a reason for not acting as demanded the failure of petitioners themselves to comply with the requirements of the state reclamation board and to bring the river levee up to the prescribed grade. This much is admitted.

It is not charged that the highway commission has in any wise acted contumaciously. It has declined only to act until such time as it may be able to proceed efficiently.

It is a matter of record and a notorious fact that the reclamation board is at the present time through the state department of engineering completing surveys such as are necessary for the adoption of a definite project to follow the requirements of the California débris commission, which shall include the east levee of the Sacramento river south from the city of Sacramento. The work will doubtless be carried forward with such acceleration as is consistent with the magnitude of the project. The right to the issuance of the writ of mandate is largely within the discretion of the court. Much that has been said here is directed to the discretionary powers of the court. There appears, however, sufficient equitable reasons for denying the petition. It is ordered, therefore, that the demurrer be sustained and the petition dismissed.

Assignments 🔑106—Payment for assignment of electric power contract held to be computed on dredging under existing and later contracts.

Contract by which, in consideration of plaintiff assigning his contract for electric power for dredging at N., defendant agreed to pay plaintiff one cent per yard of material dredged through use of defendant's dredge leased to the city of N., payments to be made out of moneys as received from the city as rentals for the dredge, held to apply, not only to the lease contract then made by defendant with the city, but to a later lease contract made between them; the later contract amounting merely to an extension of the earlier, and under both the dredge being operated, not only on the same work but, as contemplated, by use of the electric power, contract for which was assigned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John N. York, Judge.

Action by A. H. Koebig against the North American Dredging Company of Nevada. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph Bandini, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover the sum of $3,028, claimed to be a balance due from the defendant to the plaintiff under a certain agreement in writing which, as set forth in the complaint, reads as follows:

"A. H. Koebig, Sr., Los Angeles, California—Dear Sir: In consideration of your assigning the agreement which you hold with the Southern California Edison Company, to furnish electric power for dredging purposes at Newport Beach, California, to C. F. Guthridge, the North American Dredging Company of Nevada, a corporation, hereby agrees to pay you an amount equal to one cent per cubic yard of material dredged through the use of said company's dredge leased to said city of Newport on November 20, 1918, such payments to be made out of moneys as received from said city as rental for said dredge; provided, however, that any sum over and above $2,500.00 which said Southern California Edison Company may charge to said C. F. Guthridge for the construction and erection of a line for transmitting electric current to a point marked station S north, of Bay Island, on the Harbor channel map of Newport Harbor, approved by Paul Kressly, April 30, 1918, shall be deducted from the amount so to be paid by said North American Dredging Company of Nevada to said A. H. Koebig, Sr., as above specified. North American Dredging Company of Nevada, a Corporation, by C. F. Guthridge, Vice President."

The complaint further alleges that prior to the making of said contract between himself and the defendant the latter was negotiating for a contract with the city of Newport Beach, by the terms of which the defendant was to lease to said city of Newport Beach a certain dredger to be used by said city in dredging a channel through its harbor, but was unable to consummate said agreement because of the defendant's inability to provide the electric energy for the operation of said dredger, and for that reason the defendant had entered into the aforesaid contract with the plaintiff, and was thus enabled to consummate their transaction with the city of Newport Beach, and that under their said contract with said city a large amount of dredging was done. The plaintiff further alleges that he performed the portions of said agreement on his part to be performed, and that the defendant proceeded, through the aid of the power thus obtained, to do the dredging work specified in said agreement, and thereby and in accordance with the terms thereof became indebted to the plaintiff in a certain amount, upon which certain payments were made, leaving a balance due of the sum for which this action has been brought, and which the defendant is alleged to have failed and refused to pay.

The defendant in its answer put in issue the material averments of the plaintiff's complaint, and in addition thereto set forth a state of facts tending to show that the contract which it was alleged to have entered into with the city of Newport Beach had expired by reason of the fact that the funds of the municipality which had been set apart to do said dredging work had become exhausted, and that said defendant had paid to the plaintiff all moneys which had become due prior to the expiration of said contract and termination of said work, and that after the suspension of dredging work under said contract the defendant had entered into a new or supplemental contract with said city of Newport Beach, to which new contract and to whatever dredging work was to be done thereunder the contract between itself and the plaintiff did not apply, and hence that the defendant was under no liability to the plaintiff by reason of any dredging work done under said new and supplemental contract with said city.

The case went to trial upon the issues as thus made up, and upon the submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact, following in the main the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, and further finding that the original and supplemental contracts between the defendant and the city of Newport Beach constituted but one entire and inseparable contract, to which the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant applied, with the result that the defendant was held liable to plaintiff for the percentage to be paid him for all dredging done under both the first and the supplemental agreement, and hence found as a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the balance claimed to be due. Judgment was entered accordingly for said sum, and it is from this judgment that the defendant prosecutes the present appeal.

We find no merit in the appellant's contention that the agreement between itself and the plaintiff was to be confined as to its scope and effect to the original contract between the defendant and the city of Newport Beach. The agreement with the plaintiff does not so state either expressly or by reasonable implication. It was in plain terms an agreement to pay the plaintiff an amount equal to one cent per cubic yard of material dredged through the use of the defendant's dredge while the same was being used by said city of Newport Beach for dredging purposes and was operated through the power obtained by the defendant through the contract which plaintiff held with the Southern California Edison Company and which had by him been assigned to the defendant. This is made plain by reference to the supplemental contract which the defendant entered into with the city of Newport Beach, and which amounts merely to an extension of the terms of the original contract for the use by said city of the defendant's dredger. Under both the original and supplemental contract with the city of Newport Beach the defendant's dredger was to be used, and was to be operated, and the same was in fact operated, by the use of the electric power to which the defendant acquired the right of use through the assignment to it of the paintiff's contract with the Southern California Edison Company. The trial court properly treated the arrangement between the defendant and the city of Newport Beach as continuous in its character, and hence as one to which in its entirety the plaintiff's contract applied. This being so, there were no errors committed, we think, in ordering judgment in plaintiff's favor for the amount which became due through the use and operation of the defendant's dredger by the city of Newport Beach under the supplemental arrangement for the completion of the dredging operations for which the defendant's dredger and the plaintiff's contract for electric power requisite to operate the same were acquired.

Judgment affirmed.

HOWDERSHELL v. HOWDERSHELL.

(Civ. 3622. L. A. 6209.)

1. Divorce ⚷136—Separation by consent not shown.

In an action by husband for divorce on ground of desertion, evidence held to sustain finding that separation was not by consent with the understanding that one party should apply for divorce under Civ. Code, § 99, though an agreement for division of property was entered into soon after the separation.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

2. Divorce ⚷56—"Consent separation" immaterial by reason of subsequent refusal to cohabit.

Divorce for desertion was properly granted although there was a "separation by consent" within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 99, where after the execution of the consent agreement plaintiff requested defendant to resume the marriage relation with him and the defendant refused his request.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by B. J. Howdershell against Norma Howdershell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton K. Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of divorce in plaintiff's behalf on the ground of desertion. The sole contention of the appellant herein is that the evidence in the case shows that the separation between the parties, upon which the plaintiff's claim of desertion on the part of the defendant is based, was a voluntary separation occurring as the result of an agreement in writing between the parties for such separation and for a settlement of their property rights. Defendant claimed at the trial and contends upon this appeal that under section 99 of the Civil Code "separation by consent with or without the understanding that one or the other party will apply for a divorce is not desertion." The difficulty with the defendant's contention in that regard does not arise out of the section of the Code above cited, but arises out of its application to the facts of the case at bar. These facts as found by the court and as fully supported by the evidence are briefly these: band and wife until some time in the month of April, 1917, at which time they were residing in the city of Los Angeles. For some time prior to the latter date their marital relations had been inharmonious to an extent which seemed to render their separation imminent and inevitable. On or about April 22, 1917, a meeting was held between the plaintiff and defendant and two friends of theirs, a Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton, with a view to attempting to bring about a reconciliation. After considerable discussion the effort of these friends to effect a reconciliation proved unsuccessful, and the plaintiff left his home where the interview occurred and went to his office in another part of the city, to which shortly thereafter the defendant sent Mr. Hamilton with a message, stating that she did not wish to see the plaintiff any more and directing him not to return to their home. Plaintiff, however, returned to the home, but only for the purpose of removing his effects to a rear bedroom therein, which he occupied for a short while thereafter but with no intercourse with the defendant. A few days later, at the defendant's request, the plaintiff prepared and presented to the defendant the written agreement for a division of their property upon which the defendant herein relies as showing a separation by consent. The trial court embodied this writing in its findings, but in connection therewith expressly found that said writing was entered into after the defendant's desertion of the plaintiff had been accomplished by her refusal to be reconciled to him and by her direction that he remain away from the home. The written agreement between the parties, while it recites the existence of conditions which render it impossible for the parties to longer live together in the relation of husband and wife, does not purport otherwise to be an agreement to separate or, in other words, to amount to a separation by consent, but does purport to amount to nothing more than a property arrangement predicated upon an already existing separation. The finding of the court in that respect is:

> "That said agreement was not intended as an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to live separate and apart, but was intended to recognize the fact that plaintiff and defendant were then living separate and apart by reason of the defendant's refusal to live with said plaintiff, and was for the purpose of providing a property settlement between the plaintiff and defendant and to assure maintenance and support for said defendant."

The court further makes this suggestive finding, namely:

> "That the next day after the execution of said agreement, to wit, on April 29, 1917, the said plaintiff requested the said defendant to resume the marriage relation with him and to thereafter live with him, but the said defendant refused so to do, and ever since has continued to live separate and apart from the plaintiff and to desert and abandon him."

The evidence fully sustains these findings of fact, and the findings amply support the judgment in plaintiff's favor rendered and entered herein.

It may be noted that the defendant, while relying solely upon her contention that the evidence showed a separation by consent, has never either in her pleadings or proofs offered to return to plaintiff or to resume their marital relations.

We find no merit in the appellant's contention, and the judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, we desire to say that our denial is not to be taken as an approval of the portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal dealing with the question of the character of the written agreement referred to therein, and the finding of the trial court that the same was not intended as an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to live separate and apart. We base our denial of the petition for hearing in this court upon what is said in the opinion with relation to the finding of the trial court to the effect that after the execution of the agreement the plaintiff requested the defendant to resume the marriage relation with him and that the defendant refused this request and has ever since continued to live separate and apart from him. This finding does not appear to be attacked, and sufficiently disposes of the case.

All concur.

McMILLAN v. GREENAMYER et al.
(Civ. 3234.)

Appeal and error ⚷124—Associations ⚷20(1)—One trustee of association may appeal from alleged collusive confessed judgment.

In an action on a note given by trustees of an association, one of the trustees, representing himself and other shareholders, is entitled to maintain a defense on a showing that the other trustees were acting in collusion with plaintiff in attempting to enforce a note on which the consideration had failed, so that appeal from a judgment by confession by such trustee whose answer was ignored should not be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Joseph McMillan against C. V. Greenamyer and others as trustees, doing business under the name and style of Mechanical Development Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, stating as ground for the motion that judgment against the defendants was entered by confession, and that appeal does not lie from such a judgment.

The transcript shows that the complaint was filed May 29, 1917, to recover judgment on a promissory note executed by the Mechanical Development Company, an unincorporated association doing business under a declaration of trust such as is commonly used in similar organizations fashioned after the plan of the so-called "Massachusetts Trust." On June 12, 1917, an answer was filed, purporting to be on behalf of all the defendants, to which a demurrer was sustained with leave to amend, on June 27, 1917. A confession of judgment was filed July 2, 1917, on behalf of the association, signed by Josephine M. Johnson, vice president, and P. Borden Johnson, secretary. Attached to the confession appears a copy of a resolution passed by the trustees, ordering the confession to be executed. It is recited in the resolution that the association has no defense to the action, and that the appearance by answer and the employment of an attorney by trustee Greenamyer was unauthorized. An amended answer was filed July 12, 1917, purporting to be on behalf of the defendant trustees, which, by order of court made July 20, 1917, was stricken from the files, and the names of Josephine M. Johnson and P. Borden Johnson were also eliminated from the amended answer; the defendant Greenamyer being granted leave to file an amended answer within ten days. The defendant Greenamyer, answering for the Mechanical Development Company and himself individually as trustee, on July 24, 1917, filed an amended and supplemental answer attached to which appears an order of the presiding judge permitting its filing. This pleading avers that there was no consideration for the execution of the note, or, at least, that the consideration has failed to a material extent through the manipulations of the plaintiff; that the defendants Josephine M. Johnson and P. Borden Johnson are subservient to the will of plaintiff; and that they are conniving with the plaintiff to wreck the association in order to deprive Greenamyer of his valuable interest therein. Plaintiff moved the court, on July 12, 1917, to render judgment on the confession. The notice of motion bears the following indorsements: "Jul. 12, 1917. Motion denied. Attest: H. J. Lelande, Clerk, by Geo. B. Whiteleather, Deputy. Department No. 16;" and "Nov. 21, 1917. Motion granted. Attest: H. J. Lelande, Clerk, by E. E. Ekdale, Deputy. Department No. 5." The judgment from which this appeal is taken provides that, in accordance with the confession of judgment, the plaintiff recover from the defendants Greenamyer, Josephine M. Johnson, and P. Borden Johnson, as trustees doing business under the name and style of Mechanical Development Company, the sum of $6,887, etc.

The record does not disclose that any action was ever taken on the answer filed by order of court subsequent to the filing of the confession, and the judgment itself is entirely silent with reference to the answer. The court apparently ignored this pleading, no trial was had on its issues, and no finding made in regard to the truth of its allegations. If the statements made therein were substantiated by proof, the court would have been justified in rendering a different judgment than that founded on the confession.

The defendant Greenamyer, being one of the trustees, representing himself and the other shareholders, in the association, is entitled to maintain a defense in its behalf, on showing that the other trustees are acting in collusion with the plaintiff in his attempt to enforce an illegal demand against the association. Newhall v. Western Zinc Min. Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 Pac. 1040.

Motion denied.

Ex parte LAMSON. (Cr. 947.)

1. Infants 🔑19—Minutes of court held to show voluntary appearance of parents waiving service.

In a proceeding to make a child a ward of the juvenile court, a recital in the minutes that the parents "were present in open court," and that they participated in the proceedings and were sworn and testified shows a voluntary appearance as contemplated by St. 1915, p. 1227, § 4, waiving a failure to serve the parents with process.

2. Habeas corpus 🔑99(1)—Facts held to show child in lawful custody under court order.

In a parent's habeas corpus proceeding to secure release of a child adjudged a ward of the juvenile court, where failure to serve the parents with citation had been waived by voluntary appearance, and at a subsequent hearing in which the parents were served and from which no appeal was taken the child was committed and is in custody, held, that the custody was not without due process of law.

In the matter of the application of Fred M. Lamson for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the juvenile court of Butte county to secure the release of petitioner's daughter, a ward of the court, from custody. Petition denied.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for petitioner.

John R. Robinson, Dist. Atty., of Chico, and R. A. Leonard, of Oroville, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The petitioner, who is the father of Gertrude Lamson, a ward of the juvenile court of the county of Butte, filed his application in this court for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of examining into the legality of the confinement of said ward and obtaining her discharge from custody. The grounds of the petition are that said ward is illegally held in custody because at the time of the original commitment no service of citation was made upon the parents of said ward, that the same was not filed with the clerk of the court prior to hearing, and that service thereof was not waived by them by a voluntary appearance entered in the minutes of the court, as required by section 4 of the juvenile court law. Stats. 1915, p. 1225.

The facts of the case are that on the 2d day of June, 1916, the judge of the superior court, sitting as a judge of the juvenile court in the county of Butte, made and entered his judgment adjudicating said Gertrude Lamson a ward of the juvenile court and finding that the parents of said ward were incapable of exercising proper parental control over her. Said judgment and findings were made as a result of the hearing conducted by said court on the 29th day of May, 1916, based upon a petition regularly filed therein on the 25th day of the same month. Thereafter, and on the 9th day of April, 1917, the petitioner herein filed with the District Court of Appeal for the state of California in and for the Third Appellate District his application for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the probation officer of said county of Butte, based on the same grounds urged herein. This application was denied. On April 24, 1917, a new petition was filed in the juvenile court of the county of Butte, asking that said ward be committed to the St. Catherine's Home and Training School in San Francisco. Citation thereon was duly served upon the parents of said ward, and they duly appeared at the hearing thereof, were present in court, were represented there by counsel, and took part in all said proceedings. As a result of said hearing said court did on the 2d day of May, 1917, commit said ward to the St. Catherine's Home and Training School where she is now confined. No appeal was taken from this order.

[1, 2] For the first hearing no citation was served upon the parents, and service thereof was not waived by them in writing. Hence petitioner's whole case rests upon a claimed insufficiency of the minutes of the court of the 29th day of May, 1916, the day when the first hearing was had. In these minutes it is recited that "F. M. Lamson and Martha Lamson were present in open court." The minutes further show that these parties, the father and mother of Gertrude Lamson, participated in the proceedings and were sworn and testified as witnesses therein. If the clerk had used the word "appeared" instead of the words "were present," there would be no ground for argument. The statute requires that the voluntary appearance be entered in the minutes of the court unless citation has been served or waived in writing. We are satisfied that the clear intendment of the entry made by the clerk was that of a voluntary appearance as contemplated by the statute, and in view of the fact that the same question was determined adversely to petitioner in the application for habeas corpus before the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, and of the further fact that the ward is now committed under a subsequent order made after due notice to the parents from which no appeal was taken, we cannot say that the ward is now in custody without due process of law.

The petition is denied, and the ward remanded.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; BRITTAIN, J.

NEELY v. BUSTER et al. (Civ. 3239.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 29, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 24, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Inferences to support court's findings considered as established facts.

On appeal from a judgment denying cancellation of a deed, the evidence must be considered on the theory that every reasonable inference deducible therefrom, and which is favorable to the court's finding that the deed was delivered, is an established fact.

2. Appeal and error 🔑842(2)—Finding of delivery is finding of fact.

Delivery or nondelivery of a deed is a question of fact to be found from the surrounding circumstances, so that a finding of delivery based on conflicting testimony, or on inferences reasonably deducible from the evidence, cannot be questioned on appeal.

3. Deeds 🔑54, 56(6)—Delivery essential; delivery must be in lifetime of grantor.

Delivery of a deed is essential to a valid transfer of title to real estate, and must take place during the life of the grantor.

4. Deeds 🔑61—Delivery to third person who delivers to grantee after grantor's death is sufficient.

Delivery of a deed need not be made to the grantee in person, but it is sufficient where the grantor, parting with all dominion and control over it and intending it to take effect as a present transaction, delivers it to a third person to be delivered to the grantee, though the third person does not transfer possession to the grantee until after the grantor's death.

5. Deeds 🔑58(3)—Leaving with attorney held delivery to grantee.

Where the grantor, after signing and acknowledging his deed, gave it to his attorney, with directions to give it to the grantee without any reservations or conditions attached to such delivery, it is sufficiently shown that the grantor parted with all control over the deed and intended it should operate as a present transfer of title.

6. Deeds 🔑65—Grantee's assent to deed delivered to third person relates to time of delivery.

Where a deed is delivered by the grantor to a third person for the grantee without the grantee's knowledge, the grantee's subsequent assent to or acceptance of the deed relates back to the delivery to the depositary.

7. Deeds 🔑208(6)—Evidence held to show acceptance by grantee during grantor's lifetime.

In a suit to cancel a deed for nondelivery, where it was shown that the grantor left the deed with his attorney for the grantee, evidence that thereafter the grantee in the grantor's presence instructed the attorney to retain the papers for her sufficiently shows an acceptance by her, though she testified that, while she knew the papers transferred the property to her, she did not know it was a deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by G. W. Neely, as administrator, against Ethel Stella May Buster and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry M. Hurd, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Wilbur F. Earl, deceased, who died intestate on December 29, 1915. Plaintiff's intestate was the grandfather and adoptive father of the defendant Ethel Stella May Buster.

Wilbur F. Earl, something more than a year before his death, namely, on September 11, 1914, signed and acknowledged and left with his attorney, Henry M. Hurd, Esq., a deed to the property in controversy, wherein his granddaughter, Mrs. Buster, is named as the grantee. The deed, which was without any pecuniary consideration, recites that it is made for love and affection. Without doubt, it was intended as a gift from the grandfather to his granddaughter. Plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Wilbur F. Earl, deceased, alleging that the deed was never delivered, brought the action to have the instrument declared to be null and void. The answer put in issue the allegations of nondelivery. The lower court found that the deed was delivered, judgment, accordingly, was entered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The evidence bearing upon the one question in the case, that concerning the alleged nondelivery of the deed, is, in substance, as follows:

The deed was prepared by the grantor's attorney, Mr. Hurd. After being signed and acknowledged by the grantor, it was left by him with his attorney for delivery to the grantee. Mrs. Buster testified, in substance, as follows:

> I was not present when the deed was signed; I knew nothing about it until after it was recorded. I knew I was going to get the property, and I knew that grandpa had some papers made out, because he told me so. I learned that in the latter part of September, 1914, some time after the deed was actually made. He did not tell me it was a deed that he had made out. He said it was just some papers. Grandpa said he thought he would have it made out in a deed, so there would be no mistake. Nobody ever told me it was a deed. I must have known it was a deed. I did not have it in my possession until it was recorded, which was after grandpa had died. I told Senator Hurd to keep the papers for me. (The witness is here referring to a conversation, testified to by Mr. Hurd, that took place between him and Mrs. Buster during Mr. Earl's lifetime and in the latter's presence.)

Mr. Hurd testified, in substance, as follows:

> I prepared the deed. Mr. Earl acknowledged it before me as notary. I was present when it was signed. It was signed in my office. The deed was left with me at the time it was made. When it was signed Mr. Earl told me to give it to Mrs. Buster—the grantee. He told me that at the time he signed it. He told me to keep it and give it to her. He did not tell me to wait until after his death before giving it to her. I was instructed to deliver the deed to Mrs. Buster at once. I did not deliver it until after it was recorded. I recorded it on January 3, 1916, after Mr. Earl's death. I was not told not to deliver it or not to record it. The deed was in my possession from the time it was made until recorded. Mr. Earl was talking about giving Mrs. Buster his property, and I said, "Do you want to make a will?" and he said, "No; I want to deed it to her. I want Ethel to have it;" and he says, "Can you make that out?" and I said, "Yes." The proposition at that time in my mind was to leave the deed in escrow. I told him if he made the deed he never could have it, and he said he wanted her to have it, and I said, "Do you want the deed?" and he said, "No; just give it to her." Following that, I think in the latter part of September, as I was going to court, I met Mr. Earl and Mrs. Buster at the entrance to the building (referring, evidently, to the building in which the witness had his offices), and I spoke to them and I said, "How do you do, Mr. Earl?" and he said, "I was just going up to see you;" and I said, "What was it?" and he says, "I was going to give Ethel those papers;" and I said, "All right, how soon do you get back?" He said, "Not for some time." I said, "I am just going to court and I will soon be back." She said, "All right, Mr. Hurd, you keep them for me." I said, "All right, Mrs. Buster, I will;" and I hurried on to court. I kept the papers for her.

[1, 2] It is the contention of appellant that the finding that the deed was delivered by the grantor and accepted by the grantee is contrary to the law and the evidence. The evidence must be considered on the theory that every reasonable inference deducible therefrom, and which is favorable to the court's finding that the deed was delivered, is an established fact. Delivery or nondelivery is always a question of fact to be found from the surrounding circumstances of each transaction; and a finding that a deed has been delivered, if the finding is based upon an analysis of conflicting testimony or upon inferences reasonably deducible from the evidence, may not be questioned here.

[3, 4] Delivery of a deed is, of course, an essential element of a valid transfer of title to real estate, and must take place during the life of the grantor; for a deed cannot be made to perform the functions of a will. But the delivery need not be to the grantee in person. The deed may be delivered to a third person to be by him delivered to the grantee. Where the grantor, parting with all dominion and control over the deed, and intending it to take effect and pass the title as a present transfer, delivers it to a third person to be delivered to the grantee, and such person does deliver it to the grantee, as authorized and directed by the grantor, there is a good delivery to the grantee, though the grantor be dead at the date of the last delivery. Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201, 16 S. W. 497, 24 Am. St. Rep. 326; Kelly v. Woolsey, 177 Cal. 325, 335, 170 Pac. 837; Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 381, 97 Pac. 885; Nelson v. Colton, 36 Cal. App. 69, 79, 171 Pac. 701.

[5] Earl, after signing and acknowledging the deed, gave it to his attorney with directions to give it to the grantee. No conditions whatever were attached to this delivery of the deed to the grantor's attorney. The grantor parted with it without any reservation or condition. Moreover, it is a justifiable inference from the evidence that Earl had formed a determination to convey this property to his granddaughter, and that the deed was signed and acknowledged by him pursuant to that formed and expressed design. These circumstances show quite conclusively that when he delivered the deed to his attorney he parted with all control over it, and intended that it should operate as a present transfer of the title to the land.

Appellant's chief contention appears to be that the grantee's assent during the lifetime of the grantor has not been shown. He concedes, as indeed he must, that where a deed is delivered to a third person with instructions to deliver it to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, the latter parting with all dominion over the instrument and reserving no right to recall it or to alter its provisions, such third person will, in such case, have authority, after the death of the grantor, to deliver the deed to the person named as grantee, and, as between the grantor and grantee and those claiming under them, the rights of third persons not intervening, the grantee's acceptance of the deed, though after the death of the grantor, will constitute a good delivery. But, says appellant, here the grantor did not authorize his agent to deliver the deed after his death, but to make immediate delivery to the grantee. Hence, says counsel for appellant, Hurd's agency was dissolved by the grantor's death, his authority to deliver the deed thereupon terminated, and, as no assent by the grantee or manual tradition to her was given or made during the grantor's lifetime, the deed never became operative; citing, among other cases, Furenes v. Eide, 109 Iowa, 511, 80 N. W. 539, 77 Am. St. Rep. 545.

Without a doubt, a deed, to be effective, must be delivered, actually or constructively, to the grantee, or to some person for his use, during the lifetime of the grantor. A deed is to be deemed constructively delivered "where it is delivered to a stranger for the benefit of the grantee, and his assent is shown, or may be presumed." Civ. Code, § 1059, subd. 2. For reasons presently to be stated, we incline to the view that, under the circumstances of this case, the grantee's assent during the lifetime of the grantor may be "presumed," not inferred as a fact, but presumed as a matter of law, within the meaning of the above-quoted Code provision. However, be this as it may, we are quite satisfied that the grantee's actual assent, during the lifetime of the grantor, has been shown.

[6] It has been held in this jurisdiction and elsewhere that, as between the grantor and grantee, or those claiming under them, and in the absence of the rights of third persons superior to those of the grantor, the grantee's assent to a deed delivered to a third person for delivery to the grantee, made after such tradition to the third person, constitutes a full and complete delivery to the grantee as of the date of the manual tradition to the depositary. Under the doctrine of relation, the grantee's subsequent assent to or acceptance of the deed relates back to the date of the delivery to the depositary and makes such tradition to the latter and the grantee's subsequent assent contemporaneous. Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 561, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46, 56 Am. St. Rep. 726; Kelly v. Woolsey, supra; Fischer Leaf Co. v. Whipple, 51 Mo. App. 181, 184; note to Munro v. Bowles, 54 L. R. A. 890. In Kelly v. Woolsey, supra, it is said:

> "Where a grantor intends that the deed executed by him shall operate as a present transfer of title, and delivers it to a third person without condition, the title passes as of the date of the delivery to such third person, although the deed is not actually delivered to the grantee until after the grantor's death." (Italics ours.)

It also is held, with few, if any, exceptions, that there is a presumption of acceptance by the grantee of a deed beneficial to, and imposing no burdens upon, him, delivered to a third person for his benefit. De Levillain v. Evans, 39 Cal. 120; Bryan v. Wash, 2 Gilm. (Ill.) 557, 565; Rivard v. Walker, 39 Ill. 413; Holcombe v. Richards, 38 Minn. 38, 35 N. W. 714; note to Munro v. Bowles, supra, 54 L. R. A. p. 892. In Bryan v. Wash, supra, the court stated the rule as follows:

> "The delivery may be made by the grantor himself or by any one authorized to make the delivery, nor is it indispensable that the delivery be made to the grantee, or even to any person authorized by the grantee to accept the deed, for if the delivery be made to a stranger, for, and in behalf of the grantee, and to his use, it is a good delivery, although the grantee may in truth be entirely ignorant of the conveyance, for, if the delivery be absolute, the assent of the grantee is presumed from the fact that the conveyance is beneficial to him."

In the light of these legal principles, we incline to the view that, the grantor having unconditionally delivered the deed to Mr. Hurd, without any right to recall it, and it being wholly beneficial to the grantee, and the latter having actually accepted it from Mr. Hurd after the death of the grantor, her assent to the delivery, during the lifetime of the grantor, even though she then had no knowledge that the instrument was a deed, will be presumed as a matter of law. See Standiford v. Standiford, 97 Mo. 231, 10 S. W. 836, 3 L. R. A. 299; Miller v. Meers, 155 Ill. 284, 40 N. E. 577; Winterbottom v. Pattison, 152 Ill. 334, 38 N. E. 1050; McCutchen v. McCutchen, 9 Port. (Ala.) 650; Buffum v. Green, 5 N. H. 71; Phillips v. Houston, 50 N. C. 302; Sneathen v. Sneathen, supra.

[7] However, regardless of whether Mrs. Buster's assent during the lifetime of the grantor may be presumed as a matter of law from the fact that the deed was wholly beneficial to her and was accepted by her after the grantor's death, we are satisfied that, under all the facts of the case, viewed in the light most favorable to the finding of the lower court, and, under the well-known rule, that is the light in which we must consider the evidence, her actual assent to the deed during the grantor's lifetime has been shown. When she and her grandfather met Mr. Hurd at the entrance to the building in which Mr. Hurd had his offices, and after the latter had told the grandfather that he could not at that time get him the papers (referring to the deed) to give them to his granddaughter, for the reason that he was then on his way to the courthouse, Mrs. Buster, addressing Mr. Hurd, said: "All right, Mr. Hurd, you keep them for me." This was said in the presence of, and presumably with the assent of, the grantor. Mr. Hurd testified that thereafter he did keep the papers for her. Then and there Mrs. Buster assented to a delivery to her of this deed. By making Hurd her agent and the custodian of the papers for her, his possession thereupon became and was her possession, and, eo instanti, there was an actual delivery to her. True, she testified that she was not sure that the instrument was a deed. She does say, however, that she "must have known it was a deed." She testified that her grandfather had told her he had made out some papers and that she knew she was going to get the property. So that, regardless of whether she knew that it was a deed that Mr. Hurd held in his possession, she did know that he had the custody for her of some paper or papers under which she was to get the property. She agreed to accept those papers, whatever they might prove to be, and when she told Mr. Hurd to hold the papers for her, she assented to their final and complete delivery, whatever might be their nature.

WOOD et al. v. BOARD OF FIRE COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

Prohibition 🔑3(3)—District Court of Appeal will not exercise jurisdiction where superior court has denied similar petition by appealable judgment.

The District Court of Appeal will not entertain jurisdiction of an original proceeding for a writ of prohibition where a similar application has been made to and has been denied by the superior court, since an appeal may be taken from the superior court's judgment, and since the Court of Appeal will not exercise original jurisdiction when an appeal lies.

Petition for writ of prohibition by George W. Wood and another against the Board of Fire Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles, State of California. Writ denied.

A. J. Morganstern, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and William P. Mealey, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. This is an original proceeding for a writ of prohibition against the board of fire commissioners of the city of Los Angeles. On the filing of the petition an alternative writ issued.

It is alleged in the application that a similar application was made to the superior court and denied, on the 19th day of August, 1920, the judgment not having become final at the time of instituting the proceeding here. Under the circumstances there existed a right of appeal from the judgment of the superior court; and this court will not exercise original jurisdiction when an appeal lies. In re Burt, 17 Cal. WOOD v. BOARD OF FIRE COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (Civ. 3449.)

1. Prohibition 🔑34—Appeal from judgment denying writ does not continue alternative writ in force.

An appeal from judgment of the superior court denying a writ of prohibition does not operate to continue in force the alternative writ issued by the superior court.

2. Appeal and error 🔑477—District Court of Appeal empowered to stay proceedings on judgment appealed from.

The District Court of Appeal in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction possesses the inherent power to stay proceedings on the judgment appealed from, although no statutory provision is made for such stay.

3. Prohibition 🔑34—Supersedeas not granted pending appeal from judgment denying writ of prohibition.

The District Court of Appeal will not grant application for a supersedeas pending an appeal from judgment of the superior court denying writ of prohibition, since in such case there is nothing to supersede and the writ would be ineffectual for any purpose; no process being necessary to carry the court's judgment into effect.

4. Supersedeas 🔑1—Writ of "supersedeas" defined.

The writ of "supersedeas" cannot operate as an injunction against any of the parties to the action, its function being confined solely to staying proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment in the court below.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Supersedeas.]

5. Court 🔑207(5) — Extraordinary circumstances must exist to warrant District Court of Appeal in awarding writ.

In view of Supreme Court Rule 26 (176 Pac. xii), requiring petition to District Court of Appeal for writ of prohibition to state the reasons for an original application to such court, the appellate court will not assume original jurisdiction unless it appears that special or extraordinary circumstances exist which warrant such action.

6. Courts 🔑207(5)—Possibility of adverse decision in superior court not ground for application to District Court of Appeal.

The possibility of an adverse decision in the superior court on application for a writ of prohibition would not be sufficient cause for applying to the District Court of Appeal in the first instance.

7. Prohibition 🔑23—District Court of Appeal can issue alternative writ pending adjudication on merits.

The District Court of Appeal, in original proceeding for writ of prohibition, can issue an alternative writ, thus preserving the status of the controversy until the final adjudication on the merits.

8. Prohibition 🔑34—District Court of Appeal on appeal from judgment denying writ is without power to restrain proceedings pending appeal.

On appeal from judgment of the superior court denying writ of prohibition, the District Court of Appeal is without power to issue any writ which would operate as, or effectuate the purpose of, the alternative writ of prohibition.

Application for writ of supersedeas by George W. Wood in his proceeding against the Board of Fire Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles, State of California. Writ denied.

A. J. Morganstern, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and William P. Mealey, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Appellant applies for a supersedeas during the pendency of the appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county denying a writ of prohibition against the board of fire commissioners of the city of Los Angeles.

[1] In an original proceeding instituted in this court for the same purpose before the appeal was taken, it was considered that sufficient cause was shown by the petition, and an alternative writ was issued. We have this day decided that (195 Pac. 739), as the right to appeal existed, this court should not exercise its original jurisdiction, and the writ was denied for that reason alone. As the appeal does not operate to continue in force the alternative writ issued by the superior court, the defendant will not be restrained from proceeding after our action on the original application in this court has become final, and unless we can afford the relief prayed, the appellant may be deprived of the results of a favorable decision, if he should finally prevail in this appeal.

[2, 3] This court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, possesses the inherent power to stay proceedings on the judgment appealed from, although no statutory provision is made for such stay. Rogers v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 467, 111 Pac. 357. The action sought to be enjoined by this application is not in execution of the judgment, but is entirely distinct and separate therefrom. The superior court adjudged merely that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief, and no process of the court is necessary to carry its judgment into effect. There is therefore nothing to supersede, and the writ would be ineffectual for any purpose. Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290, 13 Pac. 856.

[4-8] The writ of supersedeas cannot operate as an injunction against any of the parties to the action, its function being confined solely to staying proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment in the court below. Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123. By Rule 26 (176 Pac. xii) promulgated by the Supreme Court, the petition for a writ of prohibition must state the reasons for an original application to this court, and unless it appears that special or extraordinary circumstances exist which warrant such action, the appellate courts will not assume original jurisdiction. We take it that the possibility of an adverse decision in the superior court would not be considered as sufficient cause for applying to this court in the first instance. The practical effect of this rule is to relegate the applicant to the jurisdiction of the superior court, in the vast majority of cases, and to confine this court to its powers as an appellate tribunal. In the exercise of original jurisdiction, this court could issue an alternative writ of prohibition, thus preserving the status of the controversy until the final adjudication on the merits. But on an appeal from a judgment of the superior court we find no authority for the issuance of any writ which would operate as or effectuate the purpose of the alternative writ of prohibition. Thus, by rule and practice, we are divested of a power which the Constitution has expressly conferred. Proper legislation or a modification of the rule might eliminate this difficulty in the future; but in the present instance we are powerless to grant any relief.

1. Constitutional law ⚷48 — Statutes to be declared constitutional if possible.

No legislative enactment will be declared unconstitutional unless no other reasonable conclusion is possible.

2. Constitutional law ⚷70(1)—Taxation ⚷25—Courts will not interfere with legislative discretion in tax provisions unless Constitution violated.

What things are subject to taxation, and the amount and method of levying and collecting taxes, are essentially matters of legislative concern with which the courts will not interfere unless some provision of the Constitution is clearly violated.

3. Constitutional law ⚷70(1) — Licenses ⚷7(1)—General rules of taxation apply to license fees.

The same general rules apply to license taxes for revenue as to other taxes in relation to the legislative discretion being controlling, as also to license fees enacted under the police power of the state in matters affecting the public health, safety, or morals.

4. Licenses ⚷3—Power to tax and collect license fees must be found in generic law.

The power to tax and collect license fees under the police power must be found in the generic law.

5. Licenses 🔑6(1)—City of San Francisco empowered to levy license taxes and to collect fees.

Under Charter of San Francisco, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15, article 8, c. 3, § 1, subd. 9, and chapter 4, § 7, the power exists in the city board to levy license taxes for revenue and to collect license fees under the general police power; where both powers exist in relation to a specific public interest, it is a matter of indifference whether the particular enactment is under one or the other or both.

6. Licenses 🔑1 — Ordinance exacting license from dealers in secondhand automobiles not mere revenue measure.

Ordinance No. 5132, New Series, of the City and County of San Francisco, § 18, providing every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling, exchanging, or buying secondhand or used automobiles for resale or exchange shall pay a license of $50 per quarter for each place maintained, but that persons reselling used automobiles taken in exchange for new automobiles shall pay $25 a quarter, need not be considered only as a revenue measure, in view of Charter of the City, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15, but may be regarded also as a licensing or permit ordinance.

7. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Frequency of thefts of motorcars, etc., a matter of common knowledge.

It is a matter of common notoriety that the theft, disguise, and resale of motorcars has become so common as to tax the powers of the police throughout the United States to recover the stolen cars and to bring the criminals to trial.

8. Evidence 🔑47 — Necessity to regulate pawnbrokers, junk dealers, etc., a matter of common knowledge.

It is a matter of common notoriety that the temptation to buy cheaply, which is so often presented to those carrying on the business of pawnbroker, junk dealer, secondhand dealer, and kindred activities, renders it necessary for the public safety and morality that their business activities be subjected to police scrutiny and regulation.

9. Licenses 🔑7(2) — Ordinance exacting license fee from dealers in secondhand cars not discriminatory.

Ordinance No. 5132, New Series, of the City and County of San Francisco, § 18, providing every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling, exchanging, or buying secondhand or used automobiles for resale or exchange, shall pay a license of $50 per quarter for each place maintained, but that persons reselling used automobiles taken in exchange for new automobiles shall pay $25 a quarter, held not discriminatory against those regularly engaged in the business of selling secondhand cars at a fixed place of business as compared with those selling such cars and maintaining no place of business.

10. Licenses 🔑7(9) — Ordinance exacting license fees from dealers in secondhand cars valid.

Ordinance No. 5132, New Series, of the City and County of San Francisco, § 18, providing every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling, exchanging, or buying secondhand or used automobiles for resale or exchange shall pay a license of $50 per quarter for each place maintained, but that persons reselling used automobiles taken in exchange for new automobiles shall pay $25 a quarter, considered as a revenue measure, makes no unreasonable classification, and, considered as a police measure, imposes no excessive, burdensome, or unjust charge incommensurate with the cost of the required police supervision, but is valid under either or both of the powers vested in the supervisors of the city and county by Charter, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15, and article 8, c. 3, § 1, subd. 9.

Application for writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Richard Higgins, petitioner, against R. L. Roberts, as Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco. Petitioner remanded to custody.

Chas. W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Milton T. U'Ren, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. From the petition it appears that Richard Higgins was arrested and, until his release on bail when the writ of habeas corpus was issued, was imprisoned, on a complaint charging him with the violation of section 18 of Ordinance No. 5132, New Series, of the City and County of San Francisco. The ordinance is the general license ordinance, and section 18 is as follows:

"Every person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of selling, exchanging or buying secondhand or used automobiles or other motor vehicles for the purpose of resale or exchange of same shall pay a license of fifty dollars ($50) per quarter for each such place maintained, provided, however, that persons reselling used automobiles or other motor vehicles taken in exchange or part payment for new automobiles or other motor vehicles, shall pay a license of twenty-five dollars ($25) per quarter."

The record fails to show whether Higgins was dealing in new automobiles or in secondhand vehicles only. If he was in the second category of those sought to be taxed by the section in question, some of the matters on which he relies would require no consideration at this time. Since both the petitioner and the respondent present the entire matter of the validity of the enactment, it may be assumed that Higgins was engaged in the business of dealing in secondhand automobiles, and, if subject to any tax, to that of $50 a quarter. In the brief for the petitioner reliance is placed on four propositions, but since the whole matter is before the court it is unnecessary to follow any artificial segregation of mere points.

mental rules should be borne in mind. They are so well known that citation of authority is unnecessary, but since they are sometimes overlooked, a reference to them is not amiss. No legislative enactment will be declared unconstitutional unless no other reasonable conclusion is possible. Government cannot exist without recourse to the power of taxation. What things are subject to taxation, and the amount and method of levying and collecting taxes are essentially matters of legislative concern with which the courts will not interfere unless some provision of the Constitution is clearly violated. The same general rules apply to license taxes for revenue as to other taxes as also to license fees enacted under the police power of the state in matters affecting the public health, safety, or morals. The power to tax and to collect license fees under the police power must be found in the generic law.

[5] The charter of San Francisco (article 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15) provides that the board of supervisors shall have power "to impose license taxes and to provide for the collection thereof; but no license taxes shall be imposed upon any person who, at any fixed place of business * * * sells or manufactures goods, wares or merchandise, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners as provided in this charter." It further provides (article 8, c. 3, § 1, subd. 9) that the board of police commissioners shall have the power "to grant or refuse to grant permits to any person engaged or desiring to engage in business as a pawnbroker, peddler, junk-shop keeper, dealer in secondhand merchandise, auctioneer and intelligence office keeper," etc. The chief of police (article 8, c. 4, § 7) "shall possess powers of general police inspection, supervision and control, over all pawnbrokers, * * * dealers in secondhand merchandise. * * * All persons engaged in said callings must first procure permits from the commissioners. * * * The chief may * * * empower members of the police department, when in search of property feloniously obtained or in search of suspected offenders, or in search of evidence to convict any person charged with crime, to examine the books and the premises of any such person. Any such member of the police department, when thereunto empowered * * * may examine property alleged to have been * * * lost * * * or stolen." Under these provisions the power exists both to levy license taxes for revenue and to collect license fees under the general police power. Where both powers exist in relation to a specific business, it is a matter of indifference whether the particular enactment is under one or the other or both of the powers. Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183–188, 20 Sup. Ct. 633, 44 L. Ed. 725.

[6-9] The argument that the section of the ordinance must be considered only as a revenue measure is without force. Under subdivision 15, § 1, of chapter 2, art. 2, of the Charter, while the supervisors have no general power to levy a tax upon the business of those who sell merchandise at a fixed place of business, they have such power if the business is one requiring a permit from the police commission. As to the latter kinds of business, the supervisors have power also to charge a license or permit fee. There is nothing in the decision of the Supreme Court in Rapp & Son v. Kiel, 159 Cal. 702, 115 Pac. 651, nor that of this court in the Matter of Dees, 194 Pac. 717, which helps the petitioner here. In the Rapp Case, as in the Dees Case, the imposition, whether considered as a tax in its technical sense or a permit fee under the police power, could not be upheld because in each case it was a charge on a business within the protection of the charter provision and not within the exception. A dealer in secondhand merchandise is within the exception which permits the license charge to be made whether considered as a revenue or a police measure. The correlative argument that the ordinance cannot be considered as regulatory in character because it discriminates between the business of taking secondhand vehicles in exchange for new ones and the business of dealing in secondhand vehicles is fallacious. It is a matter of common notoriety that the theft, disguise, and resale of motorcars has become so common as to tax the powers of the police throughout the United States to recover the stolen cars and to bring the criminals to trial. It would be fatuous to assume that a motorcar thief would very often pay the difference between the secondhand value of a used car and the selling price of a new car. The tendency of the thief would be to get money in exchange for the stolen car from those in the business of buying used cars for resale. Without reflecting in any way on the petitioner or on any other dealer in used cars, of whom there must be as honest and honorable men as those in any other mercantile pursuit, it is also a matter of common notoriety that the temptation to buy cheaply, which is so often presented to those carrying on the business of pawnbroker, junk dealer, secondhand dealer, and kindred activities, renders it necessary for the public safety and morality that their business activities be subjected to police scrutiny and regulation. There is a clear distinction between the business of buying at the lowest price secondhand automobiles for resale and the business of selling new cars at the highest price and taking used cars in part payment. In the one case the object is to make a profit on original sales of new cars, and in the other to make a profit on the purchase and resale of secondhand cars. These reasons furnish a sufficient ground for a classification between the two classes of dealers in secondhand cars. In this case the license charge is upon a business subject to police control. The Richardson Case, 170 Cal. 71, 148 Pac. 213, dealt only with license taxes imposed solely for revenue. It is therefore inapplicable to this phase of the present case. The last contention of the petitioner is that the section is discriminatory against those regularly engaged in the business of selling secondhand automobiles at a fixed place of business as compared with those selling such cars and maintaining no place of business. This same argument might have been made in ancient times against every saloon license charge because a license was not imposed upon bootleggers. There is no question before the court, and no evidence, to warrant it in discussing other police regulations which may or may not have been made. The license regulations in question apply to all engaged in the business of dealing in secondhand automobiles.

[10] In conclusion, it appears to the court that in the section of the ordinance in question, considered as a revenue measure, the classification is not unreasonable, and, considered as a police measure, it cannot be held as a matter of law that the charge of $50 a quarter is excessive, burdensome, or unjust, or not commensurate with the cost of the required police supervision. The enactment is valid under either of the powers vested in the supervisors, and under both.

It is ordered that Richard Higgins be remanded to the custody of the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco.

MILLER v. SHAW et al. (Civ. 3433.)

1. Deeds 🔑155—Forfeiture in event of default held sufficiently expressed.

Condition in a deed, conveying land in consideration of payment of $70 per month to grantors as long as they should live, that property should be forfeited in the event that monthly payments were not made, held sufficiently expressed.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑116(5)—Agent may not bind owner of interest in real estate in absence of writing.

Where land was conveyed in consideration of monthly payments to grantors for life and grantees defaulted, the grantors could not be bound by an agreement of an agent to take a certain amount of money from the grantees in settlement of defaulted payments and their interest remaining in the property, without a writing authorizing the agent so to do.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑116(8)—Letter did not constitute writing authorizing agent to dispose of interest in land.

A letter, "I will withdraw my consent given on Friday the 13th to Monday the 17th and then do what you can for me, as I must have money to live on, and if you cannot get what they already owe me take what you can get so long as it does not below the $1,500 which I understand they have offered you," held not a sufficient writing of authority to the addressee to enter into a binding contract concerning the disposal of an interest in real estate.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑129(3)—Facts held not to show part performance of agreement to convey interest in land.

In action to quiet title to land claimed to have been forfeited under a deed, where defendants claimed an oral agreement on the part of plaintiffs to accept a certain amount in settlement of plaintiff's claims against or interest in the property, facts held not to show such part performance on the part of the grantors as would take the agreement out of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Lavina H. Miller against Walter P. Shaw, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles L. Chandler, Frank M. Bering, and E. O. Leake, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James G. Owen and Henry M. Willis, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to quiet title in the plaintiff to a certain parcel of real estate. Judgment was entered agreeable to the prayer of the complaint. Defendants have appealed.

[1] On the 27th day of February, 1912, plaintiff and Jacob C. Miller, her husband, executed a deed conveying the title to the property in controversy to Mervin Miller. The deed was made upon the consideration that the grantee should pay to the grantors the sum of $70 per month as long as the said grantors should live, and to the survivor in the event one should die. Jacob C. Miller did die, and the plaintiff during all of the times herein mentioned was entitled to receive the $70 per month provided to be paid. The condition subsequent was definitely and expressly stated in the deed that in the event of the nonpayment of the $70 and in the event such default should continue for a period of 15 days, "then the title to said real property will revert to said parties of the first part, * * * and it shall be lawful for the parties of the first part or survivor of said parties of the first part, to re-enter, and have, and enjoy the said real property as of their former estate, and to eject, oust and remove the party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns therefrom; and in event that said condition to pay said sum of $70 per month as hereinbefore described, is not strictly performed as described, then the title to said property shall vest in the parties of the first part or their survivor, and all right, title and interest therein of said second party, his heirs, successors or assigns, shall terminate." In addition to the provisions quoted, it was expressly provided that time should be of the essence of the agreement. The condition that in the event of default committed by the grantee, forfeiture of title should result, is sufficiently expressed. Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. at page 261, 116 Pac. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190; Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 Pac. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229. Payments were made to the plaintiff up to and including the month of April, 1918. The defendants herein at that time claimed to have succeeded to whatever title the Millers had divested themselves of in the property. In the summer of the year last mentioned, plaintiff employed attorneys to look after the matter of collecting the amounts due, and negotiations were had to that end. But no payments were made and the default of the defendants continued; in fact, default had never been relieved up to the time of the commencement of this action, which was in the middle of February, 1919. Defendants in their answer asserted that an agreement had been entered into with the plaintiff whereby the plaintiff had agreed to accept $1,500 in full settlement of her claim against them and in full settlement of her interest in the property, and that she had agreed to execute to them a deed conveying all such interest therein held by her. In the attempt to support this defense, they offered to show that plaintiff had authorized her attorneys to make a "compromise" settlement, and that an agreement was made with plaintiff's attorneys, and at the latter's direction the defendants had deposited $1,500 with an abstract company. They first offered in evidence a letter written by plaintiff to her counsel, which read as follows:

> "December 14, 1918. I will withdraw my consent given on Friday the 13th to Monday the 17th and then do what you can for me, as I must have money to live on, and if you cannot get what they already owe me take what you can get so long as it does not below the $1,500 which I understand they have offered you. Mrs. Lavina H. Miller."

[2-4] They offered to show that by oral conversation had between Mrs. Miller's attorney and defendant Leake, the agreement for the payment of $1,500 had been arrived at; they offered also to show that instructions were given to a title company, and that the sum of $1,500 had been paid (at what time is not shown by the offer) to the title company, and that certain expenses had been incurred by the defendants in connection therewith. The instructions and papers used in connection therewith show that instructions signed by defendant Leake had been left with the title company on January 17, 1919, but no money, and that on January 22d a person from whom defendants were intending to borrow the money on mortgage filed certain instructions, without the money, however, and by their exhibits in connection with the escrow offer it appeared that on the 30th day of January no money had yet been placed with the title company. It does not appear that any instructions were ever given to the title company for Mrs. Miller, either directly by herself or through her attorneys. The court sustained the objection to the letter on two grounds: First, that it amounted to a confidential communication between a client and attorney; second, that as it was claimed that authority was thereby given to dispose of an interest in real property, the writing was insufficient because it contained no mention of any real property. Objection was sustained to the other testimony and documentary evidence offered, on the ground that it was incompetent and immaterial, and particularly because it was not shown that any one had acted with authority to bind the plaintiff thereby. It may be further stated that up to the time this action was brought, the plaintiff had not by suit sought to enforce any claim against the defendants. She had left the matter of the collection of the money in the hands of her attorneys. At the end of the year 1918 there was approximately $600 due to plaintiff from the defendants on account of the $70 payments which had accrued for each month subsequent to April, 1918. Defendants were not only in default under the condition of the deed under which they deraigned whatever title they had, but were allowing a new default to be committed each month by failing to make the payments so plainly provided to be made. In so far as the matter of the settlement of this account is concerned, there was nothing to "compromise." The amounts were definite and ascertained; the whole sum was a debt, if the plaintiff so elected to treat it, due her from the defendants. Defendants made no attempt or offer to pay, except that it appears they did seek to secure plaintiff's interest in the property by paying therefor the sum of $1,500. Presumably that was to settle all matters between the parties. However that may be, it is clear enough that some part of that money was to be considered as payment for the interest of plaintiff in the real estate, and before any agent would be authorized to make a contract binding upon the plaintiff, engaging to transfer such interest, it was necessary that there be a writing sufficiently expressing such intent. The letter written by plaintiff did not constitute such a writing. It contained no description of the real estate and no reference thereto from which it could be deduced as to what property was in the mind of the plaintiff, if any, at the time; and if we assume for the moment that the attorneys possessed authority to enter into a binding engagement with respect to the plaintiff's interest in the property, it does not appear that they did this. They made no written contract with the defendants such as is required. Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 Pac. 179; Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 105, 69 Pac. 853. Neither was there any part performance of an oral agreement. If we still keep in mind the assumption that the attorneys possessed the requisite authority and that they did orally agree to accept $1,500 in payment for plaintiff's interest in the real estate, and that, while not entering into a written agreement with the defendants, the defendants attempted to make performance of their part of the obligation, it does not appear that there was such part performance as to take the case away from the operation of the statute of frauds. As we have suggested after viewing the offered "escrow instructions," it appears that, while such escrow was commenced on the 7th of January, no money had been placed therein up to the 30th of January, 1919. When such money was so placed does not appear, even in the offer to prove the same made by counsel. The offer was that the money had been so deposited, which statement was made at the time of the trial, which occurred in June, 1919. In the view we take of this case, any other judgment than that entered by the trial court would not have been justified. Whether the letter first referred to was objectionable as being a confidential communication between client and attorney, we need not decide. It was, as was the other offered evidence, clearly objectionable on the ground that no sufficient authorization was expressed or appeared to have been given by the plaintiff which would entitle her attorneys to make any contract which would bind her interest in the real estate to the defendants. While it is wholly aside from any material question in the case, in fairness to those attorneys, it may be added that they did not appear and claim that they ever had made the agreement which defendants insisted upon and which plaintiffs by this action repudiated.

MILLER et ux. v. DOHENY et ux.
(Civ. 3476.)

1. Boundaries 🔑37(1)—Evidence held to sustain findings as to boundaries.

Evidence held to sustain court's finding as to the true boundary of property in question.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence conclusive.

The trial court's findings on conflicting evidence are conclusive.

3. Boundaries 🔑37(3) — Evidence held to overcome presumption that a fence marked boundary line.

In an action to quiet title, involving question of boundaries, positive testimony as to the location of a fence by guess held to overcome any presumption that it marked or was intended to mark the true boundary line.

4. Adverse possession 🔑34, 37—Possession held not exclusive; exclusiveness necessary element.

Defendants' claim that they had acquired title by adverse possession to a 7-inch strip of plaintiffs' land, which strip was included in an alleyway which was mainly on defendants' land and which had been graveled and laid out by defendants, could not be sustained, where it appeared that the eaves of plaintiffs' house had extended over the strip from a time within the limitation period, and that during such period plaintiffs and their predecessors used the alleyway jointly with defendants; for exclusiveness is a necessary element of adverse occupancy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Suit by Louis F. Miller and wife against Edward L. Doheny and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Stephen Monteleone, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Muhleman & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is a suit to quiet title to property in Los Angeles, described as the west 14 feet of lot 42 and all of lot 44 of the Ellis tract, as per map recorded in Book 10, p. 91, miscellaneous records of said county. Plaintiffs also asked that the trial court decree that they had an easement of right of way over a certain private alley east of their east line, which alley is owned by defendants. Upon this latter point, the judgment was against plaintiffs, and this matter is not involved, therefore, upon this appeal, which is taken by the defendants from the portion of the judgment quieting title in plaintiffs to the property claimed to be owned by them.

The only dispute is over the title to a strip of land approximately 7 inches wide by 138 feet deep along the east line of the property involved in this action. Plaintiffs have a house and sidewalk upon their land. The eaves of this house project to a point within abount one inch of the boundary line as found by the trial court. In 1913 defendants erected a fence at a place which plaintiffs claimed was upon their land. This fence extends under the eaves of the plaintiffs' building.

The plaintiffs and defendants, adjoining landowners, derived their title from a common source, to wit, George A. Newhall. It was stipulated at the trial that plaintiffs are the record owners of lot 44 and the west 14 feet of lot 42 of the Ellis tract. These lots lie on the south side of Twenty-Third street in the city of Los Angeles, as shown by the maps of the tract contained in the record before us.

Appellants make two contentions: First, that the survey of their witness Wright, starting with a dividing fence as a monument, should have been accepted as conclusive as against the testimony of the surveys by other engineers who testified on behalf of plaintiffs, and who had taken as a starting point an old stake which had been found at the northwest corner of lot 44 of Ellis tract. In this connection, it is the contention of appellants that the dividing fence was evidence of an agreed boundary line, and that the survey of the property should have been made from it as a starting point rather than from the location of the stake found by plaintiffs' surveyor. The second contention of appellants is that they should have been awarded title to the strip of land in controversy upon the theory of adverse possession. We shall consider these contentions in the order in which they are made.

The conclusion of the trial court upon the first question, obviously, was arrived at upon a consideration of the testimony of the witnesses on behalf of plaintiffs who had made surveys of the land in dispute. Surveys of the portion of lot 42 in dispute were made at various times by V. J. Rowan and Leonard O. Hall, witnesses for plaintiffs. These surveys all agree and according to them the eaves of plaintiffs' house are within an inch of plaintiffs' easterly line as found by the court. A conflict occurs in the evidence on this point, raised by reason of the fact that defendants introduced the testimony of George A. Wright, who had surveyed the land. His survey differed from those of the other surveyors, and according to his records and maps, the eaves of plaintiffs' house are over the line on defendants' property.

Mr. Rowan, testifying for plaintiffs, stated that he had been engaged in the occupation of civil engineer and surveyor in the city of Los Angeles for over 30 years. He testified to having made original surveys of all the lines of all the properties involved in this suit before the properties were subdivided into small holdings, except a few of the lots in St. James Park. He surveyed the entire district, covering the lots of the Ellis tract facing the south line of Twenty-Third street before the year 1900. In January, 1899, he surveyed the Ellis tract annex, lying on the west of lot 44 of the Ellis tract, and at that time found an old 3x3 stake planed down and marked with the figures "44" at the northwest or most northerly corner of lot 44 of the Ellis tract. He placed a tack in lead at this point and it is so marked on the maps before us here, and it appears thus in his notes taken at the time of the survey. This was used as a starting point for his survey. This witness also found a stake in place in February, 1898, marked "24—26" for the dividing line between lots 24 and 26 of the Ellis tract, and this was also found in place again on June 1 and June 26, 1898, and used for the east line of the Doheny property as it now exists. Mr. Rowan's testimony as to the existence of this stake is as follows:

> "The first survey I made out there was in October, 1895. This was the first time I saw this stake that I have described as a 3x3 stake marked '44.' The next survey I made in that vicinity was February, 1898, and then followed the June survey in 1898, and the one in January, 1899, and the one in October, 1901. I found identically the same stake on each of these occasions; it was pretty well protected by an old cypress hedge. I first saw that stake in October, 1895. It was about a 3x3—what we call 3 by 3, and it was a little bit longer one way than the other. I should say perhaps a 2½ by 3 inch stake; and was marked '44' on the easterly side toward the Ellis tract. It stood up about 2 to 3 inches from the ground; it was marked with a stencil or painted—it is pretty hard to remember those things. I was so certain of it I made notes of it in my note book, and thought it might come in handy in the future to simply tie to it."

The engineer, Leonard O. Hall, in 1917, found the tacks in lead placed by Rowan at these points where he had found the stakes, and as these points checked with his survey, he adopted them. The survey made by Hall was in accordance with that of Rowan and in accordance with the judgment of the trial court. The testimony of the surveyors was further corroborated by the testimony of J. H. Claudius who was at one time the owner of lot 40 and the easterly 21 feet of lot 42 of the Ellis tract, and who purchased lot 44 and the westerly 14 feet of lot 42 in 1902. He testified that he located a stake at or near the northwest corner of lot 44 at the place where an old stake was found by him. His testimony regarding the location of this stake is as follows:

> "Subsequently I bought 45 or 46 feet of land west of the alley. I located the stake at or near the northwest corner of lot 44. I burned some grass there one day, and it kind of spread on me, and I took some wood stakes and went through under it, and found a stake there, and I never knew it was there before—I guess it was about three foot inside of the sidewalk. I found that stake right after I bought lot 44. I guess it was an old stake; it was painted white. I found it under a hedge fence. I found two stakes. I found one right at the southwest corner of the barn and the other one over there, at or near the northwest corner of lot 44, the point marked 'R' on the map; it was in from the Twenty-Third street line, about two feet, I guess, on the west side of the hedge. The stake I found under the hedge was a survey stake, painted white. It had no marks on it, nothing but a tack in the middle of it. It was an inch and a half square; or it might have been 2 inches or larger maybe. It was in pretty good condition when I found it. It was above the ground a very little. At the time I found the stake at the point marked 'R' on plaintiffs' Exhibit 1, being at or near the northwest corner of lot 44, the sidewalk had not been widened to 8 feet. When I said that I found the stake about 3 feet in from the sidewalk, I referred to the old sidewalk, which was in place at that time."

[1-3] Appellants contend that the testimony quoted and referred to herein, together with the other testimony in the record upon the subject, is not sufficiently definite to establish the location of the monuments of the original survey of the Ellis tract, and that, because these cannot be established, the location of various hedges and fences erected by prior owners of the land involved are the best evidence of the boundary line, and that these conform to the survey of Mr. Wright, who testified on behalf of the defendants. We think the testimony establishes the location of these stakes with sufficient accuracy and certainty. The true location of the survey is a question of fact. Washburn on Real Property (6th Ed.) vol. 3, p. 410, § 2343; Abbott v. Abbott, 51 Me. 581; Opdyke v. Stephens, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 90; Pettingill v. Porter, 3 Allen (Mass.) 349. This fact was decided in this case, upon conflicting evidence, in favor of the plaintiffs. This in itself would be a sufficient answer to the appellants' contention upon this question, but we have the further fact that it appears in the record that some of the fences and monuments relied upon by appellants were not placed with any idea of marking the boundary line. Mr. Claudius, a former owner of the property, testified in rebuttal that he did not intend to mark the exact boundary line when he erected a fence upon the property. He testified that he had not measured to locate his fence upon the true line, but merely "took a guess at it." This positive testimony, of course, would overcome any presumption relied upon by appellants that this fence marked or was intended to mark the true boundary line. Any presumption with reference to the other fences and hedges, relied upon by appellants, is overcome by the definite testimony of several persons as to the existence of survey stakes upon the property which did not conform to a boundary line consistent with the location of said fences.

Under all the testimony in the record, it is apparent that the finding of the trial court with reference to the true boundary of the property in dispute is amply sustained by the evidence.

The other question presented by the record is the one of adverse possession. It is contended by appellants that as the alley upon appellants' property was graveled and laid out by them in accordance with the survey of Mr. Wright, for more than five years before the filing of this action, and said alley included the strip of land claimed by plaintiffs, that regardless of the finding of the trial court as to the true boundary line, appellants have acquired title by adverse possession against the plaintiffs herein. Appellants rely upon the fact that a copy of the survey by Mr. Wright was filed for record, and assert that, thereafter, appellants occupied the strip of land in dispute adversely to the plaintiffs under color of title. Cases are then cited to the effect that where possession is created adversely under color of title, an actual possession of all of the property is not necessary —a continuous possession of a part extending to the whole.

The evidence of the existence of the gravel walk over the line of plaintiffs' property was the testimony of Mr. Wright to the effect that in December, 1907, he made a survey of the land and at that time the driveway was graveled and smoothed out to the point contended for by appellants as the boundary line. Assuming, but not deciding, that this would constitute adverse possession of the 7 inches of plaintiffs' land included in such driveway, nevertheless, before this possession ripened into a right, and in 1909, the plaintiffs erected a house upon their property and occupied the land in dispute by the eaves of said house which the record shows extended to within an inch of their true line. The case of Gillespie v. Jones, 47 Cal. 259, cited by appellants to meet this state of facts, does not serve their purpose. It is true that case holds that one claiming possession adversely to the true owner by reason of the fact that the eaves of his house overhang the land of said true owner, only establishes an easement for such use by adverse possession and not a full title to the land. But in the present case the situation is reversed. It is the true owner who is occupying the land with the eaves of his house. His ownership extends up to the sky and down to the center of the earth. He is holding his own, and not seeking to acquire the land of another by adverse possession. We apprehend that he need not occupy his land by resting his structure upon the ground. We are of the opinion that he would be occupying his land if he built his house on stilts; and one claiming adversely could not dispossess him by building a fence thereunder, even under color of title.

[4] However that may be, it also appears that since 1909, the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest have used the cement sidewalk along the side of the house for the purpose of ingress and egress to their premises until the erection of defendants' fence in 1913. Appellants' contention with reference to this fact is that as the court found plaintiffs had no right, title, or interest in the alleyway of which this sidewalk is a part, plaintiffs' use of the same was permissive. It is to be remembered that in addition to finding that the use of the alleyway by plaintiffs was permissive, the court found that the seven inches of the alleyway in dispute was the property of the plaintiffs. Its finding that plaintiffs had no right or easement in the alley necessarily applies only to the portion of the alley which was found to be the property of the defendants, and not to the portion that was found to be the property of plaintiffs. Any other construction of the findings would render them inconsistent.

From the fact that the eaves of plaintiffs' house extended over the land in dispute since 1909, and from the further fact that during the time defendants claim to have occupied said strip adversely by reason of having used the same as an alleyway, the plaintiffs and their predecessors used this alleyway jointly with the defendants. It clearly appears that the occupancy of the defendants of said strip was never an exclusive occupancy. Exclusiveness is one of the elements necessary to an adverse occupancy in order that it may ripen into a title. Hart v. All Persons, etc., 26 Cal. App. 664, 666, 673, 675, 148 Pac. 236; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100.

We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its holding that the claim of title by adverse possession was without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

ALLEN v. FREEAR et al. (Civ. 3656.)

1. Contracts 🔑187(3) — Unmentioned creditors beneficiaries under contract of transferee to pay transferor's indebtedness.

Where the consideration of a transfer of property is agreement of transferee to pay the transferor's indebtedness, creditors, though not mentioned, have a right to come in as being of a class for whose benefit the contract was made.

2. Subrogation 🔑32—Surety paying debt subrogated to principal's remedies.

By provision of Civ. Code, § 2848, a surety paying his principal's debt has right of subrogation to his remedies.

3. Assignments for benefit of creditors 🔑7—Trust arises on sale by transferee without applying proceeds as agreed.

On a transferee of property selling it without applying the proceeds, as agreed, to payment of transferor's indebtedness, a trust arises in favor of transferor's creditors.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑119(2)—Not available in defense of fraud.

The statute of frauds is not available in defense of fraud of transferee of property in consideration of his oral agreement to pay the transferor's indebtedness, where he sells the property without so applying the proceeds.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑103(2) — Statute does not run till repudiation of trust and knowledge thereof.

The trust arising from transfer of property on oral agreement of the transferee to pay the transferor's indebtedness being a positive one, though resting in parol, the statute of limitations does not run against action to establish and enforce the trust till after repudiation and knowledge thereof.

6. Limitation of actions 🔑172 — Cannot be pleaded by one agreeing to pay another's debt.

The transferee of property who has agreed to pay indebtedness of the transferor and who has not repudiated the agreement, cannot plead limitations against the transferor's debt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by T. F. Allen against Charles H. Freear and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Klein, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, in pro. per.

Chas. A. Barnhart, of Bakersfield, for respondent Stephenson.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to have a trust declared in certain property. The substance of the facts as disclosed by the findings show that on the 18th day of April, 1914, L. L. Bateman was the owner and in possession of certain personal property described as all the stock in trade, including groceries and general merchandise, in a certain store located in Kern county, the value of which was approximately $4,000. Bateman was financially involved, and on the day last mentioned he entered into an agreement with the defendant Freear to transfer the business over to him. Notice of his intention so to do was recorded, and pursuant to such notice a sale was subsequently made. The only consideration for this transfer was that Freear should take possession of the business, conduct the same, and pay off Bateman's indebtedness, upon the happening of which event Freear was to reconvey to Bateman a one-half interest in the property. At the time of the transfer Freear was familiar with the different claims against Bateman. Among these was one held by plaintiff and one of the defendants, Stephenson. Allen and Stephenson at the time of the transfer were guarantors on two promissory notes given by Bateman. These notes aggregated the sum of $1,500, and as such guarantors Allen and Stephenson were compeled to and did subsequently pay the same; Allen paying two-thirds and Stephenson one-third of the amount due thereon.

After acquiring the business in the manner indicated Freear conducted the same, but in violation of his agreement to pay off the indebtedness he retained the income arising therefrom, and finally sold the business to one Carlson. As part of the purchase price Carlson gave a note to Freear for the sum of $2,500, which note was secured by a mortgage upon certain real property. Before the maturity of this note Freear transferred the same to the Produce Savings Bank to secure his personal indebtedness. This mortgage was subsequently foreclosed by the bank. After the bank had satisfied its claim a surplus remained in its hands amounting to the sum of $866.50, which sum was ordered by the court to be deposited with the county treasurer to await such order as might be made in this action. The complaint herein prayed that this fund be adjudged to be held by defendant Freear in trust for the payment of the claims of plaintiff and other creditors of Bateman.

The trial court found in accordance with the prayer of the complaint and rendered judgment accordingly, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court was correct. Where property is held under the consideration, as here, that the purchaser is to pay off the indebtedness of the seller, the creditors, although not mentioned, have a right to come in as being those of a class for whose benefit such contract was made. Sherwood v. Gill, 36 Cal. App. 707, 173 Pac. 171.

Appellant concedes this to be the rule, but he claims that, as plaintiff was already obligated to pay by reason of the notes being outstanding, he was not put in the place of a creditor of Bateman to such an extent that he would be subrogated or substituted to the rights of the creditors that he paid off. We see no force in this contention. When a surety has paid the debt of his principal he has a right to be subrogated to the remedies and rights which the creditor had with whom he has settled. Civ. Code, § 2848; 37 Cyc. 415, 416. Here the only right that Freear had in the transferred property was his agreement that out of the proceeds of its management he was to pay the debts of Bateman. The claim of plaintiff was one he had knowledge of and was bound to pay. By making the sale without paying the debts Freear violated his agreement, from which act a trust arose in favor of those for whose benefit the transfer was made. The contract involved was an oral one, and appellant pleads the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations to defeat the action, and he relies on these statutes for a reversal.

[4] With reference to the statute of frauds, it is sufficient to say that such statute was never intended to operate as a shield in defense of fraud. Civ. Code, § 2794. As above indicated, the property received by Freear under the arrangement was held by him under a trust. The statute cannot be availed of to invalidate a relation which the law thus creates. Valentine v. Richardt, 126 N. Y. 272, 27 N. E. 255; 1 Perry on Trusts, § 79. To hold otherwise would permit the statute to aid Freear in the betrayal of the trust imposed upon him by preventing the fulfillment of the legal and moral obligation he was bound to perform. The statute was never enacted for such a purpose. This defense therefore can avail Freear nothing.

[5, 6] The same may be said with reference to the statute of limitations. The arrangement was entered into in April, 1914, and suit was brought thereon in December, 1916. It is conceded that if this were an action upon Freear's verbal promise it would be barred under the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Here, however, the trust being a positive one, though resting in parol, the statute could not run until after a repudiation and knowledge thereof. Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 50 Pac. 386; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88. Moreover, Freear having received the property under the express agreement to pay the debts of Bateman, and there being no repudiation thereof, it does not lie in his mouth to plead the statute as against Bateman's creditors. He cannot be heard to say that while the debt is due from the person with whom he contracted, that the statute has intervened. This is no concern of his. Washer v. Independent, etc., 142 Cal. 702, 76 Pac. 654; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 440, 37 Pac. 411; Davis v. Davis, 19 Cal. App. 797, 127 Pac. 1051.

And finally it is contended that plaintiff acted in bad faith in procuring the contract, and that Freear was never informed of the plaintiff's claim. The evidence shows that Bateman himself fully informed Freear of all the outstanding claims against him, including those here involved.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Equity 🔑41—May grant legal relief on denial of equitable relief if suit was bona fide.

Where suit is erroneously brought in good faith on the equity side of the court to foreclose a lien, the court was not without jurisdiction to grant legal relief as to defendants, against whom a money judgment was rendered.

2. Mechanics' liens 🔑303(1)—Court may render a personal judgment where equitable relief is denied.

Though a claimant sought to foreclose a mechanic's lien for less than $300, after service of stop notice under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, and such equitable relief is denied, the superior court is not without jurisdiction to render a personal judgment.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—No reversal for findings outside issue not prejudicial.

In a proceeding to establish and foreclose a lien on a drainage district ditch, if findings of plaintiff's good faith are outside the issues made by the pleadings, still, no prejudice being shown, a reversal does not necessarily follow, particularly where nothing indicates that plaintiff was not acting in good faith, so that the lower court must be held to have acted within its jurisdiction.

4. Drains 🔑49—Facts presented held to show equity jurisdiction in suit to foreclose lien for material, regardless of amount involved.

In an action by party furnishing materials to a subcontractor to establish and foreclose a lien on a drainage district ditch, evidence that the directors of the district had knowledge of stop notices issued under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, and deliberately and intentionally ignored them, held to present facts giving a court of equity jurisdiction on the merits, regardless of the amount involved, for the notices being an "equitable garnishment," the right to recover the money was a "cumulative remedy," not dependent on establishing the lien.

5. Drains 🔑49—Amount due from county drainage district held sufficient fund for equitable jurisdiction in suit to foreclose lien for material.

Where stop notices were served, the money in the hands of the county treasurer subject to order of the trustees of the drainage district was a sufficient fund to extend the arm of equity, in a proceeding against the drainage district for lumber furnished where such notices were ignored because contractor had previously fully paid subcontractor who ordered the lumber.

6. Drains 🔑49—Directors of drainage district personally liable for violation of stop notices served by materialman.

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, fastens liability for violation of stop notices issued thereunder upon "the owner or person who contracted with the contractor," yet directors of a drainage district, which owns a ditch on which a lien by plaintiff materialman is sought, are personally liable where ignoring the stop notices.

7. Drains 🔑49—Lumber consumed in constructing a ditch held a part thereof.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, as amended by Laws 1911, p. 1313, lumber consumed in and which contributed to the construction of a ditch or canal became in legal contemplation a permanent part of the ditch, notwithstanding it may have been used for "skids" and ground to splinters by the dredger.

8. Drains 🔑49—Drainage district directors held personally liable for paying contractor after stop notices from materialman.

Where a materialman served stop notices on the directors of a drainage ditch district for material for which a subcontractor had failed to pay, and the directors, because contractor had already paid the subcontractor, ignored the notices by paying the contractor, they are personally liable.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by the L. W. Blinn Lumber Company against the Pioneer Drainage District and others. Judgment for the defendants Drainage District and J. W. McAllister, Sr., and plaintiff obtained a personal judgment against the defendants Edward Pine and others, directors of the defendant Drainage District, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Donald Barker and James M. O'Brien, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. As claimed by appellants, this action is brought to establish and foreclose a lien, and for the recovery of the sum of $241.19.

The defendant drainage district, a public corporation, entered into a contract with one J. W. McAllister, Sr., for the construction of a drainage ditch, the construction work being thereafter sublet by McAllister to A. H. Hobart, one of the defendants here. Plaintiff, between the dates of September 2, 1913, and October 30, 1913, furnished lumber to Hobart to be used—and part of it was so used—in the construction of a bridge over the ditch, the same becoming a permanent part of the ditch as planned. The balance of the lumber so furnished was used for "skids" over which the dredger which was employed in digging the ditch was moved and rolled in such a manner that this portion of the lumber was wholly consumed, being "reduced to splinters in the operation." The value of the lumber so furnished and used was $235.86, which indebtedness Hobart has not liquidated.

In January and May, both of the year 1914, plaintiff served upon the defendant corporation, by delivery to its president, documents purporting to be the usual stop notices, in an attempt to comply with the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, setting forth the fact that the amount above stated was still unpaid, and notifying the corporation to withhold sufficient money due or to become due to the original contractor, J. W. McAllister, Sr., with which to pay the same. The notice served in May, 1914, was not only served upon the defendant corporation and McAllister, Sr., but also upon the auditor and treasurer, respectively, of the county of San Bernardino, who, it is claimed, were ex officio officials of the Pioneer Drainage District, the defendant corporation. These officers, however, were not served, nor did they appear, in the action. Defendants J. W. McAllister, Jr., Edward Pine, and James W. Pate were the directors of the defendant drainage district, and familiar with all the facts above set forth. At the times of the service of the "stop notices" above referred to, the board of directors of the defendant corporation held the sum of $1,700, an unpaid balance of the contract price under the McAllister, Sr., contract, for which sum, notwithstanding the service of said notices, a warrant was issued by such board, and, by the county officials above named, approved and paid. It is alleged in the complaint that a claim of lien was, on June 1, 1914, duly verified and recorded, and thereafter, on August 28, 1914, the present action was commenced.

A special demurrer was interposed and by the court overruled. The answer, in addition to joining issue on the foregoing alleged facts, set up, by way of further defense, the fact that the court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter, for the reason that the amount prayed for is less than $300; that the drainage district, being a public corporation, could not have its property, nor any part thereof, subjected to the lien sought to be impressed thereon; that in no event are the members of the board of trustees of the drainage district liable in their individual capacity; that there was no money due to the subcontractor, to whom plaintiff furnished the materials, at the time of the service of the "stop notices" in question, hence that the same are ineffectual; and that the attempt of plaintiff to establish such claim of lien was, and now is, made with full knowledge by plaintiff of the foregoing facts.

On the issues thus formed, the case was tried, and the court found for the plaintiff and against the defendants Edward Pine, J. W. McAllister, Jr., and James W. Pate—the directorate of the defendant corporation—for the sum prayed in the complaint. The judgment, however, expressly denied relief against J. W. McAllister, Sr., and the defendant drainage district. In denying the claim of lien, the court found:

> "That the claim of mechanics' lien as alleged in said complaint was filed and recorded, and this suit in and for the foreclosure of the same was brought by said plaintiff in good faith on the part of said plaintiff, and that said mechanics' lien was not asserted by said plaintiff in bad faith or as a fictitious claim."

It will be further noted that the judgment so entered was against the defendants named, not "as directors," but personally.

Four points are urged by appellants for reversal: (1) The superior court was without jurisdiction; (2) appellants are not liable in their individual capacities; (3) materials furnished by plaintiff were not shown to have been used or consumed in the improvement upon the district property; and (4) that there was no money due or to become due to the subcontractor, to whom plaintiff furnished the materials, at the time of the service of the stop notices, hence the latter were ineffectual as against intervening matured rights of the contractor.

[1] On the first point it is contended that, the defendant corporation being public in its nature and the purposes for which it was organized being essentially public, no mechanics' lien could be established or foreclosed upon property belonging to the drainage district. Respondent, on the other hand, contends:

> "That this ditch was subject to a mechanics' lien for the reason * * * that there are two kinds of public uses: * * * (1) Those things which are acknowledged to be public because 'used by the public'; and (2) those things which are held to be public uses because they promote the public interest by developing the natural resources or wealth of the country."

It is argued that the things within this second class are declared to be public uses, so that the right of condemnation may be exercised in their behalf (section 16, Stats. 1903, p. 295), that the ditch referred to here was of this class, and that but for this reason the ditch in question is nothing more nor less than a private enterprise—while those within the first classification are of a wholly different character. Respondent concedes that no such lien could be sustained as to any such "public property," but contends that the decision of the trial court holding that no such lien could be sustained against this ditch, being acquiesced in by all parties to the suit and having become final, is now the law of this case, even if erroneous. The point is adverted to by respondent "to convince this court that he was in absolute good faith in contending that the ditch is subject to such lien," and we have no difficulty whatever in sustaining the trial judge on this phase of the case; that is, we are satisfied that plaintiff, erroneously, but in good faith, brought the action on the equity side of the court.

[2] The next question with which we are confronted is: Does the fact that plaintiff sought equitable relief in the court below, notwithstanding the amount claimed to be secured by the alleged lien attempted to be foreclosed is less than $300, and notwithstanding a denial of such relief, confer jurisdiction upon that court? In our opinion this query, as applied to the instant case, must be answered in the affirmative.

It is admitted by appellants that plaintiff sought the establishment and foreclosure of a mechanics' lien, but it is claimed that—

> "Under no possible interpretation of the law could such a lien have been established or foreclosed on property held in trust by a public corporation for public use."

In Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 91 Pac. 983, the court says:

> "* * * The true doctrine is that when the superior court acquires jurisdiction by the filing of a suit to enforce a lien of mechanics and others, under the statute relating to such liens, it has jurisdiction to render a personal judgment for the amount claimed, although the right to a lien is denied and the amount claimed is less than $300."

If we substitute for the words which we have italicized above, or add thereto the words "or under section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to stop notices," we think that language applicable here. As we have seen, practically all of appellants' argument on this point urges upon us their conclusion, i. e., that no lien could be had "under the law" in this case, and that there was no issue presented as to respondent's good faith in filing said "lien" and in afterwards seeking to establish and foreclose the same. In our opinion it is not a question of good or bad faith, but, rather, whether the evidence here presents facts which, under the law, confer jurisdiction upon the court. We think it does.

[3] Conceding, without so holding, that the findings of good faith are entirely outside the issues as made by the pleadings, still, no prejudice being shown, a reversal of the judgment does not necessarily follow. Collins v. Gray, 154 Cal. 131, 97 Pac. 142. With the exception of Miller v. Carlisle, 127 Cal. 327, 59 Pac. 785 (since overruled by the Supreme Court in several cases), we consider no case cited by appellants in point on the question now under consideration. In Becker v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 313, 90 Pac. 689, the court says:

> "We have no doubt that an action at law in which the actual demand amounts to less than $300 cannot be brought and retained within the jurisdiction of the superior court by adding a fictitious claim for a larger sum, or by making a fictitious showing as a basis for a purported prayer for equitable relief. But no such question is presented here. There is nothing to indicate that the Glenwood Lumber Company was not seeking, in good faith, to foreclose a lien claimed by it. It follows that the lower court must be held to have acted within its jurisdiction in rendering the judgment complained of."

If we substitute the name of the plaintiff in the instant case for that of the lumber company in the Becker Case, the language just quoted is applicable here.

[4] Appellants' argument on the question of the lower court's jurisdiction is directed toward the "lien" sought to be established and foreclosed, but apparently ignores the "stop notices" under section 1184, supra. Regardless of the amount involved or claim that no lien could be had here, we think the stop notices, as already set forth, together with the evidence showing that all the directors had knowledge thereof and that they were deliberately and intentionally ignored, present the existence of facts of which a court of equity will take cognizance and retain jurisdiction to decide on the merits. This we think should follow here, even though the stop notices were served and the court had found that the "lien" was not filed in good faith. The stop notices served as an "equitable garnishment"—a form of "equitable subrogation regulated by statute"; hence, we think, it follows that the right to a recovery of the money so garnisheed, being a "cumulative remedy," does not depend upon the establishment of a lien. Diamond Match Co. v. Silberstein, 165 Cal. 282, 131 Pac. 874; Weldon v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 427, 71 Pac. 502.

[5] It also is contended that there is no "fund" here, because of which the equity arm of the court could be invoked. With this contention we are unable to agree. Without an extended discussion of the matter, our opinion is that the $1,700 held by the county treasurer subject to the order of the board of trustees of the drainage district, under all the facts disclosed by the record here, constitutes such fund. It was out of this fund that the payment of the $235.86, found by the court to be due plaintiff, was sought. As already seen, facts were shown which developed that the court had jurisdiction of the money which, because of the service of the stop notices, should have been held, and not by the said directors paid to another. In such case and on such showing we do not hesitate to say that equity had jurisdiction to enforce the remedy here sought, from which it follows that the action of the trial court was entirely proper.

[6] The next point urged is that appellants are not individually liable. It is contended that the statute (section 1184, supra) fastens the liability for its violation upon "the owner or person who contracted with the contractor"; i. e., that in this case it requires the "owner" to withhold the money; that the "owner" in the instant case is the drainage district; that "if there is any liability at all for failure to withhold this fund that liability is upon the district"; and that there is no privity between these appealing defendants and the plaintiff, the former being simply agents of the district, hence no right to grant plaintiff relief against them exists, but that such right, if any exists, must be against the district. The argument is false. Though the drainage district is the "owner," it could only act through its board of directors, and the directors, when they wilfully disregarded their clear duty under the law and refused to withhold the money as they lawfully should have done, became personally liable to the person injured thereby. Amy v. Barkholder, 11 Wall. 136, 20 L. Ed. 101; Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 344, 58 Pac. 826; Payne v. Baehr, 153 Cal. 441, 95 Pac. 895.

It is admitted that the execution and delivery of the warrant drawn on the county treasurer for the balance owing to the contractor was authorized by these appealing defendants acting as a board of directors, and not as individuals, and that all this was done after the service of the stop notices, as hereinbefore set forth; but, in an attempted justification of their action, appellants say this was done "because the board knew that the subcontractor had been fully paid by the contractor for all the work which he had done." From this they argue that "the injustice of making the contractor pay for materials the second time appealed to them very strongly." This was a matter which was not for their consideration. When the notices were served upon the drainage district, there was but one thing for them as directors to do, i. e., to "withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim." Section 1184, supra. This one thing they did not do; but, on the contrary, and with actual knowledge that the notices had been served, they deliberately and intentionally disregarded the same. This conclusion is amply supported by the evidence, for one of the directors of the drainage district, McAllister, Jr., testified as follows:

> "We [the directors] knew that notices had been served by plaintiff as already stated. * * * We intended to disregard the notices that had been served for we knew that A. H. Hobart had been paid in full for all the work he had done."

The argument of appellants is hypertechnical. The testimony does not pretend to show that Hobart had been paid anything for materials which had been furnished to him. There was no discretion vested in these appealing defendants, either individually or as a board. At the meeting on June 29, 1914, when acting as such board with knowledge of the notices, appellants ordered and drew up a warrant for $1,700 in favor of the original contractor, delivering the same to him, they acted at their peril. Having done so, they cannot now, we think, be heard to complain. Whether they acted in good faith in such action is immaterial, for the result is the same as would have followed a like action in bad faith, namely, the deliberate destruction of plaintiff's right to the remedy sought. One cannot act to the detriment of another, and in open defiance of that other's rights, and escape liability for his action. In our opinion there is no question of the liability of appellants individually, as was found by the learned trial judge.

[7] In the face of the record before us, we fail to discover any merit in the third point urged. The court found that all the lumber furnished by plaintiff to Hobart, the subcontractor (excepting a certain part of the value of $5.33), was actually used in the digging or dredging of the ditch or canal; that the portion not wholly destroyed became a permanent part thereof; and that the value of the lumber so used was $235.86. The evidence supports this finding. It is contended by appellants that the portion of the lumber so furnished which was used as "skids," and which was destroyed by the action of the dredger, was not incorporated in the structure of the ditch, and hence remained the property of the contractor and not the district. With this contention we cannot agree. The statute provides that—

> "Materialmen * * * furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * the construction * * * of any ditch * * * shall have a lien," etc. (Italics ours.)

In our opinion this section (1183, Code Civ. Proc.) contemplated just such a condition as is here presented. A most cursory perusal of the history of this section will, we think, disclose the fact that appellants' argument is based upon the premise that the law is as set forth in the cases cited by them to support their contention; while the fact is that none of the cases so cited was decided since the amendment of the section in 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 1313), an amendment which reversed the policy theretofore followed by the courts of this state, to the end that our policy thenceforth might conform to "that of Nevada and other Pacific Coast states." Under the section as it now reads, there is no doubt that the lumber consumed in, and which, as found by the court, "actually contributed to the construction of said ditch or canal" and was "entirely consumed in said construction," became, in legal contemplation, a permanent part of the ditch. Olson-Mahoney L. Co. v. Dunne Inv. Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 159 Pac. 178; Consolidated Lbr. Co. v. Bosworth, Inc., 40 Cal. App. 80, 180 Pac. 60.

[8] On the fourth point urged, i. e., that "there was no money due or to become due to the subcontractor, to whom the plaintiff furnished the materials, at the time of the service of the stop notices, and therefore those notices were ineffectual as against the intervening matured rights of the contractor," we are also unable to agree with appellants. So far as the latter are concerned, it is wholly immaterial whether the original contractor had settled in full with Hobart or not. Los Angeles, etc., Brick Co. v. Los Angeles, etc., Dev. Co., 7 Cal. App. 460, 94 Pac. 775; In re Snell, 16 Cal. App. 253, 116 Pac. 699; United Materials Co. v. Loughery, 22 Cal. App. 1, 133 Pac. 18. To concede appellants' contention upon this point would be, in our opinion, to open the floodgates of fraud, deceit, and double dealing, and to make legally possible a conspiracy between original contractors and the members of boards of directors, where the facts are as we find them here. This cannot be permitted. Appellants cite the case of Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 205, 157 Pac. 5, as supporting their contention here. In that case prior rights had intervened before the service of the stop notice; in the instant case there are no intervening rights. Under the cases last cited, we think the point now under consideration devoid of merit.

Judgment affirmed.

PRESTON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 6775.)

1. Prohibition ⚷3(1)—Receiver's right to maintain action should be determined in the action, and not by prohibition.

The right of a plaintiff to maintain an action in the capacity of a receiver must be determined in that action subject to review on appeal, and the proceeding will not be restrained by a writ of prohibition which lies only to restrain acts in excess of jurisdiction.

On Rehearing.

2. Prohibition ⚷29—Case held proper for application of court rule for submitting on brief without argument.

A proceeding to prohibit the superior court from proceeding with trial, where it obviously had jurisdiction of subject-matter and parties, and the matter complained of as constituting excess of jurisdiction was simply one of the issues to be determined in the cause, is a proper case for the application of court rule 30, subd. 5 (183 Pac. viii), providing for submitting matters for decision on the briefs on file, without affording further opportunity for argument.

3. Prohibition ⚷3(1)—Will not lie against receiver's maintenance of action.

That action by an alleged receiver is in the superior court of the county wherein he claims to have been appointed does not affect the fact that his right to sue must be settled in his suit, and not by prohibition.

4. Prohibition ⚷5(1)—Will not be granted against receiver, where it could not be granted against the court.

The rule that prohibition will not be refused against a receiver when joined with a judge, because the receiver does not exercise judicial functions, is no reason for granting prohibition against a receiver when sued alone, where the court in which it is sought to prohibit his proceeding would not exceed its jurisdiction in entertaining the receiver's suit.

In Bank.

Application by William H. F. Preston for a writ of prohibition directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for Los Angeles County, L. H. Valentine, Judge, and another, to restrain further proceedings under an order appointing receiver. Writ denied.

Henry J. Stevens, Norman A. Bailie, and John T. Jones, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Alfred H. McAdoo, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. [1] Petitioner seeks a writ of prohibition enjoining the superior court of Los Angeles county from proceeding with the trial of an action instituted against him therein for the recovery of money alleged to be due from him and others to a corporation by one who sues as the receiver of the property of the corporation appointed by the superior court in another action, in which such corporation was the defendant, and also to enjoin such receiver from further acting under the order of appointment. [In so far as the writ is sought against the alleged receiver, it will not lie, as he is not exercising judicial functions.] [1] As to the superior court, petitioner's claim here is that the superior court had no power in such action to appoint a receiver, with the result that the order of appointment is a nullity. If we assume this to be true, it does not follow that there is any excess of jurisdiction on the part of the superior court in entertaining and determining the action brought against petitioner. That the superior court has full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine that action cannot be doubted. The question of the right of the plaintiff therein to maintain the action in the capacity in which he sues is a question that must be determined in such action exactly as where one sues as the administrator of the estate of a deceased person, any question as to his right to sue in that capacity must be determined in the action itself. If, in the determination of such a question, the trial court errs, it is error in the exercise of jurisdiction, and the aggrieved party's remedy is an appeal from the judgment given in the action. Prohibition lies only to restrain acts in excess of jurisdiction, and the petition in this matter fails utterly to state a case in this behalf.

We express no opinion as to the validity of the order appointing a receiver, as that question is not here involved.

The application for a writ of prohibition is denied.

We concur: SHAW, J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.; LAWLOR, J.; OLNEY, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] In view of certain claims earnestly pressed in the petition for rehearing filed herein, we deem it proper to state that our order submitting the matter for decision in this court upon the briefs on file, and without affording further opportunity for argument by the parties, was in accord with the provisions of subdivision 5 of rule 30 of this court (in effect September 15, 1919, 183 Pac. viii), which is as follows:

> "When a cause is transferred for determination to the Supreme Court after decision by a District Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court, if it deems such course proper in the particular cause, may order the same forthwith submitted for decision upon the briefs on file, without entertaining further argument, oral or otherwise."

Upon the record before us we deemed this to be the proper course in this proceeding. If in any matter in which this practice has been adopted it is made to appear on application for a rehearing that the doing of substantial justice demands that a further hearing should have been afforded, we would unhesitatingly grant such a rehearing. The rule appeared to us and still appears to be peculiarly applicable in this proceeding, wherein it was sought to prohibit a superior court from proceeding with the trial of a cause pending therein, in which it was obvious that the court had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and of the parties, and that the matter complained of as constituting an excess of jurisdiction on the part of the court was simply one of the issues in said cause to be determined therein. The rule is in the interest of a more speedy disposition of litigation and will be followed in such cases as appear to warrant its application.

[3] On the merits, petitioner's whole grievance lies in the fact that an action has been instituted and is pending against him for the recovery of money alleged to be due from him to a corporation, by one who alleges himself to be the lawfully appointed receiver for such corporation. His claim here is that such plaintiff is not the lawfully appointed receiver of such corporation, and on that claim he seeks to prohibit the superior court from entertaining and determining the pending action, wherein it has full jurisdiction of both subject-matter and person, and the consequent right to determine, subject to review on appeal, the issue as to the validity of the plaintiff's appointment as receiver. That he cannot do this seemed too clear to us to admit of question. It may be that any different view on the part of learned counsel for petitioner is due to the fact that the action in which the appointment of a receiver was made is one also pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county. If the action sought to be restrained had been commenced and was pending in another county, as might lawfully have been the situation if the defendant, who is petitioner here, had been a resident of such other county, the correctness of our view would probably be more clearly apparent. We are satisfied that it must be apparent on reflection that it is altogether immaterial in this connection whether the action instituted by the alleged receiver is in the superior court of the county wherein he claims to have been appointed, or in the superior court of some other county. In either case, the court in which it is pending has full and complete jurisdiction of the action.

[4] It is suggested that the statement in the opinion, that "in so far as the writ is sought against the alleged receiver it will not lie, as he is not exercising judicial functions," is at variance with the views enunciated in Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 389, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192. We did not mean to intimate that the receiver may not be properly joined with the superior court under whose appointment he is acting as a respondent, and that where excess of jurisdiction on the part of the respondent superior court for which he is acting is shown the writ may not run against him to effectuate the complete relief against judicial action to which a party is entitled. As said in the Havemeyer Case, "the writ runs to the court, and operates directly upon the court, but indirectly upon the receiver." But if the court is not, in the respect in which it is assailed (in this matter, in entertaining and determining the pending action), acting in excess of its jurisdiction, there is no foundation for prohibition against the receiver alone, and the proceeding must also fail as to him. The statement referred to, contained in the opinion, is susceptible of misconstruction, and is not at all necessary to the decision in view of what we have here said.

It is ordered that the statement referred to be and the same is stricken from the opinion, and that the petition for rehearing be and the same is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Delia M. Sweetman, deceased. From an order admitting on petition of Walter Johnson, will to probate as a lost or destroyed will, W. A. Griffiths and another appeal. Affirmed.

F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for appellants.

Decoto & Calkins, of Oakland, and R. E. Hoyt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order admitting a will of Delia M. Sweetman, deceased, to probate, as a lost or destroyed will. The main question at issue in the case is whether or not the will was in existence at the time of the death of the testatrix. The will was last seen in the possession of the testatrix in November, 1916, 2½ months previous to her death. The proponent of the will relies upon declarations made by the testatrix during that period to establish its continued existence, to overcome the presumption of its destruction with intent to revoke, arising from the possession of the will by the testatrix and the inability to find it after her death. The rule is thus stated in the Encyclopedia of Evidence:

"A will last seen and known to have been in the possession of the decedent, which cannot be found after his death, will be presumed to have been destroyed by him with the intention of revoking it, since the law always presumes in favor of the innocence of an act, and any other inference would involve a finding of a wrongful or fraudulent destruction of the will by a third person." 14 Ency. of Evidence, 440.

See, also, Matter of Cunnion, 201 N. Y. 123, 126, 94 N. E. 648, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 834; In re Keene's Estate, 189 Mich. 97, 155 N. W. 514, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 367; In re Miller's Will, 49 Or. 452, 90 Pac. 1002, 1004, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 14 Ann. Cas. 277; Van Dyke v. Mack, 139 Ark. 524, 214 S. W. 23, 31; Rape v. Cochran (Tex. Civ. App.) 217 S. W. 250, 40 Cyc. 1281. The admissibility of such testimony is conceded by both parties, for each relies in part upon her declarations to support their respective claims. The proponent of the lost or destroyed will, which we will hereafter call the Johnson will, sought to prove that the will had been destroyed after the death of the testatrix by F. A. Berlin, the attorney who proposed an earlier will of testatrix for probate, which we will hereafter refer to as the Berlin will. The latter contended that all the evidence with relation to the execution and existence of the Johnson will is a pure fabrication. The trial court found that the Johnson will was properly executed, and that it continued in existence up to the time of the death of the testatrix, and that it revoked the Berlin will by implication, as it disposed of all the property of testatrix. The court also found that F. A. Berlin did not destroy the Johnson will after the death of the testatrix. The court also specifically found that the allegation of the proponents of the Johnson will that the Johnson will was destroyed by a person or persons unknown to the Johnsons prior to the death of the testatrix was not true. There is no dispute as to the execution of the Berlin will, and it is conceded that the will produced in court was executed by the testatrix, but it was denied probate because not her last will. The Berlin will was executed on the 10th day of May, 1915. It was drawn by Mr. F. A. Berlin, who, for some 20 years had been the attorney for and employer of, the husband of the testatrix. By the terms of this will all the property of the deceased was left to her husband with the exception of a set of mahogany furniture, which was bequeathed to Mr. Berlin. The husband was named as the executor thereof.

According to the testimony offered in behalf of the proponent of the Johnson will, the decedent came to the office of Walter S. Johnson, an attorney, 10 days later, and requested that he draw a will for her. This he did, and by the terms of this will, as first drawn, all of the property of the decedent was given to Mr. Johnson, his brother and sisters, and they were charged with the obligation of supporting the husband of the testatrix during his life. Five or six days later this draft was superseded by another, whereby the husband was given a life estate and Mr. Johnson, his brother and sisters were given the remainder of the entire property, subject to that life estate. Walter S. Johnson was made the executor. This will was executed by the testatrix August 9, 1915. The testatrix, however, instead of destroying the Berlin will, kept the two wills together underneath a drawer in one of the upstairs rooms of her home, where they were frequently seen together. In June, 1916, the Johnsons moved into the home of the deceased, and remained there until the latter part of November, 1916. Mrs. Sweetman was asked why she kept the Berlin will, and she stated it was because she had therein bequeathed the set of mahogany furniture to Mr. Berlin, which she wanted him to have. The Johnson will was last seen by Walter S. Johnson, together with the Berlin will, in the upstairs room, on the floor where they had apparently dropped from underneath the drawer. Without calling the attention of the testatrix to the fact that the wills were out on the floor, he suggested to her that they ought to be put in a safe place. The testatrix promised him that she would place them with Mr. Green of the Oakland Savings Bank, where she had an account. Instead of this, however, and without the knowledge of any of the Johnsons, Mrs. Sweetman delivered a small package to her friend, Mrs. Kammer, with the request that it be placed in the safe in a butcher shop in Oakland. This was done, and subsequently, at the request of Mrs. Sweetman, the package was returned to her for her inspection. After examining them she returned the package to Mrs. Kammer to be replaced in the safe. There they remained until the day of her death, when Mrs. Kammer, acting under the previous directions given her by the testatrix, got the package and delivered it to Mr. Berlin, who opened it in the presence of his wife, and, as they testified, found only the Berlin will.

The declarations of the deceased:

There are two distinct lines of opposing declarations introduced in evidence. Those introduced on behalf of the proponents of the Johnson will are to the effect that at numerous times during the 2½ months before her death Mrs. Sweetman stated that the will was still in existence and acceptable to her, while the testimony on behalf of the proponents of the Berlin will was that she had stated that she had destroyed the will purposely; that she did not desire the Johnsons to have any of her property; and that she had intentionally deceived them into believing that the will was still in existence.

The exact nature of the declarations will more clearly appear from the following statement of the evidence:

Walter S. Johnson testified: That 2 or 3 days before her death he told the testatrix that he had asked Mr. Green at the Oakland Bank of Savings if he had the will, and that Mr. Green said he did not have it. That the will was not upstairs. That he asked her where it was, and she, after thinking quite a while, said, "Then you go and see Mr. Berlin about it." That after that he had several conversations with Mrs. Sweetman about it. That "she said something about to keep on looking for the will, that I would find it. She said that I would find it all right. I think she told me twice to ask Mr. Berlin about it, and I did finally go down and ask Mr. Berlin about the wills." That at another time she stated to him, "'Now, you have no fear about that will, you will find the will all right.' She rather laughed at my even questioning its whereabouts—'it will be handed to you. If anything happens to me it will be handed to you immediately.' She said I didn't need to have any fear about the will; that as soon as she got well she would get it, and she would show it to me, and then she was going to put it away again." This was three days before her death. On that day, according to the testimony of Mrs. Brooks, the mother-in-law of Mrs. Johnson, the decedent was questioned as follows:

> "Q. I suppose you want Mr. Berlin to have that set of furniture. She said, 'Yes.' She says, 'That will is with the other one.' She says, 'They are both together, Sam.'"

Mrs. Brooks also testified as follows:

> "We asked her one day if she felt able to sign a copy of that original will, so that my son might have something to show in court, she said no, that she didn't think she felt able, thought it wouldn't be right, and 'it is not necessary.' At that time she knew that we were not able to find the will, but she did not consider that it was lost. She did not tell us where it was."

This also occurred only a few days before her death. She further testified to a conversation with the testatrix 3 days before her death, as follows:

> "I told her that he was unable to find the will which she had given him, and we spoke of that several times, and she said—my son had told her that he was unable to find this will, and that they had an understanding about it, and I asked her about it, and she told me very explicitly that—she said 'Just as sure as I am lying here, and just as sure as I hope to be in Heaven, Sam will have that will at the proper time.' She said, 'I don't give one anxious thought, and I don't want Sam to.'"

In answer to the following questions this witness gave the following answers:

> "Q. What did she say on this last occasion that you were speaking of the will? A. Well, she said this that I have just repeated to you, that 'Sam will find the will, or it will be handed to him at the proper time, and I do not give it one anxious thought, and I don't want him to.' * * * Q. Did she ever say anything about looking for the will? A. The last thing she said to me that was intelligible—her articulation was very poor—was, 'Mrs. Brooks, never give up about that will; search for it; never give up.'"

Pete Balengat, a witness for appellant, testified that the day before the death of Mrs. Sweetman he asked if her affairs were in shape, and she replied that they were; "that everything was all right. She said that she had some wills, and that they were in the safe. She didn't say what safe. She said all she wanted done would be in some safe, I don't know where. She never mentioned the place."

Cornelia C. Gruenhagen, a sister of Mr. Johnson, a legatee under the will, testified as follows:

> "She never told me where the wills were. I asked her on her deathbed. I had never worried about the will, but when I found nobody could find out where the will was—she had great confidence in me, and I asked her where the will was, and she said, 'Why, it is all right; it is all right. What's all this fuss about?' I didn't probe it because she was very ill, and I didn't like to. That is all I ever talked to her about the wills. She never told me where the will was, neither of them."

On the other hand, the nurse who attended Mrs. Sweetman during her last illness, Mrs. Martha Bergendahl, testified for appellant that on the Wednesday before her death (the very day of one of the conversations testified to by Mrs. Brooks, the mother-in-law of Walter Johnson), the deceased said to her:

> "'They think they are smart,' referring to the Johnson children, 'but I will fool them.' She said this several times in the last week before she passed away. * * * She said she had destroyed all wills except one man that had a will that was high up in office. That was her last statement she gave to me. * * * She said she had destroyed the Johnson will, burned it. She did not want them to get anything, she said. She told me that Wednesday before she passed away at night, the last time she told me."

She further testified that in the presence of Pete Balengat, decedent stated that the Johnson will had been destroyed. That witness, however, stated that he did not hear her say anything about burning up any will. On cross-examination, however, he testified:

> "She said straight that she was not going to leave her property to the Johnsons. She says, 'they think they are smart, but I will fool them.'"

Daisy A. Adams testified that in January, 1917, Mrs. Sweetman told her that she did not want the Johnsons to have anything, and that she had burned up everything, all the papers.

Annie Ayhens testified that Mrs. Sweetman, two weeks before she died, told her that she was going to send for Mr. Berlin to have him make her will. Another witness named Kelly testified that testatrix said shortly before her death that she was going to make a new will, and drop the Johnsons out, about two weeks before her death.

Mrs. Kammer also testified that arrangements were being secretly made by Mrs. Sweetman to have Mr. Berlin come on Monday, January 29, 1917, to draw a new will for the deceased, who died Saturday, February 3, 1917. Mr. Sweetman had predeceased her in June, 1916.

[2] If the foregoing declarations of the deceased were established by competent testimony, the problem presented for consideration would be quite different from the one that confronts us, for we must assume that the trial judge disbelieved the testimony hostile to the Johnson will. We have therefore the simple question as to whether or not the declarations of the deceased that the will was in existence, repeated in the most solemn fashion only 3 days before her death, was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the will was in existence at the time of her death. It seems clear that these declarations of the testatrix at least had the effect of overcoming the presumption that the will had been destroyed by her with the intention of revoking the same.

[3] With this presumption thus eliminated we have then the fact that the will was in existence 2½ months before her death. The law presumes that a thing once shown to be in existence continues in existence as long as things of that nature usually exist. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32.

If we apply that presumption to the will under consideration, it is evident that without the intervention of some unusual agency it would not cease to exist in 75 days. There was no proof that any such agency destroyed the will. The trial court was therefore justified in its findings to that effect.

Order affirmed.

We concur: SLOANE, J; SHAW, J.; LENNON, J.

OLNEY, J. I dissent. The Code provides that no will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless either (1) "the same is proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator," or (2) is shown to have been destroyed in his lifetime fraudulently or by public calamity. Section 1339, Code Civ. Proc. The findings of the trial court negative the second alternative. The probate of the will in this case therefore depended on its being proved that it was in existence at the time of the testatrix's death. No one was produced who saw the will at or after her death. It had, in fact, disappeared some time before, and had been searched for and not found. Its disappearance is in no way accounted for. It was attempted to account for it by the contention that one Berlin destroyed it, but this contention the trial court expressly finds against. The only testimony relied upon to show its existence at the testatrix's death was testimony of declarations by her, from which the inference might be drawn that she believed it to be still in existence. How declarations of this character can be taken as proof that it was in existence some days later, when she died, I am wholly unable to see. They do not even show that it was in existence when they were made. They were not declarations that she had the will, or knew its whereabouts, or knew that it was still in existence, but were merely expressions of a belief that it would be found if searched for. Why she so believed does not appear. She may have had good reasons or she may not. The facts that do appear are that the will had disappeared some months before the testatrix's death, and was not seen thereafter, so far as shown, either by the testatrix or anybody else, although its disappearance was rather persistently brought to the testatrix's attention and she urged searching for it, which was done without avail. Yet, although these are all the real facts shown, except such as are negatived by the court's other findings, it is held that they are sufficient to meet the requirement of the Code that it affirmatively appear that the will was in existence when the testatrix died. To my mind, if there is any inference whatever to be drawn from them, it is just to the contrary.

The reasoning of the main opinion is that it having been shown that the will was in existence some time before the death of the testatrix, the presumption operates that a thing once shown to exist continues in existence as long as things of that nature usually do. But the very purpose of the requirement of the statute that proof be made of the existence of the will "at the time of the death of the testator" is not to permit the presumption to operate, to make it impossible to probate an unproduced will by proof that it was in existence prior to the testator's death eked out by any presumption that it continued to exist until he died. If it can reasonably be inferred from the facts in evidence that it was in existence when the testator died, that is another matter, and quite different from presuming, as a matter of law, that it was then in existence because it was shown to have once existed. In this case no such inference from the facts in evidence can reasonably be drawn.

The opinion also goes on the proposition that the declarations of the testatrix show that the will was not destroyed by her animo revocandi. But suppose they do, what difference does it make? The fact still remains that the will disappeared 2½ months before the testatrix's death, and was not seen afterwards. The opinion seems to be based upon the assumption that, unless the will was destroyed animo revocandi, it would still operate. This is not the law. It must be in existence at the time of the testator's death; that is, must not have been destroyed, except where it was destroyed fraudulently or by public calamity. That is the explicit requirement of the statute. If the will were destroyed by the testatrix ignorantly or accidentally, or by some one else, but without fraudulent intent, it was not only destroyed physically but legally as well. The requirement is that it be in existence when she dies, and that that fact be affirmatively proven. Is it a sufficient compliance with this requirement that it be proven that she once made a will, that it disappeared some months before she died, but that she did not destroy it animo revocandi, and believed that it would be found? Yet, when the evidence is examined that, and only that, is the proof in this case.

It should, perhaps, be observed that in many jurisdictions the question presented in case of an attempt to probate a lost will or destroyed will, which is shown to have once existed, is purely a question as to its revocation by the testator. The presumption from its disappearance is that it was revoked, and this presumption must be overcome. Proof that the will was in existence after his death goes, of course, directly to show that it was not revoked, and this is the point of such evidence in those jurisdictions. On the other hand, it is not material that the will was not in existence when the testator died, provided it appeared that it was not destroyed by him for the purpose of revoking it, or that he did not know of its destruction in some other manner and acquiesce, as it were. But this is not the rule under our statute. Proof of nonrevocation is not sufficient. The proof must be that the will was in existence when the testator died, or else that it was destroyed fraudulently or by public calamity. This appears, not only from the language of the statute, but from our decisions. Estate of Johnson, 134 Cal. 662, 66 Pac. 847; Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 102 Pac. 941, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 132 Am. St. Rep. 116, 18 Ann. Cas. 625. It may be that the declarations of the testatrix in this case were sufficient, if the evidence for the proponents alone be believed, to show that the will was never revoked. But that they were sufficient to show that the will was in existence when the declarant later died is a very different thing.

MOONEY v. CYRIACKS. (L. A. 6041.)

1. Principal and agent 🔑123(7) — Evidence held to show agent's authority to make representations.

In action for rescission of sale of automobile, evidence held to show that defendant's agent had full authority to negotiate the sale, and bind defendant by his representations.

2. Appeal and error 🔑204(3)—Objection to oral evidence as to contract cannot be first made on appeal.

Objection to the admission of oral evidence concerning a written sale agreement cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

3. Evidence 🔑434(11)—Parol evidence admissible to prove fraud in sale contract.

Parol evidence is always admissible to prove fraud, and the fact that the sale of an automobile is evidenced by a written contract reciting that all the conditions and representations are embodied therein will not prevent the purchaser from proving by parol that the sale was induced by false and fraudulent representations.

4. Evidence 🔑434(1) — Statutory provisions held not to exclude oral evidence of fraud.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, providing that when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing it is to be considered as containing all the terms, and Civ. Code, § 1625, providing that the execution of a contract supersedes all prior negotiations or stipulations, do not prevent the admission of oral evidence in an action for rescission on the ground of fraud.

5. Sales 🔑52(7)—Evidence held to show representations as to automobile false and fraudulent.

Evidence held to show that representations inducing purchase of automobile by plaintiff, a woman not versed in machines, concerning the mechanical condition of the automobile and the distance it had been run, were false and fraudulently made.

6. Sales 🔑38(7)—Showing car and instructing buyer's daughters held not a "demonstration," precluding reliance on representations.

In buyer's action to rescind automobile purchase for fraud, the car being described in the written agreement of sale as in present good condition "as demonstrated," the buyer, who was uninformed as to automobiles, was not precluded from claiming reliance upon representations by the words "as demonstrated," where the seller showed the car to the buyer and she sent it back immediately to have seat covers put on, and it was returned four days later, and on three occasions in the following week the seller instructed the buyer's daughters in its operation; for such acts could hardly be called a "demonstration."

7. Sales 🔑52(7)—Evidence held to show buyer relied on fraudulent representations by seller's agent.

In an action for rescission of a sale of an automobile, evidence held to show that plaintiff buyer did not rely upon an independent investigation, but upon oral representations as to the use of the car and its condition, made by the seller's agent.

8. Sales 🔑130(3)—In action for rescission evidence held to show buyer had restored goods to seller.

In action to rescind automobile purchase for fraud, evidence held to show that plaintiff buyer had restored the automobile to the seller.

9. Sales 🔑38(3)—Representations of defendant's agent held not mere opinion.

In an action for rescission of automobile purchase false representations of defendant seller's agent as to the value of extra equipment, the mileage the machine had been run, etc., held not mere statements of opinion but material statements of fact, in view of the agent's statement that the car had been gone over in defendant's shop and the testimony of defendant himself that he knew its mechanical condition and that the car was in A-1 condition; he being a mechanical engineer.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Mooney against F. R. Cyriacks. Judgment for plaintiff, a new trial was denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frederick H. Griffith, of Phœnix, Ariz., and Ernest C. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Perry F. Backus and Wm. J. Carr, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, F. R. Cyriacks, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, Mary E. Mooney, in an action for the rescission of a written agreement of sale, on the ground of fraud, for the purchase and sale of an automobile, and to recover the sum of $532.15, alleged to have been paid out by plaintiff on account of said agreement of sale. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and findings of fact and conclusions of law were made. A motion for a new trial was interposed and denied. The defendant appeals.

Respondent and appellant, the latter represented by J. H. Graves, his salesman, entered into a written agreement of sale which is dated August 20, 1918, whereby respondent agreed to purchase and appellant agreed to sell a Buick automobile for $1,835, of which $500 was paid on account; the balance of the purchase price remaining unpaid. Respondent also disbursed $26.75 for insurance premium on the car and $5.40 for a certificate of registration.

According to the testimony of respondent:

She approached J. H. Graves about August 15, 1918, and stated she desired to buy a Buick automobile. On August 20th Graves called her on the telephone and said: "If you want to buy a car we have a wonderful bargain in a car, which is new, with the exception of 918 miles." That Graves further told her that accessories to the value of $350 were on the car; that there were no more seven-passenger Buicks in Southern California for sale; "the company is not making any more now; they are going into the employ of the government * * * it is a great bargain." That she "talked it over with a few people whom I thought would be good counsel, and I called Mr. Graves up again and asked him if he would bring the car to my house and let me see it, which he did." In the company of her three daughters she viewed the car, and then said to Mr. Graves: "It looks very nice, but I know nothing about a car. If it drives well and looks well that's all I know, and I have to depend entirely on you;" to which Graves replied, "This is a fine car and it is in fine condition." Graves stated to her that appellant purchased the car from a young man who was called in the draft. Respondent concluded this conversation by saying, "If the car is as you represent it, I will take it." Graves then went back to the shop with the automobile.

"While we were talking to him I spoke about the top looking a little bit peculiar; all marked up. He said, 'You know that could all happen coming over the desert. * * *' And I said, 'I believe I'll have the seats covered; the leather don't look very nice. * * *' We talked about the cost of that, and later he called me up and said it would be $85. I said I believed I would be willing to give that much and more; and I said, 'How soon can you have the car out?' He said, 'On Saturday afternoon; I will rush it through. * * * The car was delivered Saturday afternoon about 4 o'clock." The seat covers had been put on and Graves called three times in the following week to teach respondent's daughters how to drive, and "within a day or two we went out for a ride and the car rattled and squeaked and the engine made so much noise I was really worried—I was afraid something was wrong, and I didn't know whether we would get home or not. We stopped at Mr. Cyriacks' store, and I said to Mr. Cyriacks, 'This engine makes so much noise, and there are so many squawks, I don't know what's the matter with it.' He said, 'All new cars do that, and after you ride a little while it will be all right; or maybe the engine needs a little greasing.'"

Respondent said:

That her daughters told appellant the brakes would not work and he requested them to send the car over the next morning; that the car was sent to the shop several times for repairs, which did not prove satisfactory. "Within four days I found the car wasn't what it was represented, and then was the time I saw Mr. Cyriacks himself. The time the car was left to have the brakes fixed, it was brought back within an hour or two by my daughter. Then he took it over to fix the curtains; kept it most all day, and then he brought it back and the curtains didn't fit then. Upon investigation of a very capable automobile man, the car was all wrong; it was not what it was represented to be at all." She testified she found the right front fender had been broken and repaired; that the top was composed of two or three different materials; that there was a hole in the top, the leather part, as large as a dime—a piece of leather had been pasted over it, which fell out when she pulled the braces a little bit; that the curtains didn't fit; the front had been broken; that a part of the hood had been refinished; the tires on the car were all worn, worn smooth; that "I found 'For Rent' and 'For Hire,' two different signs, like you see on cars on the street for hire, in the pocket, and two different guidebooks of Los Angeles city and surrounding country, and a number of apartment houses. The hinge which was to support the lid to the rear seat box, which raises, was broken off. The rear seat box cover was all to pieces, and when you took it up the boards all fell in all directions. They were nothing but a bunch of slats. I noticed the speedometer at the time I first looked at the car. It registered 918 miles. There was a hole in the linoleum on the floor of the car. I called Mr. Graves' attention to it. After I saw these different things I called Mr. Graves up and told him I wanted to bring the car back; that it was not as represented; that it was not a new car, and I had found out many defects; and I said, 'I didn't ask you for a car that was used. You told me this was a new car, and it is not a new car.' He came down to the house and we went out to the car, and I pointed out these defects. I was very indignant, and he said, 'Well, we will do anything that is reasonable. We will put on a new running board and fix the top.' He said they would do anything I wanted them to do. I said, 'I don't want you to do anything, because I don't want a car that is patched up. When I want a car I want a new car. I don't want one that I have to excuse to my friends about its appearance.' He said, 'We will do what we can about the car. I will tell Mr. Cyriacks.' I said, 'You tell Mr. Cyriacks I won't have this car.' He went back and presently called me up and said 'We will take that car back and put it in perfect running condition, and we will do anything that is within reason; but we won't give you back your money.' I said, 'All right, Mr. Graves, we will determine that later; but I won't have this car;' and that ended my conversation with him. My daughters were present while I was talking with him, and when I was talking over the phone.

"I went to see Mr. Cyriacks on Thursday evening [August 29th]. My daughter was with me. I said to him, 'I want to know what you will do about this car Mr. Graves sold me.' He said, 'I don't know anything about the car.' I said, 'Do you mean to tell me that you allow cars to go out of your storeroom and don't know anything about them?' He said, 'I don't know anything about the car, I told you.' I said, 'Well, you simply have to know something about it, because, I said, I won't be imposed on like this,' and Mr. Cyriacks said, 'I'll tell you what I'll do; I will talk this over with Mr. Graves, and you come back next Tuesday, Monday being Labor Day [September 3d]. Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock I called at his request, and two of my daughters were with me. I said, 'Mr. Cyriacks, what do you intend to do about this car?' He said, 'I won't do anything. Mr. Graves has talked this case over with me and I find he has told you nothing that is not true.' I said, 'That is the stand you take?' He said, 'Yes; Mr. Graves has not misrepresented it.' I said, 'All right, Mr. Cyriacks, I will put this into the hands of my lawyers.'"

Ralph E. Ruble, an automobile driver who formerly dealt in automobiles, was called by respondent and testified:

That, accompanied by Mr. Graves, he visited the shop where the seat covers were being made for the car on "Friday or Saturday, August 23d or 24th"; that he went there at the instance of Mrs. Mooney. He told Graves he "had come down to look over the car that Mrs. Mooney was figuring on. * * * I looked at the car and said, 'Well, it looks pretty good. * * * The rubber seems to be pretty good. * * * I mean the tires by that.' I said, 'It is a special top, isn't it?' He says, 'A different top from the top the car is equipped with from the factory.' * * * I looked at the speedometer and I think it had 948 miles on. * * * The lineoleum on the floor was worn through to the wood. I think I made a remark about it in my estimation 9,000 was better than 900."

This witness testified that after he had driven around in the car three or four blocks he said to Graves:

"'The machine seems to be in fair shape mechanically.' He said, 'Yes; the car has been in our shop and gone all over.'"

Ruble testified further:

That he told Graves the price of $1,750 "seems to be kind of high, doesn't it?" "I said, 'Has Mrs. Mooney bought the car?' He said, 'Yes; a substantial payment has been made.' 'Then,' I said, 'my report doesn't make any difference one way or the other.' He said, 'No; not necessarily.'"

Ruble gave as his opinion that the car had run at least 5,000 miles and that it is a simple matter to turn a speedometer back. He also made the report of his examination to Mrs. Mooney, and told her he thought she was paying too much money for the car.

Within the next four days, Frank E. Wellens, salesman for the Howard Automobile Company, who had been an automobile mechanic for 15 years, testified:

He "found the left front fender had been dented; it had been straightened and the right front fender was broken at the step of the running board; the right rear fender was cracked. * * * The right rear hubcap was badly dented; the moulding on the right running board was torn badly; there was a hole about the size of your little finger in the top over the center bow; the car squeaked and rattled, and No. 5 wrist pin in the engine was loose. No. 3 cylinder's connecting rod was loose. I noticed that the boards, the slats that acted as a lid to the rear seat box, were all shattered, all torn loose. The brake pedals showed as though they had been worn from long riding, and the floor board showed where the heel had > worn, cut clear through the lineoleum on the floor. The foot accelerator showed considerable wear. The tires had all been retreaded. The extra tire had gone about 6,500 miles. In my opinion, from my examination, the car had been run since leaving the factory about 10,000 miles. The denting and straightening out of the fenders had been done before the car was refinished. * * * Q. What would you say at that time was the reasonable value of that car? A. $1,300.' "

This witness also testified that a new Buick of the same model and equipment as the car in question was worth $1,850 at that time.

Miss Mary Margaret Mooney corroborated the testimony of her mother as to the conversations between the latter and Graves and appellant.

J. H. Graves testified:

> That he had known respondent since the middle of August; that the first time he met her "I told her it was a mighty good bargain; that the car had only been driven 900 miles and was in A-1 condition, and really in better condition than a new car, mechanically; * * * there was nothing that showed any wear on the car any more than could be worn in 900 miles—I mean except the tires.
> "Q. Are you able to explain the condition of the tires? A. Yes; I talked quite a while with Smail, who owned the car; I think I was about the first one there, before Mr. Cyriacks saw it even. * * * The tires on the car at the time Mrs. Mooney bought it were not the same tires that it was equipped with at the factory. * * * I think it had been refinished, but don't know about the paint. * * *"

The witness testified to certain imperfections in the car, and continued:

> "I drove the car probably three or four times before selling it to Mrs. Mooney, about 5 or 6 miles. * * * I inspected the car in company with an expert on behalf of Mrs. Mooney; the expert [Ruble] that testified this morning. Mrs. Mooney told me he was sent down by her brother to inspect the car to see whether she made a good buy or not; * * *" that he told Ruble respondent had made a deposit on the machine and that she would take it unless his report was unfavorable; that he personally had handled ten second hand cars a month during the preceding ten months; and that he had talked to appellant about the car the same day he saw respondent and went into it thoroughly with him.

Appellant testified to the condition of the machine and said further:

> "I know Mary E. Mooney, but didn't meet her at the time the car was sold. I am entirely familiar with the automoble my firm sold her. * * * In addition to my business of selling automobiles, I am by profession a mechanical engineer. At the time I bought that automobile, I made an examination of it; * * * looked the car over carefully, and found the car to be in A-1 condition. * * *
> "Q. Will you state the value of that car at the time you sold it to Mrs. Mooney? A. In the neighborhood of $1,800. * * * I had a conversation with Mrs. Mooney on or about the 1st of September, 1918. She said, 'There is something wrong about the car.' I said, 'If you will bring the car back tomorrow, if there is anything to be done, we will surely be pleased to fix it up. I will give the order to my foreman to fix the car up, whatever needs to be done to it.' * * * The next time I saw her, she said, 'There's some things about the car that have been misrepresented to me.' I said, 'I'm awful sorry that you take that view about it, because I can't understand why you say that, because Mr. Graves has been working for me a long time and he wouldn't do that.' * * * The next time Mrs. Mooney came into the office and asked me what I was going to do about it and I said, 'Well, I would like to straighten out the matter for you, but Mr. Graves has not misrepresented anything."

Under date of September 4th, respondent, through her attorney, sent a written notice of rescission to appellant, in which she demanded return of the $500 paid on account of the agreement of sale, and stated his agent Graves had, through fraud, deceit, and false representations as to material facts concerning the age, usage, and condition of the car, induced her to enter into the agreement of sale; that the representations were false in fact and known by Graves at the time to be false; that she relied upon the truth of said representations and would not have become a party to the agreement of sale in the absence thereof; and that she had just discovered said fraud and the falsity of said representations. Appellant's attorney, under date of September 6th, in a written response to the notice of rescission, stated that—

> "Apparently the communication is rigged up as the foundation for an action at law; but you may rest assured that Mr. Cyriacks will not, for any such reasons assigned, which are false and untrue, permit your client * * * to repudiate her contract. I am satisfied that if you gentlemen will investigate the matter further the fact will develop that Mrs. Mooney has no grounds for complaint. You may consider this as indicating definitely Mr. Cyriacks' position and your course may be guided accordingly."

On September 16th the car was returned by respondent to appellant, accompanied by a demand for the return of the $500 which she paid on August 24th, and a notice that unless it was refunded within three days an action would be brought to enforce payment. The complaint was filed on September 20th.

The court found, among other things, that on August 20, 1918, appellant represented to respondent the car was better than a new automobile of the same make and description; that said automobile had been run only 918 miles; that said automobile was worth in value more than $300 over and above the price of a new machine of the same make and style at said date; that said automobile was in perfect mechanical condition and was in all respects worth the sum of $1,835; that respondent was uninformed and unskilled in the use, condition, and price of automobiles, and had never driven or owned one theretofore, and that she informed appellant that she would rely solely upon the representations made to her by him and his agent in the matter of the purchase and sale of the automobile; that the representations were false and untrue and were known by the appellant to be false and untrue at the time they were made; that the payments made by respondent were made in reliance upon the said statements and representations, and that the said statements and representations were false and untrue at the time they were made to her; that within a reasonable time after August 20th respondent discovered that the representations and statements were false and untrue, and that she thereupon returned to appellant the automobile and each and everything of value received by her from him and thereupon demanded of appellant the return of the $500; and that appellant has failed, neglected, and refused to refund the said amount; that by reason of the false and fraudulent statements and representations respondent is damaged in the sum of $500; that on August 20th the automobile had been run for more than 5,000 miles; that within a reasonable time after discovering this the respondent restored to appellant everything of value which she had received from him under the said agreement, and that within a reasonable time after the discovery of the falsity of the statements and representations made to her by appellant she rescinded the agreement of sale, and that by reason of such rescission appellant is indebted to respondent in the sum of $532.15.

Appellant urges four grounds for reversal of the judgment:

I. The oral representations of appellant's agent were not competent or legally sufficient to vary the terms of the written agreement subsequently entered into, nor to bind appellant nor to sustain the findings;

II. That the independent investigation made by plaintiff estops her from now attempting to say that she relied upon the representations made at the time of the purchase, when it is apparent from the evidence that she did not in fact rely upon them;

III. There was no complete restoration, or offer thereof, upon the attempted rescission by plaintiff, and hence no rescission; and

IV. The representations as to mileage and as to the value of the extra equipment constitute mere statements of opinion, and the defects claimed were not material.

I. The executory agreement of sale is in the usual form; it was dated August 20, 1918; time was made the essence of the agreement; plaintiff paid down $500 in addition to $32.15 for the license fee and insurance premium, and the balance $1,335, was to be paid in monthly installments. On final payment being made appellant was to execute a bill of sale, respondent to have no interest in or title to the car until the full consideration was paid.

> "Property being a used Buick touring car, model E 49, motor No. 438625, frame No. 422422, in present good condition as demonstrated.
> "It is expressly understood and agreed that no statements, agreements, understandings or representations of any kind or nature have been made, or exist, other than those in this agreement contained."

As we understand this statement of appellant's first contention, it is that because the oral representations were made by his agent he is not bound by them; that, the agreement of sale having been reduced to writing, it is to be deemed to contain all the terms, and hence the writing itself is the only admissible evidence upon the issue of fraud, and that as the findings of fraud rest upon parol they cannot be held. As to the question of agency, it is sufficient to point out that the evidence we have set forth shows that Graves had full authority to negotiate the sale for his principal. When respondent first spoke to appellant about the car he said he knew nothing about it and that he would take up the matter with Graves. Appellant did not, in his interviews with respondent, take the position that Graves did not have complete authority to bind him in the transaction, nor did either appellant or Graves claim that she was foreclosed by the agreement of sale to rely upon the oral representations. It must be presumed that in the interval between Thursday, August 29th, and Tuesday, September 3d, when appellant canvassed with Graves the representations that he made to respondent, Graves detailed the facts of the transaction faithfully to him. In any event, he did not disclaim responsibility for Graves' action in the premises, but, passing on the merits of his version, told respondent the car had not been misrepresented, and that while willing to put it into condition, he would not return the money. In view of the findings of fraud, which, as we shall presently show, are fully supported by the evidence, appellant will not now be heard to question the authority of Graves.

[2, 3] As to the remaining contention, it is proper to mention that appellant made no objection to the admission of the oral evidence. The objection to its consideration is made for the first time on appeal. But, apart from this, the contention ignores the well-established rule of law that—

> "Parol evidence is always admissible to prove fraud." Berry on Automobiles, § 814; Huddy on Automobiles, § 1059; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 858; Jones on Evidence, § 435; Smith on the Law of Fraud, § 265; Elliott on Contracts, §§ 1650, 1651; sections 1566, 1567, 1568, 1572, 1709, 1710, Civ. Code; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. 625; Hick v. Thomas, 90 Cal. 289, 27 Pac. 208, 376; Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 18 Pac. 791; Maxson v. Llewelyn, 122 Cal. 195, 199, 54 Pac. 732; Langley v. Rodriguez, 122 Cal. 581, 55 Pac. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70; Hays v. Gloster, 88 Cal. 560, 26 Pac. 367; Tiffany v. Automobile Co., 168 Mo. App. 729, 154 S. W. 865; Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Webb (Tex. Civ. App.) 181 S. W. 853; Avery Co. v. Staples, 183 S. W. (Tex. Civ. App.) 43.

"Hence the fact that the sale of an automobile is evidenced by a written contract, which recites that all conditions and representations are embodied therein, will not prevent the purchaser from proving by parol evidence that the sale was induced by fraud." Berry on Automobiles, supra; Huddy on Automobiles, supra; 9 Ency. of Ev., supra; Tiffany v. Automobile Co., supra; Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Webb, supra.

[4] It follows that in actions for rescission on the ground of fraud the statutory provisions that when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing it is to be considered as containing all of the terms (section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the execution of a contract supersedes all prior negotiations or stipulations (section 1625, Civ. Code), do not control. Appellant has cited certain authorities on this point: Kullman, Salz Co. v. Sugar, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 725, 96 Pac. 369, was an action for rescission based, not on fraudulent representations, but on the alleged failure of a machine to meet the requirements of a warranty expressed in the written contract. This clearly is not in point. Munn v. Anthony, 36 Cal. App. 312, 171 Pac. 1082, was an action for damages. It was alleged by plaintiff that defendant made certain false representations touching the model number of the car, which indicated the year of manufacture. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff on this issue, and the finding was not disturbed on appeal. Two other points were considered in the appellate court: First, that plaintiff resorted to an independent investigation before purchasing the car, which point was declared to be without merit; and, second, that having finally entered into a written contract of sale containing, as here, a limiting clause, "the claim that false representations had been made by way of inducement could furnish no ground for a cause of action." The appellate court, referring to a limiting clause such as the one here, and citing section 1625 of the Civil Code, sustained the contention of the appellant notwithstanding the allegations and findings of fraud, and reversed the judgment, saying:

"It cannot be sustained because of the condition of the contract by which plaintiff waived the representations made previous to the execution thereof."

The vendee in that case elected to sue for damages under the contract for the alleged fraud, but so far as the question we are considering is concerned the form of remedy is not material. The decision therefore is opposed to the authorities we have cited, and hence cannot be followed.

The next authority upon which appellant relies is Tockstein v. Pacific, etc., Co., 33 Cal. App. 262, 164 Pac. 906. It is, however, not in point. The alleged fraudulent misrepresentations in that case were as to what the seller (the defendant) would guarantee in respect to the car which was the subject of the sale. But the plaintiff actually bought the car under a written contract which did not contain these guaranties which it had been represented to the plaintiff would be made, and which also expressly provided that there were no guaranties other than those set forth. The case was one, therefore, where the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations went to the character of the contract which the plaintiff was to receive. She very evidently could not recover in such a case unless she had been deceived into accepting the contract which she did receive in lieu of that which she expected to receive, and this is all that the case decides. This is apparent from the following quotation:

"The plaintiff does not pretend to state that she did not sign these writings knowingly and freely, or that any fraud, deceit, or concealment as to their terms and effect existed as an inducing cause for her execution of them; nor has the plaintiff shown in the proofs in this case that any of the terms of the express and limited warranty of the manufacturer and seller of the car set forth in detail in the written agreement were violated by the defendant or by its principal, the Ford Motor Company."

[5] We shall next consider whether the evidence was sufficient to support the findings of fraud. Upon these findings we must assume the existence of every fact necessary to their support which the trial court might have inferred from the evidence. The testimony of respondent and her daughter as to the representations made by Graves is that the 918 miles which the machine had run improved its condition mechanically; that the addition of the accessories had increased the value of the car $300 over the original price; that it was a wonderful bargain and a good buy; and that respondent told him she knew nothing about automobiles and would rely entirely on him in the transaction. Appellant's answer was a general denial, but the testimony of respondent and her daughter that the above representations were made was not contradicted, and consequently the findings thereon cannot be questioned. And we think it is clear that evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the findings as to the falsity of the representations upon which respondent relied. The testimony as to the car's mileage varied from 5,000 to 10,000 miles, the finding being more than 5,000 miles. It also appears that both Graves and appellant were well versed in automobiles; that the car had been in the shop for some time prior to this transaction; that when the machine first came in it was given a careful examination by appellant; that it had been revarnished if not repainted; that the tires then on the automobile had run more than 6,500 miles. The evidence is overwhelming that the car had greatly exceeded the mileage stated by Graves; for instance, Ruble remarking to him, "9,000 was better than 900!" Ruble said Graves told him the machine had been gone all over before it was offered to respondent. After she received the car, it was repeatedly taken to the shop, apparently without any satisfactory results; it had been roughly handled; showed heavy wear and tear; and that it had been run out of condition. Appellant and Graves were dealing with a woman who was not versed in machines, and yet she was induced by the latter to sign the agreement whose sole warranty is that the car was "in present good condition, as demonstrated," and endeavored afterwards to reconcile her to the sale by promises to put it in shape. There would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that upon the evidence the findings that the representations were false and fraudulently made in order to induce respondent to enter into the agreement must be sustained.

[6] Appellant has italicized the words "as demonstrated" in the warranty we have just quoted. The car was first shown to respondent on August 20th, when it was sent to have the seat covers put on, and was returned to her on the 24th. On three occasions in the following week Graves instructed respondent's daughters in the operation of the machine. Showing the car to the respondent on August 20th, and thereafter instructing her daughters, can hardly be called a demonstration, especially in view of the findings that respondent "was uninformed and unskilled in the use, condition and price of automobiles," that the representations were fraudulent, and that respondent relied on them.

[7] II. The next question is whether respondent made and relied upon an independent investigation and not on the oral representations in entering into the agreement of sale. This has reference to the visit made to the shop by Ruble with Graves to look over the automobile. There is some question whether this meeting occurred before or after the agreement was made. There is no finding on this point. The car was first shown to respondent on August 20th, the same day it was sent to have the seat covers put on. There is testimony that $50 was paid by respondent at that time, her daughter saying that it was on account of the seat covers. The purpose for which the $50 was made would not alter the situation, for the reason that the seat covers were included in the purchase price of $1,835. Graves testified:

> "I don't remember the details, whether there was a $50 deposit and the balance of $500 was paid at the signing of the contract or not; anyway the deposit and payment were made; * * * the expert that examined the car for Mrs. Mooney came after she had made a deposit [italics ours]; * * * before Mrs. Mooney signed up the contract she had the seat covers put on."

Ruble says that when he asked Graves whether respondent had bought the car, the latter answered, "Yes; a substantial payment had been made." The indorsement on the agreement indicates that $500 was paid on August 24th, the day the car was returned. If two payments were made, it is not likely they were made at the same time, and it is fairly clear the court reached the conclusion there were two payments; the first being made on August 20th.

We shall, however, consider the point on its merits. Appellant cites the following from section 892, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, as to the effect of an independent investigation:

> "(1) When before entering into a contract or other transaction he actually resorts to the proper means of ascertaining the truth and verifying the statement.
> "(2) When, having the opportunity of making such an examination, he is charged with the knowledge which he necessarily would have obtained if he had prosecuted it with diligence.
> "(3) When the representation is concerning generalities equally within the knowledge or the means of acquiring knowledge possessed by both parties."

Referring to the first two paragraphs the author says:

> "They are the ones which present by far the greatest practical difficulties in the administration of justice. If, after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled by it." (Italics ours.)

This text is quoted approvingly in Farnsworth v. Duffner, 142 U. S. 43, 12 Sup. Ct. 164, 35 L. Ed. 931.

The view of the court probably was that respondent asked Ruble to see the car in order to ascertain whether, as he put it, "she had made a good buy or not." It does not seem likely the court believed Ruble looked the car over for the purpose of enabling respondent to decide whether she would enter into the agreement; the italicized word "had" in his testimony suggesting that he thought the agreement was then in force. His judgment was plainly adverse; for he estimated that the car had run at least 5,000 miles, and in his report to respondent he told her she was paying too much for the car. This is the only criticism he made to her. The court made no specific finding on this evidence, but in the state of the record the finding that respondent relied solely on Graves' representations is fully sustained. Taking this view of the evidence, it will not be necessary to consider the cases cited by appellant on this point.

[8] III. Appellant claims that respondent failed to present any evidence under the issue of restoration raised by his general denial. This is not true. The witness Wellens testified that he saw the car in Hollywood on September 16th, and "it was practically in the same condition as when I first saw it." September 16th was the day the machine was finally returned to appellant.

[9] IV. Under this head appellant's claims are twofold: that the representations as to mileage and the value of the extra equipment were mere statements of opinion, and that the defects claimed were not material. The second proposition is sufficiently answered by what we have already said touching the general condition of the car. We cannot say from the evidence that the trial court did not conclude that every defect shown was material. Respondent was induced to buy a new car that was represented to have run 918 miles, which mileage, it was claimed, only improved its condition. As to the first proposition, it is idle to assert that the representations made by Graves were mere opinions and not statements of fact. From the tenor of his testimony respondent was justified in assuming that he was speaking from personal knowledge of the car's condition, or that he desired respondent to believe that he was. His statement to Ruble that "the car had been in our shop and gone all over," coupled with his knowledge of and experience with automobiles, put him in a position to speak advisedly as to the car, and to impress respondent with his statements concerning it. Moreover, appellant, by profession a mechanical engineer, testified that he was familiar with the car; that when he bought it he made a careful examination of it, and that the machine was in A-1 condition.

JUDD v. WEBSTER. (Civ. 3645.)

1. Trial 🔑260(1) — Refusal of instructions covered by those given is not error.

The refusal of instructions covered by those given is not error.

2. Highways 🔑175(2)—Cyclist entitled to the right of way must nevertheless use ordinary care.

Though plaintiff, a cyclist, on turning to the left into an intersecting road, was entitled to the right of way over a motor vehicle approaching in his direction, and could rely on the assumption that the motorist would yield the right of way, the assumption will not excuse him from exercising care which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under the circumstances, for the rights of travelers are reciprocal, and all are bound to use reasonable care to look and listen to avoid collisions with others exercising the common privilege.

3. Highways 🔑175(2)—Traveler should look and listen for vehicles though he has right of way.

Where plaintiff, who, when some distance from an intersecting road, noticed motorcars approaching from his left, turned into the road, he was bound in the exercise of ordinary care to look for cars to the left, notwithstanding he had the right of way over them and was bound to look out for traffic on his own right.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Instruction unsupported by evidence harmless.

Where plaintiff's instruction that it was the duty of defendant to travel on the right-hand side of the road at a street intersection was qualified by an addition provided that there was no obstruction, the addition was harmless, as it was a conceded fact that there was no obstruction.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1067—Refusal of a requested instruction as to defendant's negligence in operating motor vehicle harmless.

Where plaintiff did not apparently rely on the averments of his complaint that defendant was unskillful in the operation of his automobile, and the only evidence on that score was brought out by defendant to the effect that, though suffering from a physical disability, he was a competent and qualified driver, the refusal of a requested instruction that, if the accident occurred by reason of the unskillfulness of defendant, whether due to inexperience or physical disability, etc., was not harmful.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Hugh W. Judd against Alex. Webster. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and Rea, Cassin & Caldwell, of San Jose, for appellant.

Webster & Lyon, of Paso Robles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff in a collision with an automobile owned and driven by the defendant.

The questions to be determined relate to the refusal of the trial court to give certain requested instructions to the jury.

A brief outline of the facts of the case will be of advantage in arriving at that determination. The collision occurred on July 30, 1918, at the intersection of two public highways in the county of Monterey, namely, the San Juan road and the Castroville road, the former running east and west and the latter north and south. The plaintiff was mounted on a bicycle and was proceeding along the Castroville road in a northerly direction, pursuing his course on the easterly or right-hand side thereof. He reached the San Juan road and crossed to its northerly side, turning his bicycle gradually to the west. At the same time the defendant, driving an automobile along the San Juan road, approached from the west the intersection of the two highways. The automobile and bicycle came into collision at some point in said intersection north of the medial line of San Juan road and near the medial line of its intersecting thoroughfare.

The complaint alleged that the defendant was driving his automobile at a high rate of speed and on the wrong side of the road; that he did not yield the right of way to plaintiff; that he failed to look for or to see traffic approaching from his right; and that by reason of his inexperience as a driver and of a physical infirmity he was unskilled in the operation of his car, which matters the plaintiff alleges to be the proximate cause of the collision in question. The defendant denied these allegations and in his turn charged the plaintiff with contributory negligence in that he proceeded to cross the San Juan road without first ascertaining the condition of traffic thereon and without looking where he was going, and from the time he started to cross said road until a moment before the collision the plaintiff was looking to his right.

Our examination of the record discloses that there was no evidence that at the moment of or just before the collision the defendant was traveling at an unlawful rate of speed, or in fact, faster than about 10 or 15 miles an hour; nor is there any satisfactory evidence that he was traveling on the wrong side of the road. It is admitted, however, that the impact occurred on the northerly side of the San Juan road; but defendant's claim in this regard is that he turned to that part of the road from its southerly side, upon which he was traveling, in an attempt to avoid the collision. As to the alleged unskillfulness of the defendant in the operation of his car, it appears that he had been driving an automobile for about four months, covering in that period about 3,000 miles. It also appeared that, while he was lame and could not use his right leg for the manipulation of the footbrake of his car, he had had a lever attached to said brake by means of which he experienced no difficulty in its prompt and effectual use.

[1, 2] The plaintiff relies chiefly for a reversal of the judgment in favor of the defendant upon the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as follows:

> "The plaintiff, Judd, at the time he entered into the San Juan road from the Castroville road was not bound to assume that the defendant would abandon any reasonable precaution or violate any obligation imposed upon him by the laws of the land. The plaintiff was authorized in this case to assume that the defendant and all other persons using the road would do so with ordinary care, and would observe the rules of the road as established by law. In other words, the plaintiff, Judd, when entering upon the San Juan road, was entitled to assume that the defendant, Webster, would comply with the requirements of the Motor Vehicle Act that he travel on the right-hand side of the San Juan road and yield the right of way to a vehicle approaching from the right."

This instruction, while laying down a correct proposition of law generally, would, we think, under the circumstances of this case, have had a tendency to mislead the jury. The testimony on the part of both plaintiff and defendant showed that the plaintiff entered the intersection where the collision occurred without looking to his left, confining his attention to the right, until a moment just before the accident when too late to do anything himself to avoid it. During the trial it was contended by the appellant that the law cast no obligation upon him to look to the left, and that he might cross an intersecting road or street consciously oblivious to what might be happening on his left. The court construed this proffered instruction of the plaintiff as drawn upon that theory; and hence liable to mislead the jury. But, in refusing to give this instruction as requested, it did instruct the jury upon this phase of the case. It advised them substantially that, while the plaintiff had a right at the time he approached the intersection in question to assume that the defendant would obey the law and yield to him the right of way, still this assumption would not excuse the plaintiff from exercising at the same time the care which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under the particular circumstances; in other words, that the right to assume that a fellow user of a public highway would obey the law was not absolute, and to be indulged in regardless of all other considerations. The instruction given by the court upon this phase of the case sufficiently advised the jury of the plaintiff's rights; and he is therefore in no position to complain of the court's refusal to instruct the jury in the language proposed by him. In the case of Scott v. San Bernardino V. T. Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677, it is said:

> "It is the law that one walking or driving in a public street is bound to use reasonable care to look and listen as he goes, so as to be able to avoid collisions with others exercising the common privilege of using the street. This duty is not confined to persons driving or about to drive upon a street car track. * * * The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty toward others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time."

[4] Plaintiff also complains of the court's modification of his proposed instruction No. 9. The pertinent part of the requested instruction is as follows:

> "In driving easterly on the San Juan road it was the duty of the defendant to travel on the right-hand side of that road while crossing the intersection of the Castroville road. If he failed so to do, that fact in itself constituted negligence, and no further proof of negligence is necessary."

To this instruction the court added:

> "Provided there was no obstruction or other sufficient cause closing to travel the right-hand side."

We think this modification did not add to the burden of plaintiff in establshing a prima facie case. It is true that, if there had been an obstruction on the road, the modification introduced by the court would have been more apposite; but, as it is a conceded fact that there was no obstruction on San Juan road, we are at a loss to understand how it can be reasonably contended that the instruction as given was prejudicial to the plaintiff.

[5] The only other point raised is as to the refusal of the court to give plaintiff's proposed instruction No. 14. The text of the instruction as it appears in the record is not clear, doubtless due to errors in transcribing; but it in effect states that, if the jury believed from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by the unskillfulness of the defendant in the operation of his car, whether such unskillfulness was due to inexperience in driving or to his physical condition, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict in his favor at the hands of the jury.

The plaintiff does not appear to have relied much upon his allegation of unskillfulness on the part of the defendant in the operation of his automobile; the only evidence upon that issue having been brought out by the defendant when being cross-examined by his counsel over the objection of the plaintiff. Such evidence was to the effect, as before stated, that the defendant had driven his car for four months, covering in that time about 3,000 miles, and that while he could not operate the foot brake in the usual manner, he could and did operate it by hand, having provided a suitable attachment to the braking mechanism which permitted its effectual operation in that manner. Under these circumstances, and under the general instructions as to what constitutes ordinary care and negligence, we cannot say that the refusal to give the proposed instruction was prejudicial error.

We are of opinion, after a careful examination of the court's instructions as a whole, that they were full, fair, and impartial.

The judgment is affirmed.

BIRCH et al. v. ORANGE COUNTY.

(Civ. 3626.)

Venue 🔑49(2) — Fact that the judge was counsel in litigation against principal plaintiff held not to show prejudice.

The fact that the judge was counsel in litigation by minority stockholders of a corporation against one of the plaintiffs, then a majority stockholder, who had acquired an option on their shares, in which it was asserted that plaintiff was guilty of fraud, will not in subsequent litigation show a prejudice against plaintiff on the part of the judge, who had since been elevated to the bench, and warrant change of venue of an action against the county to recover taxes paid on lands which had been the property of the corporation; it not appearing that in the prior litigation the judge entertained any actual prejudice, or any wise exceeded the duties of an attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by A. Otis Birch and others, copartners doing business under the firm names and style of the Birch Oil Company, against the County of Orange. From an order of the superior court denying a motion for change of venue, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. A. West, Dist. Atty., of Santa Ana, W. F. Menton, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Santa Ana, and Alex P. Nelson, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order made by Hon. R. Y. Williams, judge of the superior court of the county of Orange, denying the application of plaintiffs for a change of the place of trial of said action from the superior court of said Orange county to the superior court of the county of Los Angeles.

The application was made on the ground that said judge, before whom the said cause was pending and set for trial, being the same judge who heard and denied said motion, was disqualified to sit or act by reason of the prejudice or bias that he held against plaintiffs, particularly plaintiff A. Otis Birch, and that plaintiffs could not therefore have a fair and impartial trial by reason of said bias. Section 170, Code Civ. Proc.

It was the stipulation of counsel that if Hon. R. Y. Williams should be proven to be disqualified, then there would have been no judge of said county qualified to sit, inasmuch as the only other judge for said county had deemed himself disqualified.

The main action out of which this proceeding springs was brought by A. Otis Birch and his copartners against the county of Orange to recover from said county the sum of $9,222.85, paid to said county by plaintiffs under protest on account of taxes assessed against said copartnership's oil lands for the year 1917. Said property, consisting of 20.16 acres, was assessed on a valuation basis of $408,975, and plaintiffs seek to have declared void all of said amount in excess of a valuation of $30,240.

The action was commenced on June 3, 1918. On December 28, 1918, defendant answered. The cause had been set for trial for May 5, 1919. On April 30, 1919, five days prior to trial day, plaintiffs filed a notice of their motion for a change of the place of trial, urging as a reason therefor the ground heretofore stated.

In support of said motion A. Otis Birch, manager of said copartnership, filed an affidavit, setting out at great length and in minute detail the history of previous litigation in which he was an active litigant and the opposing interests were represented by Hon. R. Y. Williams, then a practicing attorney and a member of the firm of Williams & Rutan, Hon. Oscar A. Trippet (now United States District Judge for the Southern District of California), H. C. Head, Esq., and Clyde Bishop, Esq.

The main facts to be gathered from the affidavit of A. Otis Birch by which the prejudice and bias of the trial judge are attempted to be demonstrated are substantially as follows:

Prior to 1911 said oil lands were owned by the Menges Oil Company, a corporation. A majority of the capital stock of said corporation was owned by plaintiffs, of whom A. Otis Birch was the active and dominant head. A group of other persons, 13 in number, who may be denominated minority stock owners, held the balance of said capital stock. Early in 1911, A. Otis Birch secured options to purchase on all the stock of said corporation, and later exercised said option and became the owner thereof. Prior to this acquisition the corporation had drilled and completed four oil wells. A fifth well, known as Well No. 5, had been in the process of drilling and development for a period of two years before said A. Otis Birch had secured said option on the stock held by the minority stock owners. Subsequent to securing said option and before he exercised it Well No. 5 began to produce oil and gas in almost fabulous quantities. It is the averment of A. Otis Birch that for several years after its completion it continued to produce in large quantities, and "had the reputation of being the most profitable well in Orange county or elsewhere in the state of California."

The 13 minority stockholders who had contracted their stock for sale under said option, upon subsequently learning of the extraordinary productiveness of said Well No. 5, and within three years thereafter, commenced separate actions to recover damages in the sum of $1,500,000 from said A. Otis Birch on the grounds that he had fraudulently suppressed and withheld from them important facts and information existent within his knowledge at the time he was negotiating said option concerning the wealth of said Well No. 5 in oil and gas and by false representations and by the employment of methods deceitful induced each of said minority stockholders to dispose of their stock to him at the paltry sum of $2 per share, when, in fact, said stock was of a value of at least $50 per share.

Prior to the commencement of said actions, 13 in number, against said Birch, some of said former minority stockholders had employed H. C. Head, Esq.; some had employed Hon. Oscar A. Trippet; some had employed Clyde Bishop, Esq.; and others had employed Hon. R. Y. Williams. As the several causes of action must necessarily have been similar in many if not all respects, it was agreed by said attorneys that all would join in signing the several complaints and become associated in the prosecution of said actions.

The complaints were filed in April, 1914. In January, 1915, an order was made sustaining the demurrer to a second amended complaint without leave to amend. The litigation was finally disposed of by decision of the Supreme Court affirming the order of the lower court sustaining said demurrer. Thomas v. Birch, 178 Cal. 483, 173 Pac. 1102.

The affidavit of said A. Otis Birch is the only one offered by plaintiffs herein. It is based almost wholly upon the allegations found in the several complaints charging fraud and deceit. It surely does not go beyond the issues or outside of the proceedings had in said trial and Supreme Courts. There is no single act shown to have been committed, or declaration, statement, or expression shown to have been made by said Hon. R. Y. Williams before, during, or since the litigation ceased that has the slightest tendency to show hostility or even unfriendliness on his part for the said A. Otis Birch. The allegations of said pleadings, which form the basis and main support of the only affidavit made in behalf of the moving parties, are but the usual and necessary allegations employed in framing a pleading in which fraud is the principal issue. In fact, the allegations are as temperate and the language employed to state fraud is as well chosen as would fittingly become any member of the bar whose broad sense of universal justice and high regard for legal ethics may not be easily prostituted to personal advantage or at all sacrificed to consuming malice.

We have searched the record with some degree of pains and with a view of uncovering some hidden or veiled evidence of personal hostility exhibited in some form or in some manner by the said Hon. R. Y. Williams and his associates, but have failed in the search. It is not to be found in the record.

Bitter complaint is made because certain of the complaints, verified by certain litigants in said former actions, charged A. Otis Birch with a refusal to give certain requested information concerning the development of said oil well to said plaintiffs, and that he made certain false, equivocal, and misleading statements to them. Several of such instances, rendered unimportant, however, so far as the issue before this court is concerned because of the direct allegations made in the complaint, were developed upon the taking of a number of depositions at the instance of A. Otis Birch in the said suits. The truth of the matter is, according to the affidavits made by Hon. R. Y. Williams and attorney Clyde Bishop, the original complaints were dictated and prepared in the law office of said Clyde Bishop by him. The causes of actions being practically identical, the complaints were prepared in blanket form. Certain matters alleged as existing within the knowledge of certain deponents proved upon the taking of said depositions to be incorrect. In other words, matters within the knowledge of one or more did not in each instance prove to be within the knowledge of all. More care might have been exercised in this respect, but in the stress of the practice of the law such a circumstance furnishes a very weak support to sustain specific charges of prejudice and bias. As soon as the inaccuracies were discovered the complaints were immediately amended to correspond with the knowledge of each particular litigant. Other grounds urged in support of plaintiffs' motion are:

That said R. Y. Williams personally verified one of the second amended complaints; that he was through a "mass" of litigation extending over a period of five years; that seven of the complaints were verified by him as a notary public; that he and other attorneys were employed on a contingency fee basis; that meetings of counsel and clients were held at the law offices of Williams & Rutan to hear preliminary reports and make necessary investigations; that said Hon. R. Y. Williams was a leading attorney in the cause; that certain stationery upon which pleadings were prepared bore his name; that he gave to the plaintiffs in the corporation suits their first information constituting grounds of the action.

The foregoing acts upon which bias and prejudice are predicated are but the ordinary incidents to the preparation of an action for trial. There is not one among the enumerated acts urged for disqualification that should have had a tendency to produce prejudice in a well-balanced mind. The accused did all that every attorney should do to protect his clients' interests and nothing more. An attorney should be active, diligent, zealous to a reasonable degree, and generally useful to those who employ him. Said affidavit nowhere contains an averment that the allegations of the complaints filed in the former cases were wantonly or maliciously or even falsely made, or that they were not reasonably justified by existing facts.

By no process of reasoning may legal bias be presumed from the facts as presented by the record. It would be contrary to the rules of inferences and abhorrent to the laws of human conduct to conclude upon the showing made that any or all of the attorneys connected with the case became so obsessed by implacable hatred for plaintiff A. Otis Birch as to compass his financial undoing.

Almost a year had intervened from the day the Supreme Court decision ended all litigation and the trial day of said action. Four years had passed since all activity had ceased in the superior court of Orange county. The causes had long awaited a hearing. Said causes were never before any court except on the presentation of questions of law, and while in numbers there were many, in substance there was but one action, and a decision of one was decisive of all. Certain excerpts, taken from the brief of plaintiffs filed in the Supreme Court upon appeal, have been severely criticized, but said excerpts contain but the very familiar language usually employed in the presentation of questions of fraud. The counter affidavits aver that the Hon. R. Y. Williams was not the author of the language complained of, and that the criticized portions of the argument were written by one of his associates.

The issues raised by the pleadings in the respective causes have no point of similarity. Here no question of fraud is involved. Plaintiff seeks by this action to recover the sum of $9,222.85 from the county of Orange on account of taxes paid to it under protest. The proceeding was doubtless brought under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code. The fact that one of the plaintiffs, A. Otis Birch, who was a stockholder in the litigant corporation in the former action, is also a member of the litigant copartnership in the present action, and that the land about which controversy was formerly waged is the same land upon which the disputed taxes were levied by the county assessor of Orange county neither shows similarity of situation nor similarity of interests so far as the question may relate to or affect the question of the disqualification of the trial judge.

Notwithstanding the apparent insufficiency of the affidavit offered to sustain a demand for a change of the place of trial, Hon. R. Y. Williams, H. C. Head, Esq., and Clyde Bishop, Esq., filed counter affidavits, rebutting many of the averments of said A. Otis Birch. Nothing material is left untraversed. Said Hon. R. Y. Williams avers that he was not the leading counsel in said former actions but that Hon. Oscar A. Trippet was the counsel to whom all others deferred; that he did not prepare the original complaints in said action, but is informed and believes that the same were prepared by Clyde Bishop, Esq.; that the allegations of the original complaints were made and based upon statements of fact made to said Clyde Bishop by the plaintiffs and by persons who would be witnesses; that he did not personally interview more than two witnesses as to what said witnesses would testify relative to the issues; that upon information received by him he wrote but one letter of inquiry to one person to obtain knowledge and information concerning the drilling of Well No. 5. He denies unusual or unwarranted activity on the part of himself or others. He further avers that he believed that plaintiffs had sufficient cause to justify them to institute said action, and that he represented his clients only in conformity to the duty that an attorney owes to his clients, and that he is not now, nor has he ever been, hostile to or prejudiced or biased against said A. Otis Birch or any member of his family or any of the plaintiffs. He further avers that he does not know any of said plaintiffs except said A. Otis Birch; that he can and will give said Birch and all the plaintiffs a fair and impartial trial on the issues, and will weigh the evidence of each by the same rules of evidence fixed by law to be applied to the testimony of any other witness in said action.

Other counter affidavits corroborative of the foregoing were filed, and were sufficient to meet all the averments of a contrary character.

No authorities need be cited in support of the suggestions repeatedly made by plaintiffs that it is the duty of judges to remove even from the minds of the disappointed, if reasonably possible, all imputations of unfairness and partiality. The confidence and respect that the people of a democracy hold for the fairness and impartiality of its judiciary are the most hopeful tokens of national existence. The books are full of helpful admonitions and the judiciary is mindful of them. But, on the other hand, a judge is not to be driven from the performance of judicial duty by vehement and menacing cries of "prejudice and bias" when none in fact exists.

No doubt the moving parties have fully persuaded themselves of the truth of the charges they have made. But because a person may reason himself into a false notion affords no justification for the triumph of wrong over right to the end that he may be relieved from the embarrassment of his folly.

The trial judge has not been shown to be legally disqualified. The propriety of hearing said cause or withdrawing from the trial is a matter for his determination. Whichever way conscience may direct him is beyond the control of this court.

SIME et al. v. HUNTER. (Civ. 3491.)

1. Executors and administrators 🔑429—Suit on claim not yet due may be maintained when rejected by representatives.

When claim not yet due, such as a promissory note, has been rejected by the representatives of the estate of a decedent without cause, the court may, on a showing of necessity therefor, entertain a suit in equity to establish the claim and sequester sufficient funds of the estate to meet the payment when it becomes due, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1648.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑481 — Claim, allowed and paid without affidavit, allowable on final settlement.

Claims, paid by the representative of a decedent without the affidavit attached required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1494, must be allowed by the court in the settlement of the case, if shown to be justly due and paid in good faith.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑227(1) — All members of partnership filing claim need not make affidavit.

All members of a copartnership or association of persons filing a claim against an estate of a deceased person need not make the affidavit required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1494, since under Civ. Code, § 2429, a partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner, including the power to collect for the partnership interest a partnership debt, and one or more partners may make the affidavit in behalf of all of them.

4. Evidence 🔑71 — Administratrix presumed to have received mailed claim.

Where mailing of letter to administratrix containing a claim against estate was admitted by administratrix in her answer, it must be presumed that she received it in the regular course, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 24.

5. Executors and administrators 🔑429 — In suit in equity, it is immaterial on which of several claims filed action is brought.

In a suit in equity to establish the rights of holders of notes as against the estate of a decedent, plaintiffs were not required to rely upon any particular claim which they filed, having filed several which were rejected; such a suit not being an action upon any particular claim.

6. Executors and administrators 🔑227(1) — Claim against estate need not be in name of individual members of a partnership.

The form of a claim against the estate of a deceased person is not required to meet the rigid rules of pleading applied to a complaint, and may be made in the name of a partnership, instead of in the name of the individual members thereof.

7. Affidavits 🔑9—Test of sufficiency is that it would sustain perjury charge.

A test of sufficiency of an affidavit is whether it is so clear and certain that an indictment for perjury may be sustained on it if false.

8. Partnership 🔑64—A suit maintainable on a contract made under fictitious name prior to compliance with statute.

Where partnership complied with Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, it could sue on a prior contract or transaction had under the fictitious name; compliance with such provisions of the Code being sufficient if prior to trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by A. Sime and others against Mary A. Hunter, as administratrix. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace M. Pence, of San Miguel, for appellant.

Hugh R. Osburn, of King City, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs commenced this action in equity against the defendant as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband to procure a judgment establishing their claim against said estate, based upon two promissory notes not then due, and to impound and sequester sufficient funds of said estate in order that said claim might be paid in due course of administration when due. The amended complaint alleged that two promissory notes in the sum of $600 each, with interest, were executed and delivered by deceased and his minor son, who disaffirmed his liability thereon; that one of said notes was payable on July 1, 1919, and the other on July 1, 1920; that both were made payable to Norm W. Thompson, or order, and were sold, assigned, indorsed and delivered to plaintiffs; that a contingent claim based upon said notes was presented to defendant as such administratrix within due time, and that the same was rejected by her; that the said administratrix was proceeding to defeat said claim when due by dissipating the property of the estate so far as was within her power by having set aside to her as exempt from execution all the farming implements and personal property, which was greatly in excess of $1,000 in value, by obtaining a family allowance of $100 a month, which was unnecessary, by selling other personal property belonging to the estate and failing to account therefor or to pay claims against the estate with the proceeds, and by continuing the farming operations upon the estate for a period of two years without accounting to the court, and in such negligent manner as to dissipate the entire estate; that claims against said estate aggregating $22,000 had been approved, but that none of such claims had been paid; also that claims aggregating $5,200 had been presented against said estate and rejected. As to the presentation of plaintiff's claim, it was alleged that within the time allowed by law, and pursuant to notice to creditors, the plaintiffs presented their claim based upon said promissory notes, and attached thereto a full, true, and correct copy of said notes, together with all indorsements thereon; that said claim was rejected by defendant as not in proper form; that thereafter and within due time another claim on said promissory notes, setting forth all particulars thereof, and containing a full, true, and correct copy of said notes and all indorsements thereon, was presented to defendant by mail, but that she claimed she had not received it; that thereafter and within due time the plaintiffs again presented their claim based upon the same notes, with a full, true, and correct copy of the notes attached and a statement of the indorsements thereon; that said claim was also rejected by defendant. It was then alleged that plaintiffs were a copartnership or association of persons doing business under the firm name and style of Laton Percheron Horse Association, and that they were desirous of proving their claim so that they could compel the defendant to make some provision for securing it and have standing in the probate court as a creditor of said estate for the purpose of protecting their interests.

All the material allegations of the amended complaint upon which the plaintiffs' prayer for equitable relief was based were admitted by the answer. The defendant did, however, deny the allegations of the partnership relation of plaintiffs, and by way of abatement set up that the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code had not been complied with. By way of special defense the defendant alleged that the claim presented by plaintiffs did not contain a copy of the indorsements upon said promissory notes or a statement thereof, and also that said claim was not supported by the affidavit of the claimants, or either of them, or by the affidavit of some other person in their behalf.

The trial court found that the plaintiffs had entered into an agreement of partnership or association; that they had not complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code at the time of their association, but that they had done so prior to the commencement of this action; that within due time they presented their claim to the defendant as administratrix of said estate, duly and regularly verified by one of said claimants for said association, and that said claim set forth all the particulars required, including full, true, and correct copies of the promissory notes and a full and complete statement of the indorsements thereon; that each of said notes had upon the back thereof the words "Without Recourse. Norm W. Thompson"—and that said words were not stated to have been indorsed thereon in the last claim presented, but said claim did contain a statement of the sale and assignment of said notes by the payee thereof to plaintiffs, and also a statement of the payments of interest which had been made by decedent. The court also found that prior to the time of presenting the claim last mentioned plaintiffs had furnished defendant with a full, true, and correct copy of each of said promissory notes showing all the indorsements thereon, together with the payments of interest made, and that defendant had these copies of the notes and the indorsements in her possession at the time of the presentation of the last claim. Judgment followed on these findings in favor of plaintiffs, establishing their claim as a good and valid claim against the estate payable in due course of administration.

Defendant has appealed from this judgment, assigning various technical grounds of attack, those requiring consideration being enumerated as follows: (1) Can an action be brought in any instance in our state upon a claim against an estate upon a promissory note not yet due? (2) Can a claim against an estate made by two or three persons be supported by the affidavit of one of the claimants without stating why it is not made by all? (3) Can a claim against an estate on a promissory note omit a statement of the indorsements, especially of the name of the payee on the note? (4) Was the failure of plaintiffs to comply with sections 2466 and 2468, Civil Code, within six months after they entered into the partnership fatal to their maintenance of this cause of action?

[1] 1. Section 1498, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that when a claim is rejected the holder must bring suit within three months after the service of notice of rejection, if due, or within two months after it becomes due, otherwise the claim shall be forever barred. By a long line of decisions interpreting this section of the Code it has been held that, though it is perfectly proper to present a contingent claim before it becomes due, an action thereon may not be maintained until after the claim becomes due. However, in the case of Miller v. Miller, 171 Cal. 269, 152 Pac. 728, it is clearly intimated that, in a suit in equity setting forth the condition of the estate, the ability of the personal representatives to provide for future payments, and the necessity of creating a fund to meet the demands of the claimant, the court may, in accordance with section 1648, Code of Civil Procedure, create a fund to meet the demand if the claim is established as one absolute excepting only as to time of payment. The case presented upon this appeal is such a case. The allegations relating to the condition of the estate and the actions of the administratrix, all of which show the necessity of creating a fund to meet the payments of the claim when due, are all admitted in the answer. It may be that the judgment should have expressly provided for the creation of such a fund rather than the payment of the claim in due course of administration, but this point is not raised on this appeal, and as from the record it clearly appears that both notes have long since become due, no prejudice has resulted to appellant from the form of the judgment. It would seem, therefore, that the answer to appellant's first query is that, when a claim not yet due has been rejected by the representatives of the estate without cause, the court may, upon a showing of necessity therefor, entertain a suit in equity to establish the claim and sequester sufficient funds of the estate to meet the payment when it becomes due.

[2, 3] 2. Section 1494, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that every claim which is due when presented must be supported by the affidavit of the claimant, or some one in his behalf, to the effect that the amount is justly due. But "if the claim be not due when filed or presented, or be contingent, the particulars of such claim must be stated." From the wording of the section it would appear that the affidavit is essential only in the case of a claim which is due. In any event, it is a matter which may be waived, and claims paid without the affidavit attached must be allowed by the court in the settlement of the case if shown to be justly due and paid in good faith. Assuming that the section requires the affidavit in the case of a claim which is not due, it is absurd to say that all members of a copartnership or association of persons must make the affidavit. Under section 2429 of the Civil Code a partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner. That this authority includes the power to collect for the partnership interest a partnership debt cannot be doubted. It is sufficient, therefore, when an affidavit is required to be attached to a claim against an estate, that such affidavit be made by one of two or more partners on behalf of himself and those associated with him.

[4-7] 3. Section 1497, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, if a claim be founded on a note or other instrument, the original need not be filed or presented "but a copy of such instrument with all indorsements must be attached to the statement of the claim and filed therewith." Technically, under the provisions of this section a claim based upon a promissory note, not accompanied by the original, should contain a copy of the instrument with all indorsements. The first claim which was presented to the administratrix on behalf of the Laton Percheron Horse Association fully complied with the demands of this section. This claim was rejected on August 6, 1918. Thereafter another claim, also meeting these requirements, was sent to the administratrix by mail. This was admitted in the answer. The mailing of the letter having been admitted, the administratrix is presumed to have received it in the regular course. Section 1963, subd. 24, Code Civ. Proc. No evidence was offered to overcome this presumption, and the court found that prior to the time of presenting the last claim plaintiffs "furnished defendant with a full, true, and correct copy of each of said promissory notes, showing the indorsement of the above-mentioned words and payments thereon, which defendant had in her possession at the time of the presentment of said claim, and which she retained for a long time thereafter." This finding is not attacked. The situation is therefore that the administratrix had in her possession true copies of both notes with all indorsements thereon attached to a claim which was filed in due time and which was rejected without cause on August 6, 1918, and prior to the presentation of the claim, which was rejected on December 13, 1918. It is said in argument that the first claim filed was rejected because not in due form, but wherein it failed to comply with the statute has not been pointed out. Inasmuch as this is not an action upon a claim, but a suit in equity to establish the rights of respondents as evidenced by the promissory notes, they are not required to rely upon any particular claim which was filed. If the objection to the first claim be upon the ground that it was made in the name of the partnership and not in the name of all the individual members thereof, the objection is not well taken. The form of a claim against an estate is not required to meet the rigid rules of pleading applied to a complaint. Thompson v. Koeller, 191 Pac. 927; Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 196, 135 Pac. 496; Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 705, 174 Pac. 305; Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 689, 126 Pac. 978. Accepting the rule of this state to be as outlined in the foregoing decisions that the purpose of presenting a claim to an estate is to so advise the executor and the court of its nature that they may act advisedly upon it, the claim first presented in this case meets these requirements. The copies of the notes which were attached showed that they were indorsed by the payee without recourse, and they were therefore accordingly payable to bearer. They showed upon their face that they were not yet due. The affidavit, if one was required by section 1494, Code of Civil Procedure, was made by the secretary of the association, and fully complied with the statute. "A test of the sufficiency of an affidavit is whether it is so clear and certain that an indictment for perjury may be sustained on it if false." Gee Chong Pong v. Harris, 38 Cal. App. 214, 175 Pac. 806. In the same case the following language from 2 Corpus Juris 325, was quoted with approval:

> "An affidavit on behalf of a partnership, therefore, should be sworn to by one of the partners, and where it appears in the body of the affidavit that it was sworn to by one of the partners it is sufficient, although signed with the firm name."

If the administratrix had any doubt as to the ownership of the notes or the effect of the indorsements thereon, she had the right under section 1494, Code of Civil Procedure, to require additional vouchers or proofs to be produced in support of the claim.

[8] 4. The trial court found that prior to the commencement of the action plaintiffs complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. Assuming for the purpose of appellant's argument that this action is one based upon a contract or transaction had under the fictitious name, it is well settled that compliance with these provisions of the Civil Code prior to trial is sufficient. Henning v. Clark, 189 Pac. 714; Ward Land Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 747, 752, 82 Pac. 426; Roullard v. Gray, 38 Cal. App. 79, 81, 175 Pac. 479; Rudneck v. Southern Cal. M. & R. Co., 193 Pac. 775.

Other points raised by appellant are all of the same technical character as those heretofore discussed. The obligation of the estate upon the notes has never been denied. The dissipation of the assets of the estate is admitted, and the necessity of this action for equitable relief on the part of respondents is apparent from the record, which discloses a studied and vexatious effort on the part of appellant to avail herself of every technical advantage to escape payment of an admittedly valid obligation.

PEOPLE v. NEWSOME. (Cr. 540.)

1. Homicide ⟹250—Conviction of manslaughter supported by evidence.

Evidence on prosecution for killing by peace officer in the course of an arrest of deceased held to support a conviction of manslaughter.

2. Criminal law ⟹1159(2) — For appellate court to disturb conviction it must be without evidentiary support.

A conviction can be set aside on appeal as unsupported by evidence only when it can be said as a proposition of law that it is without the necessary evidentiary support.

3. Homicide ⟹105—To be justified in making arrest there must be real or apparent necessity.

While a peace officer when attempting an arrest may use all necessary force to effect it, or may take the life of the supposed offender if necessary to save his own, there must be a real or apparent necessity to justify resort to such measure for his own safety or protection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Edward T. Newsome was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Under an information charging him with the crime of murder, the defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter in the superior court in and for the county of Stanislaus, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The single ground upon which the defendant attempts to sustain his appeal is that the evidence does not support the verdict. It is only necessary briefly to repeat herein some of the testimony received at the trial to show that the point relied upon by the defendant is entirely without merit.

The homicide occured at the town of Newman, in Stanislaus county, in the early morning of November 26, 1919, and the name of the party slain was Felix Van Vleet. The defendant, Newsome, at the time of the homicide, was a night policeman in the town of Newman, a position he had held for several years.

On the evening of November 25, 1919, at the hour of 6:30, the witness A. Swanson, who was then employed as a truck driver for a concern in Newman known as the Globe Dairy Products Company, having previously arranged to go to the ranch of a Mr. Azavedo, near Newman, to get some turkeys for use on Thanksgiving day, started for said ranch in an automobile, accompanied by the deceased and two other persons, named, respectively, Hansen and Michaels, the last named a lad about 16 years of age. After Swanson and his companion arrived at said ranch and the former had made his wants known to Azavedo, the latter proceeded to catch or gather the number of turkeys desired by Swanson. While Azavedo was so engaged, Swanson and the deceased went into the tank house on the Azavedo premises, filled two jugs with wine, and placed them in the automobile or truck used by Swanson in going to the ranch. The required number of turkeys was caught and placed in the truck, and thereupon the party started on the return home. On arriving at Newman the machine was stopped near a soft drink saloon owned and conducted by one Kilburn, and Swanson, deceased, and Hansen went into said saloon, Michaels remaining on the outside near the machine. Swanson testified that his object in stopping at and going into the Kilburn place was to leave a turkey there for a friend of his, a railroad conductor by the name of Brown. On the way from the Azavedo ranch to Newman each of the said men named drank freely of wine from the jugs. At Kilburn's Swanson, Hansen, and Van Vleet had several drinks of cider. While in the saloon word came to them that the turkeys were escaping from the truck, and Hansen thereupon went out to recapture them. He was shortly followed by Swanson and the deceased. Swanson was then feeling the effects of the wine to some extent. Just as he was about to "crank" his machine, preparatory to starting for his home, some one of the party called attention to the fact that Newsome was approaching, and Swanson, in a voice sufficiently loud to be heard by Newsome, made a very offensive remark relative to the latter. Newsome thereupon stepped from the sidewalk, delivered a blow on Swanson's head with a policeman's "billy," and was about to take him to jail, when one Morena, a cousin of Swanson, interceded for the latter and persuaded the officer to allow Swanson to proceed on home. After Swanson and his friends arrived at the former's house, they discovered that the two jugs of wine were missing. It was thereupon agreed between them that they would return, find Newsome, Swanson would apologize for the offensive reference he had made to the officer, and then undertake to persuade the latter to return to them the wine. Swanson and the deceased went back to the street where last they saw the defendant, and upon seeing the latter, who was walking along the street at some distance from them, called him in a loud voice, saying that they desired to see him. Newsome (now quoting from the testimony of Swanson)—

> "didn't pay any attention to me and kept on walking and then Van Vleet called to him, and he walked out in the middle of the street and stopped, and he said he wanted to see him a minute; and while he stopped he says, 'What do you want?' and I says, 'Mr. Newsome,' I says, 'I came back to apologize to you for how I addressed you on the other side of the street about a half an hour or so ago;' and he says—I started to apologize to him about the trouble we had and the words I remarked about him, and I told him that I didn't want to have no trouble; and he says 'All right,' he says, 'that's all right,' he says, 'I don't want to have any trouble; would not be any trouble; it was all right;' so then I asked him if I might have that jug of wine that he had taken out of my truck for Thanksgiving dinner, and I told him I would like to get it. And he says, 'No,' he says, 'you can't have that,' he says, 'I have got it locked up,' he says, 'I want it for myself.' He says, 'You can't have it,' and Mr. Van Vleet says, 'Well,' he says, 'we are going home now; give us the wine, will you,' and just about that time why the way he said it why we kind of laughed at him and he pulled out his gun, and he struck at Mr. Van Vleet or struck at me, we were pretty close together, and I kind of ducked the blow, and he hit Mr. Van Vleet in the head and knocked him down."

Swanson, proceeding, said that the first blow delivered by the defendant on the head of the deceased knocked the latter to the ground, he falling on his knees towards defendant, and that while on the ground deceased grabbed the defendant by the left wrist; that defendant also went down on his knees; that defendant, while deceased was on his knees, beat him (deceased) on the head seven or eight times with his gun.

Continuing, Swanson testified:

> "I told Mr. Newsome, 'We didn't come up here for any trouble,' and I says, 'We don't want any trouble,' and he asked me to help him, and I says, 'All right,' and so I got hold of Mr. Van Vleet's arm and pulled it out from him, and started to raise him up, and when he asked me to help him he says, 'Let go,' and Van Vleet says, 'No,' he says, 'I won't let go,' and he says, 'If you don't let go,' he says, 'I will kill you,' and Van Vleet says, 'Go ahead and kill me if you want to,' and so I started to raise him up, and just as soon as I got him off his knees he began to shoot, and he shot three times. Q. Well, now, was there a handcuff exhibited there during the time? A. Yes; he put one handcuff on Van Vleet. Q. When did he do that? A. When he beat him over the head the first time and had him on his knees, you know, he beat him over the head and then he reached around and put one handcuff on him. Q. Which hand did he put that handcuff on? A. Well, he—I think it was his left hand—left wrist. Q. Did Van Vleet have the handcuff on when you—when you say you took hold of him to raise him up? A. Yes."

Swanson further testified that, when Newsome first struck deceased, the latter was standing with his hands in his pockets; that, when defendant fired the first shot, the deceased was in the act of getting up from the ground, to which he previously had been knocked by Newsome; that immediately following the first shot the other two were fired in rapid succession. The witness positively testified that he saw no club or other article in the hands of the deceased, and that he would probably have seen it if a club or other article had been in either hand of deceased. The witness continued to say that, while Van Vleet was lying on the sidewalk, Newsome ran up to him (witness) and said to the latter; "Give me that club," to which witness replied, "I have got no club;" that thereupon defendant reached down and picked up a club or had it in his hand; that at about that time one Hazelbecker appeared on the scene, and defendant turned to him and said, showing Hazelbecker the club he held in his hand: "You see that; you see that; that's evidence enough."

Hazelbecker, also an employee of the Globe Dairy Products Company and who at the time of the homicide was working on the "night shift," testified that while he was on his way home and when near the point where the shooting took place, he first heard and his attention was arrested by some loud talking, which was followed within a brief time by three gunshots, which succeeded each other without any appreciable space of time between them. The shooting having ceased, he started toward the part of the street where it occurred, when he saw the deceased, in a "fast staggering walk," going towards the sidewalk, reaching which he fell to the curbing. The witness corroborated Swanson as to the fact that a handcuff was on the left wrist of deceased, and testified, as did Swanson, that he saw no club or other article which might be regarded as a weapon in the possession of the deceased or until defendant called his attention to a "billy" under the hat of deceased in the street. The witness said that Swanson, after fruitlessly attempting to get Van Vleet to speak while the latter was lying on the sidewalk, addressed defendant, saying, "Damn it, Ed., you shot this man," and that defendant replied, "Well, I had to, the damn s—n of a b—tch."

Dr. Armistead, the physician who was called to attend Van Vleet while the latter was yet lying on the sidewalk, and who later conducted an autoptical examination of the deceased, testified that, in response to a telephone call from the defendant, he went to the scene of the shooting and found that Van Vleet had expired; his body lying in the position as described by the witness Swanson and Hazelbecker. The physician, upon examination, found a bruise on the side of the head and over the left ear, three incised cuts on the scalp, and a bruise on the chin, of the deceased. At the post mortem examination, the autopsy revealed three gunshot wounds in the body of the deceased, to wit, one which entered and passed through the chest, a necessarily fatal wound, one which entered and passed through the abdomen, cutting the intestines in five different places, and entering into and passing through the bladder, thence into the pelvic bone, in which the bullet was imbedded, and one in the wrist.

[1] It is not necessary to reproduce here more of the testimony received at the trial in support of the information than that of which the above is in substance a full statement; for it is clear that what has already been given sufficiently shows that the verdict, even if in fact it was not justified (a proposition which it is not for this court to attempt to solve) is nevertheless amply supported. In fact, it is idle to argue that the above testimony does not show at least a clear case of manslaughter, of which crime the defendant was convicted. Indeed, an examination of the evidence as it is presented before us would, in our opinion, justify the conviction in any fair and impartial mind that there was no valid reason or any real necessity for the slaying of Van Vleet by the defendant. It is true that the latter made the claim, and so testified at the trial, that he was only doing his duty as a peace officer when undertaking to subdue and arrest the deceased, that the latter struck at him with a club or "billy," and that he was in fear that Swanson would join the deceased in an assault upon him; the inference from that testimony being that the shooting became necessary for the protection or defense of himself against personal injury or perhaps the loss of his life. But even from the testimony of defendant, considered in its entirety, it is not clear that the taking of Van Vleet's life was necessary. The defendant appeared to have the better of the deceased at all times, having knocked him to the ground several times and succeeded in putting a handcuff on one of his wrists; and the defendant's testimony does not clearly show that Swanson at any time made any serious demonstration or movement indicating an intention or purpose to assist the deceased in resisting or assaulting the defendant. But, however this all may be, the testimony for the people certainly shows that the killing of Van Vleet was not at all necessary; that, indeed, there was even no apparent necessity for it. It further clearly shows that Newsome was bent upon killing the deceased, for he fired the three shots in rapid succession, if the testimony for the people speaks the truth. But it was, of course, for the jury to say from the whole evidence whether the killing of Van Vleet was or was not committed with malice, and their verdict evidences their conclusion that, while unlawful, the homicide was not the direct result of malice aforethought in the slayer.

[2] There is, as must be conceded, a sharp conflict in the evidence as to some of the important facts and circumstances attending the killing. It is also made to appear that Swanson and Hazelbecker, the principal witnesses for the people, added to their testimony at the trial a few facts and circumstances, more or less damaging to the accused, to which they did not testify at the coroner's inquest and the preliminary examination of the charge. They sought to excuse their omission to testify previously as fully as they testified at the trial by explaining that they were not at the inquest or at the preliminary hearing before the magistrate asked any specific questions as to the particular facts and circumstances which they added to their later stories of the homicide. But these were all considerations going to the weight of the evidence and entirely for the jury to solve. There is nothing in the fact of the conflict in the evidence, or in the fact that the witnesses named stated facts in giving their testimony at the trial relative to the homicide that they did not state in testimony previously given by them, which renders the evidence for the people or the testimony of said witnesses inherently improbable. This court can interfere and so set aside verdicts in criminal cases only when it can be justly declared, as a proposition of law, that the verdict is without the necessary evidentiary support. We cannot say that in this case. To the contrary, the conclusion to which we are forced by the careful examination we have given the evidence is that the verdict appears to be impregnably fortified, evidentially, if not, indeed, characterized by a much more liberal measure of leniency than was actually warranted.

[3] It may, in conclusion, be added that a peace officer, when attempting to arrest a person charged with a public crime, who has committed a public offense in the presence of the officer, or who the officer has probable cause for believing has committed a crime, may use all necessary force to effect the arrest, or may take the life of the purported offender if it becomes necessary to save or preserve his own, but there must be a real or apparent necessity to justify the resort by the officer to such an extreme measure for his own safety or protection. The testimony, especially that produced by the people, does not show that such a necessity, either real or apparent, arose in this case. However, for the reasons given, the judgment and the order appealed from should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

POTTS v. MEHRMANN et al. (Civ. 3522.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑206(2)—Plaintiff held "existing creditor" at time of conveyance.

Where life tenant and remainderman entered into agreement whereby life tenant was to paint and repair the property, and the remainderman was to insure and pay taxes on the property, held, that the remainderman was an existing creditor of the life tenant at the time of a conveyance by her of her property under Civ. Code, §§ 3429, 3430, defining debtor and creditor.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑241—Allowance of claim prima facie evidence of debt.

Allowance of a claim against an estate of a decedent by the judge of the superior court has the same force as a judgment of the court, and is prima facie evidence of claimant's debt, and the burden was upon the estate to show that the claim was not properly allowed.

3. Trial 🔑165—Every inference considered in favor of plaintiff on motion for nonsuit.

On a motion for nonsuit every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as evidence in favor of plaintiff, while all contradictory evidence must be disregarded.

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑80—As to transfer in consideration of future support actual fraudulent intent unnecessary.

Transfers of property in consideration of future support are upon the same plane as voluntary transfers under Civ. Code, § 3442, and an actual intent on the part of one transferring all of his property in consideration of future support is unnecessary to render the transfer void as to creditors.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑80 — Extent of validity of conveyance in consideration of future support stated.

Where the consideration for a conveyance is an agreement for the future support of the grantor, the transaction is fraudulent in law as to the creditors to the extent which the value of the property is in excess of the support furnished.

6. Appeal and error 🔑174 — Objection as to right to sue not raised below not considered.

In an action to set aside fraudulent conveyance, a claim made for the first time on appeal that appellant, a simple creditor of the estate, had no right to prosecute the action, and that the exclusive remedy is to be found in Code Civ. Proc. § 1589, giving the administrator or executor authority to prosecute like actions, will not be considered, where motion of appellee defendants for nonsuit, which was granted, did not specify any failure of evidence to make such proof.

7. Appeal and error 🔑232(1)—Only grounds stated in motion for nonsuit considered on appeal.

No grounds other than those stated in a motion for a nonsuit can be considered on an appeal from judgment of nonsuit; the reason for requiring the grounds to be stated being to afford the plaintiff an opportunity to correct any defects in the pleading or proof which admit of correction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by James A. Potts against H. B. Mehrmann, as administratrix of the estate of Mary Potts, deceased, and the Oakland Bank of Savings. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Abe P. Leach, of Oakland, for respondent Mehrmann.

McKee, Tasheira & Wahrhaftig, for respondent Oakland Bank of Savings.

WOOD, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit. The action was brought to set aside, as a fraud upon creditors, a trust executed voluntarily by the decedent, Mary Potts, in her lifetime, to the defendant Oakland Bank of Savings. By the terms of the writing she transferred to the bank the sum of $3,245, and made provision therein for medical attention and medicines during her life, for the payment of the expenses of her last illness and funeral, and for the disposition after her death of the remainder of the fund among certain of her relatives. There was also a provision for the payment during her life to her niece, Mrs. Hottel, of the sum of $40 per month. This amount, it seems, was for the support of Mrs. Potts, and it was collected monthly by the niece, and paid to, or for the benefit of, the trustor.

At the time of the transfer of the moneys to the bank, Mrs. Potts was well advanced in years, had reached a state where she could not be left alone, and the neighbors had suggested that she go to an old ladies home. She, however, wanted her niece to take care of her, and, apparently the better to secure proper care and treatment, made her the sole beneficiary of the trust fund upon the death of Mrs. Potts, if the latter did not die within five years after the date of the trust. The demise of Mrs. Potts occurred, however, on April, 1, 1908, or 15 months after executing the transfer to the bank.

Other than this money that went into the trust fund, Mrs. Potts had no property except some household furniture appraised at $50, and a life estate in a lot upon which there was a small four-room dwelling in which she lived for many years prior to and up to the time of her death. It is because of the obligations imposed upon the owner of this life estate that this litigation ensues.

Mrs. Potts acquired the life interest in the property in this wise: By the last will of Thomas Potts he devised the dwelling and lot to the appellant herein, who was his son by a former marriage. This devise was subject to the said life estate to his widow, the said Mary Potts. Pending the administration of the estate of Thomas Potts, the appellant James A. Potts and the said Mary Potts, executed an agreement, by the terms of which Mary Potts agreed to keep the improvements in reasonable and ordinary repair during the life estate, and to paint them at reasonable intervals; while upon his part appellant agreed to pay the taxes upon said property at all times, and to keep the improvements insured in the sum of $1,000 for the benefit of himself and the life tenant. The decree of distribution in the estate of Thomas Potts was in strict accordance with this agreement, and was made on June 16, 1902.

After the death of Mrs. Potts, appellant presented to the defendant Mehrmann, as administrator, a claim which was thereafter duly allowed by the court, against the estate of Mary Potts, in the sum of $716 for moneys expended, as appellant claimed, to place the improvements upon the lot in reasonable repair on account of waste and depreciation of of said premises suffered and permitted by Mary Potts during her life tenancy. The claim included moneys expended for plumbing, tinning the roof, shingling, repairs to woodword, painting, and papering.

[1] The motion for a nonsuit, which was granted by the trial judge was made upon the following grounds: (1) That the evidence did not prove that there was an existing creditor at the time of the conveyance; (2) that it had not been shown that there was a debt in existence at the date of the conveyance; (3) that it was not shown that a fraudulent intent existed or had been shown. As to the first ground, reference has already been had to the covenant upon the part of Mrs. Potts to keep the improvements in reasonable and ordinary repair and to paint them at reasonable intervals during her life estate; and all that is necessary in order to show that appellant was a creditor of Mrs. Potts at the time of the conveyance is to refer to the definitions of debtor and creditor as given in the Civil Code, which are:

> "Sec. 3429. A debtor, within the meaning of this title, is one who, by reason of an existing obligation, is or may become liable to pay money to another, whether such liability is certain or contingent."
> "Sec. 3430. A creditor, within the meaning of this title, is one in whose favor an obligation exists, by reason of which he is, or may become, entitled to the payment of money."

Further than this, in 20 Cyc. 454, it is said:

> "A person who is bound by a contract upon which he may become liable for the payment of money is indebted, although his liability is contingent as in the case of an indorser of a note."

And in 12 R. C. L. at page 492, it is stated:

> "Claims that arise from contract are in force from the date of the agreement. The liability arises at that time, although no demand accrues until afterward. * * * Whoever has a claim or demand on a contract in existence at the time when a fraudulent conveyance is made is a creditor within the meaning of the statute, and the holder of a contingent claim is as fully protected by the statute as one that is absolute."

[2] As to the contention "that it was not shown that there was a debt in existence at the date of the conveyance," there was in evidence the claim we have mentioned, in the sum of $716, which had been duly allowed and approved by the judge of the superior court. This had the same force as a judgment of the court. It was prima facie evidence of plaintiff's debt, and the burden was upon the defendant to show that the claim was not properly allowed. Shiels v. Nathan, 12 Cal. App. 608, 108 Pac. 34, and cases there referred to. It was not necessary that the claim disclose that there was an actual indebtedness to appellant at the time of the execution of the trust, for it was not disputed that at the time of such execution there was this subsisting obligation, upon the part of Mrs. Potts, to keep the improvements in reasonable and ordinary repair, and this constituted the appellant a creditor within the meaning of the law.

[3, 4] Did the evidence fail to show that a fraudulent intent existed? The rule is well settled in this state that upon a motion for a nonsuit every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as evidence in favor of plaintiff, while all contradictory evidence must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, and cases there cited, at page 586, 82 Pac. 252. It was not necessary to prove an actual intent on the part of Mrs. Potts to defraud any creditor. Indeed, she may have been, and probably was, entirely ignorant of a default in the performance of any obligation on her part to the appellant. Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides, however:

> "That any transfer * * * made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

The authorities place transfers of property in consideration of the future support of the grantor upon the same plane as voluntary transfers referred to in section 3442, supra, at least to the extent which the value of the property is in excess of the support furnished. In Baxter v. Baxter, 19 Cal. App. 239, 125 Pac. 360, it is said:

> "As against existing creditors, one cannot transfer all his property in consideration of future support and thus defeat the creditor in enforcing his claim. Under such circumstances the law presumes the act to be done with fraudulent intent to hinder and delay the creditor in the collection of his debt."

This rule is sustained by a citation of authorities, and a petition for a hearing of that case in the Supreme Court was denied.

[5] The claim is made that there was no evidence that the trust agreement was made without a valuable consideration. No mention was made in the motion for nonsuit of the lack of evidence in this particular, but, assuming that the question may be raised under the ground stated that there was no fraudulent intent shown, we think that the oral evidence introduced, taken in connection with the trust agreement, shows that there could have been no consideration moving from any person other than Mrs. Hottel, who appears to have cared for Mrs. Potts and supported her out of the $40 per month, and who, at the utmost, was entitled to a sum not exceeding $1,000, if Mrs. Potts died, as she did, within five years after the date of the trust. But this would not preclude appellant from a recovery, for, as was said in Harris v. Brink, 100 Iowa 366, 69 N. W. 684, 62 Am. St. Rep. 578:

> "Where the consideration for a conveyance is an agreement for the future support of the grantor, the transaction is fraudulent in law as to the creditors, to the extent which the value of the property is in excess of the support furnished."

[6] It is claimed that appellant, a simple creditor of the estate, has no right to prosecute this action, and that the exclusive remedy is to be found in section 1589 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which gives the executor or administrator authority to prosecute like actions when there is a deficiency of assets. Respondents rely upon Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303, in support of this proposition. Whether that case was intended to overrule Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 386, and Ohm v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 547, 26 Pac. 244, 20 Am. St. Rep. 245, need not be here considered; for in that case the right of the creditor to bring such an action was sustained, and it was held that such action did lie where the creditor had exhausted all means to procure such action to be brought by the executor or administrator. The motion for nonsuit did not specify any failure of evidence to make such proof, and it is too late to raise the point now.

It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to show that Mary Potts became insolvent upon the making of the transfer to the bank, inasmuch as she owned the life estate in the house and improvements referred to, and that this life estate was of some value. There was no evidence of the value of the house or improvements or of the life estate. It seems to have been conceded at the trial that the transfer to the bank left Mrs. Potts without sufficient property to pay her debts. There was proof of a search for property by the administrator, and the niece, Mrs. Hottel, who lived with Mrs. Potts antecedent to the transfer to the bank and up to the time of her death, testified that Mrs. Potts had no property in the world other than this money in the bank. The evidence as to the condition of the premises at the time of the transfer indicated that the value of the life estate could scarcely equal that of appellant's claim.

But, notwithstanding all that has been said, it may be conceded that the action of the trial court in granting the nonsuit would have been correct and proper had the respondent in its motion specifically included as one of the grounds the failure of proof to show that Mrs. Potts was insolvent upon making the transfer to the bank.

[7] The rule is uniform, however, that no grounds other than those stated upon a motion for a nonsuit can be considered upon an appeal. The reason for requiring the grounds to be stated is to afford the plaintiff an opportunity to correct any defects in the pleadings or proof which admit of correction. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 117, 24 Pac. 867, and cases there cited; Christensen Lumber Co. v. Buckley, 17 Cal. App. 37, 118 Pac. 466.

For the reason stated, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

WOESTMAN et al. v. UNION TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF PASADENA.

1. Perpetuities 🔑6(2)—Trust held not to illegally suspend the power of alienation.

Trust for benefit of testatrix's sons to continue until they reach the age of 40 years held not to suspend the power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of lives in being, in violation of Civ. Code, § 715, since on death of survivor of the sons the trust would cease by operation of law.

2. Trusts 🔑61(1)—When trust may be terminated in equity.

A court of equity may terminate a trust prior to the expiration of the time fixed for its duration, when all the parties in interest are sui juris and join in a request for its dissolution, unless the trustor has placed an express limitation upon this power, or the trustee is vested with discretion as to the amount of income to be devoted to the use of the beneficiary, or a valid direction for accumulation is contained in the instrument creating the trust.

3. Wills 🔑686(1)—Trust not terminated in equity on application of beneficiaries, where children have contingent interest.

Where testatrix gave the residue of her estate to her two sons, "or if either should die without issue, then to the other," to be held by named trustee until the sons reached specified age, equity will not terminate the trust on application of the sons, since if one of them should die before the expiration of the trust period his children would take as members of a class designated by the will; such class having a contingent interest which the trustee and the court are in duty bound to protect.

4. Wills 🔑684(9)—Beneficiaries of trust held entitled to income of corpus of trust, and not merely allowance specified by will.

Where testatrix gave the residue to her sons to be held in trust by named trustee, with directions to give each of the sons a specified sum per month during the life of the trust without providing for accumulation of interest, the sons, on becoming of age, were entitled to the entire income of the corpus of the trust, and not merely the specified amount per month; they being entitled to the excess, as the persons presumptively entitled to the next eventual interest under Civ. Code, § 733.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Suit by Karl O. Woestman and another against the Union Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with permission to plaintiffs to amend complaint.

George P. Cary, of Pasadena, and Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment entered after a demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend.

By their suit plaintiffs seek to terminate a trust created by the will of their deceased mother, Henrietta C. Woestman, in which the defendant is named as trustee. The relief is sought on two grounds: (1) That the trust was void in its inception because attempted to be created in violation of the statute prohibiting perpetuities; and (2) that all the parties in interest consent to its termination.

The provision of the will necessary to be considered reads as follows:

> "Sixth. I give and devise, and bequeath all of the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, wherever situated, of which I may die seized or possessed, or to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease, to my two boys, Walter E. Woestman and Karl O. Woestman, share and share alike, or if either should die without issue, then to the other, the same, however, to be held in trust by the 'Union Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena,' a corporation, created and existing under the laws of the state of California, having its principal office in the city of Pasadena, county of Los Angeles, in said state, until my said boys reach the age of forty years. And I authorize my trustee to pay out of the said trust above created, to each of my said boys, the sum of fifty dollars ($50.00) per month, during the life of said trust."

In due course a decree of distribution was entered, containing the following clause:

> "* * * And all the rest of the property of said estate is distributed to the Union Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, as trustee, upon the trusts stated and declared in the will of said Henrietta C. Woestman, deceased, which will is on file and of record in the office of the clerk of this superior court."

The complaint alleges that, at the time of the distribution of the estate, plaintiffs were minors, and were not represented in the proceedings by counsel, but relied upon the defendant, the executor of their mother's will, to protect their interests, and that the defendant did not advise them of the invalidity of the trust attempted to be created by the will, but, on the contrary, informed them that it was a valid trust, and that the property should be distributed to the defendant as trustee. It further is alleged that on the hearing of the petition for distribution defendant's counsel represented to the judge that the will created a valid trust, and thereby induced the court to enter the decree under the influence of a mistake in law affecting the court, the defendant, and its attorney. Pursuant to the decree there was distributed to the defendant, as trustee, personal property to the value of about $180,000.

The plaintiffs are, respectively, 23 and 21 years of age, in poor health and unable to support themselves and their families according to their station in life, and the allowance of $50 per month from the trust is insufficient for their needs. Both claim to be fully capable of managing their shares of the estate without the intervention of a trustee, being of sound mind, good habits, and not spendthrifts, and are desirous of embarking in business while young, to familiarize themselves with the handling of their own money during the formative period of their business careers. At the time of the commencement of this action the accumulations of the income over and above the corpus of the trust estate, after deducting the expenses of administering the trust and the allowance to plaintiffs, amounted to $18,000, which is now in the possession of the trustee, and, according to the allegations of the complaint, could be paid to the beneficiaries without detriment to the estate, and greatly to the benefit of plaintiffs.

[1] 1. Appellants contend that the trust was void in its inception because it illegally suspended the power of alienation for an absolute period of years, in contravention of the provisions of section 715, Civil Code. If the suspension here under consideration is dependent upon, and measured by, the duration of designated lives in being, it cannot be said to violate the inhibition of the Code section. The trust by its terms is to continue "until my said boys reach the age of forty years." No definite term is fixed by the instrument. The duration of the trust is limited to the existence of the life of the survivor of the two beneficiaries named. If they should both die before reaching the age of 40 years, the trust would cease by operation of law. This case is analogous to Estate of Hendy, 118 Cal. 656, 50 Pac. 753, where our Supreme Court said:

> "But it matters not whether it be by express terms or by necessary construction that lives in being measure the duration of the trust. If it appear with certainty that the trust cannot longer continue, the law against perpetuities is not violated. Thus a trust in property to pay the income to A. until he arrives at the age of 40 years would not violate the law, for every trust of necessity ceases when there is no beneficiary, and in the case instanced it is obvious that A.'s life is the ultimate and determinative measure of duration. In no event can the trust continue longer than his life; upon his death before reaching the age of 40 years the trust determines for lack of a beneficiary."

See, also, Estate of Yates, 170 Cal. 254, 149 Pac. 555. We are of the opinion that the trust in question is not void as imposing an unlawful restraint on alienation.

[2] 2. A court of equity may terminate a trust, prior to the expiration of the time fixed for its duration, when all the parties in interest are sui juris and join in a request for its dissolution, unless the trustor has placed an express limitation upon this power, or the trustee is vested with discretion as to the amount of income to be devoted to the use of the beneficiary, or a valid direction for accumulation is contained in the instrument creating the trust. Fletcher v. Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank (Sup.) 187 Pac. 425; Eakle v. Ingram, 142 Cal. 15, 75 Pac. 566, 100 Am. St. Rep. 99. The first matter for determination is whether or not all of the interested parties are before the court invoking its equitable jurisdiction. The solution of this question depends upon a construction of the will by which the trust was created. This instrument leaves much to be desired in the way of specific directions. Inferences must be indulged in in order to give effect to the intention of the testator, as indicated by the meager provisions of the will. It clearly appears that it was intended to leave the estate to the two plaintiffs, provided they both lived to the age of 40 years, the property in the meantime to be held in trust by the defendant, with an allowance of $50 per month to each of the boys. Equally apparent is the desire that, in the event of the death of either without issue, the whole corpus of the trust shall go to the surviving son. Thus each is vested with a half interest in the property, subject to divestment should he die without issue prior to arriving at the age mentioned, and each has a contingent remainder in the interest of the other, conditioned upon his survival and the death of that other without issue. So much is definite and certain from the terms of the instrument.

[3] There is no express direction as to the disposition of the share of a decedent leaving issue. We must, perforce, endeavor to ascertain from the contents of the will what purpose actuated the mind of the trustor in inserting the provision with reference to issue. Obviously, she did not contemplate that the portion of a deceased son should lodge outside of his family, if any children survived him. In whose favor, then, was the limitation made? The natural and logical inference, we think, must necessarily be that it was made for the benefit of those whom the testator mentioned, namely, the issue. The specific reference to issue would imply an intention to provide for them in the event of their father's death. Hull v. Holmes, 78 Conn. 362, 62 Atl. 705. The conclusion we have reached gives full force and effect to every clause of the will, and all reasonable deductions which may be drawn from its expressed and implied provisions. If one of the plaintiffs should die before the expiration of the trust period, his children would take as members of a class designated by the will, and not as heirs at law of their father. This class, indeterminable though it is, has a contingent interest in the trust property which the trustee and the court are in duty bound to protect. Gray v. Union Trust Co., 171 Cal. 637, 154 Pac. 306. As all of the possible beneficiaries of the trust are not and cannot be before the court, equity has no power to terminate this trust.

[4] 3. Plaintiffs demand that the income of the corpus of the trust be paid to them, claiming that the accumulation beyond their majority is illegal. There is no provision whatever in the will for the accumulation of income. All that is disposed of by its terms is the allowance of $50 per month to each of the boys. The excess, therefore, would come within the provisions of section 733, Civil Code, and belong to the plaintiffs as the persons presumptively entitled to the next eventual interest. To this extent the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, with permission to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if so advised, to state a cause of action solely for the recovery of the accumulated income.

SARONI v. CHICAGO BONDING & SURETY CO. (Civ. 3647.)

1. Guaranty ⚷92(1)—Findings considered together held to establish guarantor's liability.

In an action on a written instrument whereby defendant undertook to guarantee to plaintiff payment of a loan made at the instance of defendant, findings, when considered together, held to show that the loan was made at the instance of defendant to the corporation designated, and not to third persons, and hence to support the judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⚷932(1) — Presumption in favor of trial court's finding as to amount of attorney's fees.

Where a surety contract provided for payment of attorney's fees in case of default, a finding by the trial court as to the amount of a reasonable attorney's fee will be upheld on appeal taken on the judgment roll alone, though attacked as excessive, on the presumption that there was evidence of sufficient strength to warrant the finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Louis Saroni against the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Miller, Thornton, Miller & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hugo K. Asher and Asher, Meyerstein & McNutt, all of San Francisco (Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

BARDIN, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, taken on the judgment roll alone. The action was instituted to recover the sum of $5,000, with interest and attorney's fees, and was founded upon the alleged liability of the defendant upon a written instrument whereby the defendant, a corporation engaged in a general surety business, undertook to guarantee to plaintiff the payment of a loan in the sum of $5,000 made to Western Reclamation Company at the instance and request of the defendant. It was provided in the undertaking referred to that, if the debtor defaulted in the discharge of its obligation, the defendant would itself make the required payment to the plaintiff together with interest thereon, costs, attorney's fees, and such damages as the creditor, Louis Saroni might sustain.

The first point urged is that the judgment does not find proper support in the findings.

[1] By way of a separate defense to the action it was alleged by the defendant, in effect, that the Western Reclamation Company never at any time borrowed or received from the plaintiff the sum of $5,000 or any other sum, or promised to pay to plaintiff that sum or any other sum, and that the said sum of $5,000 was loaned by the plaintiff to certain individuals, naming them, for their sole and personal use and benefit, and that at the time said loan was made plaintiff received from the persons named their joint and several promissory note therefor.

Finding No. X, in response to the particular issues created by the above averments, in part is as follows:

"The sum mentioned in the complaint, and the whole thereof, was not loaned by plaintiff to Louis Saunders, Frank V. Wright, and Just Anderson for their sole and personal use and benefit; and plaintiff, at the time of making said loan to said Western Reclamation Company, did receive a joint and several promissory note, signed by Louis Saunders, Frank V. Wright, and Just Anderson, in the sum of $5,000, and at the time that plaintiff so received the said note it was to him stated by the defendant and by the signers of the said note, and plaintiff believed, and had reason to believe, that the said persons so signing the said note constituted the Western Reclamation Company."

It is claimed by the appellant that, inasmuch as the bond upon which this action is based stated that the consideration for its execution was a loan to be made to Western Reclamation Company, there can be no liability fastened upon the defendant in view of finding No. X, for the reason that there occurred such an alteration of the obligation of the principal as to exonerate it from any liability on the bond; or, in other words, that the obligation for which the appellant became responsible under the terms of the bond was the obligation of the Western Reclamation Company, while the obligation for which it is held under the judgment is to pay the join and several note of the three individuals already named.

Before following the thread of appellant's argument further, it will be well to consider portions of two other findings of the court. Finding No. V in part is as follows:

> "On the 31st day of March, 1914, at the time of the execution and delivery of the instrument hereinabove set out, plaintiff loaned to the Western Reclamation Company, named in said instrument and as therein set forth, and said Western Reclamation Company received from plaintiff, the sum of $5,000 in gold coin of the United States, and the said Western Reclamation Company then and there agreed to repay the same to the said plaintiff, Louis Saroni, five months thereafter, together with interest thereon. * * *"

And in finding No. IX we read the following:

> "Said Robert M. Ford (the agent of the defendant) did apply to plaintiff and request him to loan to the Western Reclamation Company the said sum of $5,000, and did promise that this defendant would execute and deliver to plaintiff as security for the repayment of said sum the bond hereinabove set forth and did so execute said bond. * * *"

We believe that, when all the findings relative to the point sought to be made by appellant are considered together, it must necessarily follow that appellant's contention in the behalf stated is entirely without merit. The court directly and unequivocally found that the plaintiff had, as stated in the bond sued upon, made a loan to the Western Reclamation Company, and this constituted the consideration for the execution of defendant's undertaking. In what manner the obligation of the debtor was evidenced is beside the question.

[2] Complaint is also made against that portion of the judgment awarding plaintiff the sum of $1,500 as and for an attorney's fee incurred in prosecuting the action, on the ground that the sum thus awarded is excessive. The court found as to the attorney's fee now complained of as follows:

> "By reason of the failure of the said defendant to pay said sum of $5,000 plaintiff has been obliged to employ attorneys to enforce the collecting of the said sum against the said defendant and to bring this action to enforce collection of said sum, and that the sum of $1,500 is a reasonable attorney's fee in this behalf by plaintiff incurred."

In the absence of a record showing the character and amount of work performed by plaintiff's attorneys, we cannot review this finding of the court. It must stand under the presumption that there was evidence of sufficient strength adduced at the trial to warrant the finding.

JOHNSTON v. ST. SURE, Judge. (Civ. 3690.)

Witnesses ⚷55—In action against husband and wife wherein husband disclaimed, wife could be examined as to her separate interests.

In an action to quiet title to an undivided half interest in realty brought against husband, wife, and others, wherein, by their joint answer, the wife alleged her husband was not a party in interest, and the husband expressly disclaimed any interest in the property, alleging the wife alone was the real party in interest, plaintiff was entitled, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, to examine the wife as if on cross-examination in taking her deposition, confining the inquiry to her separate property interests, despite section 1881, subd. 1, providing a wife cannot be examined for or against her husband without his consent.

Petition for mandamus by Grace A. Johnston against A. F. St. Sure, as Judge, etc., to require respondent to direct a witness to answer certain questions. Writ granted.

Hayes & Oliphant, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Edwin T. Cooper, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the respondent, as judge of the superior court, to direct Carrie E. Bridge to answer questions propounded to her in the taking of her deposition in a proceeding pending in that court. The sole question at issue is whether the said witness, being jointly sued with her husband as a party defendant in said action, may be interrogated without his consent. The action is one to quiet title to an undivided one-half interest in certain real property situated in the county of Alameda, for an accounting of the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and to declare that the defendant Carrie E. Bridge, in whom the record title stands, holds such undivided one-half interest therein in trust for the plaintiff. Some 15 other persons were joined as defendants, some of whom it is said have been served and appeared in the action. The defendants Carrie E. Bridge and H. S. Bridge, her husband, filed their joint answer verified by the oath of said H. S. Bridge, in which they expressly denied the allegations of the complaint that said Carrie E. Bridge has no interest, right, title, or claim in and to said real property and that she holds the naked legal title thereto to the use or benefit of the defendant H. S. Bridge, or in trust for him. They also expressly denied that at any of the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint the defendant H. S. Bridge was the owner of an undivided interest in the property, and expressly alleged that the defendant Carrie E. Bridge, at all the times in plaintiff's complaint referred to, "was and she now is the owner in fee of all the real property in plaintiff's complaint referred to and described, and of every interest therein, except those portions thereof which have been sold or contracted to be sold by her to certain persons named in this answer."

By this answer the defendant H. S. Bridge disclaimed all interest in the property involved in the action and made himself a nominal rather than a real party in interest. His wife joined with him in this disclaimer.

When she was cited to appear before a notary for the purpose of having her deposition taken by plaintiff she refused to answer any questions propounded to her, upon the ground that she was an incompetent witness under the provisions of subdivision 1, section 1881, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The provisions of this section, so far as material hereto, read:

> "A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage."

It is freely conceded by petitioner that the last portion of the section just quoted prevents the examination of either a husband or a wife as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage unless the consent of the other is given. No question of the violation of confidential communications made during the marital relation is involved, the sole question being whether the wife may be examined in this proceeding without her husband's consent so long as he is a party to the action.

Counsel concede that when the action is one for or against either a husband or wife alone, the other may not be examined as a witness in said action without the consent of the party, because necessarily the evidence so given must be either for or against the spouse who is a party to the action. Many cases of other jurisdictions are cited to this effect, but the rule in this state is clearly announced by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Marple v. Jackson (Sup.) 193 Pac. 940. These authorities generally relate to a case wherein one spouse alone is a party and are of little assistance in a determination of the question herein presented. The case of Nicklaus v. Dahn, 63 Ind. 87, comes closest to the matter under discussion. Therein the Supreme Court of Indiana said:

> "The general rule is that neither husband nor wife can be a witness for or against each other; yet, when they jointly sue, or are jointly sued, and have separate interests, each is a competent witness—the husband for himself and the wife for herself."

In the present case, by the answer which the husband and wife have jointly filed, the wife is the only one of the two who is a real party to the suit. By the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, she may be called by the plaintiff as a witness as if under cross-examination. Having alleged that her husband is not a party in interest in the suit, she cannot now claim that he is a real party in interest so that her testimony would be either for or against him. On the other hand, the husband having expressly disclaimed any interest in this property, and having joined with his wife in the allegation that she alone was the real party in interest, he cannot now be heard to say that the testimony of his wife would be either for or against him.

As to the main issue in the case, to which all the questions included in the record were directed, both the husband and wife have removed themselves from the privileges of the statute by their joint answer, and have by the same answer waived the privilege. Thus the parties having by their joint answer made the witness the sole party in interest in the main issue of the suit, the plaintiff was entitled, under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, to examine her as if upon cross-examination, confining the inquiry to her separate property interests. Furthermore, her testimony was admissible on the main issue of the case against the many other defendants who were joined as parties, because by the husband's own allegations such testimony could not be either for or against him.

BACON v. MESERVE. (Civ. 3477.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1078(1) — Appellate court will not search record for grounds for reversal.

The appellate court will not search the record for grounds for reversal, if any, on which counsel for appellant placed so little reliance as to fail to mention them in their brief.

2. Attorney and client 🔑166(1)—Finding that defendant assumed payment of $2,000 for fees incurred in transaction held supported by evidence.

In an action against an attorney on his note for $2,500, the attorney claiming a credit of $2,000 as a fee for certain legal services for which plaintiff assumed liability through his agent in the transaction in which the services were rendered, finding that plaintiff and the attorney agreed on the sum of $2,000 as a fee for the services, and finding that plaintiff agreed to pay the amount, held supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Frank P. Bacon against Edwin A. Meserve. From an adverse judgment awarding him less than sued for, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. [1] The plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment awarding him $236.91 in a suit on a promissory note of the defendant for $2,500. He makes the single contention that under the evidence the trial court should not have allowed a certain credit of $2,000 which was claimed by the defendant as attorney's fees, among other credits, some of which were allowed and one of which was rejected by the court. While at the outset of the appellant's brief it is said this is the principal matter involved in the appeal, no other proposition is discussed. This court will not search the record for grounds for reversal, if there be such, on which counsel for appellant place so little reliance as to fail to mention them in their brief. The appellant makes no claim that the findings are not responsive to the pleadings, nor that they do not support the conclusions of law. The appeal, therefore, presents a single question of fact, or, more accurately, of mixed law and fact.

[2] The evidentiary facts are not controverted, and the only matters of law are those applicable to the evidentiary facts from which the single ultimate fact was deduced by the trial court. Stated in their chronological order, the evidentiary facts are as follows:

Plaintiff has some connection with a banking institution in Los Angeles and is interested in investments. W. N. Hamaker is connected with the same bank and has attended to much of the plaintiff's financial business. It is claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that in the particular matter Mr. Hamaker was the plaintiff's trustee. From further facts it will readily be seen that he was acting generally as the plaintiff's agent and the apparent scope of his authority was very broad. For several years, from time to time, acting for the plaintiff, Mr. Hamaker had retained the defendant as the plaintiff's attorney in separate matters. There was no general retainer. The arrangements made by Mr. Hamaker with the defendant were carried out by the plaintiff in his dealings with the defendant. Apparently, during this course of dealing carried on through Mr. Hamaker, the plaintiff never in any way questioned his authority.

On September 7, 1917, the defendant borrowed through Mr. Hamaker $2,500, which was admittedly the plaintiff's money. The note of the defendant was made payable to Hamaker, who thereupon indorsed a personal guaranty upon it and transferred it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff owned, or was at least interested in the ownership of a building known as the Metropolitan Building, in which Messrs. Lester Robinson, Fred P. Barman, the Leasehold Company, and others, had some interest by way of lease or equity. Mr. Hamaker was on friendly terms with the members of this group. They were indebted to the plaintiff, and Mr. Hamaker, for the plaintiff, undertook to bring about an adjustment of differences between them and the plaintiff. Just as he had done in former matters, he retained the defendant as the attorney. There were lengthy negotiations, and it was finally agreed that the Robinson group should transfer their interests in the Metropolitan Building to Mr. Hamaker for the plaintiff, and in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim against them, upon being given what amounted to an option to repurchase the building or their interests in it, at any time before January 1, 1921, for the amount then agreed upon as due from them to the plaintiff and satisfied by their transaction. When the total amount of the items of their pre-existing indebtedness was computed, it aggregated in the neighborhood of $35,000. Before the transaction was closed, the question of attorney's fees was discussed between the defendant and Mr. Hamaker, then between Mr. Hamaker and Mr Robinson, and finally by the three.

Mr. Hamaker's testimony in regard to the employment of the defendant was not direct, but it appeared that it was Mr. Bacon's money that was involved in the transaction, and that upon its determination depended the loss or gain of Mr. Bacon. Mr. Hamaker was asked by the trial judge:

> "And when you went to Mr. Meserve did you expect to pay him or did you expect Mr. Bacon to pay him?"

In reply the witness stated:

> "Let me say this: That in that I was following a general rule which I followed for a great many years in the bank and out, in which in almost every instance I sought to saddle the expense on the other fellow; for instance, the banks do that as to attorney fees; and each note and every obligation sought to be collected was predicated upon a note which included attorney fees, so in the end the object was to seek to saddle the expense upon— The Court (interrupting): But the preliminary objection (obligation) to the attorney being directly when the person went to him, of course? A. I have always held them payable out of the proceeds of the—"

The primary obligation to the attorney, of course, is just what the trial judge indicated—that of the person who retained him—in this case of Mr. Bacon, on whose behalf Mr. Hamaker was acting. This primary obligation might have been shifted with the consent of both the attorney and the other parties, but in the present case it was not so shifted, or, if it was, it was reshifted to the plaintiff. In the first conversation between Mr. Hamaker and the defendant, the former, pursuant to his custom of shifting the burden to the other fellow, told the defendant in substance that the Robinson group should be made to pay the attorney's fees. The amount of the fees was then discussed. The settlement involved different claims, aggregating $35,000, and 10 per cent. of this amount, or $3,500, was suggested. Other amounts were discussed, and Hamaker and Meserve agreed that a fee of $2,000 was reasonable under all the circumstances. Hamaker then communicated with Robinson and returned with him to Meserve's office, where Robinson was told, in effect, that in addition to the option price of $35,000 for the repurchase, there would be added an attorney's fee of $2,000. Robinson made a "wry mouth" over the amount of the fee, but agreed that it should be added to the option purchase price, making it amount to $37,000 instead of $35,000, and thereupon the interests of the Robinson group were transferred to Hamaker nominally, but in fact for the plaintiff.

If the conversation between Hamaker, Robinson, and the defendant resulted in the shifting of the burden from Bacon to the Robinson group, in accordance with Hamaker's custom, that burden was satisfied when it was included in the settlement under which the Robinson group transferred the property to Hamaker for Bacon. The defendant was entitled to his fee. He could not, in any way, have maintained a claim for a fee against Robinson and his group after the transfer had been made, nor was Robinson and his group in any way obligated to pay any sum of money to the plaintiff or the defendant. If the Robinson group should never exercise the option of repurchase, they were freed of all obligations by the transfer, and the transfer inured solely to the benefit of the plaintiff. The plaintiff having received full satisfaction for his claims against the Robinson group, including the attorney's fee of $2,000, the primary obligation which Hamaker had tried to shift to the Robinson group again rested upon Bacon.

The contention on the part of the plaintiff that Mr. Hamaker was a mere trustee, that the title to the property in question had been transferred to him, and not to Bacon, is clearly evasive. The entire title vested in him as a trustee for Bacon and for Bacon's convenience. He signed no declaration of trust either to Bacon or the defendant. The defendant could not compel Hamaker to make any trust accounting to him, while Bacon could compel his agent to transfer the title directly to him. Having received the benefit both of the transaction and of the attorney's services, the finding to the effect that the plaintiff and defendant agreed upon the sum of $2,000 as a fee is supported by the evidence concerning the conversation between Hamaker and the defendant in view of the ostensible agency of Hamaker for Bacon, and the finding that the plaintiff agreed to pay this amount is supported by the evidence that the amount of it was included in the valuation of the property transferred to the plaintiff through the agency of the trusteeship of Hamaker. There is no other question involved in the appeal.

1. Insurance 🔑229(3)—Brokers held without authority to accept notice of cancellation.

Persons engaged by the insured to place insurance on his property, whose custom it was to give notice of any cancellation and procure other insurance if possible, should be treated as mere brokers, and not authorized to accept notice of cancellation.

2. Insurance 🔑665(1)—Brokers placing insurance held not agents of insured to receive notice of cancellation.

In an action on a fire policy, where the insurer relied on notice of cancellation given to brokers employed by the insured to effect the insurance, evidence held wholly insufficient to show that they were ostensible agents within Civ. Code, § 2300, and as such entitled to accept notice of cancellation.

3. Insurance 🔑229(3)—Agents to procure insurance have no power to consent to cancellation.

An agent, employed to procure insurance, has no power to consent to cancellation or accept notice thereof; his authority terminating on delivery of the policy.

4. Insurance 🔑665(4)—Evidence held to sustain finding of amount of plaintiff's loss.

In an action on a fire policy insuring plaintiff's dry cleaning establishment to recover for clothing burned while under the care of plaintiff for the purpose of cleaning, evidence held sufficient to support a finding as to amount of plaintiff's loss.

5. Insurance 🔑560(3)—Objection to proof of loss solely on one ground held waiver of defense of lack of evidence of amount of loss.

Where policy of owner of dry cleaning establishment covered "property left * * * in trust or for repairs, or storage, or for which" insured "should have assumed liability," and also provided that the insurer "shall be deemed to have assented to the amount of loss claimed * * * in * * * preliminary proof of loss unless within 20 days * * * the company shall notify the insured * * * of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of loss claimed," the company assented to the amount claimed in the proof of loss of goods left with insured where it confined its objection to the proof of loss to the failure of insured to show ownership of or liability by law or by specific assumption for loss or damage to the goods.

6. Insurance 🔑560(2)—Insurer held bound to specify amount of loss admitted in order to contest amount of loss claimed.

Where policy of owner of dry cleaning establishment covered "property left * * * in trust or for repairs, or storage, or for which" insured "should have assumed liability," and also provided that the insurer "shall be deemed to have assented to the amount of loss claimed * * * in * * * preliminary proof of loss unless within 20 days * * * the company shall notify the insured * * * of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of loss claimed and * * * of the amount of loss, if any, the company admits on each of the different articles * * * set forth in the preliminary proof," and the proof of loss set forth in detail the items paid by insured to third persons for their goods destroyed in his keeping, the insurer, if it intended to contest the amount of any particular item, was required, under the policy terms, to specify the amount of loss it admitted on such item, otherwise it must be deemed to have assented to the amount of loss sustained on all items to which no specific objection was made, for a general denial of all liability would not meet the policy requirement to designate the different articles for which it disclaimed liability.

7. Evidence 🔑69 — There is a presumption that private transactions have been fair and regular.

The presumption is that private transactions have been fair and regular, and, if not controverted, such presumption is satisfactory.

8. Appeal and error 🔑204(1)—Objection to evidence must be made in trial court.

The question of competency of evidence must be raised during the trial, if it is to be reviewed upon appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Roy R. Lauman and another against the Concordia Fire Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wis. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the defendant appeals. Affirmed, superseding former opinion, 192 Pac. 128.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul H. McPherrin and Chandler P. Ward, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. The facts upon which this appeal is based are stated in our former opinion herein. The conclusions there reached as to items 1 and 3 of the policy in question are not questioned on this rehearing. We therefore adopt that opinion in part as follows:

"This is an action to recover on a fire insurance policy. Plaintiff Lauman was at all times referred to in this action engaged in the cleaning and dyeing business in the city of Los Angeles. His 'customers' were the owners of 'routes,' having their own wagons, etc., with which they solicited the patronage of their own patrons throughout various parts of the city. The articles so gathered such 'customers' would take to Lauman's place of business for cleaning or dyeing, after which they would, by the latter's 'customers,' be delivered to their own patrons, the owners thereof. In other words, Lauman had no dealings with the individual owners of the clothing and other articles so delivered to him for cleaning or dyeing; all his business was with the owners of the various 'routes.' The court found in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly.

"The policy upon which the action is based was issued to plaintiff by the defendant corporation through one C. P. Spinning, its duly and legally authorized agent. The policy covered three separate items, as follows: (1) 'One thousand dollars on office and other furniture and fixtures, machinery and equipment'; (2) one thousand dollars on merchandise of every description, specifically including property left with plaintiff in trust or for repairs, or storage, or for which he should have assumed liability'; and (3) 'five hundred dollars on one-story brick building, where the business was located, and as described in the policy of insurance.' As to the last item, there is attached to the policy a 'mortgage clause,' making the loss, if any, payable to the plaintiff H. R. Dodd.

"The policy was issued on May 16, 1917. On the 5th of June following, the property was damaged by fire. Thereafter, and within the time and in the manner required by such policy, Lauman notified the defendant company of the fire, and furnished and submitted to defendant company proof of loss in writing, later, at the request of defendant, submitting amendments thereto. In addition to this, and as late as September, 1917, in response to defendant's demand, Lauman personally submitted to an examination under oath, in compliance with the terms of the policy.

"Under date of July 11, 1917, the defendant corporation, through its special agent and adjuster, R. L. McCulloch, wrote Lauman a letter, which, omitting the formal parts, is in words and figures as follows: 'I am in receipt of a preliminary proof of loss under policy No. 30804 of the Concordia Fire Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, wherein you claim loss and damage by reason of a fire that occurred on the 5th day of June, 1917, at the premises No. 2190 East Eleventh street, Los Angeles, California. The Concordia Fire Insurance Company herewith disagrees with you as to the amount of loss claimed by you by reason of said fire under its policy No. 30804. The aforesaid Concordia Fire Insurance Company admits that the loss to the various articles covered under the first item of the form as attached to the policy is as set forth in the aforesaid proof of loss; and also that the loss to the building covered under the third item of the form as attached to the policy is as set forth in the aforesaid proof of loss. The aforesaid Concordia Fire Insurance Company disagrees with you as to the amount of the loss and damage claimed by you on any and all articles covered under the second item of the form as attached to the policy and described as "merchandise," and does not admit that you sustained any loss or damage under this item by reason of said fire, as you have failed to show that the goods destroyed or damaged were your property or that you were liable by law for any loss or damage to said goods, or that at any time prior to the date of the fire you had specifically assumed liability therefor, nor do you furnish any evidence as to your liability to others in event said goods were held by you in trust at the time of the fire.'

"Accompanying the proof of loss filed by Lauman and constituting a part thereof, relating in item 2, was a schedule of garments lost, together with the owners' names and the amounts claimed by each. We do not consider it necessary to set out this schedule here. Further reference thereto will be made when we come to consider appellant's second point.

"It appears that this class of insurance is exceedingly hazardous, and for that reason plaintiff had experienced considerable trouble in keeping his property insured, having had several policies issued to him by Horton & Son, an insurance firm with offices in Pasadena, as agent of various insurance companies. In our opinion no other reference to these 'other' policies is necessary.

"The policy under consideration contained the following provision: 'This policy may be canceled at any time, without tender of unearned portion of premium, by the company by giving five (5) days' written notice of cancellation to the insured and to any mortgagee or other party to whom, with the written consent of the company, this policy is made payable, in which case the company shall, upon surrender of the policy or relinquishment of liability thereunder, refund the excess of paid premium above the pro rata premium for the expired term.' (Italics ours.) On June 1, 1917, Horton & Son—not Spinning, the issuing agent—wrote Lauman as follows: 'Kindly return us Security policy No. 2064319 and the Concordia policy No. 30804, because both of these companies have ordered their policies canceled. Kindly give this matter prompt attention, as we wish to return these two policies back to the companies at once. * * * In our letter of the 29th we mentioned the National as one of the companies which had canceled off, but this was an error. We should have stated the Security and the Concordia.' This letter was mailed in Pasadena at 6:30 p. m., June 1, 1917, and delivered to Lauman the next day. As we have already seen, the fire occurred on June 5, 1917.

"On this appeal appellant contends: (1) That at the time of the fire the policy here involved had been canceled; and (2) that there was no proof of value as to the articles embraced in item 2 covered by the policy. To support the first contention, appellant argues that the firm of Horton & Son was the agent of plaintiff Lauman, 'with power to receive notice of cancellation.' If this be so, and such purported notice of cancellation was given within time, then on this phase of the case our decision must be for appellant. The question, therefore, resolves itself into two divisions: (1) Was Horton & Son the agent of plaintiff Lauman with power to receive notice of cancellation and to cancel the policy which is the basis of this suit; and (2), if so, was the purported notice given in time?

[1-3] "It will be borne in mind that the agent issuing this particular policy of insurance was not Horton & Son, but C. P. Spinning. The record here shows that under date of May 25, 1917, a special agent of the defendant company—R. L. McCulloch—wrote to Spinning as follows: 'Kindly cancel Concordia policy No. 30804, Roy A. Lauman, assured, covering on cleaning and dyeing establishment at No. 2190 East Eleventh Street, Los Angeles, California, and relieve the company of all liability thereunder within the time specified in the policy contract. I have already declined this risk four different times, and in order not to do the assured or your office an injustice I have made a reinspection to-day and find no change. I am sorry to disturb this line, and trust that it will cause you no inconvenience.' Upon receiving this letter Spinning showed it to Mr. A. T. Horton, of the firm of Horton & Son. Thereupon Horton stamped across the page of the 'Daily' containing entries with respect to the policy in question, the word 'Canceled.' The 'Daily' referred to in this case is an abbreviation of the phrase 'Daily Report,' as used in the parlance of insurance agents. The 'Daily Report' is a blank upon which the transactions, if any, that may have been had in connection with a given policy are entered. When a policy is written it is usually delivered to the assured, and a record thereof, together with all 'riders' attached thereto, is kept by the agent in a book known as the 'policy register.' The 'Daily Report' is a record of the same transaction, and theoretically, at least, is supposed to be mailed on the same day to the home office of the company. Such 'Daily' contains the report of that day for the one policy only, as issued, modified, or canceled, as the case may be. The 'Daily' in the transaction in question was not that of any company for which Horton's firm was acting as agent. Under these circumstances, by what authority did Horton perform this act? Other than the showing of the letter of May 25, 1917, to Horton, nothing was done by Spinning to bring notice of the cancellation of said policy to the plaintiff Lauman. The letter of June 1, 1917, was written and mailed by Horton & Son to, and received by, Lauman, as hereinbefore set forth. If we thought that Horton & Son had authority to receive notice of cancellation, and to cancel the policy, then we doubtless should hold that the letter of the special agent to Spinning, of date of May 25, 1917, and by Spinning shown to Horton, was a sufficient notice of cancellation, regardless of Horton & Son's letter of June 1, 1917, to plaintiff, just referred to.

"Appellant attempted to prove by the witness Spinning that at the time Horton placed the word 'Canceled' on the 'Daily' that he (Spinning) 'believed that Horton, or Horton & Son, had the right to receive notices of cancellation,' by asking him if he thought and was of the opinion or belief that Horton & Son had the right to cancel the policy of insurance,' and also if he 'believed that Horton & Son, or the Mr. Horton that put that cancellation there, had authority to cancel that policy'—to all of which questions objections were interposed and by the court sustained. Error is predicated upon each of such rulings.

"The record shows that Spinning was employed as a bookkeeper by Horton & Son, and that he was conversant with the practice and custom of the firm in the matter of the cancellation of insurance policies—which was, that in every case the assured was given notice of cancellation. Indeed, Mr. Horton himself corroborated Spinning in this regard, and goes somewhat further when he testifies: 'Our custom was first to protect the assured in some other company, and to notify him by either sending him a new policy or advising him that we could not replace it, and request the return of the other policy; and when the other policy came back, or when the notice was duly given to him of the cancellation, then was the time that we stamped that "Canceled."' (Italics ours.) Horton further testified that he maintained the foregoing practice in every instance. Under these circumstances Horton & Son were mere brokers, and, being such, were without authority to accept notice of cancellation. Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233. This record contains nothing which brings Horton & Son within the purview of section 2300 of the Civil Code. 'The fact that an agent was employed to place insurance does not make him an agent to cancel the policy on behalf of the owner of the property.' Cronenwett v. Iowa Underwriters, etc., 186 Pac. 824.

"It is contended by appellant that 'the facts proven conclusively show that Horton was the agent of plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining policies of insurance and to receive notices of and agree to cancellation of policies.' But with this we are not able to agree. When the plaintiff Lauman was being cross-examined by defendant's counsel he was asked the following questions and made the following answers: 'Q. Did you tell him, Horton, to what amount to keep the insurance up? A. I asked him to place $1,000 in garment insurance. Q. You told him to keep it insured to the extent of $2,500, didn't you? A. $1,500 on building and equipment and $1,000 garment insurance. Q. And you told him to keep you insured to that extent? A. Most assuredly, if he could; they cannot always keep it. They do it to the best of their ability, I presume, but policies are sometimes canceled, and it is hard to place insurance.' Standing alone, this might support the broad assertion of appellant, but, viewed in the light of the whole testimony, we do not feel at liberty to disturb the finding of the learned trial court that 'it is not true that on the 25th day of May, 1917, the defendant duly or regularly, or at all, notified the plaintiffs, or either of them, in writing, or at all, that all liability under said policy of insurance on behalf of the defendant to said plaintiffs would cease and determine within five days after the receipt of such notice,' and 'that it is not true that said, or any such notice, was received by the plaintiffs, or either of them, on May 27, 1917, or at all.'

"The facts in the case of Ferrar v. Western Assurance Co., 30 Cal. App. 489, 159 Pac. 609, 611, to which our attention is called, were very different from those in the case at bar, in that in the case cited there was nothing to cause a conflict of ideas or opinion on the question of authority of the insurance agent to keep up the insurance, etc., and the court there found that both the evidence and the 'course of dealing' supported the conclusion there reached. In the instant case the evidence, taken as a whole, amply supports the finding of the trial court, and there is no 'course of dealing' established, except that which is in direct conflict to the position taken by defendant, as we shall presently see.

"Under those conditions we fail to see any basis for the questions objected to. There is absolutely nothing upon which Spinning could base an opinion which would justify a conclusion on his part that Horton, or Horton & Son, had authority to receive notice of cancellation for plaintiff Lauman of any policy, except as provided by the terms of the policy and in accordance with the custom and practice of the office. Indeed, Horton's act in reference to the policy here involved was a departure from that custom; and certainly there is nothing in this record which can be construed as a 'course of dealing' to authorize such. The letter of June 1, 1917, referred to above, we think speaks in stentorian tones in support of plaintiff's contention, and is a mute witness which, in our opinion, corroborates the evidence of both Horton and Spinning on this point. Especially does it point to the fact that on that date Horton & Son did not themselves believe that they had any authority to receive notice of cancellation or to cancel the policy, except by following the usual custom of the office and according to the terms of the policy. It must be obvious that had Horton & Son believed that the firm, or any member thereof, possessed such authority, there was no occasion whatever for the writing of that letter.

"Another significant fact in this case is that defendant nowhere in this record makes any attempt to show an express or direct statement or action by plaintiff authorizing Horton, or Horton & Son, to accept notice of or to agree to a cancellation; and, as we have already seen, there is a complete absence of any evidence which would authorize the departure from the regular custom and practice of the office which was proven in this case. We think the court was correct on the rulings in question.

"The record further shows that Spinning, as regards the Concordia agency, was an independent operator, and that the firm of Horton & Son was acting as broker for him. As such brokers, Horton & Son had no authority, as we have seen, to issue or cancel any Concordia policy. Under such conditions, the mere act of placing the impression of a rubber stamp 'Canceled' upon Spinning's 'Daily' by Horton, as already referred to, was unavailing. As to both the Concordia Company and plaintiff Lauman, Horton, in a legal sense, was a mere meddler or interloper. We have looked in vain for any evidence to prove the authority, ostensible or otherwise, of Horton & Son to receive notice of cancellation or to cancel any policy of insurance, particularly with respect to the policy in question. Admittedly, the only thing Spinning did was to show Horton the letter of May 25, 1917, to which we have already adverted.

"If we assume that Horton & Son was in fact Lauman's agent, then we are confronted with the query: Was this letter which they mailed June 1, 1917, to Lauman, a compliance with the terms of the policy as a notice of cancellation? Manifestly not. As we understand it, the rule is 'that an agency to procure insurance is ended when the policy is procured and delivered to the principal, and the agent has no power after the policy is so delivered to consent to a cancellation, or to accept notice of an intended cancellation by the insurer; and evidence of a usage to give notice to a broker is inadmissible, where the policy requires notice to the insured.' 14 R. C. L. § 189; Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., supra. For these reasons it follows, we think, that Horton, or Horton & Son, were not the agents, or agents with authority, to receive notice of cancellation, and, no such notice having ever been given to plaintiff, that the policy was in full force and effect at the time of the fire.

"It further occurs to us that the defense in this action—the claim that the policy was canceled, and hence void at the time of the fire—is clearly the result of an afterthought. In view of the recognition by the special agent of the company of the existence and vitality of the policy in question, admitting, as he did, the company's liability as to items 1 and 3 thereof, we cannot escape this conclusion. Had the company considered the policy canceled, then it doubtless would have taken the position that there was nothing to negotiate, and denied all liability. This it did not do."

[4-6] Upon a careful reconsideration of respondents' contentions (1) that there is evidence in the record to sustain the finding of the trial court as to item 2 of the covering clause of the policy, and (2) that the defendant company, by its failure specifically to disagree with the amount claimed by the assured under this item of the policy, is deemed to have assented thereto, we conclude that both should be sustained. Item 2 of the policy covers loss to the extent of $1,000 in merchandise of every description contained in the building, provided the insured shall be liable by law, for loss or damage thereto or shall have specifically assumed liability therefor. The court found that, under this item, the plaintiff paid or assumed claims of third persons, to whom he was responsible for goods destroyed by the fire, aggregating $1,000, the full amount of the insurance covered by item 2. Appellant contends that no proof of the value of the goods lost was submitted, and that therefore the finding is not justified by the evidence.

The policy contains the following provision:

"Ascertainment of Amount of Loss.—This company shall be deemed to have assented to the amount of the loss claimed by the insured in his preliminary proof of loss, unless within twenty days after the receipt thereof, or, if verified amendments have been requested, within twenty days after their receipt, or within twenty days after the receipt of an affidavit that the insured is unable to furnish such amendments, the company shall notify the insured in writing of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of loss claimed by him, and shall also notify the insured in writing of the amount of loss, if any, the company admits on each of the different articles or properties set forth in the preliminary proof or amendments thereto."

After receiving the preliminary proof of loss, the adjuster for defendant wrote to Lauman as follows:

"The aforesaid Concordia Fire Insurance Company disagrees with you as to the amount of the loss and damage claimed by you on any and all articles covered under the second item of the form as attached to the policy and > described as 'merchandise,' and does not admit that you sustained any loss or damage under this item by reason of said fire, as you have failed to show that the goods destroyed or damaged were your property or that you were liable by law for any loss or damage to said goods, or that at any time prior to the date of the fire you had specifically assumed liability therefor, nor do you furnish any evidence as to your liability to others in event said goods were held by you in trust at the time of the fire."

Thus, the insurance company confined its objection to the payment of loss under this item to the specific reasons set forth in the letter, namely, the failure of the insured to show that the goods destroyed or damaged were his property, or that he was liable by law for any loss or damage to the goods, or that he had specifically assumed liability therefor. No objection is made in the letter to the amount of any loss, but is based solely on the reasons stated. Proof was made that the plaintiff had assumed liability for the goods destroyed, and no contention is urged against the sufficiency of the evidence to support the court's finding to that effect. The proof of loss set forth in detail the items paid by plaintiff to third persons; and if the insurance company intended to contest the amount of any particular item, it was required, under the terms of the policy, to specify the amount of loss it admitted on such item, otherwise it must be deemed to have assented to the amount of the loss sustained on all items to which no specific objection was made. A general denial of all liability would not meet the requirements of its obligation under the policy to designate the different articles for which it disclaimed liability. Victoria Park Co. v. Continental Insurance Co., 39 Cal. App. 347, 178 Pac. 724.

Moreover, we believe that the evidence adduced by plaintiffs in support of the proof of loss was sufficient to support the finding. Over 200 pages of the reporter's transcript are devoted to the testimony of witnesses regarding the amount of their claims for goods destroyed. Receipts from various parties showing payments aggregating an amount in excess of the policy were introduced in evidence without objection on the part of defendant. The proof of loss set out in detail the several items so paid, and summarized the total loss as follows:

60 suits of clothes	1800	1200	1200

The plaintiff Lauman was asked this question:

> "I will ask you if that information, that data, and those schedules and proofs of loss, were true at the time you furnished them, according to your best knowledge, information, and belief?"

—to which he answered:

> "At that time they were furnished to the best of my knowledge and belief as correct."

While in many instances the witnesses did not testify directly as to the value of the goods, the fact that they had submitted claims for the amount of their losses, and that their receipts had been introduced and received in evidence without objection, and that the witnesses were not cross-examined as to values, taken in conjunction with the proof of loss and the testimony last above quoted, is, we think, sufficient to sustain the finding as to item 2 of the policy, which is the basis of this litigation.

[7, 8] From the record it appears that considerable time was consumed in the trial of the case. The presumption is that private transactions have been fair and regular. This presumption, if not controverted, is satisfactory. The time to raise the point of the competency of the evidence concerning the item now under consideration, if considered not competent, was during the trial of this case. "The defendant cannot remain silent and take the chance of a favorable issue, and, losing, urge as a ground for reversal an error which, but for his silence, might never have found its way into the case. His failure to object justly gives rise to the inference that at the time he saw no injury being done him, and he cannot complain on being met here by a barrier arising from his own omission." People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842. This ruling, a fortiori, is, we think, especially applicable here.

STIRNUS v. ADAMS et al. (Civ. 3567.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1012(2) — Conclusions supported by evidence not disturbed, though court believes preponderance the other way.

Where there is sufficient evidence of tangible weight to support the conclusion of the trial court, it is not within the province of the Court of Appeal to disturb the findings, though it believes that the preponderance of the evidence is against the findings.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(5) — Belief of truth of representations or ignorance of falsity immaterial.

Under Civ. Code, § 1572, a positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, if made to induce another to enter into a land contract, is actual fraud invalidating the contract, though the party making the assertion believed it to be true, or did not know that it was false.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑36(2)—False assertion of matters of fact to induce contract held to authorize cancellation.

Positive assertion of matters of fact by a vendor's agent to the purchaser concerning the condition of an orchard about which the purchaser had no knowledge, when false and made for the purpose of inducing the purchaser to enter into the contract, and when believed by him, justifies a cancellation of the contract.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(6)—Misrepresentations held material.

Statements by a vendor's agent that the age of an orchard was only 15 years when it was between 25 and 30 years old, and that there was nothing wrong with it when it was in a diseased, infected, and run-down condition, were misstatements of material facts justifying a rescission.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑36(1)—Purchaser entitled to rescind if property would have been worth more if representations true.

One induced to purchase land by false representations may recover back the amount paid by him if the property would have been worth more if the representations had been true, though the property is worth the agreed purchase price.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(4)—Purchaser entitled to rely on vendor's representations.

Where a purchaser of land, though visiting it on several occasions, was, to the knowledge of the vendor's agent, unable to judge for himself as to the real condition of an orchard because of his entire lack of experience in horticulture, he was justified in relying on the agent's positive statements as to the age of the trees and that there was nothing wrong with the orchard.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑334(2)—Purchaser entitled to recover amount paid when representations false.

When representations by a vendor or his agent concerning land could not be made good by them, they could not in equity and good conscience retain the payment made on the land by the purchaser, where he refused to complete the contract.

8. Principal and agent 🔑156—Vendor's agent participating in fraud liable for return of payment by purchaser.

Under Civ. Code, § 2343, as to agent's responsibility to third persons, a vendor's agent who participated in fraudulent representations, whereby a purchaser was induced to purchase, was equally responsible with the vendor for the return of money paid by the purchaser, though he acted as agent and had paid the money over to his principal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by H. O. Stirnus against M. O. Adams and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. R. Gilbert and Geo. J. Steiger, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. P. Dessouslavy and P. A. Bergerot, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BARDIN, Justice pro tem. In this action the plaintiff filed his complaint praying for judgment against the defendants in the sum of $1,000 as money had and received by them to and for the use of the plaintiff. The defendants admitted receipt of the sum stated, but denied any liability to plaintiff upon the ground that this sum represented the amount of a deposit paid upon a certain contract of sale of real property belonging to defendant Adams, and which defendant Lyon, as agent, had sold to the plaintiff, and which sum it was agreed would be forfeited by the purchaser (one-half thereof to each of defendants), if he failed to complete the terms of the agreement of sale. The real property referred to contained approximately 19 acres of land, practically all of which was planted as an orchard.

The defendant Lyon filed a cross-complaint, alleging, in effect, among other things, the promise of the plaintiff to pay to Lyon, in the event that plaintiff breached his contract of purchase, the further sum of $1,250 as a broker's commission for negotiating the sale. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, alleging that the contract was procured by reason of the fraudulent representations of the defendants as to the quality of the said orchard. Upon the issues in this manner framed the case was tried and judgment followed in favor of the plaintiff.

The court found upon the issues of fraud substantially as follows: That prior to the signing of the agreement of the purchase of said real property the defendants falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that the trees in said orchard were about 15 years old, whereas the same were in fact 25 to 30 years old; that prior to such signing said Lyon, as the agent of said Adams, falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that said orchard was a first-class orchard, in the best possible condition, and that there was nothing wrong with it; that in fact the trees in said orchard were badly sunburnt, due to insufficient moisture and to long-continued failure to prevent or obviate the effects of such sunburn; that a large number of the trees had been seriously injured by the pest known as the "peach borer"; that said orchard was largely infected with oak root fungus, and with black knot or crown gall; that the trees in said orchard were stunted and underdeveloped, and that said orchard was not a first-class orchard, or even an average orchard, but was in a poor, diseased, and infected condition; that said representations were false and untrue, and were known by defendants so to be, and were so made to induce plaintiff's execution of said agreement. And it was further found that "plaintiff was entirely without experience in regard to orchards, and in agreeing to purchase said property relied solely upon the aforesaid misrepresentations of defendant."

No complaint is made against the findings of the court with respect to the formal steps taken for the rescission of the agreement, or the promptitude with which plaintiff acted in that behalf.

[1] As might well be expected in such a case as this, the testimony was in sharp conflict as to whether the defendants had made the representations charged against them. But a careful reading of the record reveals sufficient evidence of tangible weight to support the conclusions of the trial court. Under such circumstances it is not within our province to disturb the findings, even though we should believe that the preponderance of the evidence adduced inclined the scales to tip the other way. And we are not unmindful of the requirements as to the degree of proof required to support findings of fraud.

It is urged by the appellants that the findings to the effect that defendant Lyon knew that the representations referred to were untrue do not find proper support in the evidence, and that for a like reason the finding that Lyon made the representation that the trees were 15 years of age must fall. There is evidence of substantial weight which establishes that Lyon, in fact, did state, not as his opinion, but as a fact, that the orchard referred to was a first-class orchard, in the best of condition, well taken care of and about 15 years old, when, as a matter of fact, the orchard was in the condition and of the age stated in the findings of the court already set out.

[2] It is no answer to the charge that one has made false representations to say that it has not been shown that the misstatements complained of were known to be false by the one charged with the offense. A positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, even though he believes it to be true, if made in order to induce another to enter into a contract, constitutes actual fraud. Section 1572, Civ. Code. Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the party charged with fraud did not know that what he stated was false, or that he believed it to be true. Groppengiesser v. Lake, 103 Cal. 37, 36 Pac. 1036.

[3] This is not such a case as Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 Pac. 300, where it was held that expressions of opinion, even though they be the "exaggerated, and it may be the reckless, declarations of an eager trader, holding out the golden promise of profit to induce a sale," cannot be made the predicate to avoid a sale upon the ground of false or fraudulent representations. The statements complained of here, as shown from the circumstances of the case, were positive assertions of matters of fact, not of opinion, and related, too, to material facts about which the purchaser had no knowledge. They were made for the purpose of inducing the purchaser to enter into the contract of purchase. These statements were believed by plaintiff, and by reason thereof he entered into the contract and parted with the money sued for. While the power to cancel a contract should be hesitatingly exercised, this seems to be a proper case for rescission.

[4] It is not necessary to here go into a precise or extended analysis as to whether all the misstatements attributed to the defendants had relation to statements of fact. The statement that the age of the orchard was only 15 years, when it was in fact between 25 and 30 years old, and that there was nothing wrong with it, when, on the contrary, it was in the diseased and infected and run-down condition disclosed by the evidence and findings, each, under the circumstances of this case, constituted misstatements of material facts sufficient of themselves to constitute ground for the rescission of the contract. Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 Pac. 1047.

[5] In order to permit the plaintiff to recover it was not essential, as claimed by the defendants, that he show that the property purchased was worth less than the agreed purchase price. As stated in Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 Pac. 1047:

> "It is enough that he was induced, by false representations, to buy property which would, if the representations had been true, have been worth more than it actually was worth"—citing Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011.

[6, 7] The finding of the court that the plaintiff relied solely upon the statements of the defendants as to the condition of the orchard is amply sustained by the record. And while it is true that the plaintiff visited the orchard on several occasions previous to executing the agreement of purchase, he was, on account of his entire lack of experience in horticulture, known to defendant Lyon, unable to judge for himself, as to its real condition, or to see the things that actually condemned it for his purposes. He was justified, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, in relying upon the statements of material facts already referred to, and since the defendants were unable to make their representations good, they should not, in equity and good conscience, be permitted to retain the moneys which have come into their hands by reason of their misconduct.

[8] Defendant Lyon cannot escape liability on account of having acted as the agent of his codefendant in inducing the plaintiff to enter into the contract of purchase, nor because he paid the money over to his principal. He knowingly participated in the transaction, held to have been fraudulent, and is equally responsible with his codefendant for the return of the money. Mechem on Agency, 1458; Moore v. Shields, 121 Ind. 267, 23 N. E. 89; Gray v. Ellis, 164 Cal. 481, 129 Pac. 791; 2 C. J. 827; section 2343, Civ. Code.

McINERNEY v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3598.)

1. False imprisonment ⚷15(3)—Railroad held liable for assault and arrest by guards employed during strike.

Where a street railroad, during a strike, employed guards, acting under instructions from the president, when sent to a section of city where attacks had been made upon the railroad's employees and cars, the railroad was liable for the acts of such guards who assaulted and arrested a pedestrian in the mistaken belief that he was one of the strikers and had participated in the attacks; such assault and arrest being within the scope of their authority, regardless of the mistake.

2. False imprisonment ⚷15(3) — Employer liable for wrongful arrest by employees though done with undue violence.

Where employees were acting within the scope of their authority in taking into custody a person believed to be guilty of unlawful acts, the fact that they did so with undue violence or with insulting speech did not absolve employer of liability for the wrongful action in the course of making the arrest.

3. False imprisonment ⚷31—Evidence held insufficient to warrant exemplary damages for malice.

In action against a street railroad for assault and false imprisonment by its guards employed to protect property during a strike, evidence held insufficient to show malice, fraud, or oppression, so as to warrant a verdict for exemplary damages.

4. Corporations ⚷498—When corporation liable in exemplary damages.

A corporation may become liable in exemplary damages where an act of one of its employees done in ill will, or in actual malice, or under circumstances of fraud or oppression, is done with the knowledge or under the express direction of its superior officials having power to bind the corporation, or if done without such knowledge of direction is thereafter ratified by such officials, with full knowledge as to the willful and malicious quality of such acts.

5. Master and servant ⚷333—Employer sued with employee for acts of employee done under directions not exonerated by verdict for employee.

In action against employer and employee for assault and false arrest of plaintiff by employee under express directions of employer, the verdict of the jury in favor of the employee did not exonerate the employer from liability; the employer in such case being sued as a joint participant in the wrongful acts.

6. Costs ⚷241—No costs to either party on appeal where item of $500 was stricken from judgment.

In an action for assault and false imprisonment, where plaintiff was awarded $2,000 as compensatory damages and $500 as exemplary damages, the appellate court, in modifying the judgment by striking therefrom the item of $500 assessed as exemplary damages, will require each party to pay its costs on appeal.

Action by Michael McInerney against the United Railroads of San Francisco and others. Judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

Wm. M. Cannon and Wm. M. Abbott, both of San Francisco (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action for damages for an alleged assault and false imprisonment. The cause was tried before a jury, which awarded the plaintiff the sum of $2,000 as compensatory damages and $500 as exemplary damages.

There were four defendants other than the appellant herein who were at the time of the plaintiff's alleged injuries its employees. As to three of these—Henry Jones, M. Glennon, and John W. Lynch—a nonsuit was granted. As to the other codefendant, Charles G. Fitch, the verdict of the jury was in his favor. A motion for a new trial was made by the other defendant United Railroads, which the trial court denied, whereupon this appeal was taken.

The alleged assault upon and imprisonment of the plaintiff from which his claim for damages arose occurred in the city of San Francisco on the evening of August 22, 1917. A strike was at that time in progress among many of the employees of the United Railroads. This strike was being resisted by the latter, which, with the aid of its nonstriking employees and other persons replacing the strikers, was endeavoring to operate its cars upon the streets of said city, and also to resist assaults upon those attempting to operate its system, and to prevent threatened injury to or destruction of its cars and other property. It was a time of violence on both sides of the controversy. On the part of the strikers and their sympathizers frequent assaults were being made upon those who were replacing them upon the cars, during which weapons were freely used and missiles thrown, striking the cars, breaking their windows, and otherwise mutilating and rendering unserviceable the railroad property. On the part of the railroad vigorous efforts were being made to protect its employees from assault and its property from destruction, and otherwise to discourage the strikers, and arrest or disperse those indulging in or disposed to violent or destructive acts. The president of the United Railroads corporation had instructed his immediate subordinates to employ guards and to "spare no expense necessary to keep the cars running or necessary for the protection of passengers or the company's employees or the company's property."

On the afternoon of the day upon which the plaintiff received the injuries of which he complains, Charles G. Fitch, one of the defendants herein, was employed by the United Railroads in the capacity of foreman in charge of the stables and garage of his employer located on Turk street between Webster and Fillmore streets, in said city which was at the time the headquarters of a considerable number of men who were being used as patrolmen and guards to protect the other men and the property of the corporation from acts of violence on the part of the strikers, such as rock throwing at the cars and assaults upon their crews. Acting upon instructions from Mr. Ewing, who, as superintendent of construction and equipment of the railroad, was his immediate superior, Mr. Fitch sent out from said place at 7:30 o'clock on the evening in question an automobile in charge of M. Glennon as driver, with some six or seven other persons as occupants, some of whom were codefendants herein, with instructions, to use his own words, "to do patrol work on the street, to try and protect the property in any way they could—I would not say in any way they could, but to do anything they reasonably could to stop windows from being broken, crews pulled off cars; to help them out." This automobile with its crew of men was to operate on and in the vicinity of Haight street. About the time of this assault the plaintiff, who it appears was an employee of a publishing house and was in no way connected with either the strikers or the defendant, was walking out Haight street towards Scott street, and thence to Page street, with several friends, who were also in no way connected with the strikers or strike, on the way to the rooms of some of their number for a social evening. While passing along Scott street near Page the automobile driven by the defendant Glennon, and in which were the men sent out by the defendant Fitch as aforesaid, drove up and stopped near the plaintiff and his companions, when several of its occupants got out, and, laying hold of the plaintiff, made a violent assault upon him, striking him over the head so as to render him unconscious, and throwing him into the car and holding him there, while the machine made off in the direction of the stables and garage from which it had been sent forth. Upon the plaintiff's partial recovery of consciousness he began to struggle and call for help, when he was again violently assaulted by his captors, with violent and abusive epithets; when the machine with its occupants reached the gate of the stables and garage they found it closed, but it was opened upon signal to admit the car and immediately closed again, not, however, until the plaintiff by his cries had attracted the attention of two policemen, who forced their way into the inclosure, and, taking the plaintiff from his captors, went at once with him and them into the office of the defendant Fitch. Upon arriving in the latter's presence the plaintiff's assailants accused him of being "one of the fellows throwing rocks at the Haight street car." This the plaintiff denied as best he could in his battered condition, whereupon Fitch, apparently believing the accusation, said to the policemen, according to the plaintiff's testimony, "Those fellows are there to prove it; I want to arrest this man and bringing him up in court;" whereupon the policemen took the plaintiff to the emergency hospital, where he was temporarily treated, and thence to the city prison, where he was searched and locked up, remaining in jail about two hours, when he was released on bail. The next morning he was present in the police court, when it appeared that no charge had been made against him, but Mr. James F. Sheehan, an attorney regularly employed by the United Railroads, was present, and, according to the plaintiff's testimony, made the statement that, "I have information that this man (referring to plaintiff) was throwing bricks at a Turk and Eddy street car. I am not ready to prove it now. I want the case put back until Saturday morning." The plaintiff's case was accordingly continued to that time, when Sheehan again was present, and repeated, in substance, his former statement, with a request for a further continuance, which was granted, until the following Monday morning, when, no complaint having yet been filed, the case was dismissed. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action for damages for his personal injuries and for his false imprisonment, alleging that these acts committed against him were willful and malicious on the part of the defendants, and praying for both compensatory and exemplary damages.

The foregoing are substantially the facts of the case as they appeared at the trial. The defendants, both in their answers and in their evidence, denied that any other instructions or authority than that above set forth had been given either to the defendant Fitch or to those whom he had sent forth in the automobile on the occasion of their assault upon the plaintiff and of his capture and detention. They also denied that these acts of assault and detention were done either willfully or maliciously by the defendants or by their authority, so as to entitle the plaintiff to exemplary damages. The jury, however, returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for both forms of damage as above set forth.

[1] The first contention urged by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to show that the United Railroads ever authorized the occupants of the machine or any of them to assault or imprison the plaintiff. We are unable to sustain this contention. The time of the duration of the railroad strike, which had been in progress for some 11 days prior to the date of the plaintiff's injuries, was, as we have said, a time of violence, during which the employees of the railroad were being frequently attacked, and its cars were being fired upon and struck with stones and other missiles, to their great damage, in some cases well-nigh destruction. In resisting a strike attended with violent acts of this character it became necessary for the railroad to employ many persons to act as patrolmen and guards for the protection of their nonstriking employees and such of the traveling public as might have the hardihood to become its passengers, and of their cars and other property from destruction. It may be said incidentally that the employment of these persons for the above express purposes had also as its more or less essential purpose that of discouraging and rendering ineffectual the strike itself. Under these conditions and with these objects in view the president of the corporation issued the general order to his subordinates above set forth. It was under this general instruction that there had been assembled at the stables and garage of the corporation on Turk street a company of approximately 100 men, who were to act under the direction of Charles G. Fitch, foreman in charge there, as patrolmen and guards. It was also under this general instruction of the president of the corporation that Mr. Ewing, Fitch's immediate superior in authority, acted in instructing the latter to send forth the automobile with its driver and occupants to patrol Haight street between Market and Stanyan streets a short while before the assault upon the plaintiff. The immediate reason for sending this party of seven or more patrolmen and guards to this region was that violent attacks upon the railroad servants and cars were being made or threatened in that immediate vicinity at the time. The object of thus dispatching this body of men to the scene of existing or impending turmoil is a matter of easy inference. They were sent there by Mr. Fitch, under the most favorable statement of his instructions as testified to by himself, "to do anything they reasonably could to stop windows from being broken, crews pulled off; to help them out." It cannot be conceived that under these instructions those men arriving at the scene of disorderly action would be expected by their superior to confine themselves to merely remonstrating with the strikers or their sympathizers, to the use of moral suasion as the most reasonable means of preventing violent attacks upon the railroad's employees or property. The objects of their engagement and presence at the point of disturbance could not thus have been attained. It was clearly within the scope, if not within the express letter, of their employment that they should meet force with force, and that finding a striker or his sympathizers in the act of attacking their employer's servants, or throwing stones or other missiles at its cars, they should do whatever the occasion required to put a stop to his unlawful activities and prevent a recurrence of them upon his part. Armed with these implied, if not express, powers, this body of men came upon the plaintiff just off Haight street, and, apparently acting upon the mistaken belief that he was one of those who had been but recently engaged in stoning their employer's cars, undertook to put a stop to his pernicious activities and to have him put in jail for his unlawful acts. They proceeded, therefore, to take him into custody. It is true that they were utterly mistaken in regarding him as one of the strikers or as one of their sympathizers or allies in the attack. It is true also that their methods of achievement of their object and their method of arrest were ruffianly and inexcusable, but they were, nevertheless, acting within the scope of their authority regardless of the fact that they were mistaken as to the identity and guilt of their victim. Johnston v. Chicago, etc., 130 Wis. 492, 110 N. W. 424; Robards v. P. B. Pipe Works, 130 Ky. 380, 113 S. W. 429, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923, 132 Am. St. Rep. 394; Conchin v. El Paso, etc., R. R. Co., 13 Ariz. 259, 108 Pac. 260, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 88; American Express Co. v. Patterson, 73 Ind. 430.

The cases which are cited by the appellant as sustaining its above contention do not support it, since in each of said cases the act of the employee was clearly outside of the scope of his authority. The case of Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154, is a fair sample of these. That was a case where the plaintiff was a guest at the defendant's hotel, and while seated at the dinner table was assaulted and beaten by a dining room waiter. Mr. Chief Justice Beatty, in deciding the case, very aptly said:

> "By the general law of master and servant the master is not liable for the malicious torts of the servant committed outside the scope of his employment. The wrongful act must be one which the servant is empowered under some circumstances to do."

So in the case at bar we think that if these employees of the railroad had come upon the plaintiff while in the act of stoning their employer's cars, or immediately thereafter, they would have been authorized by the nature of their employment to put a stop by force, if necessary, to his pernicious activity, and take him into custody for the purpose of turning him over to the authorities; and, this being so, the fact that they were mistaken in his identity as a wrongdoer does not affect their employer's liability for their acts.

What we have said above applies also to the appellant's next two contentions, since we are satisfied that the evidence sufficiently shows that the arrest and detention of the plaintiff by his captors at Scott street, and by the police officers within the appellant's quarters on Turk street, were authorized and ratified by the action and direction of the appellant's foreman, Mr. Fitch, under the belief that the plaintiff had been guilty of stoning the cars of his employer. The case of Lezinsky v. Street Ry. Co., 88 Fed. 437, 31 C. C. A. 573, is not authority for the appellant's contention in the above regard, for the reason that the acts of the employee in that case were clearly beyond the scope of his employment, and hence the liability of his employer depended solely upon its subsequent ratification of his unauthorized act, which is not the case at bar.

[2] The next contention of the appellant has reference to the alleged error of the trial court in giving two certain instructions with respect to the liability of the appellant for the acts of its employees done within the scope of their employment, but in excess of their express direction. These instructions appear to have reference to that margin of excessive zeal which not infrequently attends the execution of an employer's instructions, but does not lie beyond the scope of his employment, as, in the case at bar, if, as we have held, the appellant's employees were acting within the scope of their authority in taking into custody a person believed to be guilty of unlawful acts, the fact that they did so with undue violence or with opprobrious and insulting forms of speech would not absolve their employer for their wrongful action in the course of making the arrest. Turner v. N. B., etc., Co., 34 Cal. 599.

The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in giving the instructions which it gave upon the subject of exemplary damages. The appellant's objection goes not to the form or substance of these instructions, but is based upon its claim that as against this appellant there is no sufficient evidence of malice or oppression to justify any verdict for exemplary damages, and hence the instructions upon that subject should not have been given.

It is sufficient to say that as to both the appellant and its codefendant Fitch the question of the right of the plaintiff to exemplary damages was an expressly pleaded and hotly contested issue in the case; and, this being so, we think the case ought not to be reversed because such an instruction was given, even if we should conclude upon a close examination of the law and facts of the case that there was not sufficient evidence to uphold the verdict against this particular appellant for exemplary damages.

This brings us to the precise question as to whether or not there was sufficient evidence in this regard to have justified any verdict against this appellant for such damages.

[3] Without undertaking to recite or review in extenso the evidence in this case, we deem it sufficient to say that in our opinion there is no sufficient evidence of malice, fraud, or oppression on the part of this appellant against the plaintiff herein to warrant a verdict for exemplary damages in any sum. As between this plaintiff and this appellant, no relation whatever is shown out of which any imputation of actual ill will or malice could arise; nor is there a particle of evidence of personal ill will or malice as between any of the appellant's officers, agents, or employees and this plaintiff. He was apparently unknown to each and every one of them up to and including the moment of his assault and detention; nor is there a particle of evidence that in making such assault and detention his captors and assailants bore toward him any other ill will or malice than they or any of them would have nourished and manifested toward any other person actively engaged in the unlawful diversion of destroying the property of their employer. That they may have acted with unnecessary force and violence in assaulting and arresting the plaintiff would not suffice to justify a verdict against this appellant for exemplary damages, in the absence of a showing that the superior officers of the corporation, having authority to bind it by their directions to its subordinate employees, had either expressly sanctioned these excessive acts of violence, or had subsequently ratified the same with a full knowledge of their unlawful extent and character. It is, however, claimed by the respondent that there is sufficient evidence of such ratification as will suffice to uphold the verdict for exemplary damages rendered against the appellant herein, and that it is to be found in three distinct forms in this record. The first of these is in the evidence of the action of the defendant Fitch when the battered and bloody plaintiff was brought into his presence by his captors and assailants. There is no proof that Fitch had any prior or other knowledge of him, or bore any ill will or malice toward him than that engendered by the assertions of his subordinates that he had been seized and brought into his presence as one guilty of stoning his employer's cars. Had he been so guilty, the action of Fitch in insisting upon his further arrest and punishment at the hands of the public officers and administrators of justice would have been justified, and could not be urged as any evidence of either ill will, fraud, oppression, or malice, either chargeable to him or imputable to his employer.

The second set of facts upon which the respondent relies refers to the acts and conduct of James F. Sheehan, one of the appellant's attorneys, in court on the following day and the next two or three days, wherein he sought to have the plaintiff held for trial upon the charge of stoning the cars of the appellant. The action of said Sheehan in that regard cannot, however, be held to amount to a ratification of any prior wrongful acts on the part of the appellant's other employees so as to render it liable in exemplary damages, for the twofold reason that as an attorney at law the said Sheehan had no authority to bind the appellant to a ratification of any such acts, and that, even if he had been shown to possess such authority, he is not shown to have acted with full or any knowledge of the said wrongful acts which it is claimed were ratified by what he said and did on those occasions.

The third set of facts upon which the respondent bases his claim of right to exemplary damages founded upon the alleged ratification of the acts of Fitch and his subordinates consists in the showing that said Fitch was subsequently advanced by the appellant to a superior position in its employment after the appellant is claimed to have had full knowledge of the circumstances, extent, and gravity of the plaintiff's injuries. We are satisfied, however, that the advancement of said Fitch, depending, as it well might, upon conditions entirely removed from any connection with plaintiff or his case, could not be sufficient in itself to give rise to an inference that said Fitch had been advanced as a mark of approval or by way of reward for his acts and conduct in relation to the plaintiff's assault and arrest.

[4] Our conclusion therefore is that there was no sufficient evidence in this case upon which to base the verdict rendered therein against the appellant for exemplary damages in any sum. In arriving at this conclusion we have given particular attention to the case of Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 Pac. 530, and to the very full discussion therein contained as to the application to be given to the provisions of section 3294 of the Civil Code, and as to the principles controlling the proof and finding of such actual ill will, malice in fact, evil motive, or malignant fraud or oppression, as will suffice to sustain a verdict for exemplary damages. It is to be remembered that this appellant is a corporation, and while it is undoubtedly the law that a corporation may become liable in exemplary damages where an act of one of its employees, done in ill will or in actual malice or under circumstances of fraud or oppression, is done with the knowledge or under the express direction of its superior officials having power to bind the corporation, or, if done without such knowledge or direction, is thereafter ratified by such officials, with full knowledge as to the willful and malicious quality of such acts, no such conditions are presented by the evidence in the case at bar.

It follows that the judgment must be modified by striking therefrom the specific portion thereof which awards exemplary damages to the respondent.

[5] This brings us to the final contention urged by the appellant, which is that, since the jury by its verdict in favor of the appellant's codefendant Fitch exonerated the latter from liability for the injuries of which the plaintiff complains, it must necessarily be held to have also exonerated the appellant as the employer of Fitch from liability for his acts as its employee. In making this contention the appellant relies upon the cases of Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 97 Pac. 875, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171, and Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 567, 161 Pac. 21, and also upon certain cases cited from other jurisdictions. These cases are, however, distinguishable and are in fact distinguished from the case at bar under the authority of Benson v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 777, 171 Pac. 948, wherein it is stated that, where the act of the employee was one for which the employer was liable only under the application of the rule of respondeat superior, the doctrine laid down in Bradley v. Rosenthal and the other above-cited cases might be applied; but that the principle invoked in those cases was not to be given application to a case where the employee was acting under the direction of his employer, who was therefore liable not merely under the rule of respondeat superior, but rather as a joint participant in the acts complained of, as where the act was that of an employee of a railroad in running a train at a negligent rate of speed, and was done under the rules of the railroad requiring such a speed. This principle and the case of Benson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, which sustains it, have application, in our opinion, to the facts of the case at bar. The defendant Fitch, in sending forth patrolmen and guards, who wrongfully assaulted and falsely imprisoned the plaintiff, was acting under the general directions of the superior officials of the appellant, which directions, under the circumstances attending their issuance, were broad enough to contemplate the use of force and violence if necessary in repelling the assaults of strikers or their sympathizers upon those operating the appellant's cars, or in arresting such of these as were injuring or destroying its property. In carrying into effect these instructions Fitch and his underlings were but obeying orders, and if they exceeded their duty in so doing through a mistaken excess of zeal their principal would be liable not merely under the doctrine of respondeat superior, but as a joint participant in their wrongful acts.

We think that any further points urged by the appellant are covered by the foregoing discussion.

[6] The judgment will be modified by striking therefrom the item of $500 assessed as exemplary damages, but as to the other items thereof will be and is hereby affirmed; each party to pay its costs upon this appeal.

ANDREWS v. PANAMA OIL CO. et al.

1. Corporations 🔑232(3)—Stockholders held not liable for excess of par value of stock over property delivered therefor.

Directors of a corporation may be honestly mistaken as to the value of property taken in exchange for corporate stock, and, in the absence of proof that their overvaluation was not the result of innocent mistake, the stockholders cannot be held liable to corporate creditors for any difference between the true worth of the property and the par value of the stock; it not being sufficient to prove merely that the property was overvalued in the exchange, and the fraudulent intent must be clearly shown.

2. Corporations 🔑269(1)—Burden of proving notice of overvaluation of property given for stock on one asserting fraud.

The burden of alleging and proving notice of overvaluation of property given for corporate stock by stockholders who are not subscribers to the stock is cast on the party who would advantage himself of the responsibility resulting from the fraud.

3. Corporations 🔑244(7)—Innocent purchaser of stock not liable for difference between true worth of property and par value.

Stockholders who are not subscribers to the stock of a corporation do not assume the unpaid portion of the subscription price, when it appears they have accepted stock ostensibly fully paid, but in reality issued as such in exchange for property at a gross overvaluation, where they have no knowledge of the transaction through which the watered stock was issued.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Claud B. Andrews against the Panama Oil Company, and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry K. Norton, Roy V. Rhodes, and Wilbur Bassett, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John A. Powell, Goodwin & Morgrage, and C. C. Mishler, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WELLER, J. Plaintiff seeks by this suit to subject alleged unpaid subscriptions of the defendants, as stockholders, to the payment of the corporation's indebtedness. The Panama Oil Company was organized under the laws of California in May, 1912, with an authorized capital stock of 2,000,000 shares, of the par value of $1 each. On May 24, 1912, one J. B. Hedrick offered to transfer to the corporation, in exchange for all of its capital stock fully paid, certain property, consisting of stock in another oil company, an option in favor of Hedrick and a lease on oil lands in Kern county. The board of directors of the Panama Oil Company accepted this offer, reciting in the resolution of acceptance that in their opinion the property offered was worth fully the sum of $2,000,000. Pursuant to the order of the board of directors, all of the stock was issued to Hedrick as fully paid, on his conveying to the corporation the property offered in exchange. Thereafter the Panama Oil Company became indebted to the American Contracting & Drilling Company, and, on July 12, 1913, in full payment and satisfaction of its indebtedness, executed to the latter corporation its promissory note for the sum of $11,525.03, due six months after date, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum. This note was assigned, in good faith and for value, before its maturity, to the American Well & Prospecting Company, and by it transferred to the plaintiff for collection after it became due by its terms. On March 6, 1916, the Panama Oil Company forfeited its charter for nonpayment of its license tax, being at that time and ever since wholly insolvent and without assets of any kind. The defendants, other than Wilbert Morgrage, became the owners of stock in the Panama Oil Company through purchase from Hedrick or his assigns, subsequent to the transaction by which he acquired the stock.

The court found that Morgrage never was a stockholder of the corporation. This finding is attacked as not being justified by the evidence; but, for reasons which will presently appear, it is unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the evidence on this point. It was stipulated at the trial that at the time the stock was issued to Hedrick, the real market value of the property exchanged by him for the stock was $500,000, and that the American Contracting & Drilling Company accepted the note with full knowledge that all of the stock of the Panama Oil Company had been issued to Hedrick as fully paid and nonassessable, in exchange for property of the market value of $500.000 and no more.

It is not alleged in the complaint that any of the defendants were aware of the dealings between the Panama Oil Company and Hedrick, and no proof was offered tending to show that any of them had any knowledge or notice of the manner in which Hedrick became the owner of the stock. The complaint does not aver that the defendants were subscribers to the stock, but states merely that on the 4th day of March, 1914, they were the owners and holders of stock of the Panama Oil Company. We are unable to determine from the record that any of the defendants was a stockholder at the time of the execution of the note on which plaintiff sues, or that credit was extended to the corporation on the faith of their unpaid subscriptions. As we understand the theory of plaintiff, gathered from the record and the briefs, it is contended that, where stock is exchanged for property, a conclusive presumption of fraud arises upon a showing of disparity between the actual value of the property and the par value of the stock, creating a personal liability for the difference which attaches to the holder of any stock so issued, regardless of his knowledge of or participation in the transaction. The complaint alleges merely that the corporation had not received from the defendants, or the former owners of the stock, more than 25 cents per share. No proof appears in the record of bad faith on the part of the directors who acted on Hedrick's offer. The inference of fraud must rest entirely upon the fact that the property received in exchange for the stock was overvalued, as shown by the stipulation that it was worth only $500,000.

[1-3] Expressions of the courts in some of the earlier cases in this state might seem to imply force to appellant's argument. The trend of the later decisions, however, is to apply to this class of cases the same principles as pertain to fraud in other business dealings. It is not sufficient to prove merely that property was overvalued in an exchange for stock, but it must be clearly shown that it was done with fraudulent intent. Directors may be honestly mistaken as to the value of the property, and in the absence of proof that their overvaluation was not the result of an innocent mistake, the stockholders cannot be held liable for any difference between the true worth of the property and the par value of the stock. Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265. Stockholders who are not subscribers to the stock of a corporation are held to assume the unpaid portion of the subscription price when it appears they have accepted stock ostensibly fully paid, but in reality issued as such in exchange for property at a gross overvaluation, with knowledge of the transaction through which the watered stock was issued. Such guilty knowledge is essential to bind the purchaser of watered stock to respond to an equitable call in behalf of the creditors of the corporation. The burden of alleging and proving notice of the taint in the original transaction in cast upon the party who would advantage himself of the responsibility resulting from the fraud. Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 194 Pac. 11. Any other rule would subject the prospective purchaser of stock in a corporation to unjust hardship. He would not be permitted to rely upon the records of the corporation, but would be required to investigate the bona fides of all trades previously made by the company, and, in addition, have an appraisement of all its property, at the time of its acquisition, under penalty of assuming to pay any difference between the value of the property and the stock issued in payment therefor when demanded by creditors of the corporation.

The record in the instant case fails to disclose any intentional fraud perpetrated by the directors of the Panama Oil Company in the negotiations with Hedrick, or that they knew that the value of the property taken in exchange for the stock was less than the par value of the stock. As before stated, there is nothing tending to implicate either of the defendants in the deal, or to bring home to them notice of any facts which would put them on inquiry as to the fairness of the exchange. So far as appears, they were innocent purchasers, and therefore cannot be held liable for any portion of the subscription price which might be construed to have been unpaid by Hedrick when the stock was transferred to him by the corporation as fully paid.

For these reasons, it is not necessary to consider any other points raised by appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte RIDER. (Cr. 757.)

1. Criminal law ⚷641(1)—Defendant in jail entitled to consult counsel without presence of objectionable third persons.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, declaring that in criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and with counsel, and in view of Pen. Code, § 825, providing that a prisoner in jail may be visited by his counsel, one accused of felony is entitled to consult with his or her attorney in private, without the presence of objectionable third persons, for the denial of such a right is the denial of the right to defend by counsel.

2. Habeas corpus ⚷13—Writ may issue to inquire into unlawful restraint of liberty of one properly in custody.

Under Pen. Code, § 1473, writ of habeas corpus may be issued to inquire into an unlawful restraint of the liberty of one properly in custody.

3. Habeas corpus ⚷25(1)—Writ may issue to compel authorities to allow petitioner, who was in custody, to consult with attorney.

Though petitioner was confined to Juvenile Hall under a valid commitment issued out of the juvenile court, yet where she was accused of a felony, and so entitled under Const. art. 1, § 13, and Pen. Code, § 825, to be represented by counsel, and for that purpose to have private conferences with counsel, she may obtain that right by habeas corpus, and compel the superintendent of the Juvenile Hall to allow her to consult counsel without the presence of objectionable third persons, for Pen. Code, § 1473, declares that every person unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty may prosecute a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause of the imprisonment or restraint, and the denial of the right to counsel is a restraint of liberty.

In the matter of the application of Jane Rider for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Superintendent of Juvenile Hall, Los Angeles County, to secure petitioner the right to consult her attorney without the presence of third persons objectionable to her. Writ granted.

J. Morgan Marmaduke, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Petitioner, a ward of the juvenile court for Los Angeles county, complains that she is unlawfully restrained of her liberty, in that she is denied the right of private consultation with her attorney to enable her to prepare for her defense on a criminal charge. She therefore seeks by habeas corpus an order that will effectually safeguard such right. The allegations of her petition, the truth of which are admitted by respondent, supplemented by admissions in open court, establish the following state of facts:

A complaint has been filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, charging petitioner with the commission of a felony, and her preliminary examination thereon is about to take place. She is now detained in Juvenile Hall, pursuant to an order of the juvenile court in and for that county. Respondent, who is the superintendent of Juvenile Hall, refuses to permit petitioner to consult with her attorney, save in respondent's presence or in the presence and hearing of some other third person whose presence is objectionable to petitioner, thereby depriving her of all opportunity to consult freely and frankly with her counsel and preserve the sanctity of their confidential communications. A reasonable opportunity for consultation between petitioner and her attorney is necessary to enable the former to prepare for her hearing on the criminal complaint charging her with a felony. Application to the superior court for relief having been denied, petitioner seeks a remedy here.

[1] The right of an accused, confined in jail or other place of detention pending a trial of the charge against him, to have an opportunity to consult freely with his counsel without any third person, whose presence is objectionable to the accused, being present to hear what passes between the accused and his counsel, is one of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the American criminal law—a right that no Legislature or court can ignore or violate. In this state, the right of an accused to consult with his counsel is guaranteed by the Constitution, which, in section 13 of article 1, expressly declares that "in criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to * * * appear and defend, in person and with counsel." This clause of the Constitution unquestionably was adopted to secure to the accused person all the benefits which may flow from the employment of counsel to conduct his defense. To afford him those benefits it is essential that he should be allowed to consult with his counsel, not only during the actual trial, but prior thereto, in order to prepare for his defense. The privilege of the presence of counsel upon the trial would be a poor concession, if the right of consultation with such counsel prior to the trial were denied. It is equally essential to the enjoyment of this constitutional guaranty that the accused should have the right to a private consultation with his counsel. As said by the Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals:

"It would be a cheap subterfuge of and a shameless mockery upon justice for the state to put a man on trial in its courts, charged with an offense which involved his life, liberty, or character, and then place him in such a position that he could not prepare to make his defense. It would be just as reasonable to place shackles upon a man's limbs, and then tell him that it is his right and duty to defend himself against an impending physical assault. If the right of defense exists, it includes and carries with it the right of such freedom of action as is essential and necessary to make such defense complete. In fact, there can be no such thing as a legal trial, unless both parties are allowed a reasonable opportunity to prepare to vindicate their rights. * * * It therefore necessarily follows that it is the absolute right of parties charged with crime to consult privately with their attorneys, and that it is an illegal abridgment of this right for a sheriff, jailer, or other officer to deny to a defendant the right to consult his attorneys, except in the presence of such officer. * * * It is the duty of officers having the custody of persons charged with crime to afford them a reasonable opportunity to privately consult with their attorneys, without having other persons present, taking such precautions as may be necessary, according to the circumstances of each case, to prevent the escape of such prisoner." State ex rel. Tucker v. Davis, 9 Okl. Cr. 94, 130 Pac. 962, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1083.

In this state the Legislature has expressly provided that a prisoner in jail may be visited by his counsel, and that any officer having charge of the prisoner who willfully refuses or neglects to allow the attorney to visit the prisoner is guilty of a misdemeanor. Pen. Code, § 825.

[2, 3] The respondent to the writ concedes that, by denying to petitioner the right of private consultation with her counsel, she has been denied a right guaranteed her by the Constitution, but contends—and this is the sole point urged in opposition to the writ —that habeas corpus is not the proper remedy. Respondent's argument, as we understand it, is substantially this: Petitioner is lawfully confined in Juvenile Hall under a valid commitment issued out of the juvenile court; therefore she cannot be discharged from custody; habeas corpus will lie only where the person on whose behalf the writ is sought is unlawfully imprisoned; ergo, so the argument runs, petitioner is not entitled to habeas corpus, since in any event she must remain in Juvenile Hall in the custody of respondent.

Respondent's argument places too narrow limits upon the high prerogative writ of habeas corpus, the right whereto is guaranteed by the Constitution. By express statutory enactment, it may issue in all cases where the petitioner is unlawfully "restrained of his liberty," as well as where he is unlawfully imprisoned. Section 1473 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Every person unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty, under any pretense whatever, may prosecute a writ of habeas corpus, to inquire into the cause of such imprisonment or restraint."

The office of the writ is to afford the citizen a speedy and effective method of securing the removal of any unlawful restraint upon his liberty; and the statute which confers the right has always been construed in favor of the liberty of the citizen. We think that a person may be said to be unlawfully "restrained of his liberty," so as to be entitled to the writ of habeas corpus, when, though lawfully in custody, he is deprived of some right to which, even in his confinement, he is lawfully entitled under the Constitution or laws of this state or the United States, the deprivation whereof serves to make his imprisonment more onerous than the law allows, or curtails, to a greater extent than the law permits even in his confinement, his freedom to go when and where he likes. In Commonwealth v. Ridgway, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 247, it was said that, whenever a person is deprived of the privilege of going when and where he pleases, he is restrained of his liberty, and has a right to inquire if that restraint be illegal and wrongful, and that whether it be exercised by a jailer, constable, or private individual. Here petitioner is denied the right to go to some place in Juvenile Hall where she may exercise her constitutional right to consult in private with her counsel. To the extent that she thus is denied the right to go to some appropriately secluded place in Juvenile Hall, where she may consult privately with her counsel, to that extent is she denied the privilege of going where she has the right to go. As said by the Oklahoma court in the case cited supra:

> "If the right of defense exists, it includes and carries with it the right of such freedom of action as is essential and necessary to make such defense complete."

No one, we think, would be so temerarious as to question the right of one to the writ of habeas corpus who, being lawfully in jail awaiting trial on a criminal charge, should be needlessly put in irons. In such cases the only legal ground for any incarceration whatever is that thereby the escape of the accused may be prevented pending a judicial determination of his guilt or innocence; and any physical restraint beyond that provided by the law for that purpose would be an unlawful restraint of his liberty within the meaning of the Habeas Corpus Act. So here, though petitioner is lawfully in Juvenile Hall, and her restraint is, to that extent, a lawful restraint of her liberty, the restraint passes the bounds of lawfulness when her jailer restrains her from engaging in a private consultation with her attorney, at some appropriate place in the building wherein she is confined, to the end that thereby she may prepare for her defense.

Constraint need not consist of actual physical force. Conduct inducing a reasonable apprehension of force may be sufficient to restrain one of his liberty. Hebrew v. Pulis, 73 N. J. Law, 621, 64 Atl. 121, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580, 118 Am. St. Rep. 716. If the respondent insists upon being within the presence and hearing of petitioner and her counsel whilst the latter are engaged in consultation, under such circumstances that, if petitioner objects to such arrangement, she will be forcibly deprived of all opportunity for consultation, petitioner most certainly is restrained of her liberty within the letter and spirit of section 1473 of the Penal Code, and has the right to have the legality of that restraint inquired into on habeas corpus.

It is ordered that respondent, Ianthe Densmore, superintendent of Juvenile Hall, be and she is hereby ordered and directed, upon request of petitioner or her counsel, and at all reasonable times, to permit petitioner to consult privately with her attorney in such place and under such circumstances as will afford reasonable opportunity for absolute privacy of consultation.

CITY ST. IMPROVEMENT CO. v. WATSON et al. (Civ. 2600.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹446 — Street assessment not invalid for delay in obtaining extension of time to complete work.

Under the Improvement Act, particularly the curative provisions of sections 26, 82, a street assessment cannot be declared invalid on account of a delay of two days in obtaining an extension of time in which to complete the work.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹553—Assessment, diagram, and warrant properly admitted in evidence in action to foreclose lien.

In an action to foreclose a street assessment lien, the assessment diagram and warrant were properly admitted in evidence, the allegations of the complaint as to such matters and the making of due return by the contractor having been admitted by the answer.

3. Pleading ⟹403(2)—Omission in complaint in action to foreclose street assessment lien cured by answer.

In an action to foreclose a street assessment lien, omission of the complaint to state the time fixed by the superintendent of streets for the commencement and completion of the work was cured by the allegations of the answer stating such facts.

4. Municipal corporations ⟹551 — Complaint in action to foreclose assessment sufficient in allegation of performance.

Complaint, in action to foreclose street assessment lien, alleging the making by the superintendent of streets of an assessment in a specified amount at a uniform rate per front foot, etc., and that "all of said assessment roll was duly made in the manner and form prescribed by law," held sufficient in its allegations as to performance.

5. Municipal corporations ⟹488, 489(8) — Owner should have appealed to council for correction of assessment as to amount.

Under Improvement Act, § 26, if a street improvement assessment was incorrect as to amount, an objecting owner should have appealed to the council to have it corrected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by the City Street Improvement Company, against Sarah J. Watson and the Bank of St. Helena. From judgment foreclosing street assessment lien, defendant Watson appeals. Judgment affirmed.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco (O. F. Meldon, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

Platt Kent, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland, R. M. F. Soto, Fabius T. Finch, Randolph V. Whiting, Paul F. Fratessa, John B. Gartland, and Hobart K. Eells, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a lien for an assessment levied for certain street work in the city of St. Helena under the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911. The complaint alleges, in due form, the performance of all things required by the Improvement Act to be done up to the signing of the contract on the 7th day of November, 1912. It alleges the execution of the contract, but does not contain any statement as to what time was therein fixed by the superintendent of streets for the beginning of the work or the completion thereof, other than the general allegation that the superintendent of streets "fixed the time for beginning said work and the time for completing said work." The complaint then goes on to allege that the plaintiff "did and caused to be done all the work in said contract * * * and duly performed on its part in every respect the said work according to * * * the terms of the contract"; that the work was approved and accepted by the superintendent of streets on the 16th day of May, 1913, and that thereupon the assessment and diagram for the work was made by the superintendent of streets, in due form, with his warrant and the engineer's certificate attached, their recordation, issuance to plaintiff, demand of plaintiff for payment, return on the assessment, its recordation; and that no appeal was taken to the city council. The above are not all the allegations of the complaint, but a skeleton of such as are material in this appeal.

The defendant Bank of St. Helena defaulted. The defendant Sarah J. Watson, who will hereafter be called defendant, appeared first by demurrer, both general and special, in which the complaint was demurred to specially upon the ground that the complaint was uncertain, in that it could not be ascertained therefrom the time fixed by the superintendent of streets for the commencement or the completion of the work. Other grounds of special demurrer are alleged, but these are the only special grounds urged on this appeal. The demurrer was overruled, whereupon the defendant answered, admitting all the allegations of the complaint excepting that it was denied that the plaintiff had completed the work according to the terms of the contract, or within the time fixed therein, or according to the specifications for the work. The answer further set out in hæc verba the contract wherein it appears that the street superintendent fixed the 7th day of November, 1912, as the time for commencing the work and 90 days from the 7th day of November, 1912, as the time for completion, and alleges that no extension of time to complete the work was granted plaintiff until February 7, 1913, which was more than 90 days from November 7, 1912.

At the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence the assessment, warrant, and diagram, and thereupon rested its case. The defendant offered to prove that the work was not completed within the 90 days fixed in the contract, and that the time for completion was not extended by the city council until February 7, 1913. Upon the objection of the plaintiff that the evidence proposed was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, the court excluded it. No offer was made to show that the work was not completed within the time granted by the council on the 7th day of February, 1913.

The main question presented upon this appeal is whether, in view of the curative provisions of sections 26 and 82 of the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), the alleged defect in failing to grant an extension in which to complete the work within the time limited by the contract, was cured.

Section 26 provides that—

> "No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and nonpayment, after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the council to do the work, has been actually published as herein provided, and said notices of improvement have been posted along the line of the work, as provided in section 5 of this act, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done."

Section 82 reads as follows:

> "This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purposes may be effective. No error, irregularity, informality, and no neglect or omission of any officer of the city, in any procedure taken hereunder, which does not directly affect the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement, shall avoid or invalidate such proceeding or any assessment for the cost of work done thereunder. The exclusive remedy of any person affected or aggrieved thereby shall be by appeal to the city council."

These sections will not stop inquiry concerning those parts of the proceedings which are essential to due process of law, that is, "jurisdictional." Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920.

It is claimed by the appellant that by failing to extend the time for completion of the contract within the time limited by the contract for its performance, jurisdiction was lost by the council. In other words, that the requirement that the time shall be extended during the time for the performance fixed in the contract is "jurisdictional," and the error in failing to so extend it is not one that could have been remedied by the council on appeal, and that therefore the defendant was not required to appeal to the council. The respondent contends that under the authority of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, this requirement is not "jurisdictional," and that under the provisions of the act quoted above, the defect, if any, was cured.

In the case of City Street Improvement Co. v. Pearson, 185 Pac. 962, the court, in passing on the provisions of an ordinance of the city of San Francisco for doing street work, and the provisions of which in relation to appeal to the council were practically identical with section 26 of the Improvement Act of 1911, said:

> "Curative provisions in a law of this character may cure any defect that does not go to the jurisdiction of the board over the proceeding."
> "In any proceeding designed to subject the property of an individual to the burden of tax or assessment, certain elements are essential to constitute compliance with the mandates of the state or federal Constitutions. It is agreed on all hands that no curative act can deprive a property owner of the right to resist a pretended assessment which, if enforced, would deprive him of his property without due process of law or otherwise infringe his constitutional rights. But short of this, there is no more reason for denying to the statute before us than to that involved in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, the effect of foreclosing any attack based upon the failure to pursue regularly or at all those steps which the Legislature was not bound to make a part of the statutory procedure. As is pointed out in Chase v. Trout, supra, the applicability of curative statutes is not to be determined solely by inquiring whether the steps omitted or defectively performed were 'jurisdictional.' The term 'jurisdictional' has been used in various senses. The power to levy an assessment or impose a liability on private property is derived solely from the statute, and must be exercised in the manner laid down in the statute. In this sense, the jurisdiction of the board extends only to its right to act in the manner prescribed by the Legislature. But with respect to any steps which are not constitutionally necessary, the Legislature may, in the very act which requires these 'jurisdictional' steps to be taken, declare that unless objection is made at a certain time or in a certain way, a failure to take these steps shall not affect the validity of the proceeding. This is the plain meaning of the holding in Chase v. Trout, supra, and we do not doubt that it is equally applicable here." Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation District, 173 Cal. 660, 161 Pac. 113.

The foregoing was quoted with approval and applied to the "curative" clauses of the Improvement Act of 1911, in Watkinson v. Vaughn, 186 Pac. 753, and the court further said in pointing out the distinction between the so-called jurisdictional requirements called for by the statute and those jurisdictional requirements which are necessary for a compliance with "due process of law":

"This very question of what defects in street improvement proceedings could be cured under such provisions as those of section 16 and section 66 of the present act was considered at length in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81. The argument was there made that no so-called 'jurisdictional defect could be thus cured.' In response, however, to this argument the decision made a distinction between those so-called jurisdictional requirements which are called for by statute and those jurisdictional requirements which are necessary for a compliance with the constitutional provision that property shall not be taken without due process of law, or with other constitutional provisions, and it was held that, while failure to comply with jurisdictional requirements of the later class could not be cured, a failure to comply with those of the former class might be cured by action of the Legislature, since the Legislature had the right, in the first instance, to omit such requirements entirely. The discussion on this point is thus summed up in Chase v. Trout, supra (146 Cal. 359, 80 Pac. 84):

" 'The correct proposition is that, as the Legislature has power to devise any scheme for the assessment and levy of taxes for local improvements, provided such scheme includes such notice and opportunity for hearing to the owner of property taxed as will be sufficient to constitute the due process of law required by the Constitution, and otherwise complies with constitutional limitations and restrictions, so the Legislature, by a curative clause in the law establishing the scheme, may provide that the issuance of a bond, or the execution of a deed, in the enforcement of such levy or assessment, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all the required steps in the proceeding, excepting those that are necessary to constitute the due process of law, or to comply with any other constitutional prerequisite. As to all these other statutory steps or acts, the same power which prescribes them is competent to declare that their nonobservance shall not be fatal to the validity of the tax, and that no inquiry may be made concerning them. This is sbstantially the effect of the statute in question here.' "

See, also, Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 568, 89 Pac. 352; Board of Education v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 515, 93 Pac. 117; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 292, 116 Pac. 750; Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 Pac. 976.

Speaking of the very defects urged here, the court said in Chase v. Trout:

"The Legislature undoubtedly could have enacted a valid law, which would have authorized the extension of the contract after the time first fixed had expired, * * * or that the time to begin work need not be fixed in the contract. * * * Having such power, it likewise has power to declare that after the issuance of the bonds it shall be conclusively presumed that such directions, if any such exist, have been followed."

[1] From the overwhelming weight of authority from Chase v. Trout down, we are compelled to conclude that the assessment cannot now be declared to be invalid on account of the delay of two days in obtaining an extension of time in which to complete the work. It will be admitted that, leaving out of view the curative provisions of the act, the authorities are ample and uniform to the effect that the superintendent of streets and the city council have no power to revive or validate a dead contract, and that orders of extension made after the expiration of the time within which such contracts are by their terms to be performed are void. Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. 427; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 454, 10 Pac. 672; Dougherty v. Nevada Bank, 81 Cal. 162, 22 Pac. 513; Broch v. Luning, 89 Cal. 316, 26 Pac. 972; Palmer v. Burnham, 120 Cal. 364, 52 Pac. 664, 1080; Kelso v. Cole, 121 Cal. 122, 53 Pac. 353; Union, etc., Co. v. Campbell, 2 Cal. App. 534, 84 Pac. 305. However, in none of these cases was the effect of the curative provisions of a statute such as are contained in the Improvement Act of 1911 given any consideration. These curative provisions were considered in the Trout v. Chase Case, and that case has never since been questioned.

It may be conceded that it is a "jurisdictional" requirement that the time must be extended within the time limit of the contract, but it is not one of the jurisdictional requirements necessary to constitute due process of law, and hence is cured.

Having arrived at the foregoing conclusion, and in view of the admissions in the answer that no appeal was taken to the council, and of the issuance of the assessment, diagram, and warrant and the return thereon, it follows that the evidence offered was properly excluded.

[2, 3] There was no error in admitting the assessment, diagram, and warrant in evidence, for the allegations of the complaint as to these matters, and the making of a due return by the contractor, were admitted by the answer, and the plaintiff could have rested its case thereon. Raisch v. Hildebrandt, 146 Cal. 721, 81 Pac. 21. Nor was there any reversible error in overruling the special demurrer, as the omission to state the time fixed by the superintendent of streets for the commencement and completion of the work was cured by the allegations of the answer stating these facts. Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568; Burns v. Cushing, 96 Cal. 669, 31 Pac. 1124.

[4, 5] The only grounds urged in support of the general demurrer are that the bid of the plaintiff was made for the work on the basis of a stated price per foot, and there is no allegation as to the amount of work done, that is, as to the number of feet. The complaint alleges the making by the superintendent of streets of the assessment for $4,745.70. The assessment, which was in evidence, shows the assessment to have been made at a uniform rate per front foot and does not show any invalidity on its face. The allegation of the complaint that "all of said assessment roll was duly made in the manner and form prescribed by law" was admitted by the answer. If the assessment was incorrect as to amount, the defendant should have appealed to the council to have it corrected. Improvement Act of 1911, § 26; Bates v. Hadamson, 2 Cal. App. 574, 84 Pac. 51; McSherry v. Wood, 102 Cal. 647, 36 Pac. 1010; Harney v. Benson, 113 Cal. 314, 45 Pac. 687. No evidence was offered by defendant in support of her denial that the work was performed according to the specifications, and no point is made by defendant relating thereto. The allegations of the complaint as to performance are sufficient. California Improvement Co. v. Reynolds, 123 Cal. 88, 55 Pac. 802.

The judgment is affirmed.

EWING v. HAYWARD et al. (Civ. 2971.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 30, 1920.)

1. Partnership 🔑44—Defendants held not jointly liable in absence of proof of partnership.

In a seller's action against buyer and buyer's agents to recover the difference between the amount actually received for barley and the contracted sale price, defendants cannot be found jointly liable unless shown to have been partners. (Per Thomas, J.)

2. Evidence 🔑220(2)—Silence of corporate officer held not an admission.

In a suit against a corporation based on the controverted agency of a firm for it, wherein one partner testified that in the presence of defendant's president he spoke to a copartner about representing another company, with which the president did not appear to be connected, it was held that the president was under no obligation to speak, and hence his silence could not militate against the corporation defendant. (Per Thomas, J.)

3. Evidence 🔑471(31)—Conclusion of witness that one was president of a corporation incompetent.

A witness' impression that one was president of a corporation is but a conclusion, and as such is incompetent. (Per Thomas, J.)

4. Partnership 🔑13—Sharing loss in single transaction insufficient to establish.

Civ. Code § 2395, defines a partnership as the "association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them," so that an agreement between buyers to share the loss on a single transaction is insufficient proof of partnership. (Per Thomas, J.)

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Partnership.]

5. Principal and agent 🔑23(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish agency.

In seller's action against buyers for damages for refusal to take goods, evidence held insufficient to establish that a firm of defendants was the agent of another defendant. (Per Thomas, J.)

6. Principal and agent 🔑19—Burden of proving agency rests on party alleging.

Agency is a fact, the burden of proving which rests upon the party affirming its existence. Per Thomas, J.)

7. Principal and agent 🔑119(1)—One relying on it must establish agent's authority.

Where it is sought to charge a principal upon a contract, the burden is upon plaintiff to show that the contracting agent had authority to enter into the contract. (Per Thomas, J.)

8. Principal and agent 🔑123(6)—Agent's authority not provable by his own declarations.

An agent's authority to contract must be proved by evidence aliunde, and not by the declarations of the agent himself. (Per Thomas, J.)

9. Evidence 🔑471(28)—Witness' supposition that orders were for company held a conclusion.

A witness' supposition that certain orders were for a company, and not an individual claimed to represent the company, held merely a conclusion and incompetent. (Per Thomas, J.)

10. Principal and agent 🔑145(4)—Party cannot hold both agent and undisclosed principal on contract.

Where one deals with another as principal, and afterwards discovers he was agent for an undisclosed principal, he may elect to hold either agent or principal, but not both, the agent being liable because credit was originally extended to him and the principal, on the theory that, having received the benefit of the contract, he must assume its burdens, but the contract is one, and cannot be split into two, to make both liable.

11. Principal and agent ⚷145(4)—One seeking to fasten liability must elect between agent and undisclosed principal.

The liability of an agent and his undisclosed principal is an alternative rather than a joint or joint and several liability, and either may be held, but not both, so it becomes the duty of the party seeking to fasten liability, after disclosure of agency and identity of principal, to elect which he will hold.

12. Principal and agent ⚷145(4)—Party seeking to fasten liability on undisclosed principal may join agent, but can have judgment against but one.

Where an alleged undisclosed principal denies the existence of the relation of principal and agent, the party seeking to recover on a contract may commence the action against both alleged undisclosed principal and his agent in order to ascertain the facts, but he cannot have judgment against both, and before the close of the case must elect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. F. Ewing against H. C. Hayward and others, copartners doing business as Hayward, Rath & Marshall and individually, and another. Judgment against all of the defendants jointly, and the defendant Newmark Grain Company appeals. Reversed.

Emery & Rehart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. Neither party to this appeal has given us any statement of the case. We have therefore been put to the labor of going through the pleadings, findings, etc., to get as best we could an understanding as to what the controversy is about.

As near as we have been able to ascertain from the record before us, the action is brought by plaintiff to recover on a certain contract, alleged to have been entered into between plaintiff and a copartnership doing business in Imperial county, this state, under the firm name and style of Hayward, Rath & Marshall, which copartnership, according to the allegations of the complaint, was and still is the local agent of appellant, the Newmark Grain Company. The contract referred to reads:

"No. 54. Store and Field Confirmation and Purchase. May 11, 1918. We, the undersigned, have this day entered into the following agreement, namely, to buy and sell the following named commodity: (Approximately) 800 sacks No. 1 feed barley, price $2.85 per cwt., 45# to bu., f. o. b. cars Rockwood, Calif. Terms, cash on delivery of grain. Certified public scale tag weights to govern. Seller agrees to furnish loader's affidavit as to the number of sacks loaded into car or cars. Settlement made through the buyer's and seller's banks only. Signed by the buyer, Hayward, Rath & Marshall, per M. C. Hayward. Signed by the seller, J. F. Ewing, per. Witnessed by Mrs. J. F. Ewing. Note: Subject to our office confirmation." (Italics ours.)

Nothing appears in the record, to which our attention has been called, to explain what or who is meant by the sentence above italicized. At the time the agreement was entered into not one word was said by any one that the firm was acting as agent for anybody. Plaintiff testified that he supposed he was dealing with the firm there named only; nor was he depending upon evidence of any "holding out" or ostensible agency relationship on the part of that firm.

After the agreement was entered into, plaintiff, upon threshing his barley, tendered the same to Hayward, Rath & Marshall, the firm named in the contract, which tender was refused for reasons hereinafter shown. Thereupon plaintiff made an honest effort to sell at the same price elsewhere, but failed to do so for the reason that the market had declined, the best offer received by him for his barley being $2.15 per hundredweight. The action was then brought to recover the difference between the amount actually received for the barley and that which the firm contracted to pay, as set forth in the contract above quoted.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff has performed all the terms and conditions of said contract on his part to be performed. The answer of the defendant copartnership and of the defendants Hayward, Rath & Marshall admits the making of the contract in question, but alleges that the same was made by them as brokers; while the answer of the Newmark Grain Company puts in issue every allegation of the complaint. On the issues thus formed the case went to trial, the court finding against all the defendants jointly for the sum of $495.52.

[1] Before proceeding with a consideration of the questions raised on this appeal, attention is called to the fact that a finding that the defendants are jointly liable in this case could have been entered only in the event that they were shown to have been partners, and partnership between the firm signing the agreement and this appealing defendant was not an issue before the trial court.

[2] The first point urged for reversal of the judgment is that no agency was proven. Plaintiff himself testified to the execution of the agreement in question; that at the time of its execution neither Mr. Hayward, of the firm of Hayward, Rath & Marshall, nor any one connected with that firm, informed plaintiff as to whom the copartnership was buying for, or whether or not they were in fact agents for any one; that on June 1, 1918, when plaintiff attempted to deliver the barley referred to in said agreement, Mr. Hayward informed plaintiff that he, Mr. Hayward, had turned the matter over to Mr. Rath, and that the latter would take charge of the contracts; and that plaintiff then drove to El Centro, where he saw Mr. Rath. As to what transpired between Mr. Rath and plaintiff at El Centro, we are not informed. Plaintiff also testified that neither the Newmark Grain Company nor Hayward, Rath & Marshall ever recognized the contract or agreement in any manner, and that he was told by a member of the copartnership that the reason that firm could not accept the barley on their part was that they were acting for Newmark; that they could not get him to take it off their hands; that they were unable to dispose of it at the price named in the agreement, and that they were quitting on orders from Newmark.

On June 15, 1918, according to plaintiff's testimony, Hayward gave plaintiff a note, sending him "over to Newmark Grain Company with it," at which place he delivered the same to a Mr. Shank. Omitting the heading, this note is as follows:

> "Brawley, California, June 15, 1918. Newmark Grain Co., Brawley, Calif. Dear Sir: Mr. J. F. Ewing has just come in with 100 sax barley, which was part of your contract with us. I can't take it in here, so am sending it to you, as I have no shipping instructions covering same. You may have. Hayward, Rath & Marshall. H."

On the presentation of this note to Mr. Shank—presumably in charge of the Newmark Grain Company's place of business at Brawley—a Mr. Wolz wrote the following answer:

> "Hayward, Rath & Marshall: We have no barley bought from Mr. Ewing, nor do I know anything about this being any part of any contract between Hayward, Rath & Marshall and the Newmark Grain Co., & cannot store this barley for you. Yours truly, F. A. Wolz."

As to the connection of Mr. Shank and Mr. Wolz with the defendant corporation, however, we are given no light, except as we may conjecture.

The witness Hayward, testifying for plaintiff, said that he was buying for the Newmark Grain Company, and that he had previously bought grain at Brawley and shipped it to that company, which grain was received, accepted, and paid for by the latter. In regard to a conversation had with Mr. M. N. Newmark, of the Newmark Grain Company, on the night of May 10, 1918, wherein the latter talked about buying a considerable amount of barley, Hayward testified as follows:

> "I told them I had bought that day through the instruction of Mr. Rath to start to buy at $2.85. I had purchased whatever the amount was. I don't recollect just now what the amount was; I turned that over to Mr. Newmark and told him I would get 6,000 more sacks Saturday, and he told me to go ahead and buy it, and the conversation was general what we should do if the price went up, and what we should do if it went down, and any further instructions I was to get from Mr. Rath. If there was any change in the order to stop buying, I was to get that from Mr. Rath."

This witness also testified that Newmark gave him orders to purchase 6,000 sacks of barley at $2.85 per hundredweight, and as to the grain the orders for which he claims were turned over to Mr. Newmark on Friday evening, May 10, 1918, at the Barbara Worth Hotel in El Centro; that it was bought on the orders of and for Mr. Newmark.

The witness Rath, also testifying for plaintiff, said that Mr. Newmark notified him to inform Mr. Hayward that "the deal was off"; that in their conversation with Mr. Newmark about buying grain, plaintiff's name was not mentioned; that the witness had stated to Hayward, in the presence of Mr. Newmark, that they (Hayward, Rath & Marshall) were going to represent the "Newmark Company," and any further information or data that Mr. Newmark wanted Mr. Hayward should feel free in posting him thereon, and that Mr. Newmark "afterward remarked to me that that was a very liberal introduction." In answer to the question, "What relation did Mr. Newmark sustain to the Newmark Grain Company?" put to Mr. Rath on cross-examination, the witness replied, "My impression is that he is president of the Newmark Grain Company," and volunteered the further information that Mr. Newmark transacts all business for the Newmark Grain Company, and that he (Rath) had had dealings with Mr. Newmark which the corporation thereafter "carried out and paid for."

[3] Unless the "Newmark Company" and the "Newmark Grain Company" are different names for the same concern, being used interchangeably—and there is nothing in the record to show that such is the case—the silence of Mr. Newmark, assuming him to be president of the latter named concern, cannot militate against that corporation, for the reason that when Mr. Rath spoke to Mr. Hayward concerning a firm with which it is not even insinuated that Mr. Newmark had any connection, namely, the "Newmark Company," the latter was under no obligation to speak. Furthermore, the impression of Mr. Rath that Newmark was president of any company is but a conclusion, and, being such, is incompetent. The purported information volunteered by him as to his dealings with Newmark, and that the deals thus entered into were carried out by the Newmark Grain Company, does not even intimate that any agency existed between the copartnership and the corporation heretofore referred to. Nor would the facts brought out by the volunteer statement prove that Mr. Newmark was the president of the corporation.

Testifying for the defendants, Newmark stated that "between 8 and 9 in the morning of the 11th of May, 1918," he gave orders to Rath not to buy any more grain at the present time, "expecting us to buy it of him." This was 11 or 12 hours before plaintiff claims to have executed the agreement in controversy, and the testimony is uncontradicted. With reference to some barley which had previously been bought by Mr. Rath from a Japanese—one Yukewa—Mr. Newmark testified that—

> "Three or four weeks after this barley had been bought Mr. Rath explained in a letter to the firm that the reason he didn't want to tell me about the purchase of this barley, I felt so bad he did not want me to feel any worse."

He also testified that he never authorized Hayward, Rath & Marshall to act as agents for him. During his conversation with Mr. Rath in the Barbara Worth Hotel at El Centro, on Saturday night, May 11, 1918, in the presence of a Mr. Seligman, at which time Mr. Rath told Newmark about buying 6,000 bags of choice barley from a Japanese at $2.85 per hundredweight, Newmark says that he asked Rath the following question. "How did you come to buy that after giving you strict instructions not to buy any barley, expecting us to take it?" to which Mr. Rath replied that "he was compromised with the man, and had agreed to take it," whereupon he (Newmark) said to Rath:

> "To show you I am a sport, if Mr. Seligman is willing we will let you take this barley and handle it on a joint account; that is, each one to stand their proportion of the loss on this purchase."

In addition to the foregoing, respondent claims that while the witness Rath was being cross-examined by the attorney for the defendant corporation, Mr. Newmark stated, in open court, as follows:

> "I grant you everything you say. We don't need this testimony of the orders, or the attorney trying to draw the thing out for an hour or so; it doesn't gain anything. I agree with Mr. Rath that we gave him orders to ship, and what is the use of bringing these documents [telegrams] up here. It won't do you any good or the attorneys either."

[4] Respondent contends that the agency "was clearly established, not only by the declarations of the agents, but likewise by written communications passing between the Newmark Grain Company and the agents," as also by the declarations above set forth, the last of which respondent designates as an "admission." But, to establish such agency before this court, none of the written communications referred to is set forth in the record before us. We are really at a loss to understand how, under our statute, the agreement by Mr. Newmark to share the loss in relation to one isolated transaction can prove the existence of either an agency or partnership agreement between the copartnership firm and the defendant corporation. Indeed, if any relation were created at all, it would, in our opinion, be with Newmark personally. Section 2395 of the Civil Code defines partnership as the "association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." In the construction of this section our courts have held that, by agreement in some way, each party must share in the losses as well as the profits (Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203); for there is an equal liability for the losses which the law will imply. Irvine & Muir L. Co. v. Holmes, 26 Cal. App. 453, 147 Pac. 229. An agreement to share the loss on a single transaction does not and cannot establish a partnership.

[5] So far as the "admission" is concerned, there is nothing in the record to which our attention has been called that could have compromised Mr. Newmark personally or the Newmark Grain Company. There is no explanation as to whom it was understood Newmark referred when he spoke of "expecting us to buy it of him," or whom he was understood to speak for when he said "we will let you take this barley and handle it on a joint account, that is, each one to stand their proportion of the loss on this purchase;" or what "firm" he referred to when he testified that Mr. Rath had written "to the firm" his reasons for not wanting to tell Newmark about the purchase of certain barley; or, finally, when he made, in open court, the "admission" already quoted, wherein it is claimed he said, "I agree with Mr. Rath that we gave him orders to ship," etc. The only reasonable construction that can be given this testimony, therefore, is when it is considered in the light of all the testimony and the subjects under discussion at the time of the conversations in reference to which the ambiguity appears. So construed, the "us" and the "we" first above italicized will be seen to be none other than Mr. Seligman and Mr. Newmark, and the "firm" the corporation in which Newmark testified that he had an interest, namely, the Great Western Milling Company; while the "we," employed by Mr. Newmark in his so-called "admission" must have referred to none other than himself and those "whom he represented or had connections with what led to the allied interests"—parties whose names are not disclosed by the record. If this be so, then the evidence wholly fails to establish any authority of the firm of Hayward, Rath & Marshall that would constitute them agents of this appellant.

As we have seen, the evidence establishes no partnership. Had such been the case, however, that is, had such a partnership existed, evidence of that fact would have been inadmissible, for the reason already stated—the absence of any such issue.

[6-8] Agency is a fact, the burden of proving which rests upon the party affirming its existence. Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 55 Pac. 425. In this case that party is the plaintiff. Where, as here, it is claimed that the contract was made with an agent, and because whereof it is sought to charge the principal thereunder, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the agent had authority from the principal to enter into the contract. This must be proved by evidence aliunde, and not by the declarations of the agents themselves. Petterson v. Stockton, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 244, 66 Pac. 304; Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 520, 59 Pac. 937; Smith v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 432, 40 Pac. 540; Pease v. Fink, 3 Cal. App. 371, 85 Pac. 657. In the instant case, not even a declaration or statement was made to the plaintiff by said alleged agents, or by any one in their behalf, that they were acting as agents for anybody. Nor is there evidence of any "holding out," such as sometimes is the case when a principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be an agent of such principal who in fact is not employed by him; the plaintiff testifying, as we have already seen, that he knew no one in the deal but Hayward, Rath & Marshall. There is nothing in the record, to which our attention has been called, aside from the declarations of the alleged agents themselves—and these were all made after the agreement in question was entered into—which proves the existence of the relation of principal and agent in this case; and, even if competent, the declarations referred to fall far short of that attainment. Under these circumstances, the absence of such relationship must be held to be an established fact.

[9] It would seem obvious that, unless the record discloses evidence competent to show that Mr. Newmark was an official or agent of the defendant corporation, clothed with authority to bind the latter by any statement made by him to third persons upon which reliance has been placed to their detriment, the judgment must be reversed. In our effort to discover such evidence, we have searched the record furnished us, with the result that the following is the only testimony to be found which in any way tends to identify Mr. Newmark. While the witness Hayward was on the stand he was asked the question, "Who is Mr. Newmark?" to which he replied, "That gentleman there," indicating Mr. Newmark; and, upon being further asked, "Who were the orders for; Mr. Newmark himself or the Newmark Grain Company, or some other person?" this same witness answered, "I suppose it was for the Newmark Grain Company." Clearly the latter question called for and the answer was but the conclusion of the witness, with no supporting evidence—manifestly incompetent.

The evidence being insufficient to support the finding of agency, the judgment cannot stand. It is therefore needless to discuss any other point urged.

The judgment is reversed as to the defendant Newmark Grain Company.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [10, 11] I concur in the judgment. Plaintiff, who is seeking to hold the Newmark Grain Company liable as an undisclosed principal, is not entitled to a judgment against that defendant and the other defendants also. When one party to a contract deals with another as principal and afterwards discovers that such party was in fact agent for an undisclosed principal, he may elect to hold either the agent, or, upon discovery, the principal; but he cannot hold both. The agent is liable because credit was originally extended to him in the belief that he was acting for himself. The undisclosed principal is liable on the theory that, having received the benefit of the contract made by his agent, he should assume its burdens. There is but one contract upon which the plaintiff in such an action can bring suit. The person with whom such plaintiff has directly contracted, the agent of the undisclosed principal, may be held liable on the contract as the real obligor, for he contracted in that capacity. Or, if the plaintiff in such an action so choose, he may treat the contract as the obligation of the undisclosed principal for whose benefit it was made, notwithstanding that, on the face of the contract, his agent appears to be the true obligor. There is, as we have said, but one contract in such cases. And though the plaintiff may elect to hold either one of two persons liable on that contract, either the agent or his undisclosed principal, he cannot make two contracts out of the one contract by seeking to hold each of those two persons liable severally as an independent obligor. Nor can he hold them both liable as joint obligors on one contract. He contracted with but one obligor, not two; and though he may elect to hold either one of the two liable as the obligor under the contract, he may not hold them both jointly liable, for to do so would be to give him two obligors where he contracted with, and for the liability of, but one. The result is that the liability of the agent and his undisclosed principal is an alternative rather than a joint or joint and several liability, and either may be so held, but not both. So we find that, according to the weight of authority, it becomes the duty of the creditor, after disclosure of the agency and the identity of the principal, to elect which of the two he will look to to carry out the agreement of the agent. Note to Murphy v. Hutchinson, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 786.

[12] It seems that if, as in the instant case, the alleged undisclosed principal denies the existence of the relation of principal and agent, the party seeking to recover on the contract may commence the action against both the alleged undisclosed principal and his agent, in order to ascertain the facts. But though the plaintiff may bring the action against both, the rule, as I understand it, is that the plaintiff in such an action cannot have judgment against both the undisclosed principal and his agent, but, before the close of the case, must elect whether he will take a judgment against one or the other. See Sessions v. Block, 40 Mo. App. 569; Pittsburg Plate Glass Co. v. Roquemore (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 449; Weil v. Raymond, 142 Mass. 206, 7 N. E. 860; Tuthill v. Wilson, 90 N. Y. 423; Mattlage v. Poole, 15 Hun, 556.

The plaintiff, as perhaps it had the right to do, brought the action against the agent and the alleged undisclosed principal. The lower court, instead of requiring plaintiff to make an election at the close of the case to take judgment against the agent or against the alleged undisclosed principal, the Newmark Grain Company, entered judgment against both. This, I think, is ground for reversal.

I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of the Presiding Justice: WELLER, J.

Ex parte HALL. (Cr. 744.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑274—Municipal corporations 🔑625—Dance ordinance held unconstitutional.

An ordinance prohibiting after 10 p. m. dancing or dance music in a room or hall within 25 feet of a residence held violative of the Fourteenth Amendment and Const. art. 1, § 1, being unreasonable and oppressive, and unduly and unwarrantably interfering with personal rights.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑596—Noise ordinances valid.

A city may enact and enforce ordinances designed to prevent boisterous conduct and loud, unusual and discordant sounds that cause public annoyance or menace the public health and welfare.

3. Constitutional law 🔑70(1)—Limits of police power a judicial question.

It is for the lawmaking body to determine when an exigency exists for the exercise of the police power; but what are the subjects of its exercise is a judicial question.

4. Constitutional law 🔑81—"Reasonableness" and "expediency" defined.

"Reasonableness," as applied to a police measure, is not synonymous with "expediency"; matters of expediency are wholly for legislative cognizance, while reasonableness is subject to judicial inquiry; and "reasonableness" is not what extremists upon the one side or the other would deem fit and fair, but is what from the calm sea level of common sense, applied to the whole situation, is not illegitimate in view of the end attained.

5. Constitutional law 🔑81—Existing customs of weight in defining police power.

In determining whether a police regulation is reasonably necessary to secure the public health or welfare, and therefore within the legitimate exercise of the police power, existing habits and customs are of great weight.

Application of Mark Hall for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Pasadena to secure petitioner's release from custody on a charge of violating an ordinance regulating dancing. Petitioner discharged.

Wilton W. Webster, of Pasadena, for petitioner.

James H. Howard, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] Petitioner is imprisoned under a warrant of arrest issued out of the police court of the city of Pasadena upon a complaint charging him with a violation of an ordinance entitled "An ordinance of the city of Pasadena regulating the hours during which dancing may be conducted and dance music performed in certain places." So far as material, the ordinance reads:

> "Between the hours of 10 o'clock p. m. and 8 o'clock a. m. of the next succeeding day, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation in control of any room or hall, any portion of which or any window of which is within 25 feet of any portion of any building used as the residence of any person other than the person in control of such room or hall, to conduct or permit dancing or the performance of any dance music in such room or hall."

The ordinance further provides that any person convicted of a violation thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Petitioner contends that the ordinance is unreasonable and oppressive; that it unduly and unwarrantably interferes with his personal rights and with his right to the enjoyment and reasonable use of his property; and therefore is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment, and likewise section 1 of article 1 of the state Constitution. This contention, we think, must be upheld.

The ordinance does not confine the prohibited acts to any particular locality, or to buildings in any particular part of the city; nor does it differentiate between public dance halls—admittedly proper subjects for reasonable regulation in the exercise of the police power—and rooms in private homes wherein dancing may be conducted or dance music performed for the amusement and enjoyment of the householders, members of their families, and guests. Instead, the ordinance covers and includes any and all rooms or halls within the boundaries of the municipality, any portion of which or any window of which is within 25 feet of any portion of any other building used as a residence. So that if, forsooth, the owner, lessee, or lawful occupant of any private residence should so far forget himself as to permit members of his own family or invited guests to indulge in the innocent amusement of dancing in any room in his own home that happens to be within 25 feet of any part of his neighbor's residence, or permits them to listen to the soft strains of waltz music played in such room, his temerity possibly may cost him a fine of $500 and six months in jail as a common malefactor. To construe the ordinance as covering only public dance dance halls, or as inhibiting only boisterous dancing and loud and discordant music would be but a mere arbitrary decision of the court, and, in effect, amount to a redraft of the ordinance to make it conform to what, in the view of the court, the city commissioners ought originally to have made it.

A consideration of a few of the fundamental principles underlying the police power will suffice to answer respondent's contention that the ordinance in question is a valid exercise of that power.

[2] There can be no serious question respecting the authority of the city to enact and enforce ordinances designed to prevent boisterous conduct and loud, unusual, and discordant sounds that cause public annoyance or menace the public comfort and welfare. To that end any municipality may prohibit, within reasonable limits, the use of premises in such a manner as thus to menace the public comfort or welfare. Ordinances enacted for such purpose, when they do not go beyond the limits of reasonableness and unnecessarily invade the right of the citizen to acquire, possess, and enjoy property and pursue happiness, will be sustained. But to justify legislative interference with property rights under the guise of an exercise of a police power, and to prohibit the citizen from a reasonable enjoyment of a lawful amusement on his own premises, it should plainly appear that the manner in which the property is used does menace the public welfare. Legislation which goes beyond that limit exceeds the rule of reasonableness. Laws which impose penalties on persons and interfere with the personal liberty of the citizen cannot be constitutionally enacted, unless the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare demands their enactment.

[3] It is for the law-making body to determine when an exigency exists for the exercise of the police power, but what are the subjects of its exercise is clearly a judicial question. The exercise of legislative discretion is not subject to review by the courts when measures adopted by the legislative department are calculated to protect the public health and secure the public comfort, safety, or welfare; but the measures so adopted must have some relation to the ends thus specified. The law-making body of a municipality has no power, under the guise of police regulation, arbitrarily to invade the personal rights and personal liberty of the individual citizen. Its determination upon this question is not final or conclusive. If it pass an ordinance ostensibly in the exercise of the police power, but which in fact interferes unnecessarily with the personal liberty of the citizen, the courts have a right to examine the law and see whether it relates to the objects which the exercise of the police power is designed to secure, and whether it is appropriate for the promotion of such objects. When the police power is exercised for the purpose of prohibiting a lawful amusement or regulating the manner in which it may be carried on or enjoyed, the law-making body is not the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to enjoy his personal rights and use his own property in his own way. The general right of every person to enjoy his own property and engage in any lawful and innocent amusement therein, and to do so in his own way, provided he does not encroach upon the rights of others, cannot be taken away from him by legislative enactment or municipal ordinance. Tiedeman on Limitation of Police Power, § 3; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152. As said by the New York Court of Appeals in Matter of Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 108, 50 Am. Rep. 636, the police power, "however broad and extensive, is not above the Constitution. When it speaks, its voice must be heeded."

[4] There is no certain test whereby the reasonableness of a police measure may be definitely measured in any given case. It is a matter resting in human judgment. So the line between what is reasonable and what is not, marking the bounds of the constitutional authority of the legislative department, is one often difficult of ascertainment, rendering it necessary, in all doubtful cases, for the judiciary to defer to the wisdom of the lawmaking body. But when the boundary has been plainly passed, the duty of the court to repel the encroachment and so uphold the Constitution is absolute. It has no discretion in the matter. "Reasonableness" is not synonymous with "expediency." Matters of expediency are wholly for legislative cognizance; while reasonableness is subject to judicial inquiry. As applied to a law, "reasonableness" is manifestly not what extremists upon the one side or the other would deem fit and fair. As it is well put in one of the cases, reasonableness is what "from the calm sea level" of common sense, applied to the whole situation, is not illegitimate in view of the end attained. In Ex parte Whitwell, supra, the court said:

> "Legislation of this character * * * cannot be justified by the mere possibility of the danger which it ostensibly seeks to avert. It must rest upon the fact that experience has demonstrated that such danger, in the absence of such legislative regulation, is one which may reasonably be anticipated as the probable result of conducting such business, notwithstanding the exercise of ordinary care to prevent it."

If people prefer living in a city, they can only do so because of others desiring to do the same thing in sufficient numbers to constitute a city, and each tacitly undertakes to suffer such annoyances or inconveniences as are incident to that kind of a community. Such a community is made up of all kinds and classes of persons, whose various tastes and habits of life are of almost infinite variety. Of all such is the average city constituted. They all have rights, and the only requirement of the law is that each shall so exercise and enjoy his rights as to do no injury to others, or the rights of others, in the sense in which the law regards "injury," namely, accompanied by damage. In Ex parte Whitwell, supra, 98 Cal. 83, 32 Pac. 874 (19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152), the court said:

> "There are many unpleasant and even annoying things which must be borne by persons living in a state of organized society, in order that others may also enjoy their equal rights under the law."

See, also, Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. 274, 98 Am. Dec. 224, and Pfingst v. Senn, 94 Ky. 556, 23 S. W. 358, 21 L. R. A. 571.

[5] The two cases last cited, it is true, did not present a question respecting the validity of an ordinance or statute passed in an attempted exercise of the police power. They were cases wherein the plaintiffs complained of an alleged private nuisance. But even so, it is a well-recognized principle, applicable alike to ordinances and other forms of legislation, that, in determining whether a police regulation is reasonably necessary to secure the public comfort or welfare, and therefore within the legitimate exercise of the police power, existing habits and customs are of great weight. City of Passaic v. Paterson, etc., Co., 72 N. J. Law, 287, 62 Atl. 267, 111 Am. St. Rep. 678, 5 Ann. Cas. 995. See, also, Matter of Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, 30 N. W. 72, 6 Am. St. Rep. 310.

Turning now to the ordinance in question, and viewing it in the light of the foregoing: From time immemorial, it has been customary in all free countries and in most civilized lands for people to enjoy themselves in their homes by dancing and listening to dance music. Any police measure that would hold these amusements legally objectionable in themselves would destroy one of the purposes for which people congregate in large cities—the opportunity to meet in social intercourse and enjoy the customary social pleasures and amusements. See Village of Des Plaines v. Poyer, 123 Ill. 348, 14 N. E. 677, 5 Am. St. Rep. 524, and Chicago v. Drake Hotel Co., 274 Ill. 408, 113 N. E. 718, L. R. A. 1917A, 1170. It has never been found wise, and it is not legally reasonable, to do more than fix such general conditions to the enjoyment of these innocent amusements as are necessary to the good of the whole community.

The ordinance cannot be upheld upon the theory that it is a reasonable regulation designed to prevent a disturbance of the slumbers of the occupants of nearby residences during the hours usually devoted to sleep. Not only must the inhabitants of cities put up with such ordinary sounds as are the customary and usual incidents to such community habitation, accepting the inconveniences of urban life along with the benefits derivable therefrom, but, what is equally to the point, legislation of this character, imposing an onerous burden upon a lawful and innocuous amusement by absolutely prohibiting it in all rooms that may chance to be within 25 feet of other buildings used as residences, cannot be justified by the mere possibility that disturbing and annoying sounds will endanger the public welfare. It must rest upon the fact that experience has demonstrated that the danger of such disturbance and annoyance, in the absence of such legislative regulation, is one which may reasonably be anticipated as the probable result of permitting any dancing whatever, or performing any kind of dance music, in any hall or room any portion of which or any window of which may happen to be within 25 feet of any portion of any other building used as a residence. Ex parte Whitwell, supra. By suitable regulation, far less drastic than the prohibitory ordinance before us, such an innocent recreation as dancing and such an intrinsically harmless amusement as the performance of dance music can be so conducted and performed as not to give reasonable cause for complaint even to persons of "dainty modes and habits of living." The total prohibition, therefore, of these innocent amusements, during any of the 24 hours, is an arbitrary and unreasonable invasion of private rights. In Re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 82 Pac. 241, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 796, 109 Am. St. Rep. 178, the Supreme Court declared invalid an ordinance absolutely prohibiting the maintenance or operation of a stone quarry within a certain portion of the city and county of San Francisco. The ground of the decision was that the removal of rock from land is an operation that may be rendered entirely innocuous by proper regulation prescribing the manner of doing the work, and that therefore a total prohibition was an arbitrary and unreasonable invasion of private rights.

> "The test in every case is: Is the prohibition of a particular business or the sale of a particular article necessary to prevent the infliction of a public injury? It is not sufficient that the public sustains harm from a certain trade or employment as it is conducted by some engaged in it. Because many men engaged in the calling persist in so conducting the business that the public suffers * * * is no justification for a law which prohibits an honest man from conducting the business in such a manner as not to inflict injury upon the public." Tolliver v. Blizzard, 143 Ky. 773, 137 S. W. 509, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 890.

So here, dancing unquestionably may be so conducted and dance music so performed, in a private residence after 10 o'clock at night, that persons of the average nervous temperament, residing in homes situated within 25 feet of the room where such dancing is conducted or dance music performed, need not be unreasonably annoyed thereby. One or two, or even more, couples might so conduct their dancing in a room, a portion of which or a window of which is within 25 feet of a neighboring residence, as not to jar the most sensitive nerves of the occupants of the neighboring dwelling. Who, for instance, could possibly be disturbed or annoyed by the graceful and stately minuet? Similarly, dance music, one of Strauss' waltzes, for instance, might float into the neighboring dwelling without jarring the most sensitive human tympanum, or it might be played so softly that it would not be heard outside of the room in which performed. It should be remembered that even in these days of bizarre extremes and freak abnormalities, the muscle tickling jazz has not yet succeeded in entirely excluding all sane dance music from the places where the devotees of Terpsichore are wont to foregather. And experts tell us that even jazz, like certain other things fast fading into oblivion, may be denatured—a consummation devoutly to be wished. "The law," says the Supreme Court in Re Farb, 178 Cal. 592, 174 Pac. 320, 3 A. L. R. 301, "does not tolerate the prohibition of something which may be regulated in such way as to overcome any evils which may be incidentally connected with it."

It is not in the power of the legislative department to deprive any of the people of the enjoyment of equal privileges under the law. Nor can any city be permitted to exercise tyrannical powers. The ordinance is unreasonable because it prohibits what, in general, is perfectly lawful; it reaches and passes the limits of the city's police powers. Our conclusion therefore is that the ordinance should be declared unreasonable and void, leaving the city commissioners free to enact, instead, some other more specific and definite regulation.

Petitioner is discharged.

ROBERTS v. POLICE COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 9678.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1014—Appealed judgment of police court not reviewable by certiorari.

The judgment of a police court or justice's court will not be reviewed on certiorari after appeal is taken therefrom and determined in the superior court.

2. Criminal law 🔑1180 — Errors of police court not reviewable on writ to superior court after appeal.

Irregularities or errors committed in the police or justice's court cannot be examined in reviewing the proceedings in superior court on appeal from the police or justice's court, since the writ in so far as it runs against the superior court is directed to review of the action of that court and its functions are limited to such acts as were in excess of its jurisdiction.

3. Criminal law 🔑1180—Exercise of appellate jurisdiction by superior court not reviewable.

Where the superior court was given by statute jurisdiction of an appeal from a police court, its action either in reversing or affirming the judgment of police court was an exercise of its lawful jurisdiction, and not in excess of its jurisdiction, and cannot be reviewed on certiorari even if the affirmance of the police court's judgment was erroneous.

4. Criminal law 🔑260(11) — Cannot review insufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction within jurisdiction.

On certiorari the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction in a police court for an offense within jurisdiction of that court cannot be reviewed, since the police court's decision on that issue is an exercise of jurisdiction, and, if wrong, is merely error.

5. Criminal law 🔑260(11)—Determination of inferior tribunal of fact in issue is not determination of jurisdictional fact.

The rule that insufficiency of evidence can be reviewed on certiorari to determine facts upon which the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal depends does not apply to the determination by the police court of the sufficiency of the evidence to show the guilt of one accused of an offense which is within the jurisdiction of the police court.

Application for certiorari by Edward Roberts against the Police Court of the City and County of San Francisco and the Superior Court, Department 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, to review an order of the Superior Court affirming a judgment of the Police Court convicting petitioner of an offense. Writ discharged as to Police Court, and order of Superior Court affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Leo R. Friedman, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari instituted in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2. The writ was there issued, and after hearing judgment was given vacating an order of the superior court which affirmed a judgment of the police court. On application of the respondents the judgment of the District Court of Appeal was vacated by this court and a hearing ordered herein.

Petitioner was duly charged, by complaint filed in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, with having committed a public offense triable in said court. He was tried therein and found guilty, and judgment of imprisonment was pronounced upon such conviction. It is not claimed that the imprisonment adjudged was in excess of that authorized upon conviction of the offense with which he was charged. He then duly appealed from the judgment of the police court to the superior court of said city and county, which was authorized by our law to entertain and determine such an appeal upon a statement of the case settled by the police judge. Sections 1466 to 1470, Pen. Code. The superior court, after a hearing, made its order affirming the judgment of the police court. Petitioner then initiated this proceeding in certiorari.

[1, 2] It is thoroughly settled that the judgment of a police court or justice's court will not be reviewed on certiorari, after appeal taken therefrom and determination of such appeal in the superior court. Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317; Albers v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 772, 775, 159 Pac. 453. It is also clear, as expressly held in Sherer v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. 354, 29 Pac. 716, that whatever irregularities or errors were committed in the police or justice's court cannot be examined in reviewing the proceeding of the superior court, and that the writ, in so far as it runs against the superior court, "is directed to a review of the action of the superior court, and its functions are limited to such acts of that court as were in excess of its jurisdiction." (Italics are ours.)

[3] Jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain and determine the appeal is not questioned. That jurisdiction was invoked by petitioner himself, who, within the time and in the manner required by law, took his appeal to such court from the judgment of the police court, and the statute gives to the court jurisdiction to entertain such an appeal when duly taken. The appeal was heard upon a statement of the case as required by law. The statute gives to such court the power, upon such appeal, to reverse the judgment of the police court and to grant a new trial, or to affirm the judgment of the police court. It must determine the appeal, reversing or affirming the judgment of the police court as it deems one or the other course proper in view of the matters shown by the statement of the case. Whichever it does, it is acting in the exercise of its lawful jurisdiction, and not in excess of such jurisdiction. It has the same power to affirm in any case that it has to reverse, and the mere fact that its conclusion is wrong does not make its action an excess of its jurisdiction. In such case we have simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction. All that petitioner's contention amounts to in this regard is that the superior court should have reversed the judgment of the police court, and that it erred in affirming it. The substantial contention is that the statement of the case showed that the evidence on the trial in the police court was not sufficient to establish the guilt of the petitioner of the offense charged. If that be true, the superior court erred in affirming the judgment, but mere errors in the exercise of jurisdiction are not reviewable on certiorari. It seems superfluous to cite authorities in support of these well-settled propositions, but, if authority be desired, it is to be found in the opinion of this court in the Matter of Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 113 Pac. 684. No ground appears, therefore, upon which the order of the superior court affirming the judgment of the police court may be here assailed.

[4] It may properly be noted that there is in fact no force in the claim of petitioner that the judgment of the police court was in excess of its jurisdiction. That claim is based on the same contention, insufficiency of evidence to establish guilt of the offense charged. Assuming this contention to be well based, there was no lack of jurisdiction to convict the defendant. What we have said with regard to the superior court on this point is equally applicable here. Where a court is invested with jurisdiction to determine the question of the guilt or innocence of one charged with a public offense, as was the police court in this case, by the filing of the complaint and by acquiring jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, its determination on the question of guilt or innocence, whether based on sufficient evidence or not, is a determination arrived at in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and, however erroneous it may be, it is not void for want of power in the court to render the decision. Invested with the jurisdiction to determine the matter, the court has the power to determine it wrongly upon the evidence as well as correctly, and, under our law, the defendant's only remedy in the event of an incorrect decision is by appeal. On certiorari, as approvingly quoted in Matter of Hughes, supra, "upon every question except the mere question of power, the action of the inferior tribunal is final and conclusive." In such a case a claim of insufficiency of evidence to show guilt of the offense charged does not go to the jurisdiction.

[5] It has been said that "an exception to the rule that the sufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed is made when the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved" (Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 367, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350); that is, whether facts upon which the jurisdiction of a board or inferior tribunal depends were or were not proved. We have in our reports many decisions wherein this exception has been applied, the case in which this declaration was made being one, and the case of Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners (App.) 185 Pac. 1006, relied on by petitioner, being another. But the exception has no application whatever to a tribunal invested with jurisdiction to try and determine a fact in issue with reference to proof of that fact. In such a case that fact is not what is known as a "jurisdictional fact." It is the fact to be determined by the court having jurisdiction to determine it, and the determination of such court thereon is not void, however defective the evidence upon which it is based. See 15 Corpus Juris, p. 729, §§ 25 and 26.

As to the police court the writ is discharged. As to the superior court, the order of said court is affirmed.

CULVER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 9722.)

Criminal law 🔑1011 — Superior court affirming judgment of justice's court held not without jurisdiction, so that certiorari would not lie.

The superior court has jurisdiction to enter a judgment affirming a judgment of conviction by a justice of the peace, even though the complaint in the justice's court did not state facts sufficient to show the commission of a public offense, or that the judgment of the justice was void for want of jurisdiction, so that the order of affirmance, if erroneous, cannot be reviewed on certiorari.

In Bank.

Application by Laura Culver against the Superior Court of Alameda County and James G. Quinn, Judge thereof, to review an order of the superior court affirming a judgment of the justice's court. Order affirmed.

Chas. C. Boynton, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Frances H. Wilson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in certiorari, and it is sought therein to annul the order of the superior court affirming on appeal thereto a judgment of a justice's court. In so far as the superior court is concerned, the material questions herein involved are the same in all respects as those involved in Roberts v. Police Court and Superior Court, S. F. No. 9678, 195 Pac. 1053, decided February 8, 1921. See, in addition to cases cited in opinion therein, Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 Pac. 336; American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, 164 Cal. 327, 128 Pac. 921. It is immaterial in this proceeding whether or not the complaint in the justice's court stated facts sufficient to show the commission of a public offense. If it did not state such facts, the superior court erred in affirming the judgment; but that was mere error in the exercise of its lawful jurisdiction. If for any reason the judgment of the justice's court is void for want of jurisdiction, the superior court nevertheless had jurisdiction to affirm it. Whether or not such judgment can be attacked in some other proceeding, such as habeas corpus, for instance, is altogether immaterial here. The superior court did not exceed its jurisdiction in affirming such judgment. It follows that the order assailed must be affirmed.

The order of the superior court is affirmed.

In re SANTOS' ESTATES.

SANTOS v. SANTOS et ux. (S. F. 9387.)

1. Adoption 🔑14 — Proceedings collaterally assailed, where jurisdictional defects appear on record.

If facts constituting jurisdictional defects in adoption proceedings appear upon the face of the petition and the order for adoption, the proceedings may be collaterally assailed.

2. Adoption 🔑1 — Exists only by virtue of statute.

The right of adoption exists only by virtue of statute.

3. Adoption 🔑7 — Orphan may be adopted without guardian's consent.

Under Civ. Code, § 221, providing that "any minor child may be adopted by any adult person" in the cases and subject to the rules prescribed in the chapter, a minor child without father or mother could be adopted, though at time of adoption in the custody of a guardian, and though the guardian does not consent.

4. Adoption 🔑3 — Laws construed so as to promote their object.

Adoption laws should be construed so as to sustain rather than defeat their object of promoting the welfare of children without real parents.

5. Adoption 🔑13—Welfare of child main consideration.

The matter of adoption rests almost entirely in the discretion of the court; the welfare of the child being the main consideration.

6. Guardian and ward 🔑25 — Letters of guardianship properly revoked on adoption of ward.

Under Civ. Code, § 228, and under section 253, subd. 8, providing that a guardian may be removed when it is no longer proper that the ward should be under guardianship, it was proper for the court, on adoption of an infant under guardianship, to revoke the letters of guardianship; the adopting parents having acquired superior rights to the custody of the child, and the reasons for the existence of the guardianship of the person of the child having therefore ceased.

7. Guardian and ward 🔑25—On adoption of child, court may revoke guardianship as to the person alone.

The court in the exercise of a sound discretion had power to revoke letters of guardianship over the person of an infant on the adoption of the infant, and give custody to adopting parents, and at the same time permit the guardian to act as guardian of the child's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the persons and estates of Laura Santos and others, minors. From an order revoking letters of guardianship as to Clarence Santos, on application of J. V. Santos and wife, A. J. Santos appeals. Affirmed.

Short & Sutherland and Carl E. Lindsay, all of Fresno, and Shepard & Shepard, of Selma, for appellant.

Thos. F. Lopez and C. M. Ozias, both of Fresno, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of Fresno county, which revoked, vacated, and set aside letters of guardianship upon the person of Clarence Santos, a minor. The said minor, an infant about three years of age, is the youngest of six children—brothers and sisters—orphaned by the death of their mother and father in the month of December, 1918. By the terms of the last will and testament of the father, who died subsequent to the death of the mother, property of the value of between $20,000 and $30,000 was left to the six children, share and share alike, and in January, 1919, A. J. Santos, a brother of the father, was appointed and qualified both as executor of the will and as guardian of the persons and estates of the six minor children of his deceased brother. Shortly thereafter, J. V. Santos and Maria C. Santos, his wife, who is an aunt of the orphaned children, petitioned for leave to adopt the said Clarence Santos, the minor in controversy. Consent to such adoption was given by certain relatives of the child, but A. J. Santos, the guardian, refused to consent and appeared at the hearing, in person and by counsel, for the purpose of objecting to the making of the order of adoption. The court overruled the guardian's objection and granted the petition for adoption.

Following the entry of the order for adoption, said J. V. and Maria C. Santos, the adopting parents, instituted the present proceeding for the revocation of the letters of guardianship of the said Clarence Santos. After demurrer and answer, testimony was taken from which it appeared that the eldest of the six orphans is 14 years of age, that A. J. Santos, the guardian, has children of his own living with him, in addition to his six wards, and that his wife has left him and the children are being cared for by himself and a hired woman. It further appeared that the petitioners have no children of their own. Among other things, the court found that the moral and physical well-being of the minor Clarence Santos would not be promoted and subserved by his continuing to reside with the guardian, that it would be for his best interest to reside with petitioners, and that, by reason of the relationship created by the adoption, it was no longer proper that the minor should remain under the guardianship of said A. J. Santos. Accordingly, the order, from which the present appeal is taken, was made, whereby the letters of guardianship of the person of said minor, Clarence Santos, were revoked, and A. J. Santos, appellant, was required to surrender the person of said minor to J. V. and Maria C. Santos, respondents.

[1] It is apparent from the record in the instant case that the order revoking appellant's letters of guardianship of the person of the minor was made solely for the reason that it was considered that such guardianship had been rendered unnecessary by respondent's adoption of the infant. It follows, then, that the efficacy of the judgment of removal is contingent upon the validity of the order of adoption, and, if the order of adoption is void, the judgment of removal must necessarily fall, together with the foundation upon which it rests. Consequently the initial question raised upon this appeal is whether or not the court was without jurisdiction to make the order of adoption by reason of the fact that the minor was in the custody of a duly appointed guardian or of the refusal of the guardian to consent to the adoption. If these facts constitute jurisdictional defects in the adoption proceedings, the said proceedings may be collaterally assailed, for the said facts appear upon the face of both the petition and order for adoption. Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, 348; Baldwin v. Foster, 157 Cal. 643, 108 Pac. 714.

[2, 3] In considering the question of the jurisdiction of the court to make the order of adoption, we must look to the sections of the Civil Code dealing with adoption, for the proceeding of adoption "exists in this state only by virtue of the statute which * * * expressly prescribes the conditions under which adoption may be legally effected."

Matter of Cozza, 163 Cal. 514, 522, 126 Pac. 161, 164 (Ann. Cas. 1914A, 214); Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 454, 177 Pac. 283. Section 221 of the Civil Code provides that "any minor child may be adopted by any adult person, in the cases and subject to the rules prescribed in this chapter." The remaining sections of the chapter prescribe the procedure and effect of adoption and certain limitations pertaining thereto, namely, that the person adopting must be at least 10 years older than the person adopted and that consent must be given by the following persons: The husband or wife of the person adopting; the child, if over 12 years of age; the parents, with specified exceptions, if living, or certain officers of the institution, if the child is in the custody of any of the designated institutions. It would seem to result from the provisions thus outlined that a minor child may be adopted, even though he is, at the time of the adoption, in the custody of a guardian.

[4] Wherever possible, such a construction should be given adoption laws as will sustain, rather than defeat, the object they have in view. Estate of McKeag, 141 Cal. 403, 74 Pac. 1039, 99 Am. St. Rep. 80. The main purpose of adoption statutes is the promotion of the welfare of children, bereft of the benefits of the home and care of their real parents, by the legal recognition and regulation of the consummation of the closest conceivable counterpart of the relationship of parent and child. While a guardian of the person of a minor is charged with a high duty and serious responsibility in the care of his ward, nevertheless the status of guardian and ward falls short of the close approximation to the relationship of parent and child which is attainable through actual adoption, culminating, as it does, in the child becoming a member, to all intents and purposes, of the family of the foster parents. The statutes in question should not, therefore, be construed so as to exclude an orphan in the custody of a guardian from the realization of the peculiar advantages to be derived from an adoption, unless such construction be unavoidable.

While the Code sections above mentioned do not expressly refer to such a situation as is here presented, they do, in effect, by the generality of their language, authorize an adoption in such a case. They provide that any minor child may be adopted by any adult person, in the cases and subject to the limitations set forth in the chapter. The "cases" referred to are clearly those situations where the prescribed difference in ages exists and the requisite consent is obtainable. There is no attempt to limit the privilege of adoption according to the legal relationship of the minor and the person who has him in custody at the time of the adoption proceedings. In view of the fact that adoption is sanctioned where the parents of the child are living and not disqualified from exercising their parental rights, there can be no reason for implying a restriction merely because there is a duly appointed and qualified guardian.

[5] Nor is the consent of such guardian necessary to the validity of the order of adoption. The matter of adoption rests almost entirely in the discretion of the court; the welfare of the child being the main consideration. Matter of Bewley, 167 Cal. 8, 138 Pac. 689. Since the adoption operates in derogation of the natural rights of the parents, the consent of the latter is, by statute, made indispensable, with certain clearly defined exceptions. Matter of Cozza, supra. Where, however, the parents are not living or for some recognized reason their consent is unnecessary, and where the child has not been in the custody of any of the institutions mentioned in the statutes, no consent to the adoption is required by the statutes on behalf of the child, if under 12, other than that of the court granting the adoption. Particularly must this be so when the child is in the custody of a guardian, for the minor is in reality—

> "a ward of the court, and the guardian is in effect an arm of the court, and is subject to the control of the court in the discharge of his duties as such guardian. Such court has authority to control and direct the guardian in the performance of his trust so as to insure the proper care of the infant." Matter of Ross, 6 Cal. App. 597, 92 Pac. 671.

There is apparently no authority in this state upon this question of consent of a guardian, and the cases in other jurisdictions vary, due, possibly, to differences in the statutes they interpret. In the case of Leonard v. Honisfager, 43 Ind. App. 607, 88 N. E. 91, interpreting statutes similar to the California statutes, consent of the guardian was held unnecessary. The court there said:

> "The statutory provisions on the subject give the legal guardian no right to interfere with this power of the court, and the courts will read no such right into the statute. While for many purposes the legal guardian of the child does stand in the place of the parent, the statute does not require his consent to give validity to an order of adoption of his ward."

[6] Appellant next advances the argument that, conceding that the guardian's consent is not essential to the validity of the adoption, nevertheless such an adoption does not, in and of itself, constitute a valid cause for the removal of the guardian. This contention is answered, we think, by subdivision 8 of section 253 of the Civil Code, which provides that a guardian may be removed by the superior court "when it is no longer proper that the ward should be under guardianship." The persons adopting the child acquire the paramount right to the custody of the child, for, after the adoption, they occupy the position of parents, and shall "have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation." Civ. Code, § 228. The right of parents to the care and custody of their child yields only for the most cogent and compelling reasons, to wit, in case the parents are shown by clear evidence not to be fit or proper persons to have such custody. Guardianship of Akers, 194 Pac. 706; Ex parte Brown, 98 Kan. 663, 159 Pac. 405. In the instant case the evidence fully supports the finding of the court that the best interests of the child would be subserved by residing with the adopting parents. Since the latter have acquired superior rights to the custody of the child, the reasons for the existence of a guardianship of the person of the child have ceased and the continuation thereof is no longer appropriate or "proper." Matter of Schwartz, 171 Cal. 633, 154 Pac. 304.

[7] The power of the court to make the order placing the custody of the child in the adopting parents, and, at the same time, permit the guardian to continue to act as guardian of the child's estate, cannot, we think, be seriously questioned. Doubtless, in the opinion of the court below, it was desirable that the property of the six brothers and sisters remain under the control of one person, and there is nothing anomalous in a situation wherein the custody of the person of a minor is in the parents and that of his estate is in a guardian. We think the court below had power to create this situation, if in the exercise of a sound discretion it found it proper to do so.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

OAKLAND PAVING CO. v. WHITTELL REALTY CO. (S. F. 9134.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑515(1) — Assessment statute may cure delay in work.

The Legislature has power to embody in a statute authorizing an assessment for street improvement work a curative provision, which will validate the assessment, though the contract work was not completed in time.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑446 — Contractor's delay in securing extension of time held an "informality" cured by statute.

Failure of contractor for street improvement to secure his extension of time till the day after the contract period, fixed after his bid was accepted, had expired, even if the work was then uncompleted, he having been proceeding diligently with his work, was an "informality," within Improvement Act 1911, § 26, providing that no proceeding prior to assessment shall be held invalid for any informality in it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Informality.]

3. Courts 🔑107—Decision not authority as to matters not considered.

Decisions under a street improvement act as to the effect of failure to complete the contract in time cannot be considered binding on the effect of curative provisions of the statute, where they were not discussed and apparently not considered.

4. Statutes 🔑225¾—Words considered eliminated, in view of prior decisions.

The passage, after decisions declaring the limiting effect of the words "except on appeal" in the curative clause of a street improvement act, of another improvement act eliminating such words, must be considered as done with reference to such decisions, to avoid the limitation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Oakland Paving Company against the Whittell Realty Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Reed, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, and J. P. Langhorne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to foreclose an assessment for the improvement of a street in Oakland. The only defense interposed is that the work was not completed within the time limited in the contract. The court found that the work had not been completed within such time, and therefore held the assessment void. The case was appealed to this court and transferred to the District Court of Appeal (First District, Division 1), which reversed the lower court, holding that the curative provisions of section 26 of the "Improvement Act of 1911" (Stats. 1911, p. 730), under which the work was done, validated the assessment, notwithstanding the finding that the work was not completed in time. The respondent petitioned this court for a transfer after the decision in the District Court of Appeal upon the ground that the decision squarely overruled a long line of decisions by this court upon the effect of the failure to complete a contract within time. The cases so claimed to be overruled are the following: Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. 427; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 454, 10 Pac. 672; Dougherty v. Nevada Bank, 81 Cal. 162, 22 Pac. 513; Brock v. Luning, 89 Cal. 316, 26 Pac. 972; Palmer v.

Burnham, 120 Cal. 364, 52 Pac. 664, 1080; Kelso v. Cole, 121 Cal. 121, 53 Pac. 353; Union, etc., Co. v. Campbell, 2 Cal. App. 534, 535, 84 Pac. 305.

The petition of the respondent was granted, not only because of the apparent force in its contention, but also for the reason that at the time we had under consideration a similar question arising under a street improvement procedure ordinance of San Francisco, in which ordinance the exact language of section 26 of the Improvement Act of 1911, supra, was contained.

Appellant claims that the curative provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911, § 26, supra, establish the validity of the assessment notwithstanding a failure to complete the work in time. This provision appears for the first time in that act and is as follows:

> "Sec. 26. * * * No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and non-payment, after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the council to do the work, has been actually published as herein provided, and said notices of improvement have been posted along the line of the work, as provided in section five of this act, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done."

Respondent in turn claims that this provision is so similar in scope and effect to that contained in previous laws, particularly that of 1871–72 (section 12, p. 815), that the above decisions rendered under such statutes are decisive of the question, and that the assessment is therefore void, notwithstanding the above curative clause.

The question, then, is this: Is the failure to complete the work under this contract an "error, informality or other defect in the proceedings prior to the assessment," within the meaning of section 26, supra? and, if so, has the Legislature the power to prohibit the courts from declaring an assessment void on that account?

In the case at bar the contract was signed December 30, 1911. The contractor was given 150 days from the date of the contract to perform the work. That time would ordinarily expire on May 29th of the succeeding year, but as 1912 was a leap year it expired May 28th. Apparently overlooking this fact, the order of extension was made May 29th.

The work was accepted and an assessment issued July 5, 1912. The only evidence adduced by the respondent on the question of the completion of the work was the categorical answer "No" to the question "Was the work completed May 29, 1912?" addressed to its witness, and the further testimony, given by the same witness, that on June 15, 1912, some of the contractor's employees were working upon the street. There is no evidence whatever as to the amount of work uncompleted on May 29, 1912, or as to what work was being done on June 15th. The testimony of the defendant would be entirely consistent with the fact that on May 29th some trifling imperfection in the work was not completed, and that this imperfection was being completed on the 15th day of June next, or that the work done in June might have been the remedying of some defect which had been discovered after its acceptance by the street superintendent, although, of course, the failure to complete the work may have been much more extensive.

[1] In the case of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, it was flatly decided that the curative provision contained in the amendment to the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147), sometimes called the Bond Act, making the bond conclusive evidence of the regularity and validity of all previous proceedings, was valid to the extent that nonjurisdictional matters were cured by the issuance of the bond; and it was accordingly flatly held that a failure to perform the work in time was cured by the issuance of the assessment and bond. It was thereby affirmatively established that the Legislature had power to embody in the statute authorizing the assessment a curative provision which would validate the assessment, notwithstanding the fact that the contract work was not completed in time. It follows from this decision that, if the curative provision of the law of 1911 is broad enough to cover the same subject, it is a valid exercise of legislative power, and the assessment in this case must be sustained, even though we should hold that the work was not completed in time. The above-quoted curative provision of the law of 1911 is contained in section 26, which also regulates the right of appeal to the local legislative body and declares the effect of such appeal or the failure to appeal.

[2] It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that a failure to secure an extension of time on the exact day when the contract expired, or before, is a mere defect or informality in the proceedings, where the contractor has been proceeding diligently day after day as the law and contract provides, and has failed to complete the work within the time, which was fixed after his bid to do the work had been accepted. If the extension had been made on the exact day when it should have been made, there would have been no defect and no informality, and consequently no necessity for the operation of any curative provision.

It is, however, contended by the respondent that this proviso is very similar to, if not identical with, provisions in previous laws which have been already passed upon by the court. Without reviewing the whole course of these decisions, it is sufficient to say that, in the earlier provisions of the Consolidation Act of San Francisco, the character of defense which could be interposed in an action upon a street assessment lien was specified in the law. The Consolidation Act of 1862 (Stats. 1862, p. 398, § 12), after providing for an appeal and authorizing the board of supervisors to correct assessments, provides:

> "All the decisions and determinations of said Board upon notice and hearing as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to an appeal, under the provisions of this section, as to all errors and irregularities which said board could have remedied and avoided." (Italics ours.)

The law of 1871-72 (pages 804, 815, § 12) also provided for an appeal to the board of supervisors. It also provided:

> "And all the decisions and determinations of said Board of Supervisors shall be final and conclusive upon all parties entitled to an appeal. * * * After jurisdiction to order any work has been obtained, no irregularity in any of the subsequent proceedings shall render any assessment illegal."

The Vrooman Act of March 18, 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 156, § 11), provided for an appeal to the city council, but added the following proviso:

> "All the decisions and determinations of said city council, upon notice and hearing as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal under the provisions of this section, as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided; and no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council, as provided in this section, for any error, informality, or other defect in any of the proceedings prior to the assessment, or in the assessment itself, where notice of the intention of the city council to order the work to be done, for which the assessment is made, has been actually published in any designated newspaper of said city for the length of time prescribed by law, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done." (Italics ours.)

The provision that "no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council, * * * where the notice of the intention * * * to order the work to be done * * * has been actually published" before the aforesaid resolution ordering the work to be done, was held in the case of Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. 435, not to apply to any defects which could not be cured by the supervisors upon appeal. It is there said:

> "The provision, in the latter part of section 11, that 'no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council,' etc., has no application to a case in which an appeal is not authorized, or in which, even if taken, the city council could not have remedied the defect. The Legislature did not intend to declare that the owner should be deprived of his defense to any claim upon an assessment, where the assessment was void by reason of incurable defects, because he had failed to invoke the aid of a tribunal which was powerless to grant him any relief."

It will be at once observed that the clause "except upon appeal to the city council" is omitted entirely from the corresponding provision of section 26 of the Street Improvement Law of 1911, supra. This omission is significant in the light of the fact that that clause was the basis of the decision in Manning v. Den, supra, which limited the curative scope of the provision to matters which could have been corrected by an appeal to the city council. The clause of section 26 under consideration here is to the effect that the proceedings shall not be held invalid "by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same," etc. If the failure to secure an extension of the time for the performance of the work, until one day after that time expired, is an "error or informality, or other defect" in the prior "proceedings," it is cured by that section. The only similar provision in any of our statutes bearing upon street improvements is that in the statutes of 1871-72, pp. 804, 815, § 12, supra. The fundamental idea of this curative clause is similar to that in section 26 of the Improvement Act of 1911, namely, that, after jurisdiction has been obtained, "subsequent irregularities shall not render the assessment illegal." The statute of 1871-72, supra, also contained the following:

> "In all suits brought to recover street assessments the proceedings therein shall be general and regulated by the provisions of this act, and also, when not in conflict herewith, by the Civil Practice Act of this state; but no defense shall be interposed except: First—want of jurisdiction to order work; second—that the assessment has been paid; third—fraud in the assessment, or in any of the acts or proceedings prior thereto, setting out the facts showing such fraud." Stats. 1871-72, pp. 804, 816, 817, § 13.

Notwithstanding these provisions, assessments under the act were held void where the contract was not completed in time. Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54; Mahoney v. Braverman, 54 Cal. 565; Dougherty v. Coffin, supra; Raisch v. San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. 22; Dougherty v. Nevada Bank, supra; Brock v. Luning, supra. However, the effect of the provisions of sections 12 and 13 above quoted is not discussed in any of these cases. The only discussion at all is on the subject of the effect of a failure to appeal to the supervisors as provided in section 12, supra, although the validity of section 13 of the statute of 1871-72, supra, limiting the defenses which may be interposed to an assessment seems to be fully recognized in several other decisions. Nolan v. Reese, 32 Cal. 484, 487; Brady v. Bartlett, 56 Cal. 350, 369; Doane v. Houghton, 75 Cal. 360, 363, 17 Pac. 426. But, for some reason, neither the effect of these last-mentioned decisions nor of the curative provisions found in sections 12 and 13 is discussed in any of the cases. It seems to be assumed rather than decided that the act of extending the time for the completion of the work fails for lack of jurisdiction, and that, therefore, the defense is one that is permitted under the first provision of section 13, supra, of the law. The other curative provision in section 12, supra, does not seem to have been noticed or discussed. The court simply followed decisions rendered under previous statutes which did not contain this clause. It should be noted, however, in determining the effects of these decisions that the statute of 1871–72 made it mandatory upon the supervisors to relet the contract where the work was unfinished within the contract period. The language of the act of 1911 on that point is not mandatory.

[3, 4] We cannot therefore regard the decisions under this act as to the effect of a failure to complete the contract in time as binding upon the effect of the curative provisions of sections 12 and 13 thereof where that matter is not discussed, and apparently was not considered. Moreover, the law of 1911, having been enacted after the decision of this court in Chase v. Trout, supra, must be construed in the light of that decision. The fact that section 26 of the Improvement Law of 1911 differs in its provisions from the Vrooman Act and from the law of 1871–72 is also to be considered. Relating to the point under discussion is the elimination of the clause "except upon appeal" contained in the Vrooman Act, section 11, supra. As has been stated, it was the insertion of this clause that resulted in the determination by this court in Manning v. Den that only errors which could be corrected upon appeal were referred to in that clause which provided that proceedings should not be held void for errors, etc., "except upon appeal." The elimination of this clause in legislation enacted after the decision in Chase v. Trout, supra, and in Manning v. Den, supra, is a clear indication of the legislative purpose to exercise its power to enact curative provisions which would prevent assessments being declared invalid because of defects, informalities or irregularities whether they could be corrected by appeal to the city council or not.

In view of the foregoing, we have no hesitation in saying that the failure of the contractor to secure his extension of time until the day after the contract period had expired, even if the work was then uncompleted, was an "informality" in the prior proceedings which was cured by the provisions of section 26.

Judgment reversed.

SULLIVAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY et al. (S. F. 9679.)

1. Mortgages 🔑497(2)—Parties to foreclosure suit held not entitled to resist issuance of writ of assistance.

Where a decree foreclosing a mortgage adjudged that a lease was subordinate to the mortgage but superior to all other liens and ordered a sale free and clear of all liens and claims and there was no appeal, motion for new trial, or other attack on the decree, the lessees, who were parties to the suit, could not resist the issuance of a writ of assistance for error, irregularity, or inadvertence in failing to protect their right of possession or rights in the surplus proceeds.

2. Mortgages 🔑502—Sale subject to lease subordinate to mortgage cannot be ordered.

When a lease, though superior to all other liens and claims, is subsequent and subordinate to a mortgage, the court can no more order a sale on foreclosure of a mortgage subject to the leasehold interest than it could order a sale subject to the rights of any other subordinate lienholder.

3. Mortgages 🔑567(1)—Lessees whose interest ranked next to mortgage should have had precedence in disposition of surplus.

Where a foreclosure decree adjudged that a lease was subordinate to the mortgage but superior to all other liens, the lessees should have been given precedence over all lien claimants other than the mortgagee in the disposition of the surplus proceeds after satisfaction of the mortgage.

4. Mortgages 🔑542—Bid by lessee sufficient to satisfy prior claim held to give no right of possession as against higher bidder.

That lessees whose lease was subordinate to a mortgage but superior to all other liens bid an amount sufficient to meet the mortgage at the foreclosure sale gave them no right to retain possession as against a higher bidder to whom the sale was made.

5. Mortgages 🔑517—Commissioner bound to sell to highest bidder, though lessees' bid sufficient to meet superior claim.

At a foreclosure sale, though the lessees whose lease was superior to all liens except the mortgage bid an amount sufficient to meet the demand of the mortgage, it was the duty of the commissioner to sell to the highest bidder, where the decree included other liens to be satisfied from the proceeds.

6. Mortgages 🔑544(3) — Writ of assistance against parties to action authorized without notice when so provided by decree.

Where a foreclosure decree provided that in case the purchaser should be refused possession, a writ of assistance should issue without further notice it was conclusive against the parties in possession who were parties to the action, and entitled the purchaser to a writ of assistance without notice.

7. Mortgages 🔑544(3)—Ex parte order for writ of assistance not set aside unless improvidently made.

An ex parte order granting a writ of assistance to the purchaser at a foreclosure sale should not be set aside by the court making it, unless there is a showing that it was improvidently or improperly made.

8. Mortgages 🔑544(3) — Writ of assistance cannot make possession subject to outstanding lease when sale made free from claims.

Where a foreclosure decree adjudged that a lease was subordinate to the mortgage and ordered a sale free from all liens and claims, the court had no power in issuing a writ of assistance to modify its terms so as to make the purchaser's possession subject to the lease.

9. Mortgages 🔑544(3)—Writ of assistance is matter of right when rights adjudicated by decree and not subsequently changed.

Where the parties against whom a writ of assistance is sought by the purchaser at a foreclosure sale were parties to the foreclosure suit and their rights were adjudicated by the decree and there has been no change or modification of the right to possession arising under the terms of the decree, a writ of assistance is a matter of right.

10. Mandamus 🔑3(1)—Right to writ of assistance to enforce foreclosure decree may be enforced notwithstanding other remedies.

Where a foreclosure decree adjudging that a lease is subordinate to a mortgage and ordering a sale free from liens and claims has become final and no equities have arisen since the decree, the purchaser is entitled to a writ of mandamus to compel the issuance of a writ of assistance against the lessees, notwithstanding his remedy by ejectment, unlawful detainer or appeal.

11. Mortgages 🔑546—Lessee planting crops pending running of time for redemption not entitled thereto after time for redemption.

Lessees of land, whose lease was subordinate to a mortgage which was foreclosed, who planted crops pending the running of the period of redemption, were not entitled to retain possession for the purpose of cultivating and harvesting the crops, either on the theory that the termination of the leasehold was uncertain because of the possibility of redemption, or under the common-law rule as to the right of a tenant to emblements.

12. Mortgages 🔑542—Purchaser's right of possession cannot be postponed because of hardship in removing live stock.

The right of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale to possession of the premises on the expiration of the time for redemption may not be postponed because of the hardship to lessees of removing their live stock at that particular time.

In Bank.

Application by W. H. Sullivan for a writ of mandate and prohibition against the Superior Court in and for the County of Mendocino, and others. Peremptory writ of mandamus issued.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, and Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John W. Preston, of Ukiah, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate and prohibition against the judge of the superior court, county clerk, and sheriff of the county of Mendocino to secure the petitioner in the execution of a writ of assistance to place him in possession of certain real property which he claims under a commissioner's deed in a sale under foreclosure of mortgage.

All of the facts preliminary to a consideration of petitioner's rights in the premises are determined by the decree in foreclosure.

This decree was obtained in proceedings duly had giving the court jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants and subject-matter of the action in the case of First Federal Trust Company, a corporation, as plaintiff, against Leslie B. McMurtry, Alice A. McMurtry, mortgagors, B. P. Noonan and Standard Live Stock Company, holding a leasehold interest in the premises, subject to plaintiff's mortgage, and other defendants holding liens against the premises, subsequent to and subject to the plaintiff's mortgage and to said leasehold interest. It is the rights of the purchaser at foreclosure sale, under the decree, as against the lessees that are here involved. It was adjudged and determined by the decree that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of a first mortgage lien on the lands in question, upon which there was due, owing and unpaid the sum of $94,516, and that "each and every right, title, interest, and claim of every kind of each and all of the defendants herein and of each and all of the cross-complainants herein" are subsequent and subordinate to the plaintiff's mortgage.

Also, that the certain lease referred to in said answer of said defendants B. P. Noonan, Standard Live Stock Company, a corporation, et al., "is now in full force and effect as to the unexpired term thereof, and that said Standard Live Stock Company is now the owner and holder thereof"; also, that said lease was "and it is hereby adjudged and decreed to be subsequent and subordinate to all said rights, claims and liens of said plaintiff," and that said lease is "prior and superior to any and all claims of liens" of the other defendants and cross-complainants, as parties claiming under them, and that all and every right and interest of the other defendants and cross-complainants "are subsequent and subordinate to the rights of said defendant Standard Live Stock Company under said lease, as successor in interest of the defendant, B. P. Noonan, the lessee therein named."

It was then found and decreed that other defendants and cross-complainants, whose names and interest it is not necessary to set out here, were owners and holders of subsequent and subordinate liens on the mortgaged premises in varying amounts aggregating about the sum of $64,000. The amounts of these subsequent liens were ascertained and determined and all declared subordinate to the lien of plaintiff and to the leasehold of the Standard Live Stock Company.

The decree then ordered and adjudged that a sale be made by a commissioner named for that purpose of all the mortgaged premises in one parcel in the manner provided by law "free and clear of any and all liens and claims of each and all of the defendants herein, and of each and all of the cross-complainants herein, and of any and all other persons and corporations."

It was next directed that the proceeds of such sale be applied first to the payment of the amounts due the plaintiff aggregating the sum of $94,546, and that the balance, if any, be applied in the order of their preference to the subsequent lien claims.

No provision was made by this decree to protect the leasehold of the Standard Live Stock Company, or for the application of any of the proceeds of the sale to its interest in the premises. The decree, however, directs if there remain any balance after applying the proceeds as therein specifically directed, the same "be returned into court to abide the further order thereof."

It is finally provided by the decree that the purchaser at said sale be let into possession of the premises, "and that in case such purchaser or purchasers shall be refused such possession, a writ or writs of assistance issue without further notice, requiring the sheriff of the county in which said lands are situated to place and maintain each of said respective purchasers in the quiet and peaceable possession of the lands and premises so foreclosed by him and the whole thereof."

The sale was made pursuant to said decree, at which sale the petitioner, W. H. Sullivan, bid in the entire mortgaged property at the sum of $152,825, and in due course, no redemption having been made, received the commissioner's deed to the premises. The purchaser was not a party to the foreclosure suit nor in any manner connected therewith. At the time the commissioner's deed was delivered the said B. P. Noonan and Standard Live Stock Company were in possession of the premises, claiming by virtue of their lease. Demand was made upon them and the commissioner's deed was exhibited to them, but they refused to surrender possession. Petitioner then applied to the superior court in which the decree was given that a writ of assistance be issued in accordance with the terms of the decree of foreclosure and sale. Such writ was thereupon ordered and was issued, directed to the sheriff of Mendocino county, requiring him to put the purchaser in possession. Before the sheriff had executed the writ the lessees, Noonan and Standard Live Stock Company, applied to and obtained from the court an order restraining the sheriff from executing the writ, and served notice of motion to amend the writ by providing that the purchaser be placed in possession of the premises "subject, however, to the lease of Standard Live Stock Company, a corporation."

It is to these proceedings withholding and amending the writ of assistance that the petition before us for writ of mandate and prohibition is directed. It is claimed by petitioner, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, that the court or judge thereof was without jurisdiction to withdraw or modify the original order and writ of assistance issued in accordance with the terms of the foreclosure decree.

[1-3] It seems to us that the main issue in this proceeding, namely, the right of the purchaser at this sale to possession of the entire interest and estate in these premises on receipt of his deed, freed from the leasehold or other subsequent interests, is not open to dispute. The decree was allowed to become final without appeal, motion for new trial, or other attempt to avoid or modify it. The owners of the leasehold were parties to the action. Their interest was declared subject and subordinate to plaintiff's mortgage. The entire interests covered by the mortgage and lease were subject to sale and ordered sold and foreclosed in satisfaction of plaintiff's claim. No provision was made for making this sale subject to the leasehold interest, and the court could no more have subordinated the rights of plaintiff to that of the lessees in making this sale than it could to the rights of the subordinate lienholders under subsequent mortgages. Each, in the order of preference of his claim, was entitled to redeem, but no redemption was made. As to all lien claimants other than the plaintiff, the leasehold was decreed to be prior and superior, and the lessees should have been entitled to take precedence to these in the distribution of the surplus proceeds of the sale after plaintiff's demand had been satisfied.

But whatever the power of the court or the rights of the lessees by way of protection of this leasehold, they were not exercised, and under the decree and order of sale the entire estate in the mortgaged premises was offered for sale and bid in by the purchaser, a stranger to the action, and he received under his purchase and the subsequent deed of the commissioner an unqualified and unlimited title to the entire tract.

The court did not exceed its jurisdiction in decreeing this sale, and it is too late now to go behind its judgment because of any errors or irregularities.

It is no answer at this time to the conclusiveness of this decree and the proceedings under it that the trial judge had intended the decree to safeguard the interests of the lessees, and that the failure to do so was one of mistake or inadvertence.

[4, 5] The status of the holders of the lease was in no way strengthened by the fact that they bid at the commissioner's sale an amount sufficient to meet the demand of plaintiff's prior lien. The decree included other liens to be satisfied from the proceeds of this sale and it was the duty of the commissioner to sell to the highest bidder. The bid of the lessees was not the highest bid, and was ineffective for any purpose. Petitioner's rights as a purchaser were only subject to the right of the various parties in interest to redeem.

[6] The writ of assistance as originally issued was properly granted, and only directs the execution of the decree according to its terms. It is provided by the terms of the decree itself that upon the execution of the commissioner's deed the purchaser be let into possession of the premises, "and that in case such purchaser or purchasers shall be refused such possession, a writ of assistance issue without further notice requiring the sheriff of the county in which such lands are situated to place and maintain each of said respective purchasers in the quiet and peaceable possession of the lands and premises so purchased by him and the whole thereof." Whether or not this provision for the issuance of a writ of assistance without further notice would bar the right of a stranger to the action coming into possession of the premises from requiring notice of an application for such writ, we see no reason why it should not be conclusive against the parties in possession who were parties to the action. While it is true that a writ of assistance will not ordinarily issue without notice to the person in possession, the reason for such rule surely cannot apply where the waiver of such notice has been determined as between the parties by the decree. Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220; Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190.

[7, 8] Even where an ex parte order without notice has been made, it should not be set aside by the court making the order unless there is a showing that it was improvidently or improperly made. Klokke Inv. Co. v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 717, 720, 179 Pac. 728; Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646. It is very apparent in this case that the attempted vacation or amendment of the writ of assistance as originally issued was solely for the purpose of modifying its terms so as to make the possession of the purchaser "subject to the lease of the Standard Live Stock Company," as is set out in the order of the court recalling such writ. This the court had no power to do. Such a limitation upon the possession of the purchaser at the sale would be an attempt to modify and restrict the right established by the decree.

It requires no citation of authorities to show that petitioner's rights under the judgment and foreclosure sale and conveyance cannot be circumscribed in this way.

We are satisfied that petitioner is entitled to possession of the premises freed from the claims of this lease.

[9] No judgment of court in ejectment or unlawful detainer could give him any clearer right to possession than he has under this judgment and sale. This is not a case where the rights of parties in possession who are not bound by the record in the foreclosure action are involved, and where an independent title or right of possession is claimed. Here the rights of the contenders for possession have been fully adjudicated and it only remains to put the plain provisions of such adjudication into execution. A writ of assistance under such conditions is a matter of right. The province of a writ of assistance is to give effect to the decree, and should only be withheld where it appears that the rights of the parties have been changed by some subsequent agreement or event. City of San Jose v. Fulton, 45 Cal. 316. In this case there is no claim that there has been any change or modification of the right to possession arising under the terms of the decree.

[10] It is strongly urged by respondents that the petitioner cannot resort to mandamus to compel or restrain the action of the trial court in this matter; that a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy is afforded either by appeal or by an action in ejectment, or for unlawful detainer.

It is true that all of these modes of obtaining relief are open to him, but it may well be questioned under the circumstances of this case, if either of them is plain, speedy, or adequate. Where, as here, the judgment has bcome final, and the only question in controversy is the right to enforce such judgment in accordance with its terms, it certainly is a roundabout and inadequate remedy to compel the party seeking enforcement of his decree to prosecute an independent action, when equity provides a direct procedure in the original action for carrying out the decree. Generally, it may be conceded, relief from orders granting or denying writs of assistance is sought by appeal. Such is obviously the proper remedy where issues of fact are involved raising a controversy as to rights acquired subsequent to the judgment. But here the successful prosecution of an appeal would bring the petitioner back to precisely where he now is, his right to possession under the same decree, and to obtain it through a writ of assistance. A subsequent order for or against the issuance of such writ would be subject to another appeal, and so on ad infinitum.

The question as to whether mandamus will lie in the face of a right of appeal upon orders affecting the issuance of writs of assistance has not been directly before the appellate courts of this state. The most that appears from California decisions cited by respondent is that the aggrieved party has always resorted to his remedy by appeal. It was held in State ex rel. Biddle v. Superior Court, 63 Wash. 312, 115 Pac. 307, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1119, that an appeal furnished a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy; but there, as in most of the cases where an appeal has been taken in this state, issues of fact extraneous to the record in the original action were presented which could not be adequately presented without a transcript of the evidence. In other words, where the right to the issuance of the writ appears on the record and there is no new obligation or extraneous facts giving rise to equities in favor of the respondent there would appear no good reason for denying the petitioner the right to summary relief. We think the case of Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 Pac. 11, is substantially in point here. It is true that mandamus was sought in that case to compel the issuance of a writ of execution and not a writ of assistance, and that a writ of execution issues as a matter of right, and not of discretion of the court or judge. But if in the matter before us the facts as disclosed by the petition and answer are such as to take the issuance of the writ of assistance without the discretion of the court the duty to grant and enforce the writ is as mandatory as in the case of an execution in an action at law.

In the decision last cited a writ of mandate to compel issuance of an execution was upheld, notwithstanding an appeal would lie. The court, in the opinion by Chief Justice Beatty, says:

> "Here it is suggested there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from the order overruling the motion for execution, but this remedy although plain is neither speedy nor adequate. The appeal, in the ordinary course, would not be decided for a long time, and pending the appeal there would be no security for the payment of the judgment. And, besides, nothing would necessarily result from an appeal beyond a reversal of the order, and this would merely confirm the right of the petitioner to execution—a right already complete. So that unless the judgment of reversal was accompanied by a mandatory direction to order the issuance of execution, the petitioner would find himself at the end of his appeal precisely where he is now—with a right to demand the issuance of the writ, but with no power to compel it."

The language quoted seems to us to be exactly applicable to the instant case.

[11] If respondents' contention could be maintained under the facts pleaded in the answer to the petition, that issues are presented giving rise to equities which have arisen since the decree in foreclosure there would be force in the objection to a summary disposal of the matter on this hearing, but we do not think any equities that the court could take cognizance of are pleaded. True, respondents claim a right to retain possession of the premises for the purpose of cultivating and harvesting the crops it planted pending the running of the period of redemption. The theory advanced is that the termination of the leasehold became uncertain by reason of the duty of the landlord to protect the lease by a redemption from the foreclosure sale. Such a presumption might be indulged as against the landlord mortgagor, but it cannot be maintained as against the purchaser under the foreclosure. The respondents holding under this lease had notice that all their rights would be terminated and cut off at the expiration of one year from the issuance of the certificate of sale, November 8, 1919, unless they or their landlord redeemed. That date fixed the termination of their leasehold as definitely as if it had been so written in the lease. They had an option to redeem. This could prove no more effective to extend their time than an option to renew their lease. Neither would have any force unless exercised within the time limited. The purchaser cannot be prejudiced by any laches on the part of the lessor, in failing to protect his tenants, for which the purchaser was in no way responsible. After the certificates of purchase had been issued the lessees planted and cultivated for a harvest that would mature more than a year in the future at their peril. The deed in this case was executed in November, 1920. If we may rely upon common knowledge and observation, it would suggest itself that all crops indigenous to the section of the country where this land is situated grown from the preceding cropping season would already have been harvested.

The common-law rule of the right of the tenant to emblements after the termination of the lease does not apply to an estate in lands thus definitely cut off and terminated by foreclosure.

The only decision cited by respondent which appeals to us as being at all in point on this proposition is that of Monday v. O'Neil, 44 Neb. 724, 63 N. W. 32, 48 Am. St. Rep. 760, but in that case the crops were planted before the foreclosure sale. The court says:

> "O'Neil knew, of course, that a sale might be made and confirmed before his crop would mature, but he could not know that such would be the case."

Here, the sale was completed and the only contingency that could stay the termination of the leasehold within the year was the exercise by the tenant or his landlord of the right of redemption, a matter entirely beyond the control of the purchaser, and for the failure in which there seems no good reason in law or in equity why his estate in the land should be deferred.

[12] The hardship incident to moving respondents' live stock from the premises at the particular time when their right of possession terminated is a matter which may not postpone petitioner's right of entry. In the varied and extensive population of a large stock ranch with cattle, swine, and sheep, if the time of removal should be adjusted to meet the periods of maternity of all the animals, it would prove difficult to find an entirely convenient season.

We recognize the unfortunate situation in which the respondents have been placed under this foreclosure decree and sale, but it is too late to afford them any relief by modifying the effects of the judgment.

Under the facts as they appear on the face of the record, it is our conclusion that the writ of assistance was not improvidently or inadvertently issued, and that the court is without power to amend it so as to subject petitioner's possession of the premises to the lease of the respondents, or to further withhold its execution.

Let a peremptory writ of mandamus issue requiring the issuance and execution of a writ of assistance in accord with the terms of the decree of foreclosure and sale, and providing that the purchaser at the foreclosure sale be placed in absolute possession of the premises as against all of the defendants in said action and all parties claiming under such defendants, or any of them.

CARBAUGH et al. v. WHITE BUS LINE.

1. Highways 🔑184(3) — Whether motorist after observing another vehicle was justified in proceeding held for jury.

Where a motorist who had the right of way and was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, though observing the presence of defendant's passenger bus approaching, continued on his rightful way across a boulevard in advance of the bus, the question whether such motorist was guilty of contributory negligence in view of the speed of the bus held for the jury.

2. Trial 🔑251(8)—Instruction cannot submit contributory negligence not pleaded.

Where defendant pleaded contributory negligence, an instruction which submitted the negligence pleaded was properly refused where it also attempted to submit the question whether plaintiffs were guilty of any other contributory negligence.

3. Trial 🔑255(11)—Party bound to request instruction submitting issues.

Whether defendant deemed itself entitled to an instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance, it should request a correct instruction on that issue.

4. Highways 🔑175(1)—Last clear chance doctrine inapplicable.

In an action for injuries resulting when plaintiff's motorcar was struck by defendant's autobus, the last clear chance doctrine has no application where plaintiff had the right of way, and there was nothing to show that, after he discovered the dangerous position in which he was being placed by the action of the driver of the bus in failing to reduce its speed or turn so as to pass behind his car, he could by any action have avoided the collision.

5. Highways 🔑175(1) — Motorist entitled to presume that others will obey the law.

A motorist proceeding at a lawful rate of speed and having the right of way is entitled to presume that others will obey the law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Actions by D. C. Carbaugh against the White Bus Line, and by Alice Carbaugh against the same defendant, which were consolidated. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in actions brought by them to recover damages for injuries which they each received in a collision between the automobile of which they were occupants and a motorbus operated by one of the defendant's employees. Each of said plaintiffs commenced a separate action against the defendant, but by agreement and order of the court the two actions were consolidated and tried together.

The complaint in each case charged that "the defendant, through its agents and servants in charge thereof, so negligently operated one of defendant's autobuses or passenger stages that the same collided with the plaintiff's automobile, and he was injured as hereinafter set out." The defendant in its answer in each case specifically denied this allegation, and in addition thereto pleaded by way of separate defense that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in a number of specially pleaded particulars in connection with and at the time of said collision.

The consolidated cases were tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff D. C. Carbaugh for $1,775, and in favor of the plaintiff Alice Carbaugh for the sum of $6,000. The amount of these combined verdicts was, upon motion for a new trial, reduced by plaintiffs' consent to the extent of $2,500, and thereupon said motion was denied, and judgment for the reduced amount entered in plaintiffs' favor, from which judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The facts of this case may be summarized as follows: The collision in question occurred on June 22, 1919, at the intersection of San Gabriel Mission drive with Pomona boulevard in the county of Los Angeles, state of California. Pomona boulevard runs east and west. The San Gabriel Mission drive runs in a general northwesterly and southeasterly direction, and intersects, but does not cross, Pomona boulevard at an angle of approximately 45 degrees. The plaintiffs' car was a five-passenger Saxon, and just prior to said collision was being driven by the plaintiff D. C. Carbaugh on the Mission drive approaching Pomona boulevard, into which he intended driving and thence turning to the east. As said plaintiff, driving his car, approached the intersection of these two streets he was driving on the right side of the road and sitting on the left side of his car, in which there were five persons besides himself, one of whom was the plaintiff Alice Carbaugh. The car was being driven at the rate of about 15 miles an hour, and when within about 50 feet of the point of intersection its driver looked to the east and saw the defendant's motor stage approaching from that direction along the boulevard. When he first observed the stage it was approximately 250 feet from the intersection, and appeared to be traveling at the rate of from 30 to 35 miles an hour. The plaintiff Carbaugh, as he approached the intersection, reduced the speed of his car to from 10 to 12 miles an hour, keeping the stage continually in view. When he arrived at the point of intersection the stage was approximately 150 feet away, and appeared to be coming along or near the center of the boulevard and traveling at the rate of about 35 miles an hour. Plaintiff Carbaugh, according to his own testimony and that of those who were with him in his car, put out his left hand, blew his horn, and proceeded to cross the boulevard, turning to the eastward as he reached its center. The defendant's stage continued with undiminished speed until it reached a point within a few feet of the plaintiff's car, when it swerved suddenly to the left and collided with it at a point which, according to the testimony of the plaintiffs' witnesses, was to the left of the center of the boulevard. The plaintiffs' injuries were the result of this collision.

[1] The first contention of the appellant herein is that the plaintiff D. C. Carbaugh, as the driver of said automobile, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in entering upon and attempting to cross said boulevard after observing the defendant's stage approaching its point of intersection with the Mission drive. This contention is absolutely without merit. The plaintiff D. C. Carbaugh, as he approached the intersection of these two streets, was driving upon the right side of the Mission drive at a rate of speed permitted by law, and had, under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, the right of way across Pomona boulevard in advance of the defendant's stage approaching thereon. Whether or not after observing the approach of said stage and its position upon said boulevard, and the rate of speed at which it was traveling, the said plaintiff was justified in proceeding upon his rightful way across said boulevard in advance of said stage was clearly a question of fact for the jury. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677; Commonwealth Bonding, etc., Co. v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 184 Pac. 29; Robinson v. Clemons, 190 Pac. 203; Baker v. Western Auto Stage Co., 192 Pac. 73.

The authorities cited by the appellant in support of his above-mentioned contention do not sustain the same, since the facts in each of said cases differ materially from those of the case at bar.

[2] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in refusing to give certain of the defendant's requested instructions. The first of these instructions to which our attention is directed has reference to the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The rejected instruction reads as follows:

> "I instruct you in this case that, even though you believe the defendant was negligent, your next inquiry should be whether or not the plaintiff himself was negligent, and whether or not his negligence contributed, even slightly, or to any extent to the cause of the accident; and if you believe that the plaintiff was negligent, either by failing to use ordinary care as he drove into said boulevard, or by failing to stop his automobile if he realized his perilous position, or if he was negligent in any other particular, and that said negligence or any of it contributed even in a small degree to the accident, then neither of the plaintiffs can recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

The vice of the foregoing instruction is discovered when it is compared with that portion of the defendant's answer which contains his affirmative plea with regard to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. His pleading in that regard is specific, setting forth with particular detail the specific acts of the plaintiff's alleged negligence upon which the defendant relies. In the above-quoted instruction, however, after reciting certain of these specific negligent acts, the defendant seeks to have the court charge the jury that—

> "If he (said plaintiff) was negligent in any other particular, and that said negligence or any of it contributed even in a small degree to the accident, then neither of the plaintiffs can recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

This portion of said instruction is so clearly contrary to law that it requires no authority to uphold the action of the trial court in refusing to give it.

[3-5] The next and only other contention of the appellant deserving attention is its contention that the trial court was in error in refusing to give an instruction embodying the doctrine of "last clear chance." The only instruction which, so far as we can discover, the defendant asked upon that subject, was the above quoted instruction, which, as we have seen, the trial court was for other reasons justified in refusing to give. If the defendant believed itself entitled to an instruction in this case embodying the doctrine of the last clear chance, it was its duty to request the giving of an instruction upon that subject which would not be objectionable upon other grounds, but in our view of this case there is no room for the application of the doctrine of the "last clear chance" to the facts in evidence, since there is not a scintilla of evidence tending to show that, after the plaintiff D. C. Carbaugh discovered the dangerous position in which he was being placed by the action of the driver of the defendant's stage in failing to reduce its speed or turn to the right on the boulevard so as to pass behind the plaintiff's car, he could by any action on his part in either stopping his own car or accelerating its speed have avoided the collision. The said plaintiff was at all times within the limits of both his own right and duty in attempting to make his way across said boulevard; he had no knowledge or means of knowledge that the defendant's stage was not under control, or could not have been slowed down from the speed at which it was traveling when he first observed it so as to permit the plaintiff to make his rightful way across the boulevard in safety. Being strictly within his own rights, he had the right to presume that the driver of the defendant's stage would obey the law and perform his duty in the premises. Had he done so, it is clear that the collision in question would not have occurred. The law governing the respective rights of the parties under circumstances similar to those of the case at bar is fully stated in Whitelaw v. McGilliard, 179 Cal. 349, 176 Pac. 679; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 Pac. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Robinson v. Clemons, supra, and Baker v. Western Auto Stage Co., supra.

There are no other points urged by the appellant which we deem worthy of separate consideration. The instructions of the trial court upon the issues tendered to the jury were full and fair and are not properly subject to the appellant's criticism.

WILDER v. NICOLAUS. (Civ. 1951.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 31, 1920.)

1. Boundaries 🔑9 — Conveyance of quarter section held to carry title to strip 40 chains square.

A conveyance of the northeast quarter of a designated section carries title to a strip of land 40 chains square when nothing appears to the contrary.

2. Boundaries 🔑37(3) — Evidence held to warrant inference that county surveyor followed government survey.

In a boundary dispute involving a question as to the location of the line connecting the centers of two adjoining sections of swamp land which were not fully surveyed by the United States, but were surveyed by the county surveyor under St. 1855, p. 191, evidence held to warrant the inference that he established the line in accordance with the government survey, assuming that the government survey was not controlling.

3. Boundaries 🔑46(1)—Rule as to establishment of boundary by agreement stated.

When adjoining owners, being uncertain of the true position of a boundary, agree upon the true location, mark it on the ground, or build up to it and occupy on each side up to the place fixed, and acquiesce in such location for the period of limitations or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, it becomes the true line regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location; but, if the line is located, not for the purpose of settling an uncertainty, but to take land from one and transfer it to the other or with the intent to fix the true line, the agreement is invalid and does not change the boundary.

4. Appeal and error 🔑994(3)—Credibility of witnesses concerning conversation 40 years before is for the trial court.

In a suit involving a disputed boundary, the credibility of witnesses testifying to a conversation between the parties' predecessors in title for the purpose of showing that there was no agreement that a fence should constitute the boundary line was for the trial court, though the conversation took place 40 years before.

5. Boundaries ⚷37(5) — Evidence held to warrant finding against agreement that fence was boundary.

In a suit involving a disputed boundary, evidence held to support a finding that there was no agreement between the parties' predecessors in title that a fence constructed by one of them was on the true line.

6. Appeal and error ⚷762—Point first made in closing brief may be ignored.

A point made for the first time in appellant's closing brief as to error in admitting testimony may be ignored.

7. Appeal and error ⚷1050(1)—Admission of declaration not adding anything to further testimony of same witness not prejudicial.

In a suit involving a disputed boundary, where testimony of a witness concerning declarations by plaintiff's predecessor in title added nothing to the effect of his testimony as to a conversation between plaintiff's predecessor in title and defendant's predecessor, its admission was not prejudicial.

8. Adverse possession ⚷93—Payment of taxes for five consecutive years must be shown.

Where title by prescription had not been acquired prior to the amendment of 1878 of Code Civ. Proc. § 325, it was necessary to show payment of the taxes on the disputed strip for five consecutive years.

9. Adverse possession ⚷90 — When assessment of adjoining owners was by description in deed, held that there was no payment of taxes.

Where the assessment to adjoining owners was made according to the description in their deeds which described the lands by reference to the government and state surveys, there was no payment of taxes by one of them on a strip in his adverse possession, but not covered by his deed.

10. Boundaries ⚷47(1) — Party not estopped to recover land by delay in absence of injury to adjoining owner.

A landowner was not estopped by delay to sue for the recovery of a strip in possession of the adjoining owner where the adjoining owner was not misled injuriously by any act or declaration of plaintiff's grantor and had not spent any money in improving the land or in erecting any structure thereon.

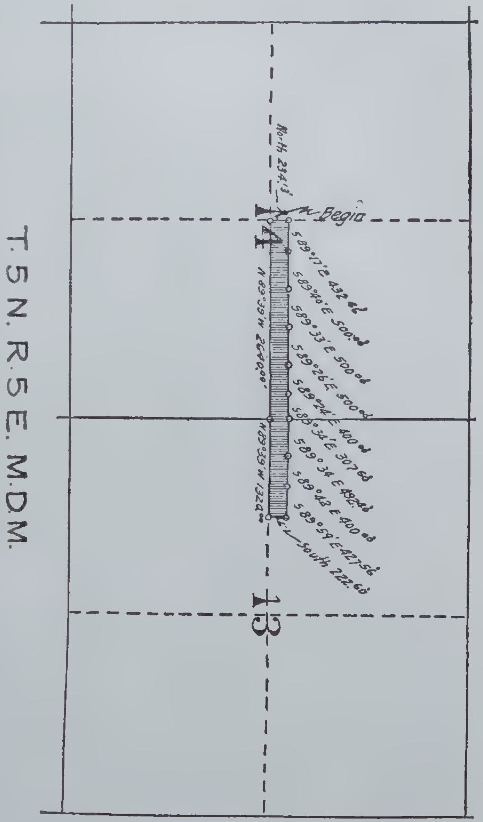
Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Elitha C. Wilder against Frances Nicolaus, as executrix. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George & Hinsdale and S. W. Downey, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

R. Platnauer and Hughes & Bradford, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The action was brought to quiet title to a rectangular piece of land containing about 20 acres. It is described in the complaint and findings by metes and bounds, the southern boundary of which as "the quarter section line running easterly and westerly through the center of sections 13 and 14, township 5 north, range 5 east, M. D. M." The strip in question is represented by the shaded portion of the following diagram:



The vital controversy in the case is as to the location of the southern boundary line of plaintiff's land, and the solution of this question depends upon the location of the center of said sections 13 and 14. It is not disputed that the legal title to the land lying north of a line connecting these centers belongs to plaintiff, and that lying south is the property of defendant. The contention of the latter is, however, that said southern boundary line constitutes the northern boundary instead of the southern of said disputed strip, the distance between them being 234.13 feet at one end, and 222.60 at the other, as shown on the diagram.

Admittedly, plaintiff's title is deraigned through two patents from the state of California of swamp land surveys, numbered 77 and 78. Survey No. 77 was patented to W. C. Hopping, March 15, 1861; the land conveyed being described as follows:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "Survey No. 77, swamp and overflowed lands, Sacramento county, township No. 5 north, range 5 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, section 14. The east half of section 14, more particularly described in the field notes as follows: Beginning at a quarter section corner of the north line of section 14 in township 5 north, range 5 east of Mt. Diablo meridian; run thence south 80 chains; thence east 40 chains; thence north 80 chains; thence west 40 chains to the place of beginning—containing 320 acres, lines run by the true meridian variation 15 degrees and 30 minutes east."

On February 1, 1883, W. C. Hopping conveyed to Ben W. Wilder "the N. E. ¼ of section 14, township 5 north, range 5 east, M. D. B. & M.," and on January 7, 1898, the latter conveyed to plaintiff "the northeast quarter of section 14," same township and range.

Survey No. 78 was patented to Wm. N. Brainard March 15, 1861. The land not involved in this controversy being omitted, the description in said patent is as follows:

> "Survey No. 78, swamp and overflowed lands, Sacramento county, township No. 5 north, range 5 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, sections 11, 13, and 23. * * * The west ½ of section 13, * * * more particularly described in the field notes of said survey as follows: Beginning again at the southeast corner of section 11; run thence south 80 chains; thence east 20 chains; thence north 80 chains; thence west 20 chains to the place of beginning—containing 160 acres."

On September 2, 1895, B. W. Wilder obtained a judgment in the superior court of Sacramento county against William N. Brainard adjudging that said Wilder was the owner in fee of "the W. ½ of the N. W. ¼ of section 13" of said township and range, and quieting his title thereto, and on January 7, 1898, said Wilder conveyed to plaintiff the same property as thus described. Plaintiff also deraigns title through a deed from George C. Higgins and others to B. W. Wilder, and dated February 1, 1859, wherein the property is described as the W. ½ of the N. W. ¼ of section 13 and the N. E. ¼ of section 14 in said township and range.

Defendant's title is connected with a deed dated December 28, 1865, executed by Wm. R. Wilder and Frances E. Wilder to Wendel Kearth, describing the land by metes and bounds, "beginning at the N. E. corner of the W. ½ of the S. W. ¼ of section 13; thence running west to the geographical center of section 14," followed by other calls unnecessary to mention, and "including the following tracts of swamp and overflowed lands, to wit: The south half of section 14 in township 5 north, range 5 east, being a part of swamp surveys No. 76 and No. 77, containing 320 acres, more or less; also S. W. (W.?) ½ of S. W. ¼ of section 13," same township and section, "containing 80 acres more or less."

It thus appears that the land conveyed to plaintiff and also that conveyed to defendant is described by legal subdivisions, and, furthermore, there is no doubt that the exterior boundaries of the surveys had their initial point at some United States section corner. The controversy, though, as to the location of the division line between the parties arises from the circumstances that said sections 13 and 14 do not appear to have been fully surveyed by the United States, that no monuments of such survey can be found at certain section corners, that the so-called swamp land surveys were made by the county surveyors, and it is the claim of appellant that these latter surveys must be followed, and that, in accordance therewith, said division line lies north of the disputed strip, although the United States survey may show it to be south.

[1] It may be said, though, that the United States survey is the basis for the survey by the county surveyor under the direction of the surveyor general, and the law makes it the duty of said official to have the survey made "as near as practicable, in accordance with the surveys of the public lands of the general government" (Stats. 1855, p. 191); and as we might expect, we find swamp land survey No. 77 beginning at the northwest corner of section 14, and the field notes end with this statement:

> "And surveyed in accordance with the instructions of the surveyor general, and being a continuation of the United States surveys."

The initial point of survey No. 78 is stated as the southeast corner of section 11, and the field notes conclude with the same statement as in 77. No doubt said reference is to the corners as located in accordance with the United States survey. It is true that the southeast corner of section 11 does not appear to have been established and set by the official survey made by the United States, but the exterior boundaries of section 11, the line between sections 11 and 14 and the western boundary line of 14 had been surveyed and established. Hence there would seem to be no difficulty in determining on the ground the location of said corner of section 11. But, even if the exact location of said corner is left in doubt, the evidence shows that the north line of section 14, as surveyed by the government, corresponds with the northern boundary of plaintiff's land. The conveyance, therefore, of the N. E. ¼ of section 14, nothing appearing to the contrary, would carry the title to a strip of land 40 chains square, but 40 chains south from said northern line would include the disputed strip in said section 14.

[2] A similar condition exists as to the portion of said strip in section 13. The northern boundary of said section is the continuation of section 14, and 40 chains south therefrom reaches the line drawn through the centers of said sections, as shown on the diagram.

The location of the northern boundary of plaintiff's land and the designation of the legal subdivisions thereof, in the absence of nullifying evidence to the contrary, seem to justify the finding of the court that the southern boundary thereof lies south of the disputed strip.

Of other circumstances tending to confirm this view, we refer to the testimony of the surveyor, J. J. Rooney. He made a survey of the premises in accordance with the United States survey, and he made a map thereof. This map was received in evidence, and it shows the southern boundary of plaintiff's land to correspond with the southern boundary of said disputed strip. Of some importance also is the testimony of J. A. Wilder, the son of B. W. Wilder, who declared that there was a stake in the northern boundary line of section 14 having a surveyor's mark upon it which was generally recognized around that vicinity as being a government survey stake; that subsequently the stake was taken up and some coal was found deposited at the foot of it. "In connection with the Wilder place, as it now exists—that is, the northwest corner of quarter section 14—it is the northwest corner of the place known as the Wilder place." He proceeded to state that he and his father measured south from that point 160 rods and it carried them 17 rods south of the northern boundary of the disputed strip.

It may be added that there is nothing in the evidence to show that the acreage claimed by plaintiff is in excess of what her deed calls for, and even some of the maps introduced by defendant and representing the swamp land surveys show the exterior lines of these sections to correspond exactly with the map and the survey made by the United States and in accordance with the claim of plaintiff herein.

The principal evidence relied upon by appellant to support her claim as to the location of the division line consists of the expert testimony of a prominent civil engineer and surveyor, but his opinion was based upon certain data of somewhat speculative and uncertain value and is subject to the familiar objections to this kind of testimony. Its force was also weakened by the cross-examination, and attention may be called to this significant admission by him that—

> "The actual position of this fence is 3.57 chains north of the location of the center of section 14, as the same would be located by the projection of the United States surveys. The point where the line would be located between the Wilder and Nicolaus ranches, according to what I have testified, would entirely depend upon where I made my starting point. * * * The map that I made did not coincide with the United States general map, but it did coincide with the swamp land. The fence line will not agree with the United States government line. * * * The northwest corner of the land occupied by Wilder is practically in the center of the road; the line is on the center line of the county road; that is, on the west boundary. The distance from the center of the county road south of the fences that we are speaking about is 36.43 chains."

The witness also testified that in 1853 "the United States surveyor had located the east boundary on Nicolaus' east line of 13 and had fixed the south corner of 13." This was three years before the said swamp land surveys were made by the county surveyor, and it would therefore appear that from the established government survey the county surveyor could locate the initial points of the two surveys, Nos. 77 and 78, and the presumption is that he followed that course, and located on the ground the half section corners of the sections 13 and 14, as called for by the government survey, notwithstanding the opinion of the witness to the contrary. Hence, if we accept the government survey as controlling, the conclusion cannot be avoided that plaintiff is the owner of the legal title to the land in dispute; and, if we must follow the survey of the county surveyor, it is at least a fair inference that he established the division line in accordance with the government survey.

Great stress is laid by appellant upon the point that—

> "The location of the true boundary line common to the 'Wilder' and 'Kearth' ranches, due to the conflicting surveys of the United States and of the state, is uncertain and is believed by the owners to be uncertain, and the survey, location, and staking of the line between the two ranches by the surveyor Winn in 1871, the construction thereon in 1873 or 1874 of the line fence ever since maintained on that line, and the acquiescence of the plaintiff and her predecessor in interest for upwards of 40 years in the line so surveyed and fenced as the true boundary line between the two ranches, conclusively establishes that line and the fence built and maintained thereon the true boundary between the two ranches."

As to the law applicable to such situation it is apparent that the earlier view of the Supreme Court has been modified by the later decisions, or, at least, that the correct doctrine was not fully stated in the earlier opinions. For instance, in Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619, it is declared that—

> "When the owners of adjoining lands have acquiesced for a considerable time in the location of a division line between their lands, although it may not be the true line according to the calls of their deeds, they are thereafter precluded from saying it is not the true line."

[3] The rule is more fully and accurately stated in Grants Pass Land, etc., Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 143 Pac. 754, as follows:

> "When such owners, being uncertain of the true position of the boundary so described, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed, and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location, as it may appear by subsequent measurements. * * * And if the line is located and agreed to, not for the purpose of settling an uncertainty in the minds of the parties as to the position of the true line upon the ground, but to take land from one owner and transfer it to the other, or without the intent to fix the true line, such agreement is invalid and does not change the legal boundary nor affect the title of either party to the land he previously owned."

In Friedman v. Southern California T. Co., 179 Cal. 266, 176 Pac. 442, it is said:

> "But the doctrine can be invoked only where adjoining owners, being uncertain of the actual position of the boundary described in their deeds, agree upon its true location. * * * The validity of such an agreement rests upon the belief and understanding of both parties that they are establishing the true boundary line between their properties."

The latest expression of the Supreme Court to which our attention has been called is found in Staniford v. Trombly, 58 Cal. Dec. 357, 186 Pac. 599, wherein it is declared that—

> "A fence built between adjoining property owners for the purpose of preventing the straying of stock, and not built upon an agreed boundary line, which boundary line was uncertain when the fence was built, cannot be considered as establishing the true boundary line between the properties, notwithstanding the acquiescence in the existence of the fence and the occupancy of each property up to the fence for a period of 30 years after its construction."

The court held that the acquiescence in the existence of the fence and the occupancy of the land did not amount to an agreement that it was upon the boundary line.

[4, 5] In this case there is no doubt of the existence of the fence and the occupancy of the land as claimed by appellant for a much longer period than required by the statute of limitations. But it is claimed by respondent that there was no uncertainty as to the location of the true boundary line, and there was no agreement that the fence was on the true line.

We may notice only the latter contention, as it is decisive of the controversy. Whether the circumstances, in the absence of direct evidence, would require a conclusion favorable to appellant, we need not determine, since there is the testimony of two witnesses to the effect that there was no such agreement between the owners of the property at the time the fence was built. This testimony is the subject of mirth and derision on the part of appellant, but its credibility was manifestly for the determination of the trial court. Assuredly we cannot say that it is inherently improbable, although it may appear somewhat remarkable, that they should remember a conversation for 40 years. We may quote the testimony of J. A. Wilder, as follows:

> "I am a son of Benjamin W. Wilder. On my twelfth birthday, March 25, 1874, my father and I started from Shingle Springs and arrived at the ranch where we now are, on March 29th. We put up a little cabin there to live in, and then we built some fence between our place and W. R. Bradford. We were there about two or three weeks. I saw Mr. Kearth; he talked with my father in my presence. Mr. Kearth came up to where we were building that fence, and spoke to my father about he was going to build that line fence on the south; he had not started then; he was then working on the west fence. He said, 'Mr. Wilder, there is lots of water down there on me; I am going up on you 16 rods.' My father said, 'Mr. Kearth, you go right on the line, and don't come on me an inch.'"

He further testified that after the fence was built the following conversation took place:

> "My father said, 'Mr. Kearth, you came upon my land.' He said: 'Yes.' 'Well,' he said, 'you move the fence back.' He said: 'I won't do it. You want your land you go up on Owen on account of the water.'"

From this and other testimony the court was amply justified in the conclusion that there was no agreement as to the fence being on the boundary line.

In explanation of the inaction for so many years of plaintiff and her predecessor in interest in reference to this fence, it may be said, as a matter of common knowledge that until a comparatively recent period this overflowed land was considered of such trifling value as hardly to justify the expense of any litigation to settle the title to a few acres.

[6] In this connection it is urged that the court committed error in overruling an objection to the testimony of these two witnesses as to certain declarations made by their father in the absence of Mr. Kearth in reference to this fence. But, conceding error in that respect, it is sufficient to say that the point is made for the first time in the closing brief of appellant, and we would be justified, therefore, in ignoring it. Kahn v. Wilson, 120 Cal. 643, 53 Pac. 24.

[7] Moreover, it is quite apparent that the error was not prejudicial. It added nothing to the effect of the testimony as to the conversation between Wilder and Kearth.

If such testimony had been given by another witness, there might be some merit in the claim that it had probably influenced the decision.

[8] As to adverse possession, the court was perfectly justified in finding against appellant. The fence was constructed in 1874, less than five years prior to the amendment of 1878 of section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, and, while there is some evidence of the use of the disputed strip prior to this time by appellant's predecessor in interest, yet the court was warranted in finding that it was not exclusive and under a claim of right or such as to give notice of any hostile claim. Mattes v. Hall, 28 Cal. App. 361, 152 Pac. 436. Hence, for appellant to establish title by prescription, it was necessary to show that she and her predecessors in interest had paid the taxes on the disputed strip for five consecutive years.

[9] It seems that the assessment was made to the adjoining owners according to the description in their deeds. In Friedman v. Southern California T. Co., supra, a similar situation was involved, and the court said:

> "Concededly the defendant paid no taxes except those assessed upon the land described by its deed. Its claim that by reason of the representations and agreements of the parties the description in the deed should be regarded as extending to the fence is but an attempt, in another form, to invoke the rule of agreed boundaries, and this, as we have seen, cannot be done."

The cases to the contrary cited by appellant where the assessment has been construed as extending to the fence were instances where the division line had been established by the parties. Such is not the condition here.

[10] We can see no element of estoppel in the case. Neither the defendant nor Wendel Kearth was misled in any manner injuriously by any act or declaration of plaintiff's grantor. There is no evidence that either of them spent any money in improving the land or in erecting any structure thereon. In Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 634, 108 Pac. 707, and Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 95 Pac. 888, buildings had been erected near the supposed boundary line under circumstances that would make it inequitable to disturb the possession and apparent title of the parties. Herein upon the facts found by the trial court the only persons who have been injured are respondent and her grantors, who have been deprived of the use of their land. Staniford v. Trombly, supra.

Under the rules by which this tribunal is governed, we think the action of the lower court must be upheld.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

CARPENTER et al. v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. (Civ. 3436.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 10, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⟹93(1) — Automobile driver's contributory negligence at crossing not chargeable to passenger.

A passenger in the automobile of another having no control over the owner driving the car or the operation of the car which he occupied merely as passenger was not chargeable with contributory negligence of the owner and driver at a railroad crossing.

2. Railroads ⟹327(12)—Automobile passenger must use ordinary care.

An automobile passenger, though not chargeable with the driver's negligence at a railroad crossing, is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, without which the injury received in a collision is attributable to his own negligence.

3. Railroads ⟹346(5)—Automobile passenger killed in crossing collision presumed to have used care.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1961, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that an automobile passenger killed in collision at a railroad crossing did everything that a reasonably prudent man would have done under the same circumstances for the protection of his own safety.

4. Railroads ⟹350(21) — Automobile passenger's negligence held question of fact.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that a passenger in an automobile driven by another was guilty of negligence contributing to his own death in collision with a train at a railroad crossing because he did not call to the attention of the driver of the automobile an approaching train when he himself saw it.

5. Railroads ⟹350(21)—Automobile passenger's negligence in failing to interfere with operation of car or to leave it held for jury.

If decedent, a passenger in another's automobile, when the car reached a point 30 feet distant from a railroad crossing, while moving at only 4 miles an hour, saw a train 300 feet away approaching at high speed, his failure to interfere with the driver's operation of the car rather than to rely on the latter's judgment in escaping the threatened danger, and his failure to leave the car, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have constituted contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Gene Carpenter and others, by Mary Carpenter, their guardian ad litem, and by Mary Carpenter, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

T. M. McNamara, of Taft, and Rowen Irwin, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter, Robert Brennan, and M. W. Reed, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and from the judgment entered thereon plaintiffs have appealed.

Plaintiffs are heirs of C. M. Carpenter, deceased, who died from injuries alleged to have been sustained as a result of defendant's negligent operation of a railway passenger train which collided with an automobile in which deceased was at the time traveling as a passenger.

It appears that Oak street in the city of Bakersfield extends north and south, crossing at right angles the railway tracks of defendant, which at the time in question was operating a passenger train thereon from the west, while W. C. Gibson, in an automobile in which Carpenter was a passenger, was driving south on said street to a point which required him to cross the railway tracks in reaching the destination to which Carpenter had employed Gibson to take him. Gibson was at the wheel of his car on the left side thereof, and Carpenter was sitting beside him on the west side, from which the train was coming. In approaching the railway from the north on Oak street the view of the railway tracks until within some 30 feet thereof was at the time more or less obstructed by telegraph poles, a fence, growing vegetation, bushes, and cars standing on a spur track extending in a northwesterly direction. But upon the automobile reaching a point 30 feet distant from the track the view thereof on the west, from which direction the train came, was unobstructed for a distance of 300 feet. Covering this distance of 30 feet from the track the automobile was operated at a speed of some 4 miles per hour, while the train approached the crossing at a speed of some 35 or 40 miles per hour, and while there was at the crossing a wigwag and bell, they were not operated, nor did the men in charge of the train give any signal or warning of its proximity to the crossing until within a few feet thereof, at which time the front wheels of the automobile had crossed the north rail of the track, and, while Gibson was trying to back his car, the engine collided therewith and caused the injuries to Carpenter from which he died.

Upon the evidence offered the jury might very properly have found defendant guilty of negligence in operating its train. Gibson, as owner and driver of the automobile, was familiar with the existence of the crossing, knew that trains were operated over the same at regular intervals, and, conceding that, as claimed by appellants, there was an absence of warning given by defendant's servants of the approach of the train, and that the track could not be seen by one traveling south on Oak street until within 30 feet thereof, nevertheless it clearly and conclusively appears that when the automobile reached a point 30 feet distant from the track a plain and unobstructed view thereof was afforded for a distance of at least 300 feet to the west, from which direction the train was coming, and from which point the automobile traveled up grade to the track at a speed of 4 miles per hour, during all of which time the approaching train was in plain view. That Gibson neglected the simplest precaution and omitted every duty devolving upon him for the protection of himself and passenger is upon the evidence not open to the slightest question.

[1-3] We cannot, however, assent to respondent's contention that such gross negligence on the part of Gibson should be imputed to deceased, who had no control over the former or the operation of the car which he occupied merely as a passenger. Indeed, the authorities, in this state at least, are uniformly to the contrary. Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059; 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 500, 502; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, p. 447; Fujise v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 Pac. 317; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652; Ilardi v. Central Cal. T. Co., 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 Pac. 763; Hermann v. Rhode Island Co., 36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813. While Carpenter, the deceased, was not chargeable with the contributory negligence of Gibson, nevertheless he was in duty bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, without which, as affirmatively alleged in defendant's answer, the injury received would be attributable to his own negligence. Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460; Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., supra. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that he did everything that a reasonably prudent man would have done under the same circumstances for the protection of his own safety. Code Civ. Proc. § 1961; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714; Baltimore & Potomac R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461, 24 Sup. Ct. 137, 48 L. Ed. 262. To overcome this presumption defendant invokes not only the conditions in connection with and surrounding the collision, by reason of which it is claimed Carpenter must be deemed to have seen the approaching train, but the uncontradicted testimony of Gibson, wherein he, referring to the travel of the automobile while covering the 30 feet, during which time the train was in sight, said:

> "I don't think any one said a word. I don't remember saying anything to Mr. Carpenter or Mr. Carpenter saying anything to me. I don't recall that I was engaged in any conversation at all; not a word I can recall was said. The car was making scarcely any noise in its operation."

And, basing its argument thereon, respondent insists that—

> "Deceased did not do anything to prevent the accident; he did not utter a word; he made no effort to leave the automobile."

[4] Conceding that deceased did see the approaching train and said nothing to the driver of the automobile or otherwise interfered with his operation thereof, nevertheless we cannot say as a matter of law that by reason of such omission he was guilty of negligence. As said in the Ilardi Case:

> "Such interference by the passenger or guest where the vehicle is about to be placed in a position of danger might prove to be gross imprudence and so disconcert the driver as to cause the disastrous result which such interference was designed to avoid"

—in support of which see cases cited. For aught that appears to the contrary, he might have reasonably believed that Gibson intended to and would have either stopped or increased the speed of the car and thus have easily escaped the threatened peril. Hence it cannot be said that deceased was guilty of negligence by reason of his noninterference with the driver's operation of the automobile. As to whether deceased attempted to escape from the automobile, there is no evidence whatever, and in the absence thereof, assuming that under the circumstances he should have attempted to so escape the danger which threatened him, the presumption arises that he did try to leave the automobile. The sole ground upon which the negligence of deceased is predicated is the fact that he could, had he looked, have seen the approaching train, and therefore, argues respondent, he should in the exercise of ordinary care for his safety have done something to escape the result of the collision. This question, however, in view of the presumptions arising, is one of fact to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances in the case, for, as said in Fox v. Oakland, etc., St. Ry., 118 Cal. 55, 50 Pac. 25, 62 Am. St. Rep. 216:

> "Negligence is not absolute, but is relative to circumstances, and it is very rarely that a set of circumstances is presented which enables the court, as matter of law, to say that negligence has been shown, but, as a general rule, it is a question of fact, or of inference of fact, to be deduced by the jury from the circumstances proved."

To the same effect are Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 627, 58 Pac. 200, and Maxwell v. Fresno City R. Co., 4 Cal. App. 747, 89 Pac. 367.

[5] Assuming that deceased, when the automobile which he occupied as a passenger or guest, reached the point 30 feet distant from the crossing, and traveling at a speed of only 4 miles per hour, saw the train 300 feet away therefrom and approaching at a high rate of speed, we cannot say as a matter of law that his failure to interfere with the driver's operation of the car rather than to rely upon the latter's judgment in escaping the threatened danger, nor that his failure to leave the car, constituted contributory negligence. The question as presented was one of fact which should have been left to the verdict of the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

LAPIQUE v. AGOURE et al. (Civ. 3618.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 11, 1921. Rehearing Denied Feb. 10, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 10, 1921.)

1. False imprisonment 🔑20(1) — Complaint held bad.

A complaint alleging false imprisonment for contempt and for criminal libel, which nowhere showed under what circumstances plaintiff was committed or in what respect defendants were responsible, held bad as against demurrer.

2. False imprisonment 🔑20(1) — Complaint must aver facts showing want of jurisdiction.

A complaint for false imprisonment under the guise of judicial action must allege facts from which want of the court's jurisdiction appears, and allegations merely that the imprisonment was unlawful and void tender no issue.

3. False imprisonment 🔑22—Jurisdiction presumed.

In an action for false imprisonment, it will be presumed, in the absence of contrary allegations, that complaint under which the warrant was issued stated facts proper to give the court jurisdiction to issue the process, and that the arrest and imprisonment were made in the legal execution of lawful authority.

4. False imprisonment 🔑7(1)—Imprisonment in due course of regular proceeding not actionable.

An action for false imprisonment does not lie for an imprisonment in due course of regular proceedings of a court having jurisdiction of the offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against Kate Agoure, administratrix of the estate of Pierre Agoure, deceased, and others. From a judgment dismissing his complaint after the sustaining of demurrers thereto, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 185 Pac. 178; 189 Pac. 834, 835.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Foley, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Kate Agoure and others.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for respondent Title Guaranty & Surety Co.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $175,000 for false imprisonment.

Demurrers by the various defendants were interposed to plaintiff's second amended complaint, which were sustained without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal followed. The present appeal is from such judgment.

Plaintiff appeared in the court below and does here in propria persona. It is manifest that he is not an attorney at law, and, in fact, his pleading so admits. The amended complaint contains some 64 allegations, in addition to which 11 additional causes of action are attempted to be stated. It would be an endless task to review its allegations in detail, and no useful purpose would be subserved thereby. In substance the pleading is an attempt to state a cause of action for damages on account of two imprisonments suffered by the plaintiff—one for contempt of court; the other for criminal libel. The demurrers of the different defendants were based upon numerous grounds, among which were that the complaint did not state a cause of action; that it was unintelligible and uncertain; that several causes of action were improperly united; and that the alleged cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

[1] In substance the complaint recited that one Pierre Agoure died a resident of Los Angeles, leaving an estate of the value of about $800,000; that he was indebted to plaintiff at the time of his death as a partner in the sum of $27,573.65; that the wife of Agoure had prior to his death through forgery and perjury acquired a homestead in property of her husband valued at about $300,000; that defendants murdered Agoure by administering poison to him; that his wife was thereafter appointed administratrix of his estate; and that one of the defendants, the Title Guaranty & Surety Company, became a surety on her bond. Then follow different recitals showing the attempt of plaintiff to collect his alleged claim. Among other things, he recites the filing of objections to the account of the administratrix and to her petition for final distribution. He also alleges an application on his part for a change of venue upon such hearings upon the ground of bias and prejudice of each and all of the judges of the superior court of Los Angeles, the granting of such motion, and the false and fraudulent entry by the clerk of an order reciting that his motion had been denied. Then follow recitals that the plaintiff was unlawfully imprisoned for contempt of court, and prosecuted and unlawfully imprisoned for criminal libel and kept in confinement from December 21, 1914, to September 8, 1916. In this connection it is also alleged that one of the defendants caused him to be held "incomunicado." By other recitals certain of the defendants are charged with various other offenses, but we do not deem a further review of the allegations necessary. Enough has been said to indicate that the demurrers were properly sustained. The complaint nowhere shows how or in what manner or under what circumstances plaintiff was committed for contempt of court, or in what respect defendants could be responsible for his conviction and imprisonment on this charge; nor can it be ascertained from the complaint how and under what circumstances plaintiff was imprisoned on a charge of criminal libel, or in what manner his arrest or release was secured—whether by serving or satisfying a fixed term of imprisonment or otherwise. There is nothing in the complaint to show that the process upon which plaintiff was arrested was defective or void, or the judgment thereon illegal, or that the courts were without power or jurisdiction to arrest and imprison plaintiff on the charges recited.

[2] A complaint for false imprisonment must aver facts from which want of jurisdiction appears. Allegations, as here, that the imprisonment was unlawful and void, tender no issue. Going v. Dinwiddie, 86 Cal. 633, 25 Pac. 129.

[3] Here there is no showing that the warrant issued in the criminal libel case or the commitment on the contempt charge were insufficient to state a cause of action; for, in the absence of contrary allegations, it must be presumed that the complaints under which the warrant was issued stated facts proper to give the court jurisdiction to issue the process under which the arrests and imprisonments were made, and that they were made in the legal execution of a lawful authority. Donati v. Righetti, 9 Cal. App. 45, 97 Pac. 1128.

Nor does the complaint show that the judgments rendered in either of the prosecutions complained of have ever been directly attacked, or that they do not stand in full force and effect.

[4] An action for false imprisonment does not lie for an imprisonment in due course of regular proceedings of a court having jurisdiction of the offense. 19 Cyc. 339.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte SHEPARD. (Cr. 759.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 7, 1921.)

1. Health ⚷24—Mere suspicion that person has isolable disease not sufficient to give officer "reason to believe" so.

Mere suspicion that an individual is afflicted with an isolable disease is not sufficient to give a health officer "reason to believe" that such person is so afflicted, under Pol. Code, § 2979a, making it the duty of health officers to protect the public against spread of such disease from persons whom such officers have "reason to believe" are afflicted with such diseases.

2. Health ⚷24—Woman charged with being prostitute and suspected of having venereal disease was improperly detained.

That a woman had offered to indulge in sexual intercourse for a consideration and had been charged with conducting a house of prostitution, and was suspected of having a venereal disease, did not warrant her detention in a hospital under Pol. Code, § 2979a, making it the duty of health officers and others to take necessary measures to protect the public against the spread of certain diseases from persons whom such officers know or have reason to believe to be afflicted with such diseases, in the absence of other facts on which to base the suspicion that she was so diseased.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Irene Shepard against the Superintendant of the Mission Valley Hospital of San Diego. Petitioner discharged.

A. W. Treadwell and W. M. Tompkins, both of San Diego, for petitioner.

C. G. Selleck, of San Diego, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The petition in this matter is presented by a friend of Irene Shepard, and alleges that the latter is held under quarantine and isolation by the respondent, Dr. Alex M. Lesem, but that she is not afflicted with any disease quarantinable or isolable under the law. It is further alleged that the respondent has no information of the existence in Mrs. Shepard "of such diseases as may * * * be made the cause" for her quarantine and isolation.

The respondent, by his return to the writ, alleges that Mrs. Shepard is isolated in a hospital under his charge, "suspected of being infected with a contagious, infectious, and communicable disease, namely, syphilis and gonococcus infection"; that, in his opinion, "it is now necessary to isolate the said Irene Shepard until an examination is made to determine whether said Irene Shepard is inflicted with said diseases, or either of them"; and "that there is reasonable cause to believe that she is so infected." He further alleges that Mrs. Shepard refuses to submit herself to the desired examination.

The circumstances under which the woman is detained, stating them most favorably to the contention of respondent and disregarding Mrs. Shepard's denials, are shown by the evidence presented to us to be these: A deputy sheriff was told by three negro sailors that there were some girls to be found at the residence of Mrs. Shepard. The sailors then pointed out the house, she being in front of the place at the time. Two days later the deputy went to the house and remained there about two minutes. While there he asked Mrs. Shepard if she would indulge in sexual intercourse with him for a consideration, and she said she would. It then was arranged that the deputy should return later to commit the act. Some days afterward, another officer, under whom the deputy sheriff had been working, swore to a complaint against Mrs. Shepard, charging her, in due form, with conducting and maintaining a house for the purpose of assignation and prostitution. She was thereupon, but without warrant or other legal process, taken to the city jail, where she remained but about ten minutes. At the end of that time she was ordered by respondent to be taken to the city hospital, in which she has since been detained.

[1, 2] If the respondent has any power to deprive Mrs. Shepard of her liberty, that power is to be predicated upon the provisions of section 2979a of the Political Code, which makes it the duty of health officers and others to take necessary measures to protect the public against the spread of certain diseases from persons whom such officers know or have reason to believe are afflicted with such diseases. There is certainly nothing in the record here to show that the respondent knows Mrs. Shepard to be diseased, and we cannot see that he has sufficient reason to believe that she is diseased. Paying just regard to the constitutional guaranties of the right to personal liberty and personal security, it must be asserted that more than a mere suspicion that an individual is afflicted with an isolable disease is necessary to give an officer "reason to believe" that such person is so afflicted. The circumstances disclosed to us here are lacking in the elements necessary to establish even a well-defined suspicion that Mrs. Shepard is diseased as alleged in the return. The facts before us come within the purview of the language of the court in Ex parte Dillon, 186 Pac. 170.

It is ordered that Mrs. Shepard be discharged from the custody of the respondent.

WEINBERG CO. v. BIXBY et al.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑171(3)—Owners on both sides of river held jointly liable for damages caused by embankments.

Where owner, who had constructed embankments to protect land from river flood waters, constructed other embankments on other side of river for the benefit of owner of land on such other side, at the request of such owner and in consideration of such owner consenting to the use of his land for a portion of the work of owner constructing the embankments, the construction of the embankments on the two sides of the river was in a sense a joint enterprise, making the two owners jointly liable for any damages proximately resulting from a negligent or wrongful performance of the work.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑171(1)—Owner may erect embankments where flow in natural channel not interfered with.

River flood water is a common enemy, which may be guarded against or warded off by owner whose property is invaded or threatened by obstructions which are merely defensive in their nature and not calculated to interfere with the current of the water in its natural channel, even though the result is to throw an increased volume of water on opposite or lower proprietors.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑118—Owner cannot retard or increase flow of surface waters.

Owner must permit the passage of surface waters arising from rain or melting snow, or springs and swamps before they have found their way to and become a part of a stream or river, over his land in such a way as not to retard its flow from the lands above him nor to concentrate and increase this flow upon the lands below.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑54—Owners could construct dikes and deepen river channel to protect land from flood waters.

Owners of land along the banks of the Los Angeles river had a right to construct dikes along and parallel with the river banks and to deepen the river channel along its natural course to protect their lands from flood waters, so long as they did not obstruct the natural flow of the stream or divert its course, notwithstanding damage to lower proprietors; such damage being damnum absque injuria.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑54—Owner not required to maintain embankment constructed to protect land from flood waters.

The fact that a landowner avails himself of the right to repel vagrant waters of a river by embankments does not, in the absence of some further circumstances, impose upon him any obligation to maintain such obstruction or to refrain from restoring natural conditions.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑171(1)—Owners constructing embankments not liable for increased flow through outlet caused by accumulation of silt.

Owners of land on river bank, who constructed embankments and dredged river channels and restored old outlet, which had been obstructed, to protect their lands from overflow of surface waters, were not liable for damage from increased flow through such outlet as the result of accumulation of silt in channel below outlet caused by construction of the dikes, since such silt fill could not have been reasonably contemplated.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑54—Owners constructing dikes and dredged channel not liable for silt carried by current to points below.

Owners who constructed dikes and dredged channel of river to protect lands from overflow of flood waters were not accountable for the silt carried to points below.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑171(1)—Owners removing dike liable if resulting damage could have been reasonably anticipated.

If owners, in reopening old outlet of river by removal of dike which had been constructed, turned the main stream of the river from the old natural channel into the side cut, and if such result could have been reasonably anticipated, they would be liable for such damage as could have been reasonably anticipated.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑171(1)—Reasonableness of act determined by existing conditions.

The reasonableness and prudence of an act causing flowage of land is to be determined by the conditions as they existed at the time, and not in the light of after consequences.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑171(3)—Owners held jointly liable for damages caused by opening of outlet to avoid overflow.

Where owner of land, to protect his land from flood waters of river and to protect the land of another for whom he was active agent, reopened outlet of river, the owner of the other lands for whom he was agent was jointly responsible with him for the damage which resulted, if the main stream was diverted, though the other owner had no actual knowledge of the probable consequences of reopening the outlet, and though neither was actuated by any thought of wrongdoing.

11. Trial 🔑142—Jury to draw inference of facts where reasonable minds might differ.

Where reasonable minds might reach different conclusions, the inference to be drawn is a question for the jury.

12. Action 🔑50(6)—Causes of action for diversion of waters held misjoinder.

The joinder of a cause of action for damages for wrongful diversion of flood waters against a railroad because of the construction and maintenance of embankments and trestles across channel of river in the year 1901, in such a way as to interfere with the flow of the river, with a cause of action against other owners for diversion of water in 1913 by constructing embankments along the river bank and by dredging and deepening the channel of the river and by cutting an opening in embankment so as to divert waters from their natural courses, held a misjoinder of parties and of independent and unrelated causes of action, in the absence of a showing of any connection between the acts of the railroad and the acts of the other owners.

13. Torts 🔑22—What constitutes "joint tort-feasors."

In order that parties may be "joint tort-feasors" there must be a concert of action, a unity of purpose or design, and two or more defendants working separately, but to a common purpose, and each acting with the knowledge and consent of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Joint Tort-Feasors.]

14. Waters and water courses 🔑179(5)—Instruction not distinguishing between flood and surface waters erroneous.

In action for wrongful diversion of flood waters of river, instruction held erroneous, in that it failed to discriminate between the flood waters of river and the diversion of surface waters.

15. Waters and water courses 🔑54—Owner may construct embankments to protect land from overflow.

Owner of land on river can protect his land from overflow of flood waters by construction of embankments at any point upon his premises, and is not required to construct such embankments along the entire length of his land.

Olney, Shaw, and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Weinberg Company against George H. Bixby, Amelia M. E. Bixby, and the Dominguez Estate Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff against the named defendants, and they appeal. Reversed.

H. C. Beach, Hunsaker & Britt, Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, Le Roy M. Edwards, Roy V. Reppy, Henry J. Stevens, O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, Veitch & Richardson, Andrews, Toland & Andrews, Frank Karr, and R. C. Gortner, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is from a verdict and judgment awarding damages for alleged wrongful diversion of the flood waters of the Los Angeles river upon plaintiff's lands.

The Pacific Electric Company, a railway corporation, the Dominguez Estate Company, a private corporation, and George H. Bixby, and Amelia M. Bixby, who are husband and wife, were joined as parties defendant. The Pacific Electric Company was exonerated from liability by the jury, and verdict and judgment were against the other defendants appellants here, as joint tort-feasors.

The defendant Dominguez Estate Company was the owner of farming lands on the westerly banks of the river and defendant George H. Bixby, and later his wife, the defendant Amelia M. Bixby, was the owner of farming lands on the easterly side of the river at and in the vicinity of the place where the alleged wrongful diversion and interference with the river channel occurred. The Pacific Electric Company was the owner of a right of way and an electric railroad with embankments and trestles across the river valley, and particularly of a trestle which it had constructed over the natural channel of the Los Angeles river above and in the immediate vicinity of the diversion works charged to the other defendants.

It is alleged in the complaint that the location and construction of the railroad embankments and trestle were such as to concentrate the waters of the river in time of floods at this point and that the other defendants, by the construction of embankments from this trestle down stream and along and on each side of the river bed and by dredging and deepening the channel of the stream between such embankments, so increased the current and flow of the river as to silt up and fill the natural bed of the stream below, thereby causing the waters to spread to each side, and that, in order to relieve this condition of overflow, they thereafter cut an opening in the easterly embankment above the silted fill, thereby turning the current of the river from its former and natural course into a new channel, and that in recurring floods covering a period of two or three years great volumes of water were thus turned into this new channel and flowed down and across plaintiff's lands below, cutting, eroding, and silting them, to the damage of plaintiffs.

For an intelligent understanding of the points involved on this appeal it is necessary to describe generally the topography of the country forming the watershed of the Los Angeles river. The river with its various tributaries has its source in the Sierra Madre mountain range, lying to the north of the city of Los Angeles. These branches converge in the northerly part of the city, where a comparatively narrow pass exists between the highlands. From this point the river runs in a generally southerly direction through a constantly widening plain and empties into the ocean between the cities of Long Beach and San Pedro. For several miles above its outlet the river bottom is near the sea level and has a very moderate slope toward the south. To the east of the watershed of the Los Angeles river is another watershed having its source in the same mountain range and draining its waters into what is known as the San Gabriel river. Toward the ocean the course of this stream is through a valley which widens out and merges on the west into the territory through which the Los Angeles river flows. The outlet of the San Gabriel river into the ocean through a period of its history has been east of the city of Long Beach and beyond the mesa lands in the vicinity of that city. The result is that in time of excessive floods the whole territory through which the two rivers flow, for a distance of some miles back from the coast, becomes a vast lake; the waters of the two streams commingling and moving toward the ocean with a very moderate current, which, of course, is accelerated in the deeper channels where the water is accustomed to run when the rivers are within their banks. At such times of overflow the higher body of land in the vicinity of Long Beach and extending back from the coast three or four miles stands above the flood waters as an island, and serves to separate the outlets to the ocean of the two rivers. At the northwesterly end of this body of mesa land a point juts out into the valley near the place where the defendants constructed their dikes or embankments, and also forms an abutment for the southeasterly end of the railroad trestle of the Pacific Electric Company. The line of road of the electric company extends from this point in a northwesterly direction across the river bottom to a projecting point of mesa lands on the opposite side called the Dominguez hills. The valley above and below these points immediately widens, both to the east and the west, but more particularly on the eastern and northern side, where it extends toward the San Gabriel watershed.

The construction of the electric company's railroad across this space from hill to hill, which is frequently called the Narrows, consists of an embankment several feet in height, intersected by a number of trestles or bridges at places of natural depression in the floor of the valley. The principal trestle is the one at the southeasterly end. This is about 1,000 feet in length, consisting of stringers and rails, resting upon bents composed of piles driven into the ground, and braced with cross-timbers. The bents were placed about 20 feet apart and at right angles with the track.

The main channel of the Los Angeles river passes under this trestle in a slightly southwesterly direction at this point. At the time of and prior to the events upon which this action is based, the natural bed or channel of the river was a shallow erosion through the comparatively level floor of the valley, not generally exceeding 2 or 3 feet in depth, and from 100 to 200 feet wide. Nearly every winter season the flow of the waters greatly exceeds the capacity of this channel and spreads over the adjacent land, and occasionally there occur floods which cover the valley from mesa to mesa, with only infrequent spots of slightly higher land appearing above the surface.

[1] The railroad embankments and trestles referred to were constructed by the Pacific Electric Company in the year 1901. The diking and dredging along the river channel by others of the defendants occurred in the fall and spring of 1912–13. This latter work originated with the Dominguez Estate Company. It owned lands bordering the westerly bank of the river, and was also in some way interested in a subsidiary company that was maintaining a cement water ditch which extended under this trestle from the north on the westerly side of the river. The construction of a line of embankment along the west bank of the river and the deepening of the eroded channel from a point some distance north of the trestle was designed to protect their lands and this water ditch from overflow of the flood waters. In extending this work south from the trestle it was necessary to carry it over lands belonging to the defendant George H. Bixby. He consented to such use of his land, provided that for the protection of his property the Dominguez Company would construct a like embankment on his side of the river from the natural high ground at the southerly end of the trestle, and carry the work on both sides of the river, further south than it had planned, to a point where the river bed divided into two channels. To this extent these two defendants joined in this work of flood protection. So far as involved in this suit, the west embankment was constructed by the Dominguez Company for its own benefit, but with the consent of Bixby. The eastern embankment was constructed by the Dominguez Company for the benefit of Bixby on his land, and at his request, and in consideration of his consent to the use of his land for a portion of the Dominguez Company's work. While each of these defendants separately owned and were the sole beneficiaries of the structure on their respective sides of the stream, it may properly be held that it was in a sense a joint enterprise, and that they became jointly liable for any damages proximately resulting from a negligent or wrongful performance of the work, and they were properly joined as defendants in the action.

It does not appear from the evidence, however, that the dredging and diking of the river channel was negligent or wrongful, or that any of the damage suffered by plaintiff proximately resulted therefrom. The complaint alleges, and the proof indicates, an entirely independent intervening cause, namely, the cutting of a channel through the easterly embankment by the defendant Amelia M. Bixby after she had succeeded to the interest of defendant George H. Bixby in the premises. This opening in the embankment occurred after the channel below where the cut was made had become silted and obstructed, and the stream was, by reason of such obstruction of the river bed and cut in the embankment, diverted into a new channel and across the lands of plaintiff. It is not contended, and in any event not shown by the evidence, that the lands of plaintiff would have been injured by the defendants' dikes and dredging if the easterly dike had remained intact. Had such condition continued, the waters of the river would either have forced their way through the silted channel and proceeded on their established course or would have been diverted through the breaks that occurred by the action of the flood in the westerly dikes and flowed westerly over the Dominguez property, as the evidence shows actually happened with the greater volume of the flood.

Moreover, as we have stated, the work of diking and dredging was not wrongful or negligent. The appellants here were in no way responsible, individually or collectively, for the physical conditions which at the time existed along the course of the river channel. The embankments and trestles of the Pacific Electric Road had been constructed over ten years before, without their co-operation or connivance. They did not connect their work of flood protection in any way with the railroad structure in order to avail themselves of any obstruction it might offer to the natural flow of the stream. Their westerly dikes commenced at a point considerably north of the trestle, followed along the westerly bank of the river, outside the channel, under the trestle, at a point some 400 feet from the railroad fill at the northerly end of the opening, and continued south along the westerly river bank. The evidence presents some conflict as to whether some pile sheeting on the face of the dike under the trestle was attached to the trestle bents or to independent piling put in by appellants; but that is an immaterial matter. The dikes thrown up by appellants presented no different obstruction to the current of the stream than it would have done had the trestle not been there. The appellants merely accepted the conditions that were thrust upon them and constructed this dike to prevent the flooding of their lands. On the easterly side of the river, as we understand the evidence, the dike did not pass under the trestle to the north, but commenced with the natural projection of the mesa against which the southerly end of the trestle abutted. The embankments at no place invaded the channel, but ran parallel to it, and the dredging was in the eroded bed of the stream.

[2] The doctrine of the common law relating to protection against flood overflow of rivers, and which has been adopted by the California courts, recognizes such flood waters as a common enemy which may be guarded against or warded off by one whose property is invaded or threatened by obstructions which are merely defensive in their nature and not calculated to interfere with the current of the water in its natural channel.

The rule as stated in Rex v. Commissioners, 8 B. & C. 355, and which has been often quoted with approval by this court, declares that the sea "is a common enemy," and that any proprietor of land exposed to the inroads of the sea may protect himself by erecting a groyne or other reasonable defense, although it may render it necessary for the owner of the adjoining land to do the like, and that "each landowner for himself * * * may erect such defenses for the land under his care as the necessity of the case requires, leaving it to others, in like manner, to protect themselves against the common enemy." Bailey, J., concurring in this opinion, says:

> "I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that every landowner exposed to the inroads of the sea has the right to protect himself and is justified in making and erecting such works as are necessary for that purpose."

This rule has been so often cited, approved, and commented upon by the Supreme Court of this state, as applied to dikes and embankments by property owners to prevent overflow of their lands by the flood waters of the Sacramento river and similar streams of this state, even though the result of such obstruction has been to throw an increased volume of the flood upon opposite or lower proprietors, that it is not necessary to review the decisions at length. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist., 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157, 32 Pac. 976, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163; Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169; Island Rec. Dist. v. Syn, 167 Cal. 467, 140 Pac. 4; De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 258, 39 Pac. 610, 47 Am. St. Rep. 237; Horton v. Goodenough, 194 Pac. 34.

Commenting on the rule established by the decisions just cited, the principle is thus tersely stated in Jones v. California Development Co., 173 Cal. 565, 574, 160 Pac. 823, 827 (L. R. A. 1917C, 1021):

> "The underlying principle governing the decision of all these cases which deal with extraordinary water conditions, whether created by the ocean or by unexpected and unprecedented floods, is that in such stress the landowner may use every reasonable precaution to avert injury from his land, and whether or not his conduct be reasonable will be determined by existing conditions and not by after consequences; so that if the acts of the landowner be, in the light of the existing circumstances, not unreasonable, he will not be held liable for consequent damages which by these reasonable acts may be inflicted upon another landowner."

We recognize the limitation in all of these cases that such right of self-protection does not permit of any obstruction of or interference with the natural channel of the stream or diversion of the flow of the water in such channel.

[3] The distinction, too, is recognized in this state between the flood waters of a natural water course and the surface drainage arising from rain or melting snow, or springs and swamps before they have found their way to and become a part of a stream or river.

As to such drainage, our courts have adopted the rule of the civil law, which places upon the proprietor of land the burden of permitting the passage over his land of the surface drainage in such a way as not to retard its flow from the lands above him, nor to concentrate and increase this flow upon the lands below. Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346, 13 Am. Rep. 213; Gray v. McWilliams, supra; Los Angeles, etc., Association v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 Pac. 572; Sanguinetti v. Pock, supra. In Gray v. McWilliams, supra, and Sanguinetti v. Pock, supra, the distinction between the rule applying to flood waters and that applying to surface waters is clearly pointed out.

[4] That the overflow waters of the Los Angeles river, spreading from the channels of the stream over the adjacent country and accompanying the channel waters in a parallel course to the sea, are flood waters and are subject to the doctrine of flood and not surface waters will not be questioned.

It follows from the authorities cited that the construction of dikes along and parallel with the river banks and the mere deepening of the river channel along its natural course, either by the Dominguez Company or the Bixbys, for the protection of their respective lands on one or the other banks of the river, or by their joint action through dikes on both sides of the river, were not wrongful so long as they did not obstruct the natural flow of the stream or divert its course. If damage to lower proprietors had followed from such defensive construction, under the authorities cited, it would be damnum absque injuria. Even though the effect upon the channel of the stream below, by reason of increased flow and current between the embankments, was to silt and obstruct the lower channel, it would afford no ground of action. If the defendants merely fend the intruding waters from their own premises in a reasonable and prudent manner, they cannot be held responsible for the action of the stream in depositing more silt and débris either in the channel or on adjacent lands below than would have been done had it been permitted to spread over defendants' lands.

In the recent case of San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. Los Angeles County, 188 Pac. 554, 9 A. L. R. 1200, which involved liability of the county of Los Angeles resulting from the construction of a cement ditch or conduit in place of the natural channel of a water course, the effect of the change was to materially increase the flow and current of the water in the stream, thereby causing erosion of plaintiff's lands below. In the opinion it is said by Mr. Justice Olney:

> "Summing up the discussion, our conclusion, as we have stated, is that an improvement for the purposes of the drainage and protection of lands above does not give a lower riparian owner on the stream a cause of action merely because such improvement increases the volume of water in the stream as it comes to his land, even though the burden he is necessarily under of protecting his land against the stream is thereby increased and his land is injured because of his failure to meet such increased burden, and, further, that the rule is not subject to the limitation that the increased volume must not be such as to make the stream exceed the capacity of its channel."

This rule which permits the owners of lands subject to overflow from adjacent rivers to erect barriers to such overflow upon their own borders may and often does result in serious damage to adjoining or lower properties, but it is the only rule consistent with the development and improvement of vast bodies of potentially rich and valuable lands along low-lying river bottoms. It is true that if the whole territory is permitted to lie in its native state these periodical floods may repeatedly spread over the surface of the country in a gradual unobstructed flow and pass off with very little damage to the soil. But the moment improvements are made this condition begins to change. Every furrow that is plowed, every fence erected, every orchard planted, every irrigation ditch constructed, creates an obstruction or diversion which changes the course and volume of the current and starts new channels and cuts and erosions.

It becomes absolutely essential that those who build houses, plant crops and orchards, and make other valuable improvements must be permitted to shut out from their premises these vagrant floods, though the result may overwhelm an adjoining or lower proprietor. In many of our California streams, particularly in the southern part of the state and near the sea, where the rainfall is periodical and the valleys low and level, the natural eroded bed of the stream is wholly inadequate to carry the flood waters in periods of heavy rainfall. In this case the channel of the Los Angeles river was but 2 or 3 feet lower than the surrounding surface of the valley, and 100 or 200 feet in width. In seasons of flood the whole valley is needed as a water course. Under such circumstances, if the landowners on one side of the stream build dikes and embankments, it throws the whole volume of the flood on the opposite side. If both banks are protected, the compressed and elevated volume of water is poured in a torrent upon any unprotected lands below. The only practical recourse is for every man to "build over against his own house," or for the community to join in a public system of flood protection for the entire exposed territory.

Returning to the consideration of the nature, effect, and responsibility for the acts here complained of, the undisputed evidence shows that almost immediately after the storm of January, 1914, which was the inception of the flood conditions which, it is claimed, in conjunction with the acts of defendants, resulted in the damage suffered by plaintiff, the flood waters passing under the trestle, and deflected by the bents of that structure toward the west, washed out several hundred feet of the northerly end of the dike on the west bank and diverted a vast portion of the channel flow in that direction. This was never replaced. The attempt of the Dominguez Company to prevent further widening of the river channel after the first floods by putting a barrier of sand bags across a wash in the river bank was trivial in its extent and not shown to have contributed in any way to plaintiff's damage.

It does appear in evidence that on subsequent occasions the city of Los Angeles erected barriers and dikes connecting with the Pacific Electric embankment at the northern end of the trestle and extending to a connection with the southerly remnants of the original westerly dike. It is clearly shown, however, that this was an entirely independent project carried on by the city of Los Angeles to protect the harbor of Los Angeles from becoming obstructed by silt from the floods; that it was not pleaded in the complaint; and that at least the defendants Bixby were not even remotely connected with it. The Pacific Electric Company gave its permission to a connection with its railroad embankment, and the Dominguez Company consented to its construction on their lands. This obstruction by the city, if wrongful and injurious and attributable in any way to either of the defendants here, was an entirely new and independent cause of action, and if relied upon should have been separately pleaded.

It must be borne in mind that these embankments of the city of Los Angeles present a very different condition from the first construction work. They joined with the railroad embankment and extended at a sharp angle in the direction of the river, and were perhaps calculated to shift the course of the flood across the channel to the lands on the east. The dikes constructed by appellants ran approximately parallel with and close to the river channel, and left an open space under the trestle 400 feet in width between the westerly dike and the northwesterly end of the trestle where it abutted on the railroad embankment, through which space a large part of the flood passing under the trestle could and did flow, and, in fact, was diverted from the easterly side of the valley by appellants' dike.

Our conclusion is that plaintiff's cause of action is reduced, under the law and the undisputed facts in this case, to a question of the responsibility for and the effect of cutting through the easterly dike, and the resultant divergence in that direction of the normal flow of the river and of a large portion of the flood waters during the overflow.

Directing our attention to this phase of the case, the evidence shows without substantial dispute that for a period of 40 or 50 years there had existed at this point where the cut in the embankment was made a natural channel opening out of the river bed, within a foot or two of the bottom of the river, through which in time of high water a portion of the channel flow was diverted toward the east, and for some distance at least ran between defined banks. Further down this flow spread out over the surface of the ground and the banks disappeared, but there was a swale in that direction along the border of the mesa, and, at a road crossing a quarter of a mile or so below, a bridge was maintained a good part of the time. Just what became of this water eventually does not very clearly appear, but the contour of the land shows that it would flow near the easterly mesa to the sea. It is also undisputed that the flow of water through this natural opening was so frequent and so threatening that it was customary in conditions of high water, after the general overflow had subsided within the banks of the river, to dam this side channel to prevent the passage of water to the lands on the east. On one occasion at least the plaintiff's predecessor in title bore part of the expense of making such a dam for the protection of the very lands in question here. It also is shown that these dams were invariably washed out upon the recurrence of a freshet. If this was a natural channel of the river it was a wrongful act of the defendants to construct a dike over it, and the removal of such dike at that point would have been a duty.

[5] But conceding that it was a mere inlet or bypass, as plaintiff contends, such as was held properly subject to obstruction in an effort to protect adjacent lands from flood waters in Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra, did any duty rest upon defendants to maintain their dike across it? We think clearly not if the result of the cut or opening was to restore the conditions at that point to their former and natural state. The fact that a landowner avails himself of the right to repel vagrant waters of a river by embankments does not, in the absence of some further circumstances or set of circumstances, impose upon him any obligation to maintain such obstruction, or to refrain from restoring natural conditions. There is nothing in the doctrine of self-protection against flood waters to prevent a landowner from applying it to a single acre of his lands or the conservation of a single annual crop by temporary structures.

[6, 7] The doubtful question in this case is whether the opening of the dike at this point restored the side channel to its original condition. The evidence shows that the cut was made at the exact place of the old outlet, and it was made no wider and no deeper below the adjoining natural surface. It was, however, left with an artificial embankment extending up and down the river on each side of the opening. This cut was reopened at a time when the natural channel below had been more or less obstructed by an accumulation of silt, apparently caused, in part at least, by the diking and dredging above. It is claimed that the result of reopening this side channel was to divert more water through it than would naturally have gone in that direction had the channel below been unobstructed. While the defendants had been within their rights in creating the conditions which filled up the lower channel, they would have no right to relieve themselves and others from the results of such damming of the natural channel by reopening this outlet to the east in a manner calculated to divert the natural channel. It is doubtless true that they were not legally liable in damages for any results directly attributable to the creation of or existence of this silt fill, conceding it to have been caused by the construction of their dikes. The silting was not, in the first place, a result contemplated by the defendants or perhaps reasonably to have been anticipated. They expected by the building of the dikes along the banks of the river and dredging the eroded channels to so increase the volume and flow of the channel as to keep it clear from silting and to even increase its capacity. That would ordinarily be the natural result. The evidence shows, however, that after this protection work was completed in 1913, the first rainy season did not cause extremely high water in the stream, and the effect of the moderate flood that did come was not only to fill up the section they had dredged, but to pile silt and sand along the bed of the river within their dikes a considerable distance to the south, and even to raise the old channel above the former level at a point just below where the cut was afterward made. It may further be said that no liability could result to defendants from the silting of the river bed below, for the reason that, in diking and dredging the channel merely for the purpose of enlarging and directing its current in its normal course to prevent the overflow of their adjacent lands, they were not accountable for the disposition of the water or the silt and débris it carried at points below. As in the case of San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. Los Angeles County, supra, the inevitable consequence of straightening or deepening a channel at a given point and increasing the flow and current of the stream therein is to cause the extra flow of water to spread out where the current ceases and to deposit at some point below whatever débris it carries. In the natural course of events, if the river embankments had remained intact, the excessive flood waters which followed in the spring of 1914 would have scoured out these beds of silt along this dredged channel, but the inevitable result would have been to deposit the silt further down wherever the waters were permitted to spread out and the current was abated. In other words, the operation of the river within such protection works as riparian owners may lawfully make to protect themselves from injury is attributable to the natural flow of the stream.

It is claimed that this was what happened, and that thereafter, by reason of these conditions, when the recurring high waters of 1914–1916 came, the eastern opening was widened and deepened to an extent that would not have happened if the natural conditions had not been interfered with, and thereby a large volume of the flood waters caused to flow in that direction and overflowed and eroded a wide channel through plaintiff's lands below. We are of the opinion that to whatever extent the evidence may show these conditions to have existed, and that the effect of making such change in the embankment and resultant damage, if any, were such as were reasonably to have been anticipated, the appellants responsible for such change in the channel would be liable.

[9] As stated in Jones v. California Development Co., supra, however, the reasonableness and prudence of the act is to be determined by the conditions as they existed at the time, and not in the light of after consequences.

[10] Conceding, however, that an actionable wrong was committed, who was responsible for it? At the time the cut was made the defendant Amelia M. Bixby was the owner of the premises along the east side of the river, her husband having conveyed them to her after the dikes were constructed. Her husband, the defendant George H. Bixby, was the active agent in procuring the reopening of this outlet. His wife knew of it and consented to it and paid for the work, and in legal effect made her husband her agent for this purpose. It does not appear that she had any actual knowledge of the physical conditions or probable consequences of making this opening, but the law imposes upon her responsibility for the natural consequences of her act. The husband, although he had parted with title to this immediate property, was still owner of adjacent lands affected by the flood waters, and was originally responsible for the closing of this side channel. He had an independent and personal interest in reopening it. Though neither of them were actuated by any purpose or thought of wrongdoing, we think they were jointly responsible for any damage which resulted and which was reasonably to have been anticipated from an unnatural increase of flood waters through this opening.

We fail to see how the defendant Dominguez Estate Company was a party to the reopening of this side channel. As already pointed out, the original dike and dredging for which it was responsible was not wrongful. The dike on the east side of the river, though built by the Dominguez Company, was constructed for and became the property of George H. Bixby and was for his benefit. The Dominguez Company had no further interest in or control over it. It was of no benefit or concern to their property. They had no part in advising or making this cut. It is true the president of the Dominguez Company knew of Mr. Bixby's purpose, and expressed the opinion that he had a right to either maintain or remove the obstruction as he saw fit, but such expression would not make him personally liable for consequences of the act, much less bind the corporation to such liability. It follows from this reasoning that the evidence does not support a verdict against the Dominguez Company.

We doubt greatly whether the evidence justifies the conclusion that the opening of the cut in this eastern embankment by the defendants Bixby was the efficient and proximate cause of the erosion and silting of plaintiff's land, or that such damage would not have resulted if such cut had not been made. It can hardly be questioned, under the facts in this case, that the floods of January and February, 1914, were unusual and excessive. Not only was the natural flood drainage of the Los Angeles river of this excessive nature, but the evidence shows that the main channel of the San Gabriel river had cut through the intervening plain between the natural course of the two streams and was adding its waters to the floods of the watershed of the Los Angeles river. The whole country above and below the Pacific Electric embankments was a great lake. All the trestles of the railroad embankment across the Narrows were running to their full capacity, to the northwest of this trestle at the main channel of the river, and at this point through the 1,000 feet of this opening a flood was pouring for the entire width and to within 2 or 3 feet of the top of the timbers. The dikes along the river were flooded and in places out of sight. Several hundred feet on the westerly side were washed out. Some time during the overflow a wide strip of the easterly embankment below the Bixby cut was washed away by the current. The greater part of this deluge of water was pouring under this long trestle, and being more confined at this place was, of course, moving with a more rapid current and carried silt and débris which, when the waters spread out below as the current slackened, was deposited in the lower channels and on the overflowed lands. One of the natural channels of the river crossed plaintiff's property and turning to the east skirted along its southerly border. In previous overflows this land had been silted and more or less eroded. It would inevitably have been overflowed during the high waters of these floods of 1914–1916, irrespective of the making of the Bixby cut; and the natural channel at the Bixby cut without any artificial embankments would have had to carry to its full capacity during these periods of high water. It is admitted by the testimony of plaintiffs that these lands suffered no material injury during the moderate freshets of 1913 after the cut had been made, or until the extremely high waters of 1914.

[11] There is no serious conflict in the evidence as to the physical conditions surrounding these successive floods. The case resolves itself merely into inferences to be drawn as to the result of these various conditions. We recognize the province of the jury to determine these inferences in all instances where reasonable minds might reach different conclusions. Yet when we take into account the immensity of this flood, the eddies and currents and backwaters and shifting channels of this cataclysm of nature, and in face of the fact that all along the course of this river other lands were eroded, new channels created, and great areas of silt and débris deposited, entirely independent of the acts of these defendants, the question remains whether any conclusion that the actions of appellants were the proximate cause of damage to plaintiff's land can be more than a surmise or conjecture.

Conceding, however, that there was sufficient evidence to make the nature and effect of the reopening of this side channel a question for the jury, there were errors of law occurring at the trial which in our judgment call for a reversal.

[12] We are satisfied that there appears on the face of the complaint a misjoinder of parties defendant and of independent and unrelated causes of action. A cause of action is stated against the Pacific Electric Company for damages resulting from the construction and maintenance of its railroad embankments and trestles across the channel of the Los Angeles river during the year 1901 in such a way as to interfere with and divert the natural flow of the river upon plaintiff's land to its damage. A cause of action is stated against the other defendants for constructing in 1913 embankments along the banks of the Los Angeles river and dredging and deepening the channel thereof, and in afterwards cutting an opening in such embankments in such fashion as to wrongfully divert the waters of the river from their natural course onto plaintiff's land, thereby washing and eroding them. No causal relation is pleaded to connect these independent and widely separated acts into one cause of action, or to show a joint liability for the damages alleged. It does not appear that the defendants appealing here were in any way connected with or responsible for the construction or maintenance of the embankments or trestles of the Pacific Electric Company, or that they made use of them as a part of their system of flood protection. Neither does it appear that the Pacific Electric Company in any way aided, advised, or permitted the diking of the river banks, or dredging of the channel, or had any right to control or interfere with the appellants in that work, or that the acts of appellants in any way rendered the trestles and embankments of the railroad harmful in any greater or different way than if the work of appellants had not existed.

The only connection suggested is in an allegation that appellants constructed their flood barriers in the vicinity of the railroad embankments and trestle knowing of the existence of such structures and of their effect in increasing the flood volume of the river at this point. This may be admitted, and that one of the reasons for attempting to protect their lands at this point was the increased danger from the river by reason of the concentrated power of the floods under this trestle. Not being in any way responsible for this added peril, they had a right to fortify themselves against it.

[13] Respondent in its brief correctly states the condition of joint tort-feasors: (1) A concert of action; (2) a unity of purpose or design; (3) two or more defendants working separately but to a common purpose and each acting with the knowledge and consent of the others. We do not think that any of these relations are shown here between the Pacific Electric Company and the other defendants. The objections by way of demurrer, answer, and motion to this misjoinder were well taken.

There are numerous exceptions to rulings of the trial court in admitting evidence prejudicial to appellants relating to defendant thus improperly joined with appellants, and to the work of flood obstruction and diversion by the city of Los Angeles, not covered by the pleadings, and in no way connected with the defendants Bixby. In some instances the prejudicial effect of such evidence may have been avoided by rulings of the court limiting its application to designated defendants, or by instructions to the jury, but there was a great deal of testimony directed to these unrelated transactions and defendants which the jury was left at liberty to apply to appellants, and which was calculated to fix upon them in the minds of the jurors liability for diversions of the flood waters for which they were not responsible either under the pleadings or the proof.

For instance, although the jury absolved the Pacific Electric Company from liability to the plaintiff for any of its railroad construction, it was left free to hold the appellants accountable for damage which might reasonably be attributed to the embankment of the railroad across the valley at this point in a southeasterly direction calculated to concentrate the flood waters at the trestle over the main channel of the river in the direction of plaintiff's lands. It can hardly be doubted that the increased volume and current of the river at this point and from this cause had much to do with the amount of silt that was deposited in the river channel and over the adjacent lands below, and in increasing the flood of water through the plaintiff's lands. These results would have been properly charged to appellants under the theory of the complaint that all of the defendants named were associated in a common purpose and working to a common end, but were improperly in evidence under our view of the relations of the parties.

Likewise, the testimony offered as to the embankments attempted by the city of Los Angeles was not only inadmissible as relating to an independent cause of action not pleaded, and with which at least the defendants Bixby were not connected, but was prejudicial, for the reason that it quite probably influenced the jurors to include in their verdict compensation for damages which they attributed to these embankments.

[14] We think, too, the trial court in its instructions to the jury failed to sufficiently discriminate between acts of the defendants which they might rightfully exercise in the construction of dikes and levees along the banks of the stream to protect their property from the invasion of flood waters, although the effect might be to increase the flow of the stream upon lower proprietors, and such acts as would amount to an interference with the natural current within the channel itself. As, for instance, the jury was instructed (instruction No. 10) that while there was no vested right in plaintiff to have the flood waters of the Los Angeles river overflow through the farming lands adjacent, "the absence of such right did not authorize any person or corporation to so divert or concentrate such flood water as to cause damage to the lands of plaintiff referred to in the complaint, if you find that said flood water was so diverted or concentrated."

The jury was thus instructed that defendants were liable for any damage caused by an increased volume or flow of water upon their lands resulting from protective dikes along the river bank constructed by defendants. This is directly in conflict with the rule laid down in San Gabriel Country Club v. Los Angeles County, supra, and other cited cases.

[15] The jury was also erroneously instructed that it was the duty of the defendants, if they undertook to protect their property or any part of it from overflow, "to construct and complete said dikes and embankments from the point of beginning continuously to the down stream edge of their said property, so that the owner of land next below in the course of the stream and riparian thereto could in like manner protect his said land by similar construction joined to the said embankments."

As already pointed out, we find no authority to thus qualify the right of self-protection against the flood waters of a stream so as to require the diking of all or none of the defendants' riparian possessions, or to create a liability in damages for an increase by such means of flood waters upon lower proprietors. Ae we understand the California decisions on this point, the right to repel flood waters is purely one of self-defense. The proprietor of land so threatened can ward off the danger by suitable obstruction to the invasion of his land at any point upon his own premises, and by any means that does not go beyond the limits of a defensive act, and become an aggressive diversion of the natural flow upon other proprietors.

We are of the opinion that there was prejudicial error in refusing defendants' proposed instruction covered by exception No. 298, and also in the giving of the instruction as modified by the court. The instruction as proposed properly presented to the jury defendants' theory that the damages complained of were caused by the excessive and unusual extent of the floods together with the conjunction of the waters of the San Gabriel river with those of the Los Angeles river, rather than as the result of any acts of the defendants, and declared the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to show that the injuries complained of were the result of the wrongful and negligent acts of the defendants, and that if they believed from the evidence that such damage was the natural and proximate result of the excessive flood waters, and that the same or substantially the same injuries would have occurred if the dikes of defendants and the subsequent cut in the east embankment had not been made, their verdict should be for defendants. The instruction as modified embodied some of these limitations on defendants' liability, but coupled with the conditions for which defendants might be held responsible, the effects which might be attributed to the embankments and trestles of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, for which appellants were in no way liable.

There are nearly 3,000 pages of the record on this appeal, and very many specifications of error are presented and elaborately argued. It is impracticable to consider in detail all the points discussed. We have pointed out errors which call for a reversal of the judgment. If a new trial is had, the issues will be so narrowed, under the views here expressed, as to obviate a recurrence of many of the remaining objections to the introduction of evidence and to instructions given or refused.

As has been said, many of these have been rendered harmless by the elimination of some of the parties under the verdict, and by the withdrawal of objectionable evidence from the jury, but we cannot doubt that in the matters herein discussed, arising out of misjoinder of parties and causes of action and admission of evidence on issues not covered by the pleadings, the defendants against whom the verdict of the jury was returned have been seriously prejudiced.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; WILBUR, J.; LENNON, J.

OLNEY, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment of reversal and in the main opinion, except in its discussion of the liability of the two Bixbys because of the cut which they caused to be made in the levee which had been previously constructed along the southeasterly bank of the river. The main opinion would seem to hold that it may be there was evidence sufficient to justify the verdict against the Bixbys because of their having made this cut. In my judgment this is not true; the evidence shows that the cut was in no wise the cause of any injury done the plaintiff's land.

As I understand the main opinion, it applies to the present case the principles contained in the quotation which it makes from Jones v. California Development Co., 173 Cal. 565, 160 Pac. 823, L. R. A. 1917C, 1021, and holds that while the defendants were under no obligation to maintain the embankments they had constructed, that is, either to prevent breaks therein caused by natural forces or to repair such breaks, yet they had no right to cut or remove those embankments, if they knew or should reasonably have known that the result of so doing would be to change the channel of the stream, and that because the evidence was sufficient to justify the possible conclusion that when the Bixbys cut the southeasterly levee they should have known that it would not improbably change the channel of the stream, it was sufficient to justify the verdict. With the proposition that the principles announced in Jones v. California Development Co. apply, I agree. I am not so certain that the evidence justifies any conclusion that the Bixbys should have known that the making of the cut would not improbably change the channel. Nor am I certain that the channel actually did change. There had been a flood water channel there before, and I am not certain that anything more appears than that the channel continued as a flood water channel merely. But passing these doubts, and assuming both that the channel was changed and that the Bixbys should have known that the cut in the embankment would not improbably cause it to change, the evidence, to my mind, shows conclusively that it was not, in fact, the cut that did cause it to change.

The cut in question was a small one, six feet across on the bottom. When the first flood came after its being made, the flood of January, 1914, the embankments on both sides were intact except for the cut. The flood was one of the highest known. It spread over the plain below the railroad trestle where the plaintiff's lands lie, practically from mesa to mesa, and flowed across this plain to the ocean. It would have done this if the embankments had been intact and had remained so. The embankments extended only a comparatively short distance into the plain, and the high waters of the river on reaching the ends of the embankments and being released from their restraint would have flowed around the ends and covered the entire plain, as they did. In fact, one of the witnesses for the plaintiff testifies that in the minor floods of 1912–13 the water "backwatered" around the ends of the embankments in just this fashion. The plaintiff's lands were a mile or more below the lower ends of the embankment, and directly in the course of flood waters passing them. More than this, the channel of the river divided immediately below the embankments and one branch ran to and across the plaintiff's lands. I do not understand that it is contended that the plaintiff's lands would not have been flooded if it had not been for the cut. What is contended is that by the cut the channel was changed so that the flood came with greater force and carrying more silt and sand, with consequent erosion of the plaintiff's land and a deeper deposit upon it.

Now, it is evident that the cut operated in the first instance only to permit the water to pass through the embankment. It is likewise evident that if the water would have broken the embankment, if the cut had not been there, and would have broken it at or about the same place, the final result would have been the same, and the cut was not a factor in causing that result. It was due to the flooding river alone. But the fact that the water would have broken the embankment if the cut had not been there is demonstrated by the fact that it did break through even with the cut there. The situation when the flood of January, 1914, came was, as I have said, that the levees on both sides of the river were intact except for the cut. The amount of water coming down was enormously greater than could be carried in the space between the two embankments. The result was that both gave way. That on the northwesterly side went out for a single stretch of some 600 feet or more. That on the southeasterly side broke just a few yards below the cut. It cannot be questioned that this break would have taken place if the cut had not been there, for the effect of the cut was to relieve, not to increase, the pressure upon the levee below it. Furthermore, the width of the break was greater than that of the cut even after the latter had been enlarged by the passage of the two floods of January and February, 1914. The plaintiff's own maps and the testimony of its witnesses show that after these floods the cut had been enlarged to a width of 50 or 60 feet only, while the break had a width of over 100 feet. The levees were of light soil, easily eroded, and there would seem to be no escape from the conclusion, not only that the levee would have been broken if the cut had not been there, but that if it had not been there and the levee had held at that point, the break below would have been correspondingly enlarged because of the increase of pressure so that the amount of water that passed through the levee would have been substantially the same. In addition to these circumstances, there is the further fact that the contour of the land on the inner side of the break is such that water passing through the break would follow the same course across the Bixby land to that of the plaintiff as water passing through the cut. We have, then, these three conclusions, from none of which, in my judgment, is there escape: First, that the levee would have broken, as it actually did, even if the cut had not been there; second, that substantially the same amount of water would have passed through this break; and, third, that the water so passing through would follow the same course as water passing through the cut. If these things be true, it means that the cut was not a factor in the final result.

So far, I have been discussing the case with reference to the flood of January, 1914, the flood which came when the levees were intact except for the cut. But, if the defendants are not responsible for injury done by this flood, they are certainly not responsible for any done by subsequent floods. They were under no obligation to repair the levee, and when those floods came the levee was already broken. The conditions which those floods met were conditions caused by the previous flood and for which the defendants were not responsible. Not being responsible for those conditions, nor under obligation to remedy them, they were not responsible for injury which the subsequent floods may have worked because of them.

STAUTER v. CARITHERS. (L. A. 6399.)

1. Adoption ⚷4—Wife may adopt child without husband's consent where "lawfully separated" by interlocutory divorce decree.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 221, 223, permitting a married woman to adopt a child without the consent of her husband if they are lawfully separated, and section 159, permitting a separation under an agreement, a wife who had secured an interlocutory divorce judgment is lawfully separated from her husband and may adopt a child without his consent.

2. Adoption ⚷4—Statute permits spouse lawfully separated by interlocutory decree to adopt child without consent of other spouse.

Since, under Civ. Code, § 132, a final judgment of divorce restores the parties to the status of single persons, the words "lawfully separated," in section 223, permitting adoption by one "lawfully separated," does not mean persons finally divorced, but includes persons lawfully separated by interlocutory divorce decree.

3. Adoption ⚷11—That adopting parent proceeded under other than her real name held immaterial.

Where, by the order of adoption, the child retained its former surname, it was not a fatal defect that the adopting parent did not proceed under her real name, she being separated from her husband, but used the name by which she was ordinarily known, no real fraud being perpetrated.

4. Appeal and error ⚷175—Matter not put in issue below cannot be heard on appeal.

In a suit to set aside proceedings for the adoption of a minor where plaintiff's counsel agreed that the trial proceed only upon the question of jurisdiction and introduced no evidence of fraud, the question of fraud is not presented on appeal.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Suit by Sadie Stauter against Della A. Carithers to set aside the adoption by defendant of the minor, Katherine Virginia Stauter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

M. M. Cohen and Frank Dominguez, both of Los Angeles, and Dehm & Cohen, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff in this action sought and secured a decree setting aside an order granting the petition of defendant, Della A. Carithers, for the adoption of the minor, Katherine Virginia Stauter. The adoption was consented to by the parents of the child, the plaintiff Sadie Stauter and her divorced husband, who is the son of defendant, and the order of adoption was entered entirely without objection. In May, 1918, plaintiff instituted the present proceeding for the cancellation of the said order, relying upon the following undisputed facts: Defendant and one Charles W. Lyke were married in 1913; in 1915 they ceased to live together and ever since that time have continued to live apart; in the same year, 1915, defendant instituted divorce proceedings against said Charles Lyke, wherein an interlocutory decree was entered in her favor on September 20, 1916, followed by a final decree of divorce in March, 1918. The order of adoption was granted on August 7, 1917, while the interlocutory decree of divorce was in force and over a month before defendant became entitled to a final judgment in the divorce proceedings. Charles Lyke did not consent to the adoption and it does not appear that he ever had any knowledge thereof.

Plaintiff's theory is that, by reason of the absence of the consent of defendant's husband, the court was without jurisdiction to enter the order of adoption. The trial court, apparently accepting this view of the case, set aside and canceled the order of adoption. Upon a new trial of the instant case the same result was reached for a second time, from which defendant appeals.

[1] Section 223 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

> "A married man, not lawfully separated from his wife, cannot adopt a child without the consent of his wife, nor can a married woman, not thus separated from her husband, without his consent, provided the husband or wife, not consenting, is capable of giving such consent."

Eliminating the portions which have no bearing upon the facts of the present case, the section provides, in effect, that a married woman not lawfully separated from her husband cannot adopt a child without her husband's consent. The only limitations upon adoption in this state are the rules prescribed by the chapter of the Civil Code which deals with adoption (Civ. Code, § 221), and section 223 of that chapter, above quoted, covering and controlling adoption by married persons, does not require the consent of a husband from whom a wife is lawfully separated. It follows that, if a married woman who has been granted an interlocutory decree of divorce can be said to be "lawfully separated" from her husband, then she may adopt without her husband's consent and the court did not lack jurisdiction to enter the order attacked in the instant case. Our attention is therefore concentrated upon a consideration of the legal consequences of an interlocutory decree of divorce.

The effect and nature of such a decree are noted in the case of London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comn., 184 Pac. 864, where it is said:

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"An interlocutory judgment of divorce is therefore, so far as it determines the rights of the parties, a contract between them. It is temporary and provisional in its nature, it is true, but it settles the rights of the parties for the time being, and until some action, proceeding, or motion is begun to change the status, and some order is made thereon which has that effect, or until they become reconciled and resume marital relations, in which event their mutual obligations are, for the time being at least, restored * * * the personal obligations between them remain in abeyance until changed by some subsequent action or agreement which is binding upon the husband. They are, by virtue of the interlocutory judgment, living separate by agreement." (Italics ours.)

In general the law discourages the separation of husband and wife. It does, however, authorize and recognize such separation under certain conditions. For instance, section 159 of the Civil Code permits a husband and wife to live separate under agreement between themselves. Likewise, marriage ties are not dissolved by the entry of an interlocutory decree of divorce (Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 121 Pac. 320; Estate of Seiler, 164 Cal. 181, 128 Pac. 334, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1093) but, while the marriage relation is not ended until final judgment of divorce and one of the purposes in the postponement of the entry of final judgment is to provide an opportunity for reconciliation and resumption of marital relations (Olson v. Super. Ct., 175 Cal. 250, 165 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589), nevertheless, after the entry of the interlocutory decree and until some change is effected either by legal act or reconciliation, the law contemplates the termination of personal relations between the parties (Estate of Walker, 176 Cal. 402, 413, 168 Pac. 689; Id., 180 Cal. 478, 494, 495, 181 Pac. 792). The result is that, where there is an interlocutory judgment decreeing that the parties are entitled to a divorce, even though the married status continues, the law, under the circumstances, permits the separation and recognizes it as rightful in substance. Such separation is therefore clearly lawful, for "lawful" denotes something which, in its substance, is sanctioned or permitted by the law, as distinguished from conformity to positive rules of law. Anderson's Dictionary of Law. Defendant was therefore lawfully separated from her husband at the time of the adoption.

[2] Plaintiff seeks to interpret section 223 as requiring consent of the husband unless the final decree of divorce has been granted. The wording of the section will not permit such an interpretation. A final judgment of divorce restores the parties to the status of single persons (Civ. Code, § 132), and, consequently, a divorced person is no longer married. Section 223 of the Code provides that "a married man, not lawfully separated from his wife," and "a married woman, not thus separated from her husband," cannot adopt without the consent of the wife or husband. Therefore, unless the phrase "lawfully separated" refers to separation, as distinguished from final divorce, it is without meaning, for, by the term "married," divorced persons are excluded from the operation of the section.

[3, 4] The adoption order provided that the child was to retain the surname of Stauter; the fact that, in the adoption proceedings, defendant appeared by the name of Carithers, the name which she had always used, rather than by her real name of Lyke, is therefore immaterial. There was no mistake in identity, and the court finds that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the facts at the time of the adoption proceedings, including knowledge of the financial condition of defendant. If it had appeared that defendant had, by concealment of her status, obtained an order for adoption which would not otherwise have been granted, that might have warranted the cancellation of the order of adoption upon the ground that a fraud had been practiced upon the court. All that appears from the record of the adoption proceedings in regard to the status of defendant is that, in the petition for adoption, defendant referred to herself as a "widow." The order granting the petition, however, omitted any reference to the defendant as "widow," providing only that "Della A. Carithers" was granted the adoption. This is insufficient to warrant the inference that the status of defendant was concealed from the court. Moreover, counsel for plaintiff agreed, at the trial, to proceed only upon the question of jurisdiction, and, accordingly, no evidence was given concerning the question of fraud, and therefore the question of fraud is not presented upon this appeal.

In view of the holding that the consent of defendant's husband was not essential to the validity of the order of adoption, it is unnecessary to consider the remaining points raised by counsel for defendant as to estoppel and the presumptions to be indulged in favor of the validity of the order of adoption.

The judgment canceling the order of adoption is reversed, and, a new trial being unnecessary for the reason that the error consisted in the conclusions of law drawn from the findings, the trial court is directed to enter a judgment in favor of defendant and sustaining the order of adoption.

KELLEY v. ABBOTT et al. (two cases).

1. Corporations 🔑90(4)—Cannot bring single action in equity against subscribers to stock.

Where individual subscriptions to corporate stock were several and independent contracts, remedy of corporation on failure of subscribers to pay installments was separate action at law against each, and it could not bring a single suit in equity against all the stockholders, though a very large number of actions at law would be required to make collection of the balances unpaid on the stock.

2. Bankruptcy 🔑245—Trustee does not represent bankrupt corporation in collecting unpaid subscriptions.

A trustee in bankruptcy is not representing the bankrupt corporation in collecting unpaid subscriptions, but is representing the creditors.

3. Bankruptcy 🔑282—Trustee may enforce rights not open to bankrupt.

While a trustee in bankruptcy must resort to the courts of the state where a bankrupt corporation resides, he may therein enforce rights and avail himself of remedies which are open to him as a representative of the creditors of the bankrupt, but not available to the corporation itself, in view of Bankruptcy Act, § 47 (Comp. St. § 9631).

4. Corporations 🔑259(8)—Judgment creditor may maintain suit in equity in nature of creditors' bill against stockholders to recover unpaid subscriptions.

A judgment creditor of a corporation may maintain a suit in equity in the nature of a creditors' bill against all the stockholders of a corporation to recover for the benefit of creditors the amount due on unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation.

5. Bankruptcy 🔑299—Trustee could join all stockholders in suit to recover unpaid subscriptions.

Trustee of a bankrupt corporation may maintain an action in equity against all the stockholders of the corporation to recover unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation.

6. Venue 🔑41—Improperly joined defendants not entitled to change.

The remedy of persons improperly joined as defendants in an action in a county other than that in which they reside is by demurrer or answer, and they have no right to take the plaintiff's cause, so far as it affects defendants properly sued in the county, to the county of their residence for trial.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by S. F. Kelley, trustee (Ernest U. Schroeter, substituted), against W. F. Abbott, J. G. Snyder, and Mrs. J. G. Snyder (J. G. Snyder, executor, substituted). From orders denying their individual applications for change of venue, the last two named defendants bring separate appeals. Affirmed.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wm. B. Ogden, of Los Angeles, and Walter E. Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The appellants above named were joined with numerous other defendants in an action to recover unpaid subscriptions to capital stock of a corporation, the Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company, which action was begun in the superior court of the county of San Bernardino. They have prosecuted separate appeals from orders of the court denying their individual applications for change of venue to the county of Los Angeles, where they reside.

As the two appeals are identical in the law and the facts involved, they are here disposed of together.

The grounds of the motion for change of place of trial were that the petitioners were residents of the county of Los Angeles, and that none of the other parties joined with them as defendants were necessary parties to the cause of action set out in the complaint against the petitioners.

The plaintiff in the action was the trustee in bankruptcy in the matter of the Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company in bankruptcy proceedings pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California. The defendants, upwards of 100 in number, were joined in a single action to recover for the bankrupt estate their several unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation.

No showing was made by affidavit or otherwise that all or any of the defendants other than the petitioners were nonresidents of San Bernardino county. None of the other defendants join in the application for change of place of trial.

[1] The sole ground to be considered, therefore, is as to whether or not petitioners were properly joined under the complaint in the same action with the other defendants. It clearly appears that the individual subscriptions to the corporate stock were several and independent contracts, that each constituted a separate cause of action, and that none of the other defendants was a necessary party to an action at law upon the individual subscription of either of the petitioners. Appellants' contention that they are improperly joined with the other defendants is urged upon the authority of Kelley, Trustee, v. Gill, 245 U. S. 116, 38 Sup. Ct. 38, 62 L. Ed. 185, instituted in the federal courts and involving these same subscriptions. The trustee had been authorized in the bankruptcy proceedings to institute a suit in equity to enforce collection thereof in the United States District Court. The action was dismissed by the United States Circuit Court for want of jurisdiction. The ground of dismissal was found in the Bankruptcy Act, which confers upon the court of bankruptcy jurisdiction "to cause the estates of bankrupts to be collected, reduced to money and distributed," etc. (section 2, cl. 7 [Comp. St. § 9586]), but prohibits the trustee (with exceptions not here applicable) from "prosecuting without the consent of the proposed defendant a suit in a court other than that in which the bankrupt might have brought it, had bankruptcy not intervened" (section 23b [Comp. St. § 9607b]). The court in its opinion further says:

> "The corporation is a citizen of California. It could not have sued the stockholders except in the state courts. The court of bankruptcy was therefore without jurisdiction."

This would seem to be all that was necessary to the decision of the matter before the United States Circuit Court. It, however, proceeds to deal with the nature of the right of action on the part of the corporation in the state courts in the following language, which the appellants claim is decisive on these appeals:

> "The cause of action sued on is the failure of the several stockholders to perform their several unconditional promises to pay definite amounts at fixed times which have elapsed. The amount payable by one is in no way dependent upon what is due from another. The corporation had a separate right against each alleged stockholder; and the remedy open to it was a separate action at law against each."

The trustee rightly assumes that the corporation could not have brought a single suit in equity against all these stockholders, although a very large number of actions at law would be required to make collection of the balances unpaid on the stock. There was no common issue between these alleged stockholders and the corporation; and the liability of each would have presented a separate controversy unconnected with that of any other. Thus elements essential to jurisdiction in equity to avoid a multiplicity of actions at law by the corporation were lacking. St. L., I. M. & So. Ry. Co. v. McKnight, 244 U. S. 368, 375.[1] "That lack is not supplied by the assignment to the trustee. * * * For him, also, the appropriate remedy was a separate action at law against each stockholder."

[2] It is urged by respondents that the portion of this opinion last quoted is dictum. Conceding that it correctly states the law as to the rights of the corporation in prosecuting these claims in its own behalf, it may be doubted if it in any way curtails the right of the trustee to pursue whatever remedy is given him under the laws of California to prosecute claims of this kind in behalf of the creditors of the bankrupt corporation. The bankrupt act merely relegates the trustee to the court to which the corporation might have resorted, but does not determine the rules of practice and procedure which would govern in such cases. The obvious purpose of this limitation is to prevent subjecting creditors of a bankrupt to greater hardship and inconvenience than would obtain if they were sued under like conditions in the courts to which the corporation might resort.

The trustee is not representing the bankrupt corporation in collecting these unpaid subscriptions, but is representing the creditors. In re V. & M. Lumber Co. (D. C.) 182 Fed. 231; In re Kessler, 186 Fed. 127, 108 C. C. A. 239; Babbitt v. Read (D. C.) 215 Fed. 395.

[3] While the trustee is relegated to the forum of the bankrupt estate to enforce collections, he is not necessarily subject to the limitations of the bankrupt corporation, in the form of his action or the nature of the relief sought. Creditors' rights, which are enforceable under state laws, accrue to a trustee in bankruptcy, and he may maintain or defend proceedings and collect assets under circumstances where the bankrupt would not be at liberty to act. Courtney v. Fidelity Trust Co. (Cir. Ct. App., 6th Dist.) 219 Fed. 57, 134 C. C. A. 595; In re Kessler, supra; In re Desnoyers Shoe Co. (D. C.) 210 Fed. 533. In other words, while the trustee must resort to the courts of the state where the bankrupt resides, he may therein enforce rights and avail himself of remedies which are open to him as a representative of the creditors of the corporation which might not be available to the corporation itself. Bardes v. Hawarden Bank, 178 U. S. 24, 20 Sup. Ct. 1000, 44 L. Ed. 1175; Hicks v. Knost, 178 U. S. 541, 20 Sup. Ct. 1006, 44 L. Ed. 1183. Section 47, subc. 5, of the Bankruptcy Act (Comp. St. § 9631), provides that the trustee has power to collect and reduce to money the property of the estate, "and shall be deemed vested with all rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned and unsatisfied."

[4] It is well settled in this state that a judgment creditor of a corporation so situated may maintain an action in equity in the nature of a creditors' bill against the stockholders of a corporation to recover for the benefit of creditors the amount due on unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation. As this court has said:

> "The action is sustained on the principle that such unpaid subscriptions are a part of the capital stock of the corporation, and, like other debts due to it, constitute a fund to which creditors may look for payment of their claims; and when the corporation neglects to call them in, a court of equity will enforce their payment," and the fact that the creditor has a concurrent remedy by an action at law on the contract does not deprive him of his right to proceed in equity. Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158; Welch v. Sargent, 127 Cal. 72, 59 Pac. 319; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 150 Cal. 764, 89 Pac. 1090; Potter v. Dear, 95 Cal. 578, 30 Pac. 777.

Though objection has been made in this form of action for failure to join all the subscribers as parties defendant (Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., supra; Baines v. Babcock, supra), we find no instance where it has been contended or held that all persons liable for unpaid subscriptions were not properly joined in such creditors' bill.

[5] While it is ordinarily true that equity will not intervene merely to prevent a multiplicity of suits where the claims against numerous defendants are independent of each other and constitute entirely separate causes of action at law, yet such joinder in an equitable proceeding is frequently recognized even where there is a complete several liability at law, if the demands arise from a common source and involve the same general issues of law and fact, as in the present case, where all the subscriptions sued on were made in consideration of capital stock of the bankrupt corporation. Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. §§ 114, 251, 269; Bailey v. Tillinghast, 99 Fed. 801, 40 C. C. A. 93; Way v. Bragaw, 16 N. J. Eq. 213, 84 Am. Dec. 147; Boyd v. Hoyt, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 78; 7 R. C. L. pp. 352, 381; Vermont Marble Works Co. v. Declez Granite Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143; People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 336, 361; Wilson v. Castro, 31 Cal. 420, 428; Whitehead v. Sweet, 126 Cal. 67, 77, 58 Pac. 376.

[6] In any event, we fail to see how the defendants, if improperly joined in this action, can obtain relief by a transfer of the action to another county. So far as appears all the numerous other defendants in this action are residents of San Bernardino county, and properly sued there. If a change of venue is granted, it becomes the duty of the court under section 399 of the Code of Civil Procedure to transfer all the pleadings and papers to the court to which the change is granted, and thereafter that court has jurisdiction of the entire action "as if it had been originally commenced therein." There is no means provided to segregate defendants improperly joined in an action under proceedings for a change of place of trial. If improperly joined in this action, appellants' remedy would seem to be by demurrer or answer. They have no right to take plaintiff's cause, so far as it affects defendants properly sued in San Bernardino county, to another county for trial.

DUNNE v. INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS. (S. F. 9005, 9155.)

Corporations 🔑462—Corporation held precluded from asserting that assignment of mortgage to it was invalid.

A corporation's investment board's determination in good faith that amount of mortgage did not exceed 60 per cent. of the value of the property empowered it to take assignment of the mortgage, and it could not thereafter avoid its contract to take such assignment from persons acting in good faith on the ground that the mortgage exceeded 60 per cent. of the value of the land in violation of law; the determination as to value of the land being conclusive as to its power to make such a contract with third persons dealing with it in good faith.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by L. Dunne against the Independent Order of Foresters, in which the defendant cross-complained, from that part of the judgment denying her the relief asked in her complaint. The plaintiff appeals, and from that part of the judgment denying it relief upon its cross-complaint, and from an order denying its motion that the judgment entered be vacated and for the entry of a judgment in its favor on the cross-complaint, the defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gavin McNab, R. P. Henshall, and Nat Schmulowitz, all of San Francisco (F. W. Henshaw, of San Francisco, of council), for appellant.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this case three appeals are presented. By reason of the fact that the transcripts were filed at different times they received two numbers. No. 9005 is an appeal by the plaintiff from the part of the judgment denying her the relief asked in her complaint. No. 9155 presents appeals by the defendant from the part of the judgment which denied it relief upon its cross-complaint and from an order denying its motion that the judgment entered be vacated, and for the entry of a judgment in its favor on the cross-complaint. It is stipulated that the record filed in appeal No. 9005 may be used on all the appeals.

The complaint alleges that on April 6, 1916, the plaintiff and defendant executed an agreement whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and defendant agreed to buy a certain note and mortgage executed by Newark Realty & Development Company to said plaintiff and dated February 15, 1916, covering 2,186 acres of land in Alameda county, and the defendant agreed that on February 15, 1917, it would pay for said note and mortgage the sum of $225,000 and all interest accrued thereon from February 15, 1916, to February 15, 1917; the note and mortgage to be transferred to the defendant upon payment by it to the plaintiff of said sum of money and interest. The agreement is awkwardly expressed, but we have stated its legal effect. It is alleged that on March 1, 1917, defendant paid $20,000 on the agreement, and that on October 3, 1917, plaintiff tendered the note and mortgage to the defendant, together with an assignment conveying to it all plaintiff's title thereto, and demanded payment of the balance of the principal and interest under said agreement, which the defendant then refused to pay. The prayer was for judgment for $205,000 with interest.

The defendant answered, setting up several defenses. Its first defense was that it had not executed the agreement sued on. The second defense alleged that the defendant had paid $42,500 on the agreement set forth in the complaint and that it was induced to execute the same by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations made by plaintiff to defendant. The third defense was that the defendant is a Canadian corporation, and that under its articles, and the laws of Canada governing it, it was without authority to purchase the said mortgage described in said agreement, and that any agreement executed by it purporting to agree to purchase the same was void for that reason. It also filed a cross-complaint wherein it alleged the same facts as are set forth in the answer, and in reliance thereon asked for a recovery of the $42,500 alleged to have been paid upon said agreement, and for the cancellation thereof.

The court found that all the allegations relating to fraud were untrue. With regard to the execution of the agreement of April 6, 1916, it found that Stevenson, who was the president and attorney in fact of the defendant, on the one part, and the plaintiff, on the other part, "went through the form of making, delivering and executing, as and for the contract of the" defendant, the said agreement. As to the power of the defendant to make the agreement, it found that it never at any time was authorized or empowered by law to enter into such contract; that it was not authorized by law to invest any of its funds in the purchase of mortgages where the amount paid therefor exceeded 60 per cent. of the value of the land covered by such mortgage; and that on April 6, 1916, the value of the land covered by the mortgage to be purchased under said agreement did not exceed $231,803.55. It also found that the defendant had, by mistake, paid $42,500 upon the agreement; that the agreement was void; that the defendant was not guilty of laches and had done nothing whereby it was estopped to contend that the agreement was beyond its powers.

The judgment was that the plaintiff take nothing by her action, that the defendant take nothing by its cross-complaint, and that defendant recover of plaintiff its costs.

To authorize the defendant to invest $225,000 on a real estate mortgage, the real estate should have been worth $375,000. If the theory of the court below that it could inquire into and revise the decision of the corporate authorities of the defendant as to the value of that land is correct, its conclusion that the defendant was not empowered to purchase said mortgage at that price is sustained by the facts; otherwise not, as we shall presently see.

Upon the trial it appeared that the denial of the alleged execution of the agreement of April 6, 1916, was based entirely on the theory that the execution of such a contract was not within the corporate powers of the defendant. The formal execution of the agreement was fully proven and found. The defense of the nonexecution of the contract, therefore, need not be considered, except as it may be connected with the defense that it was ultra vires.

The defendant is a corporation organized in Canada, under the laws of Canada. Those laws confer upon it power (a) "of loaning and of investment prescribed by the Insurance Act of 1910"; (b) to "constitute an investment board * * * to have charge of the loaning and investment of the funds of the society, * * * and to exercise such powers and under such regulations, * * * applicable thereto, as the society, or the executive council thereof, may from time to time determine"; (c) under the "Insurance Act of 1910," to "invest its funds, or any portion thereof, in the purchase of * * * mortgages * * * on real estate in Canada, or elsewhere where the company is carrying on its business, provided that the amount paid for any such mortgage * * * shall in no case exceed sixty per cent. of the value of the real estate covered thereby"; and (d), under said act, to "loan its funds or any portion thereof on the security" of such mortgages, "provided, however, that no such loan shall exceed sixty per cent. of the value of the real estate or interest therein which forms the security for such loan."

The defendant corporation was, at all times here involved, doing business in California. Consequently, its power to invest its money on the security of mortgages on real estate extended to this state and included authority to buy mortgages on California real estate in order to invest its money on such security. The only limitation upon this power is found in the proviso "that the amount paid for any such mortgage shall in no case exceed sixty per cent. of the value of the real estate covered thereby."

It appears from the uncontradicted evidence that Elliott G. Stevenson was the president, chief executive officer, and general manager of the defendant at the time the transactions involved in the action occurred; also, that prior to the making of the agreement sued on the "investment board" of the defendant, by resolution duly adopted, had authorized Stevenson, as its "president and general manager," "to undertake to purchase for" the defendant the mortgage described in the agreement sued on, "for such sum and upon such terms as to payment as he may deem expedient," and to execute as such president, in the name and on behalf of the defendant, a contract by which the defendant should "undertake to purchase said mortgage and to pay for the same the face value, plus accrued interest from the date of transfer, upon such terms as to time of payment as aforesaid as he shall deem expedient."

The decision of the court below that the defendant did not have power to make the contract for the purchase of the mortgage is based entirely on the theory that defendant's power depended on the conclusion of the court as to the value of the land covered by the mortgage at the time the agreement was made, and that the belief and decision of the investment board of the defendant that the land then had the necessary value to empower the defendant to invest the proposed sum in the mortgage was immaterial. There is no finding that Stevenson did not believe that the sum to be paid for the mortgage exceeded 60 per cent. of the value of the land, nor any finding of any kind on the subject of the belief, opinion, or knowledge of Stevenson, or of the investment board, as to the value of the land. No question with respect to the effect of fraud of any sort, or of any breach of trust, is involved in the case.

We are of the opinion that the court below was in error. The purposes of the defendant are those of a life insurance company or mutual benefit association. It has a large fund which it invests both in Canada and other countries for the purpose of obtaining money to pay to the beneficiaries of its policies or certificates. It is authorized to invest these funds in real estate mortgages to the extent of 60 per cent. of the value of the real estate mortgaged. Its "investment board" invests these funds and it is charged with the duty, before making an investment thereof upon a real estate mortgage, of ascertaining and determining that the sum invested does not exceed 60 per cent. of the value of the property, and, consequently, of determining to its own satisfaction the value of that property. It is not required to obtain the sanction of any court or tribunal before making the investment. Therefore, when it has, in good faith, determined that the value is sufficient, it has the power to invest the money upon that security. In the absence of any allegation and proof to the contrary, the law presumes that legal duty has been performed. The board authorized Stevenson to enter into an agreement on its behalf to buy this mortgage at its face value. He did so, and the evidence shows that it received the agreement and paid part of the price stipulated therein. These facts raise the presumption that the board satisfied itself by due inquiry that the sum to be paid did not exceed 60 per cent. of the value of the mortgaged land, and that the members of the board then believed that the land was worth at least $375,000. We think that with respect to third persons dealing with the corporation, in the absence of fraud, the decision of the board on the question of that value is conclusive as to the power to make the contract. We need not go so far as to say that it is conclusive in any action against the unfaithful officers of the defendant or against third persons chargeable with participation in a fraudulent valuation, or with notice that the officer or officers acting for the company did not believe that the value of the mortgaged property was sufficient to authorize the taking of the mortgage in accordance with the defendant's articles.

Any other rule would make it practically impossible for the corporation to carry on its business successfully in such matters. The validity of its contracts relating thereto would remain undecided until some attempt was made to enforce them in the courts and until the court had finally determined that the value was sufficient to give the corporation power to enter into the particular contract. In effect the investment of the funds would be committed to the courts instead of the board. It is apparent that with this condition it would not be able to obtain such contracts. The value of property rests on opinion. There is no subject of inquiry in the courts upon which opinions are more widely variant or more positive. If such contracts could be set aside whenever a court should find that the investment board had, even to a slight extent, overestimated the value of the property, no one could safely deal with the defendant in such matters, however cautious the board might be in coming to a decision.

The language of Chief Justice Field in Natoma Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 552, is pertinent here. Speaking of a corporation with power to buy and hold "such real and personal estate, as the purposes of the corporation shall require," and referring to a proposal to have the court determine whether certain property was so "required," he said:

> "Whether or not the premises in controversy are necessary for these purposes, it is not material to inquire; that is a matter between the government and the corporation, and is no concern of the defendants. It would lead to infinite inconveniences and embarrassments, if, in suits by corporations, to recover the possession of their property, inquiries were permitted as to the necessity of such property for the purposes of their incorporation, and the title made to rest upon the existence of that necessity."

In Bates v. Coronado B. Co., 109 Cal. 163, 41 Pac. 856, where a corporation having similar powers sought to avoid its contract as ultra vires, the court said:

> "Whether a contract is 'essential' to the transaction of its ordinary affairs, or for the purposes of the corporation, is to be determined by * * * those to whom the management of its affairs is intrusted. If it is within the apparent scope of its organization, the fact that the contract has been entered into by it, or by its representative, is a determination on the part of the corporation that it is essential, and the corporation will not be permitted * * * to question its effect."

And in Savings Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 417, 58 Pac. 915, the court said:

> "Whether the purchase of the mortgage in question was 'such as the purposes of the corporation required' was to be determined by its board of directors (Civ. Code, § 305), and is not open to investigation at the instance of the defendant."

The provisions considered in these cases were limitations upon the power of the corporation, and the principle enunciated is applicable to any limitation of a similar nature where the action of the corporation is to be taken according to the discretion or judgment of the officers in charge of its affairs, as is the case here. Such limitations are for the benefit and protection of the corporation and its beneficiaries or creditors, or the state. The corporation, or its beneficiaries or creditors suing in its name or on its behalf in equity, on the ground that its officers had acted fraudulently or in bad faith or that it had been defrauded by third parties, might perhaps impeach the finding as to value. But where there is no fraud or bad faith charged, the contract in such cases cannot be shown to be ultra vires by proof that the property was not of sufficient value to justify the investment made.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment in favor of the defendant is not supported either by the pleadings or the findings and that it cannot stand. This renders it unnecessary to consider the appeals of the defendant further than to state that the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint, so far as they were found to be true, do not, upon the principles we have stated, constitute grounds for any relief to the defendant against the plaintiff. The entire judgment should be set at large for a new trial.

The judgment is reversed.

HEDEN v. POINT REYES LAND CO. et al.

(S. F. 8935.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑878(1)—Whether finding against party not appealing is justified cannot be considered.

In a suit to rescind a contract for the purchase of land, where the court found that plaintiff's right to rescind for fraud had been lost by laches, but found for plaintiff on other grounds, and plaintiff did not appeal, the question whether the finding of laches was justified cannot be considered.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑112(1)—Purchaser entitled to rescind and recover purchase price, if sale to third person constituted repudiation by vendor.

If a sale by a vendor to a third person of a part of the land sold to the vendee was such an invasion and impairment of the vendee's rights as amounted to a repudiation of the contract, the vendee was entitled to a judgment rescinding the contract, and for the recovery of the money paid by him.

3. Principal and agent 🔑103(7)—Agent, authorized to resell land on cancellation of contract, held without authority to resell if contract not canceled.

A landowner's selling agent, authorized on the final cancellation of the contract of sale with any purchaser to resell the lot covered by such contract, had no authority to resell a lot sold to plaintiff if plaintiff's contract had not then been canceled, and in such case the sale was without validity, and could not impair plaintiff's rights.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Notice by vendor held recognition of contract and of vendee's right to make payment by date specified.

A notice, served on the vendee by the vendor, stating that if arrears were not paid on or before a specified date the vendor would be released from any obligation to convey and the vendee would forfeit all rights under the contract, and all moneys paid thereunder would vest in the vendor, was an express recognition of the contract and an extension of the vendee's time to make payments thereunder until the date specified.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑102—Sale to third person does not cause cancellation or rescission if it does not prevent performance.

A sale by a vendor to a third person of property covered by the contract with the vendee does not operate as a cancellation or rescission of the contract if it preserves the rights of the vendee under the original contract or does not prevent the vendor from making good his agreement to convey title within the time specified.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑86—Vendor's notice to purchaser to make payments held not a rescission or acceptance of purchaser's effort to rescind.

Where a contract of sale provided that on default by the vendee the vendor at its option was released from all obligation to convey, and the purchaser should forfeit all rights and all money paid under the contract, a notice from the vendor to the vendee, demanding overdue payments on or before a specified date, and stating that if not made, the vendor would consider himself released and all rights of the vendee forfeited, was not a rescission or repudiation of the contract or a ratification and acceptance of the vendee's previous effort to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by John Peter Heden against the Point Reyes Land Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Walton C. Webb, of San Francisco (C. F. Reindollar, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

William F. Rose, of San Francisco, and Alva S. Sherlock, of Concord, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff brought this action in rescission and to recover money paid as vendee upon a contract with defendant Point Reyes Land Company for the purchase and sale of farming lands. The cause of action under the original complaint was based upon fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by defendants whereby plaintiff was induced to purchase.

The vendor, Point Reyes Land Company, was represented in the contract of sale by its selling agent, Locke-Paddon Company.

[1] The trial court found on the evidence that the plaintiff had been induced to purchase by false representations of the defendants. But it was further found that there had been laches on the part of plaintiff in giving notice of rescission, such notice not having been given for nearly two years after plaintiff went into possession of the land. It might be questioned from the evidence if some delay in declaring a rescission was not excusable. Whether such finding of laches was justified cannot, however, be considered on this appeal, as plaintiff, against whom the finding was made, is not appealing. It is therefore not necessary to go into details concerning issues presented by the original complaint stating a cause of rescission for fraud.

The issue raised on this appeal is presented under a supplemental complaint alleging transactions had pending the suit, which plaintiff claims were a breach of the contract by the vendor. The allegations of the supplemental complaint, under which judgment was given for plaintiff, are as follows:

"That during the month of January, 1918, defendant Locke Paddon Company, as agent for Point Reyes Land Company, sold and delivered to one Miller five acres of the said land mentioned and described in plaintiff's original complaint; that said land was a portion of the land purchased by plaintiff from defendant Point Reyes Land Company, as described in the original contract, copy of which is attached to said complaint, and which land is involved in this suit."

It was found by the court on the trial that by virtue of this sale the defendants ousted plaintiff from possession of the land in question and retook possession thereof, and that by a sale of a portion of said land "defendants accepted and ratified the rescission and cancellation of said contract existing between plaintiff and defendant Point Reyes Land Company," and thereby released plaintiff from further liability under the contract, and entitled him to a recovery of money theretofore advanced in the transaction. Judgment was for plaintiff under this alleged mutual rescission for the sum of $790 against both defendants, Point Reyes Land Company and Locke-Paddon Company.

[2] If this sale of five acres of plaintiff's land by the vendor was such an invasion and impairment of plaintiff's rights as to amount to a repudiation of the contract, plaintiff is entitled to his judgment under the well-established rule in such cases. Merrill v. Merrill, 103 Cal. 287, 35 Pac. 768, 37 Pac. 392; Glock v. Howard & Wilson Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Heilig v. Parlin, 134 Cal. 99, 66 Pac. 186; Shively v. Semi-Tropic Land & Water Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848; Gaume v. Sheets, 183 Pac. 535.

The appealing defendants, however, dispute the effect or sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding upon which the judgment rests. On the filing of the supplemental complaint it was stipulated that all its allegations were to be deemed denied, and defendants also filed a separate answer thereto.

[3] It was alleged by defendants, and we think the undisputed testimony supports the allegation, that this sale to Miller of five acres of land contracted to plaintiff was made by the Locke-Paddon Company. There is no evidence that the Point Reyes Company, the owners of the legal title to the land, had anything to do with or in any way authorized this sale. It was shown that the only authority possessed by the Locke-Paddon Company to make contracts for the sale of any of these lands was under a general contract which had been in existence previous to plaintiff's purchase, and under which, indeed, the plaintiff's contract was executed, whereby the Point Reyes Land Company had empowered the Locke-Paddon Company to act as its sales and collection agent for the sales of its lands. This contract contained the following provision:

> "After the final cancellation of the contract of sale with any purchaser, the party of the second part [Locke Paddon Co.] may resell the lot covered by said cancelled contract to any other purchaser it may procure on the same terms and conditions as if said lot had never been sold, such resale to be subject to all the terms and conditions of this agreement."

This, according to the evidence, was the only authority the Locke-Paddon Company had under which it could in any way contract or sell lands embraced under plaintiff's contract.

Now, there seems no escape from the alternatives presented by this state of facts. Either at the time the alleged sale of five acres to Miller was made the contract with plaintiff had already been canceled, in which event the sale was entirely legitimate and could not injuriously affect the rights of plaintiff, or the Locke-Paddon Company was without power or authority to sell, and its contract with Miller was without validity, and could not impair plaintiff's rights. It may be said in this connection that there is no evidence in the record that plaintiff was disturbed in his possession, and the finding of the court in this respect is unsupported.

[4] With regard to the status of plaintiff's contract at the time this alleged sale was made, we are of the opinion that the evidence shows that it was still effective. The court having found that plaintiff's right of rescission was lost by delay in exercising it, the relations of the parties were still measured by the terms of the contract, and while plaintiff was in default in the stipulated payments, the defendant Point Reyes Land Company had on the 2d day of January, 1918, several days previous to the sale to Miller by the Locke-Paddon Company, served plaintiff with written and signed notice of his default in payments, and notified him that if such arrears were not paid on or before January 9, 1918—

> "that immediately upon such failure without further act on the part of the undersigned, then the undersigned will be released from any obligations to convey the premises described in the above contract or any part thereof and you shall thereupon forfeit all rights under said contract, and all moneys paid under said contract by you shall immediately belong to and vest in the undersigned in accordance with the terms and provisions of said contract."

This was an express recognition of the contract by the vendor, and an extension of plaintiff's time to make payments thereunder until the 9th of January. This attempted sale to Miller was made on the 7th of January, while the contract was still uncanceled.

[5] Under these circumstances, the most that can be said of the contract of sale to Miller of part of plaintiff's tract is that it was a contract which would be subject to plaintiff's rights. That was the utmost of the authority vested in the Locke-Paddon Company under its contract as sales agent. It is not every sale by a vendor of property covered by a contract of purchase and sale that will effect a breach of such contract. It has been repeatedly held that such a sale which preserves the rights of the vendee under the original contract, or which does not prevent the vendor from making good his agreement to convey title within the time specified, will not operate as a cancellation or rescission of the contract. Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 140 Pac. 30; Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320; Shively v. Semi-Tropic Land & Water Co., supra; Garberino v. Roberts, 109 Cal. 125, 41 Pac. 857. There is no evidence in the record as to the terms and conditions of this purported sale of the five acres to Miller, excepting the testimony of one of defendants' witnesses that "the Locke-Paddon Company sold it to Mr. Miller on a contract of sale." So far as is alleged in the complaint or shown in evidence, this contract may have been made expressly subject to existing rights under plaintiff's previous contract. We do not undertake to say that if the Point Reyes Land Company had authorized and its agent, the Locke-Paddon Company, had executed a sales contract of part of this land to Miller, pending the period covered by the demand that plaintiff pay up or forfeit his rights, which impaired plaintiff's contract or disturbed his possession, it might not be held a rescission by defendants, but such was not the case.

[6] As to the effect of the notice of January 3d demanding that plaintiff make his overdue payments on or before January 9th or the vendor would consider himself released from obligation to convey the premises and all rights of the vendee forfeited, this was not a rescission or repudiation of the contract, but a declaration of reliance upon it. The contract by its terms provided that should the purchaser fail to comply with any of the covenants or agreements therein contained "said seller at its option is thereby released from all obligations in equity to convey said premises or any part thereof and said purchaser shall (at the seller's option) thereupon forfeit all rights under this contract and all money theretofore paid under this contract by said purchaser."

Such a demand as was here made cannot be construed as a ratification and acceptance of plaintiff's previous effort to rescind the contract under allegations of fraud, as it is an express demand that he carry out the terms of the contract. Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539, 123 Pac. 363; Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 140 Pac. 283; Lemle v. Barry, 183 Pac. 148.

Plaintiff, having lost, by delay in taking action, his right to rescind for fraud, was left subject to all the terms of the contract, and in the absence of further breach of the contract by his vendor, constituting a new cause of action, is not in a position to recover any of the money previously paid in pursuance of his contract.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. ANTHONY. (Cr. 2312.)

1. Criminal law 🔑369(1)—Evidence of similar offenses excluded.

In a prosecution for lascivious acts upon the body of a girl under the age of 14 years, contrary to Pen. Code, § 288, evidence of similar acts by defendant with other girls is excluded, not because it has no tendency to prove the offense charged, but to protect the defendant from being required to meet charges other than that contained in the indictment; the only exception to the rule being evidence of other similar conduct with the complaining witness.

2. Criminal law 🔑706, 730(3)—Asking series of improper questions held prejudicial.

In a prosecution for lascivious acts upon the body of a girl under the age of 14 years, contrary to Pen. Code, § 288, where defendant introduced all the evidence possible to rebut the charge, the conduct of the district attorney in persistently asking questions which suggested he had information that defendant had been guilty of similar acts and had had sexual intercourse with other girls in the institution of which he was in charge necessarily impressed the jury with the idea that the district attorney had such information and was prejudicial to defendant, notwithstanding the court sustained objections to the questions and instructed the jury to disregard them.

3. Criminal law 🔑1171(1)—Good faith in asking improper questions does not remove prejudicial effect.

The fact that the district attorney was acting in good faith in asking a series of improper questions, to all of which objection was sustained, does not remove the prejudicial effect of his questions.

4. Criminal law 🔑785(6)—Court need not give requested instruction that charge was hard to disprove.

In a prosecution for lascivious acts upon a girl under 14, it was not error for the court to refuse to give an instruction requested by defendant that the charge could be easily made and was difficult to disprove, and that it was the duty of the jury to scan carefully the testimony of the prosecuting witness and to view it with caution, though the court might properly have instructed the jury to view the testimony of prosecutrix with caution.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Fred G. Anthony was convicted of lascivious acts on the body of a female child under the age of 14 years, and he appeals. Reversed.

George W. Smith, of Santa Cruz, and Kenneth I. Jones, of Fairfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones and Arthur Lindauer, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

WILBUR, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of lewd and lascivious acts done upon the body of a female child under the age of 14 years, with the intent to arouse and appeal to his own sexual desires, contrary to the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. He appeals from the judgment.

A reversal is asked upon three grounds, as follows: (1) Misconduct of the district attorney during the trial; (2) the refusal to give an instruction requested by the defendant; (3) the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of conviction.

The third ground was not pressed upon the argument. The testimony of the complaining witness was alone sufficient to support the verdict, and her testimony was corroborated by another girl 11 years of age.

The principal point urged in support of the appeal is the misconduct of the district attorney. Several instances of asserted misconduct are assigned. A further statement of the facts is necessary to explain them.

The Good Templars home is an institution maintained at Vallejo for the care and support of small children of both sexes. At the time of the offense charged the affairs of the home were under the actual management of the defendant and his wife, who were living at the home. The defendant was called as a witness in his own behalf and denied the charge made against him. Without the slightest basis therefor in the direct or cross-examination, the district attorney asked the defendant if he had not hesitated to mention a certain room in his description of the premises because in that room in the months of January, February, and March he had sexual intercourse with two girls whose names were mentioned in the question, one of whom was 9 and the other 13 years of age. The defendant assigned this as misconduct and moved that the answer be stricken out. Thereupon a recess was taken for the argument of the question, the objection was sustained, and the answer stricken out. The jury were thereupon instructed by the court at the instance of the defendant to give absolutely no consideration to the question and to dispel from their mind anything in relation thereto and to disregard it.

A Mrs. Hansen was called as a witness by the prosecution in rebuttal and testified that the defendant's general reputation for morality in the community in which he lived was bad. Thereupon the district attorney asked the witness if she had heard anything prior to the 2d of March, 1919, concerning Mr. Anthony having sexual intercourse with one of the girls in the home, naming her. The question was objected to, the conduct of the district attorney in asking the question was assigned as error, and the court sustained the objection and admonished the jury substantially as before, to disregard the same.

Miss Nellie Bresnan, who was called by the defendant as a witness on cross-examination, was asked the following question:

> "Q. Now, Miss Bresnan, have you ever heard, while you were at the home, of Mr. Anthony making a practice of committing lewd and lascivious acts and having improper intercourse with the girl inmates there, and in particular with those whom you have mentioned?"

This question included the same girls who had been mentioned in the question subsequently asked of the defendant. The objection to this question was sustained, but no request was made for the admonition of the jury to disregard the asking of the question. The only excuse for this question is that the district attorney assumed that the witness had testified to the reputation of the defendant for morality on direct examination. It appears that on the direct examination the defendant sought to show his general course of conduct towards the girls in the home and his care and efforts on their behalf at the time of the influenza epidemic on the theory that this would tend to show his character for morality. The district attorney objected to this line of evidence, and the questions were then postponed and were not subsequently asked. The questions asked by the defendant's counsel did not relate to the reputation of the defendant, but to his course of conduct, and were as follows:

> "Now, Miss Bresnan, up to the time of the making of this charge, did you ever have occasion to observe Mr. Anthony about the home? A. I have. Q. Now, up to the time of the making of the charges did you ever have occasion to observe Mr. Anthony's attitude and conduct toward the children?
> "Mr. Lindauer: What purpose, what trait?
> "Mr. Smith: Morality. A. Not any way—just in a fatherly way.
> "Mr. Lindauer: I move to strike it out, 'just in a fatherly way,' if your honor please; this is a question of morality.
> "Q. You understand, do you, Miss Bresnan? A. Yes.
> "Q. Mr. Smith has asked you the question. A. Beg your pardon; I have never seen anything wrong in morality.
> "Mr. Smith: I submit it should stand."

Later, in response to this question:

> "Did you see him with the girls about him many times or not? A. Yes; many times, as I would any man that goes around greeting him, you know, in a nice way."

At this juncture the examination was halted by the objection of the district attorney that this was not the way to prove the reputation for morality.

The question is whether the asking of these questions, assigned as error, and particularly that addressed to the defendant himself, constituted misconduct of so grievous a character that it could not be cured by the instructions of the court to the jury to utterly and wholly disregard it. In determining that question it is proper also to observe that the district attorney called several of the young girls from the institution in rebuttal who testified that the reputation of the defendant for morality was bad. The questions were directed to his reputation in the orphans' home and not in the community in which he lived. For instance, one girl, aged 14, testified as follows:

> "Q. Now, what was Mr. Anthony's reputation or general reputation at the orphans' home for morality, good or bad? A. It was bad."

She had been previously asked by the defendant on cross-examination in testing her knowledge as to what morality means:

> "Q. And when was the first time you ever heard any one talk about Mr. Anthony's morality before the 2d day of March, 1919? A. Before then? Q. Yes. A. Why, I don't remember before. Q. You don't remember before? A. I don't remember how long he told me before."

She also testified that she had heard statements before the 2d of March. On her redirect examination she was asked the following question:

> "Q. * * * Do you remember an occasion in the month of February, 1919, on which occasion you were up in the barn with Mr. Anthony, and you left the barn in anger, do you remember that occasion? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why did you get angry?"

This question was objected to, and the objection sustained. It was clearly improper and very suggestive.

Among the girls from the home so questioned by the district attorney as to the reputation of the defendant for morality were the two named in the above question addressed to the defendant, concerning repeated acts of sexual intercourse committed with them in January, February, and March. The 13 year old girl testified that his reputation in the home for morality was bad. The 9 year old girl was unable to qualify as a witness because she did not understand the nature of an oath. These two character witnesses and one other were also included in the above question asked of Miss Bresnan by the clause "and in particular with those whom you have mentioned?" The latter question was broad enough to include the prosecuting witness, who was also among those "mentioned" by Miss Bresnan.

In determining the prejudicial character of the district attorney's conduct, it will be necessary to consider the situation presented by the record.

The defendant was confronted with the charge made by an 11 year old girl that he had placed his hands upon her person. The incident occurred in a room where a number of children were gathered. It was a comparatively public place. His duties called upon him to come in contact with these young girls. He was alongside the girl as he testifies, showing her a book. Under such circumstances the only defenses that he could make to such charge are: First, his own flat and positive denial; second, evidence of his good character; third, evidence tending to discredit the complaining witness. The defendant made a defense along all these lines. He flatly denied the misconduct charged. He not only showed that his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity and morality was good, but in addition it appears that he has been in charge of this quasi public institution in which children are kept and maintained; that he has instructed them in the Sunday school and has been active in religious work. He also produced evidence tending to impeach the veracity of the complaining witness. Under these circumstances the jury is called upon to determine whether beyond a reasonable doubt the testimony of the complaining witness is true, and thus to determine whether or not beyond all reasonable doubt the testimony of the defendant is untrue. The defendant has offered all the proof that any man, however unjustly accused, could offer, and yet, so far as this court is concerned, it is powerless to interfere with the verdict of guilty where there is a conflict of testimony, even though the verdict was based entirely upon the uncorroborated testimony of the complaining witness. However, in considering the question of whether or not the misconduct of the district attorney is prejudicial, it is necessary for us to consider the whole case as presented by the evidence. In a case of this kind the district attorney is confronted with the difficult task of convicting a man of previous good reputation for an offense so odious as to indicate a perverted mind. This conviction must be secured by the testimony of the young and immature girl whose testimony not only flatly contradicts that of the defendant, but also stamps his whole life as hypocritical and false. Under these conditions the district attorney not only sought to corroborate the complaining witness in every possible and legitimate way, but, it is evident from the record, sought to create an atmosphere of suspicion by the improper questions asked. Experience would indicate that jurors are eager to get evidence which may be wholly improper, but which seems to them to elucidate the truth. If under our system of criminal practice it had been permissible for the prosecution to show that the defendant had been guilty of acts of sexual intercourse with the young girls in his custody, and if it could have been shown that he had also made a practice of committing lewd acts upon the persons of other young girls in his charge, such evidence would not only have shown the lewd character of the defendant and strengthened the probability that he committed the particular offense charged, but the jury, instead of being confronted with the problem of deciding which of two witnesses had told the truth, namely, the prosecuting witness or the defendant, would have either had the defendant contradicting all the witnesses offered upon that subject or admitting the truth of the other charges or remaining silent with reference thereto. It is vastly more likely that one young girl might be untruthful in making such charge than that half a dozen would make similar untrue charges.

[1] Our law wholly rejects this character of testimony, not because it does not tend to prove the truth of the charge, but because of a just regard for the rights of the defendant, who, if confronted by such witnesses, instead of being compelled to stand trial on one charge made against him, would be confronted by half a dozen or more charges. Our rule confining the testimony to the crime charged in the information has only been relaxed so far as to permit testimony of similar conduct with the complaining witness.

[2] In view of the fact that jurors instantly perceive the probative value of such improper testimony and are also unfortunately inclined to attach weight to the insinuations or suggestions of counsel as to the proof in his possession, which is excluded by the rules of law enforced by the court, it is clear that, however good the intentions of the jury, or however sincere they may be in endeavoring to follow the instructions of the court to disregard such suggestions, it is well-nigh inevitable that they should give weight to such suggestions. It is true that the asking of a question is neither proof of the fact nor a declaration of its truth. Where, however, a series of questions were asked, as they were here, each suggesting to the court and to the jury that the district attorney was advised that this man was guilty of lewd and lascivious conduct with numbers of his young female charges, and that he had had sexual intercourse with several of them, one as young as 9 years, it is a psychological impossibility for the jury to wholly eradicate the impression made by such questions from their minds in weighing the evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant on the particular item charged. It would be as impossible for the jury to believe as it is for us to conceive that the district attorney would ask questions of this character without any information whatever upon which to predicate the question. If he had no such information and sought by a question of that type to instill in the minds of the jury the idea that there was some information in his possession which justified the question, the misconduct would have been immeasurably greater than if the facts were that he had information which justified the question. A district attorney is charged with the public duty of seeing that the defendant has a fair trial. The jury is aware of this fact and must have assumed that he had information which justified the question. The question of the district attorney asked of the defendant amounted to a charge against the defendant that he had been guilty of the offense of rape committed upon two small girls in his custody. The human mind is not so constructed that a thing of that kind can be either forgotten or overlooked by a jury.

[3] We are not called upon to consider the good intentions of the district attorney in asking the question. The good faith of the district attorney in asking questions upon debatable ground is always an element to be considered. But the good faith of the district attorney in a case of this kind in asking questions that are clearly improper does not take away from the question the prejudicial effect resulting to the defendant. The real question is: Has the defendant had a fair trial? It is clear under the circumstances of this case, where the evidence and the conflicting considerations are so evenly balanced, that, if the jury attached the slightest weight to the innuendoes of the district attorney, this weight might be sufficient to turn the scales.

Ordinarily the prompt sustaining of objections to improper questions, coupled with instructions to the jury to disregard the question, will cure an error of this kind. But where the offense has been repeated in various forms and where the evidence is so evenly balanced and the district attorney after being warned by the court continues in his course, we must hold that the misconduct was so prejudicial as to entitle the defendant to a new trial.

The court refused the following instruction requested by the defendant:

> "And in the prosecution of a crime of lewd and lascivious conduct conviction may be had upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness alone if it be sufficient to be accepted by the jury as true. But such a charge is one of which it is particularly difficult for a defendant to clear himself. No charge can more easily be made and none is more difficult to disprove. From the nature of the case, the complaining witness and the defendant are usually the only witnesses to the act complained of. For this reason it is the duty of the jury in such a case to carefully scan the testimony of the prosecuting witness and to view the same with caution."

[4] It has been said that in cases of this character the court may properly instruct the jury that they should carefully scan the testimony of the prosecuting witness before reaching a conclusion that the defendant is guilty. People v. Rangod, 112 Cal. 669, 44 Pac. 1071; People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 223, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Fraysier, 36 Cal. App. 581, 172 Pac. 1126; People v. Curry, 16 Cal. App. 737, 117 Pac. 941; People v. Liggett, 18 Cal. App. 372, 123 Pac. 225.

The statements that it is particularly difficult for a defendant to clear himself of such a charge, that no charge is more easily made or more difficult to disprove, and that the two parties are usually the only witnesses to the act are statements of fact, not of law. They may be proper in an opinion of this court in the course of discussion, but they are not proper in an instruction to the jury, though they may be entirely harmless. Some of these remarks have been included in instructions given and which have not been condemned as error in the above-cited cases. But the court is not bound to give an instruction containing them, and error cannot be predicated upon the refusal to do so.

Judgment reversed.

4. Wills 🔑81—Rule as to validity of provisions of will containing invalid provisions stated.

Where a will contains both valid and invalid provisions, the valid provisions will be given effect unless the provisions are parts of a single plan or scheme, or are so dependent on one another that by avoiding the invalid provisions and allowing the valid to stand there will result a disposition of the estate so different from what the testator contemplated, or so unreasonable that it must be presumed that the testator would not have made the valid provisions if he had been aware of the invalidity of the others.

5. Wills 🔑81—Trust held invalid in toto, by reason of suspension of power of alienation.

Where will gave residue of estate to trustees, directed them to pay income to his children, and provided for termination of the trust and distribution of estate to his grandchildren on the youngest becoming 21 years of age, the invalidity of the provision providing for trust to continue until youngest grandchild became 21 years old because of the suspension of the power of alienation invalidated other provisions of the will providing for payment of income to testator's children for life; the trust being invalid in toto.

On Rehearing.

6. Wills 🔑687(6) — Decree of distribution made after termination of trust should not direct distribution upon the trust.

Where testamentary trust directing payment of income from designated portion of testator's estate to testator's sister for life terminated by sister's death before making of decree of distribution, the decree should not direct distribution upon the trust but should direct distribution of corpus to remainderman and of income accruing between testator's death and sister's death, to which sister was entitled, to sister's heirs or successors.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henry L. Van Wyck, deceased. From that portion of the decree of distribution distributing one-third of the estate to certain children as pretermitted heirs, the Union Trust Company of San Francisco as executor and trustee appeals, and from that portion distributing the residue of the remaining two-thirds upon the trust created by the will Lawrence H. Van Wyck and Edna Boyd Callaghan appeal. Affirmed as to that portion distributing one-third of the estate to pretermitted heirs, and reversed with directions as to that portion distributing the residue upon the trust.

Edwin H. Williams and R. M. F. Soto, both of San Francisco, for appellants Van Wyck and Callaghan.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Edward Hohfeld, all of San Francisco, for respondents Van Wyck and others.

J. W. Dorsey, W. E. Cashman, and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, all of San Francisco, for appellant Union Trust Co. of San Francisco.

OLNEY, J. Henry L. Van Wyck died testate December 3, 1917, leaving as his heirs at law a son and a daughter and two minor children of a deceased daughter by the name of Potter. His will was duly probated and his estate administered upon, and the executor, a trust company, petitioned in due course for distribution in accordance with the terms of the will. The two Potter children contested distribution in this manner, claiming that the will omitted to make provision for them and that it did not appear that such omission was intentional, so that under our statute they were pretermitted heirs and entitled as such to take one-third of the estate by way of inheritance. The son and daughter also each contested distribution in accordance with the terms of the will, claiming that the trust created by the will as to the residuum and bulk of the estate was void as suspending the power of alienation for a period not permitted by our statute. Upon these contests the probate court held that the Potter children were pretermitted heirs and entitled to one-third of the estate as such, but that the trust created by the will was valid, and made its decree of distribution accordingly. From the portion of the decree distributing one-third of the estate to the Potter children as pretermitted heirs, the trust company, which was both executor and trustee, appeals. From the portion distributing the residuum of the remaining two-thirds upon the trust created by the will the son and daughter each appeal.

The two questions presented are, then: First, are the Potter children pretermitted heirs under our statute? and, second, does the trust created by the will suspend the power of alienation for a period not permitted by our statute? In case the second question is decided in the affirmative, a third question presents itself, namely, is the trust wholly void or void only in part, and, if void only in part, what part is valid and what part void?

The statute as to pretermitted heirs is section 1307 of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, has the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section. * * *"

The statute as to the suspension of the power of alienation is section 715, as amended by St. 1917, p. 699, and sections 716 and 771 of the same Code, which reads:

> "Sec. 715. Except in the single case mentioned in section seven hundred seventy-two, the absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than as follows:
> "(1) During the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition; or
> "(2) For a period not to exceed twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension.
> "Sec. 716. Every future interest is void in its creation which, by any possibility, may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this chapter. Such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed."
> "Sec. 771. The suspension of all power to alienate the subject of a trust, other than a power to exchange it for other property to be held upon the same trust, or to sell it and reinvest the proceeds to be held upon the same trust, is a suspension of the power of alienation, within the meaning of section seven hundred and fifteen."

It should be noted that the present case does not come under section 772, and so does not come within the exception provided in section 715, and also that the second subdivision of section 715 (added by amendment in 1917) has no application. The question, then, as to the suspension of the power of alienation, turns on whether or not the trust created by the will suspended that power for a possible period other than that of lives in being at the death of the testator.

The will to which these sections are to be applied, after making certain minor and immaterial provisions, reads:

> "Item V. I give, devise and bequeath all of the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, wheresoever situated, whereof I may die seized or possessed, or to which I may be in any manner entitled, or in which I may be interested at the time of my death to the extent of such interest, to my executor and trustee hereinafter named.
> "In trust, nevertheless, as follows:
> "Item VI. To pay the whole of the net income of my distributive share of the estate of my grandfather, the same being a one-fortieth undivided interest or thereabouts, to my said sister Eveline, if she survives me and so long as she shall live thereafter.
> "Item VII. To pay the net income of every sort derived from my estate (excluding, while my said sister Eveline lives, if she shall survive me, that portion thereof above provided for her use,) in equal shares to my son Lawrence H. Van Wyck and my daughter Edna Boyd Callaghan if both shall survive me, or the whole thereof to the survivor if either shall predecease me; and to pay the whole thereof to the survivor when either shall die after my death.
> "Item VIII. It is my intention that when both of my said children shall have died their or its descendants shall take the corpus of my estate, and that the lawful issue of any child or children of any deceased grandchild shall stand in the stead and take the place of its parent; accordingly, I will and direct said trustee, after the death of both of my said children, to pay the whole of the net income above provided for them and the survivor of them, to my grandchildren and to the lawful issue of any deceased grandchild by right of representation, share and share alike, until the youngest grandchild shall become twenty-one years of age, and then to divide among and deliver absolutely to my grandchildren then surviving and the lawful issue of any deceased grandchild by right of representation, in equal shares, all of my estate then remaining in the hands of my trustee.
> "Item IX. I hereby nominate and appoint Union Trust Company of San Francisco, the executor and trustee of this my last will and testament, and request that it shall be allowed to serve in each of said capacities, whether in the state of California or elsewhere, without giving any bond or security whatever.
> "Item X. I authorize said executor and trustee, with the consent of both of my children, during the life of both, or with the consent of the survivor of them, and after the death of both, with the consent of a majority of my grandchildren, to sell any of my bonds, stocks, or other securities or properties of my estate, and with the proceeds arising therefrom to purchase such other securities or properties as may seem most for the benefit of the beneficiaries herein provided for.
> "Item XI. I revoke all former wills and codicils by me ever made."

The two primary questions turn very largely, if not entirely, on the construction to be given to item VIII. There is nothing in the will indicating an intention to omit the Potter children, and, unless they are beneficiaries as "grandchildren" under item VIII, they are entirely omitted and entitled to inherit as pretermitted heirs. The claim of the Potter children is that by "grandchildren," as the word is used throughout the item, is meant only descendants of the son and daughter. Likewise as to the suspension of the power of alienation, the claim of the son and daughter is that under item VIII the trust is to continue after their deaths until the youngest grandchild reaches the age of 21, and that the youngest grandchild may be one born after the testator's death, in which case the trust would continue for a period not dependent on the life of a person in being at the time of the testator's death.

It is to be noted that item VIII divides itself into two parts. There is first a declaration of the intention that when the son and daughter of the testator die, their descendants shall take the corpus of the estate. The will then goes on to say that, in accordance with the intention so expressed, the trustee shall pay the net income of the trust to the testator's grandchildren until the youngest becomes 21, when the trust estate is to be divided among the living grandchildren and the issue of any deceased grandchild. If it were not for the preliminary declaration of intention, there could, of course, be no question but that the Potter children would come within the description "grandchildren." But it is also equally clear, we think, that, in view of the declaration to the effect that it is the descendants of the son and daughter whom the testator desires to take the corpus of the estate, and in view of the fact that the provision for the disposition of the property which immediately follows is expressly stated to be in accordance with this intention, the grandchildren, among whom the property is to be finally divided, are the descendants of the son and daughter and do not include the Potter children. This, in fact, is conceded. The claim is that, while the grandchildren whom the testator designates as the final recipients of the corpus of the estate are the descendants of the son and daughter alone, the grandchildren whom he designates as the recipients of the income after the death of the son and daughter until the youngest grandchild is 21 are not so limited and include all the testator's grandchildren.

[1, 2] We cannot so read the will. There is nothing whatever to indicate any distinction between the grandchildren who are to receive the corpus of the estate and those who are to receive the income. The direction for the payment of the income and the direction for the division of the corpus are parts of a single provision contained in a single sentence, and are locked together in such intimate fashion that it must be that the word "grandchildren" means the same thing throughout the sentence. Taking the will as a whole and reading it, we think it quite apparent that its plan and scheme was to provide for the son and daughter of the testator during their lives and for their descendants after their death, and for no one else. If the testator had in mind the children of any other child, it is hardly possible that he would have used the language he did or have failed to indicate that he had other grandchildren in mind than those he mentions. Furthermore, it is hard to see why, if the testator intended to make provision for the children of his deceased daughter, his sole provision for them should be that they should receive a share of the income of his property only after the death of his living son and daughter and before the arrival of his youngest grandchild at the age of 21, on the happening of which event they were to have no further interest in the estate. In such a case, if either the son or daughter lived until the youngest grandchild became 21, the Potter children would receive nothing. There would be no reason in a gift of income to minors for a postponed, limited and contingent period of this character. Our conclusion is that by the word "grandchildren," as used throughout the will, the testator meant always the same thing, and that that thing is stated in almost so many words to be the descendants of the son and daughter, and that no other construction of the will is reasonable or can be reconciled with its language. It follows that the Potter children were omitted from the will, and are entitled to take one-third of the estate by way of inheritance, and that the portion of the decree of distribution so directing must be affirmed.

[3] The foregoing discussion has to a certain extent cleared the way for a construction of the will in connection with the question as to the suspension of the power of alienation. The provision is in effect that the trust shall continue "until the youngest grandchild shall become twenty-one years of age." If this means what it says, the testator's youngest grandchild, it would include a grandchild born after the testator's death, and the trust, if continued for the period contemplated by the testator, would continue for a period other than that of lives in being at the time of his death. We are not entirely clear as to the exact contention of the executor and trustee which would avoid this result, but it is apparently twofold.

It is, first, that by "youngest grandchild" the testator meant his youngest grandchild living at the time of his death, and did not refer to any grandchild that might be born after his death. This contention, we think, can be very easily tested. Certainly, when the testator provided that upon the death of his son and daughter it should be the duty of the trustee to pay the income to his grandchildren "until the youngest grandchild shall become twenty-one years of age and then to divide among and deliver absolutely to my grandchildren then surviving and the lawful issue of any deceased grandchild by right of representation in equal shares all of my estate then remaining in the hands of my trustee," he meant by the "youngest grandchild" the youngest of those grandchildren among whom the estate was to be divided on that grandchild reaching 21. If, then, the youngest grandchild meant only the youngest of those living at the testator's death, excluding any born thereafter, it would follow that the estate should be divided only among those, or the descendants of those, living at the testator's death, and that all grandchildren that might be born after that time should be excluded from any share in the testator's estate. The result so reached as a necessary consequence of the construction contended for by the trustee demonstrates the impossibility of that construction. We think it is hardly open to argument but that the testator did not intend to exclude from the benefit of his estate such of his grandchildren as might chance to be born after his death. No reason for any distinction between those born before his death and those born after appears, and the testator makes no such distinction. On the contrary, he uses the general expression "my grandchildren," and declares his intention that the descendants of his son and daughter should finally take the corpus of his estate without making any distinction whatever between such descendants. Reading the provision as a general one intended for the benefit of all the testator's grandchildren by his son and daughter, the provision is a natural and reasonable one. Reading it as a provision for such grandchildren only as should be born prior to the testator's death, it is an unnatural and unreasonable provision, and one contrary to the natural meaning of the language used. We think it certain, therefore, that by "youngest grandchild" the testator meant exactly what he said, his youngest grandchild, whether born before or after his death.

The second contention of the trustee is apparently that by virtue of the testator's declaration of intention that when both the testator's children should die their descendants should take the corpus of his estate, it must be held that immediately upon the son and daughter dying the beneficial interest in the corpus would vest in their descendants, the trust to continue until the youngest grandchild reaches 21 merely as a trust to pay to those same beneficiaries the income of the estate, the corpus of which has already vested in them. The claim seems to be that if this is the character which the trust will assume upon the death of the son and daughter, then, although the trust term as contemplated by the testator would endure beyond that time and for a period not permitted by the statute, yet the trust does not offend the statute for the reason that a trust merely to pay income to those already vested with the principal is a vain thing and may be terminated at any time at the desire of the beneficiaries, or, at least, may be terminated by the trustee and the beneficiaries jointly. We need not examine into the question of whether a trust of the character so assumed may or may not be terminated contrary to the expressed intention of the trustor at the instance of the beneficiaries alone or of the beneficiaries and the trustee jointly. It is manifest that, unless it is true in this case that upon the death of the testator's son and daughter those who are to take the corpus of the property are then determined and in being, the whole contention of the trustee falls. Putting it in another way, if those who are to take the corpus of the testator's estate are not then determined and in being, it is plain that all those whose interests must be acquired for a complete alienation are not then in being, and the power of alienation is necessarily still suspended. The question, then, is: Is it true that under the will those who are to take the corpus of the estate are persons determined and in being at the time of the death of the son and daughter?

The correct answer to this can, it seems to us, be easily determined by inquiring as to what would be the right of the child of a grandchild who was living when the son and daughter died but who died before the youngest grandchild reached 21. Would such great-grandchild of the testator have a right to share as an immediate beneficiary in the division of the estate when the youngest grandchild became 21, or could he share only as the heir or successor of his deceased parent? Putting it in another way, would such a person have a right to share in the division because of his character as the child of a deceased grandchild, or would he share only as the legal successor to the interest of his parent? If he shares in the latter capacity, it is evident that the parent might alienate his interest so that his child would take nothing. If he shares, however, because of his character as child of a deceased grandchild, his interest cannot be alienated except by himself. In the latter case, since it is possible that he be born after the death of the testator's son and daughter, it is evident that upon their deaths all persons necessary for a complete alienation may not be in being, and the power of alienation will still be suspended.

The terms of the will leave no doubt upon this point. They are that it shall be the duty of the trustee, after the death of the son and daughter, to divide the income as directed "until the youngest grandchild shall become twenty-one years of age, and then to divide among and deliver absolutely to my grandchildren then surviving and the lawful issue of any deceased grandchild by right of representation" the principal of the estate. The second "then" italicized in the quotation just made plainly refers back to the first "then," and that in turn plainly refers to the time when the youngest grandchild becomes 21, and not to the time when the son and daughter of the testator die. In other words, the persons among whom the estate is to be divided upon the youngest grandchild becoming 21 are the grandchildren surviving at that time and the lawful issue of any grandchild who did not survive until that time. This means, of necessity, that the child of such a deceased grandchild is entitled to share in his character of lawful issue of a deceased grandchild of the testator and as an immediate beneficiary designated by the will, and not merely as the heir or other successor of his parent. It follows that if, after the death of the testator's son and daughter but before the youngest grandchild had reached 21, all of the beneficiaries under the will should unite in an alienation, the alienation would not be complete, since there would still be outstanding the possible interest of any child born thereafter to a grandchild then living and joining in the alienation but who should die before the arrival of the time provided by the will for division. Under the will, then, it is possible that, upon the death of the testator's son and daughter, the trust must continue with the power of alienation suspended until the youngest grandchild reaches 21, since it may not be possible to determine sooner who is entitled to receive the corpus of the estate; that such, in fact, will be the situation if more than one grandchild survives the son and daughter. The possible period, therefore, during which the power of alienation may be suspended extends to the time when the youngest grandchild reaches 21, and since such grandchild may be one born after the death of the testator, such period is other than one for the lives of persons in being at the time of the creation of the trust, and the trust comes within the prohibition of the statute.

The vital point in the foregoing line of reasoning is, of course, the construction which we have put upon the will to the effect that upon the youngest grandchild reaching the age of 21, it is the grandchildren then surviving and the issue of any deceased grandchild among whom the property is to be divided. This construction, it seems to us, is plainly necessitated by the testator's use of the word "then" previously referred to. Counsel for the trustee recognize the decisive character of this word and contend that it refers, not to the time of the youngest grandchild reaching the age of 21, but to the time of the death of the testator's son and daughter. Their argument is that the opening words of item VIII, "It is my intention that when both of said children shall have died their or its descendants shall take the corpus of my estate, and that the lawful issue of any child or children of any deceased grandchild shall stand in the stead and take the place of its parent," are more than a declaration of intention as we have termed them, and are words of gift, effective to vest the corpus of the estate in the persons designated immediately upon the death of the testator's children, and that the word "then" must be taken to refer to this time, since otherwise there would be a gift of the principal to certain persons in existence at a certain time and a provision for division of the principal at a later time among persons who might not be the same. This argument wholly overlooks the connection in which the word is used. The provision containing it is, to repeat, that it is the duty of the trustee, after the death of the testator's children, to divide the income "until the youngest grandchild shall become twenty-one years of age and then to divide among and deliver absolutely to my grandchildren then surviving and the lawful issue of any deceased grandchild, etc.," the corpus of the trust estate. It does not seem to us possible to read this language in any other way than that the word "then" in both instances refers to the time when the youngest grandchild becomes twenty-one. To justify any other construction, the intent of the testator to the contrary would have to appear so clearly and unmistakably as to warrant the conclusion that the use of the word "then" as it occurs in the will was through inadvertence or mistake and should be disregarded. The only thing relied upon to warrant such a conclusion is the declaration that it is the testator's intention that when both his children die their descendants shall take the corpus of his estate. But we cannot agree with the contention that this declaration was intended as effective words of gift. While, if it had stood alone, there would be no doubt but that it was so intended, it does not stand alone. As the will reads, the testator first declares his intention, and then goes on to direct particularly what shall be done "accordingly," that is, to accomplish the intention expressed. There is, it seems to us, but one rational construction, and that is that the testator first declares his general intention, not intending such declaration as in itself an operative provision, and then goes on to say just what he wishes done in that behalf. It is the latter portion that is the operative portion of this item of the will, and if there is any inconsistency between the general declaration of intention and the particular provisions as to what shall be done, it is the latter that must govern. There is, however, no inconsistency in fact. The descendants of the testator's son and daughter do take the corpus after their death under the subsequent particular provisions. The only difference is that the general statement of intention omits to mention the somewhat minor fact that they are not to take at once but only upon the youngest grandchild reaching 21, and that in the meantime they are to receive only the income of the property.

The trustee also contends that the case is at most one of alternative limitations, one of which is bad but the other valid, and that the rule in such cases is that the invalidity of one alternative will not affect the other. It is said that the case is one of alternative limitations because whether the period of suspension of the power of alienation provided by the will will or will not in fact be for other than the lives of persons in being depends on whether the youngest grandchild proves to be one born after or one born before the testator's death. But such a case is not one of alternative limitations. There is but one limitation, namely, that the trust shall remain intact with a consequent suspension of the power of alienation until the youngest grandchild reaches 21. This event may or may not happen within the lives of persons in being at the testator's death, and therefore the period fixed is a period not measured by the lives of such persons and is not permitted by the statute.

[4] The conclusion so reached necessitates a consideration of how far the invalidity of the trust goes. Manifestly, the trust is void as to the period after the death of the son and daughter. Is it void for the period of their lives as well? The question is one of separability. The provision that the trust shall continue through the lives of the son and daughter, with them as beneficiaries of the income, and the provision that upon the death of the survivor of them it shall continue until the youngest grandchild reaches 21 and then be divided among the surviving grandchildren and the issue of any deceased grandchild, are stated in separate items of the will. This, however, is by no means determinative. The real question presented where a will contains both valid and invalid provisions is whether the two are so parts of a single plan or scheme or otherwise so dependent one upon the other that by avoiding the invalid provisions and allowing the valid to stand there will result a disposition of the estate so different from what the testator contemplated or so unreasonable that it must be presumed that the testator would not have made the valid provisions if he had been aware of the invalidity of the others. The rule in fact is frequently stated more strongly against allowing the valid provisions to stand than we have just stated it. Thus, in Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 540, 60 Pac. 459, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70, it is said:

> "The question whether the valid clauses can stand depends upon whether or not the invalid ones are so interwoven with them that they cannot be eliminated without interfering with and changing the main scheme of the testator. In Darling v. Rogers, 22 Wend. [N. Y.] 495, Senator Verplanck correctly stated the rule as follows: 'When a will is good in part and bad in part, the part otherwise valid is void if it works such a distribution of the estate as, from the whole testament taken together, was evidently never the design of the testator. Otherwise when a good part is so far independent that it would have stood had the testator been aware of the invalidity of the rest.'"

[5] Applying this test to the present will leaves little doubt as to the correct conclusion. If the trust in this case is invalidated only for the period subsequent to the death of the son and daughter, the period as to which it offends the statute, it means that the trust must terminate on the death of the survivor of the son and daughter, as the beneficial life tenants, with remainder over free of the trust, and that as to this remainder the testator has died intestate, so that it vested immediately upon his death in his heirs. But his son and daughter are his heirs as to the portion of the estate given in trust, so that we would have the very anomalous situation of the same people owning both the beneficial life estate in the property and also the remainder over in fee after the termination of the life estate, but with the life estate and the remainder in fee kept from merging by the interposition of a trust. The trust under such circumstances would accomplish nothing and would be practically futile. The son and daughter could alienate as they pleased both their beneficial life estate and the remainder in fee, so that the trustee might come to manage the property and preserve it intact for the benefit solely of strangers to the testator. If the son and daughter did not alienate the property during their lives, they could dispose of the future remainder vested in them by will so that it would not go to their descendants as the testator intended, or, if it did, would be divided very differently than as he directed. Moreover, if they died intestate, and the remainder went to their heirs, it would not necessarily go to their descendants exclusively, as the testator desired, for their descendants might not be their only heirs. They would not be, if either son or daughter left a spouse surviving, and it is worthy of note that the son is married and his wife is living. There can be no presumption that if the testator had known of the invalidity of the portion of the trust which offends the statute, he would yet have wished the trust to stand for the lives of his son and daughter, futile and unreasonable as long as it should stand, and upon its termination resulting in the property very possibly going to others than those to whom he desired it should go. The presumption is quite the contrary. In other words, it appears that the valid and invalid portions of the trust which the testator attempted to create are so intimately connected and so dependent one upon the other that the invalid portions cannot be taken away without the whole scheme and plan of the testator falling. The trust must therefore be declared invalid in toto.

This conclusion is supported by the authority of Estate of Whitney, 176 Cal. 12, 167

Pac. 399, where a trust identical in all material respects with that under consideration was involved and was held both to offend the statute as to the suspension of the power of alienation and to be void in toto, for reasons which we have in effect but repeated here.

What we have said as to the trust being void in toto has, of course, reference only to the trust for the son and daughter and their descendants. It has no reference to the trust created by item VI as to a part of the property for the benefit of a sister of the testator. The provision for her benefit is not a part of the testator's general scheme for the disposition of his estate, and is very evidently a provision the making of which would not have been affected had the testator known of the illegality of the provision he was making for his children and their descendants.

The portion of the decree distributing one-third of the estate to the Potter children as pretermitted heirs is affirmed. The portion of the decree distributing a part of the estate to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco in trust is reversed with direction that in lieu thereof distribution of that part be decreed as follows: The portion specified in item VI of the will to said trust company for the life of the sister of the testator named in said item and upon the trust therein declared, with remainder over to the son and daughter of the testator; and the balance to the son and daughter absolutely.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [6] Since the rendition of the foregoing opinion it has been brought to our attention that, while the decree appealed from directs distribution to the Union Trust Company upon the trust provided by item VI of the will, the section providing for the sister of the testator, which trust we hold to be valid, as well as upon the trusts provided in the other sections of the will, which we hold to be invalid, the testator's sister had died subsequent to his death, but before the making of the decree, and that that fact is found by the decree of distribution itself. The result was, of course, that the trust provided for in item VI had terminated before the making of the decree, and the decree should not have directed distribution upon that trust, but should merely have distributed to the heirs or successors of the sister the income to which she was entitled under item VI between the death of the testator and her own. Misled by the decree, the incorrect character of which in this respect was not called to our attention, we directed distribution to the trustee named upon the same trust. This error in the decree, also, should be corrected. It is therefore ordered that our judgment be modified to read as follows:

> "The portion of the decree distributing one-third of the estate to the Potter children as pretermitted heirs is affirmed. The portion of the decree distributing a part of the estate to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco is reversed, with direction that in lieu thereof distribution be made to the heirs or successors of the testator's sister, Eveline, of the income of the portion of the estate as to which a trust is declared in her favor by item VI of the will for the period between the testator's death and her's, and that the remainder of the two-thirds of the estate not distributed to the Potter children be distributed to the son and daughter of the testator equally."

All concur.

In action for libel against a newspaper, previous publications, even of a nature dissimilar to the one sued for, are admissible to establish malice.

2. Appeal and error ⚷970(2)—Libel and slander ⚷104(3)—Court has discretion as to limits of remoteness of evidence of provocation.

In libel action by newspaper publisher against a rival newspaper and its publishers, where the trial court sustained defendants' contention that publications of plaintiff were admissible as explaining or in connection with defendants' articles offered to show malice, the trial court had a certain discretion in determining whether articles published by plaintiff were too remote in time or effect to be admissible, which would not be interfered with on appeal unless abused.

3. Libel and slander ⚷107(1)—Plaintiff's testimony admissible as to his belief in effect of publication upon his wife.

In libel action, testimony was admissible as to plaintiff's belief respecting the influence that the libel complained of had upon his wife's feelings and as to his own sympathetic sufferings in consequence.

4. Libel and slander ⚷71, 124(7)—Instruction as to repelling libelous charge by denial or explanation held properly refused; counter libels not allowable.

In libel action, instruction as to defendants' justification in repelling a libelous charge by denial or explanation, which would be "privileged though false," held properly refused, being of doubtful correctness as a statement of the law, in view of Civ. Code, § 47, expressly defining what articles are and what are not privileged, and being, in any event, inapplicable to the case, as the article complained of was neither a denial nor explanation nor a fair answer to plaintiff's alleged charge, and was, at most, a mere counterlibel; for one libel cannot be repelled by another of similar import.

5. Libel and slander 🔑124(1)—Instructions as to offsetting damages from libel held correct.

In libel action by a newspaper publisher against a rival newspaper and its publishers, an instruction in effect advising the jury that they could not subtract from the damages they found plaintiff entitled to any offset due to damages to defendants from publication of articles in plaintiff's paper held correct.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1033(6), 1067—Refusing instruction as to nominal damages held harmless.

In libel action, where plaintiff recovered a verdict of $25,000 compensatory damages, and where the jury were instructed that they could award only compensatory damages, refusal to instruct that a verdict for nominal damages might be rendered if the jury found that the article was published without malice and plaintiff was not appreciably injured thereby was harmless, both because the requested instruction would have been to plaintiff's advantage as authorizing nominal damages rather than no damages, in case they found no substantial injury, and because the verdict actually rendered indicated that the requested instruction was inapplicable.

7. Libel and slander 🔑124(7)—Instruction correct that provocative article may be considered only in mitigation of punitive damages.

In libel action by newspaper publisher against a rival newspaper and its publishers, an instruction that an alleged provocative article published by plaintiff should be considered only in mitigation of punitive damages based upon malice was correct.

8. New trial 🔑42(2)—Properly denied for false testimony of juror on the voir dire.

In libel action against a newspaper, new trial was properly denied upon ground of misconduct of juror in stating on voir dire that he could try the case impartially and failing to volunteer the information at that time that he had, six weeks before the trial, stopped his subscription to the paper because incensed at its editorial policy upon another matter; for disagreement with the paper's policy in that respect would not necessarily affect the juror's views as to the merits of the libel suit.

9. Trial 🔑321½—Verdict for compensatory damages alone supported by required number of jurors.

In libel action, where $30,000 verdict was returned, composed of a verdict for $25,000 compensatory damages and $5,000 punitive damages, and on polling the jury, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 618, it developed that nine jurors were in favor of the $25,000 compensatory damages and ten jurors in favor of the $5,000 punitive damages, but three who voted for the $5,000 punitive damages did not concur in the $25,000 compensatory damages verdict, and two who did not concur in the $5,000 punitive damages were in favor of the $25,000 compensatory damages, the verdict would be set aside, as failing to be concurred in by the requisite number of jurors, only as to the $5,000 punitive damages; nine having agreed that plaintiff had been damaged to the extent of $25,000, and only seven concurring in the conclusion that in addition to the compensatory damages defendant should be compelled to pay $5,000 additional.

10. Libel and slander 🔑121(1)—$25,000 compensatory damages held not excessive.

A verdict for $25,000 compensatory damages in libel action against a newspaper for article charging plaintiff, a newspaper publisher, with being a defender of degenerates for hire, held not excessive.

11. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑29(3)—Demurrer held properly sustained to cross-complaint in libel action.

In action for libel by a newspaper publisher against a rival newspaper and its publishers, demurrer held properly sustained to defendants' cross-complaint for alleged libel by plaintiff; it not being a proper counterclaim under Code Civ. Proc. § 438.

12. Libel and slander 🔑9(8)—Article held libelous per se.

A newspaper article charging plaintiff, the proprietor of another newspaper, with being a defender of degenerates for hire, held libelous per se, under Civ. Code, § 45.

13. Libel and slander 🔑48(1)—Attacks on newspaper proprietor not justified on ground of his public character.

That a man is the publisher of a newspaper does not justify libelous attacks on him on the theory that he is a public character.

Olney, Shaw, and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by E. T. Earl against the Times-Mirror Company and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Plaintiff dying pending appeal, Emily Jarvis Earl and others, his executors, were substituted as plaintiffs. Modified and affirmed.

H. C. Beach, Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Geo. P. Adams, Daniel M. Hunsaker, Hunsaker & Britt, and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles (Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove and Robert B. Murphy, all of Los Angeles, Samuel Poorman, Jr., and Leon R. Yanckwich, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Meserve & Meserve, Joseph Scott, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action for libel in which E. T. Earl recovered judgment for the sum of $30,000. The defendants appeal. The article complained of was published in the Los Angeles Times of December 3, 1914. E. T. Earl was the publisher and owner of two daily newspapers, the Los Angeles Express, an evening newspaper, and the Los Angeles Tribune, a morning newspaper, while the defendant corporation published the Los Angeles Times, a daily morning newspaper, and the other defendants were also engaged in the publication of that newspaper.

The article complained of by the plaintiff is as follows:

> "Defense of Degenerates.
> "The theory of the editor of the Morning Sodomite and the Evening Degenerate seems to be that those who violate the laws of God and man should be protected from punishment and sheltered from publicity, while those newspapers whose proprietors publish the news, and by so doing aid decent people to avoid ignorantly contaminating their households with well-dressed cultivated Pharisaical moral lepers, are to be denounced as 'brutal journalists.'
> "The Toopious system is to coddle criminals, to conceal their crimes, and to denounce those who expose crime as 'brutal journalists.' The system of the Times is to publish the news, and if the news includes an account of the misdoings of a lot of pretentious Pharisees, who are as lecherous as goats and as conscienceless as jackasses in April, the acts of the evildoers will be exposed, notwithstanding the purchased defense of the editor of the Morning Sodomite and Evening Degenerate."

Pending the appeal the respondent, E. T. Earl, has died and the executors and the executrix of his estate have been substituted as plaintiffs. We will, however, refer to E. T. Earl as the plaintiff. In its concluding brief respondent's counsel states:

> "* * * In view of the importance of this case to our client's memory, and in view of the fact that a reversal upon technical grounds would mean a complete termination of this action without any opportunity whatever for a retrial and the vindication of Mr. Earl against the vicious attacks of the defendant newspaper, we have felt impelled to exercise the utmost care" in presenting this case.

Therefore, before considering the various points advanced for a reversal of this case, it may be well to state at the outset that the defendants do not count upon the truth of the article published, and throughout their briefs concede that the inferences against the character of Mr. Earl contained in the article were not true, but claim that the article was merely a journalistic fling in retaliation for similar attacks made upon the defendant H. G. Otis and the Los Angeles Times. In short, the defense is that this publication is but one item in an extended and acrimonious newspaper controversy; that it was provoked by articles published by the plaintiff in his newspapers concerning defendants, and should only be considered in the light of this controversy and as a part of it and not as a separate and independent charge against plaintiff. This being true, there was not and is not now any issue as to the moral character of Mr. Earl, and our decision one way or the other cannot affect that question.

[1] The first question very elaborately presented in the briefs, as defendants' counsel concede in their final briefs, is determined in the case of Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 184 Pac. 672, wherein it was held that previous publications, even of a dissimilar nature, might be properly received in evidence for the purpose of establishing malice.

Provocation.

Thirty editorials and cartoons from the Los Angeles Tribune and the Evening Express were received in evidence on behalf of the defendants for the purpose of showing provocation, while twenty others, offered for the same purpose, were rejected, and the ruling of the court excluding them is assigned as error. In view of the fact that the trial court fully sustained the contention of the appellants, namely, "that any publication of the plaintiff which related to, induced, tended to explain, or was in any way connected with the articles, or any of the articles, of defendant offered to prove malice was admissible," and admitted a large number of articles upon that theory, it is, as respondent contends, "incumbent upon the plaintiff, seeking to show error in the rejection of these various publications, to point out in each instance its relevancy and importance in the case." The appellant does not discuss in detail the particular objections interposed to each offer of the rejected evidence or the theory upon which they were sustained by the trial court. The rejected articles are classified by the appellant under four heads:

> First: "Articles wherein the journalistic activities and business of defendant Otis are excoriated." Second: "Articles charging defendant Otis and the owners of the Times with hypocrisy." Third: "Articles charging defendant Otis and the Times with dishonesty of assorted varieties, chiefly of a political character." Fourth: "Articles, according to defendants, the customary journalistic amenities."

[2] Nine articles are classified under the first head, five of which were published in 1911, three in 1913, and one in 1914. It appears from the transcript that the objection to some of these articles was sustained on the ground that they were too remote. Under the second head three articles are classified, one dated October 30, 1914, another dated July 21, 1911, and one dated January 30, 1913. Under the third head four articles are listed, three of them dated in 1911, one in 1913, and under the fourth, one article, dated April 11, 1914. As the trial court fully recognized the principle involved in the introduction of these articles, and the objection is on the ground of remoteness, or of its probable effect on or connection with the article published, and as a large number of articles were received in evidence which cover the same general ground, the trial court must have some discretion in determining whether or not articles are too remote in time or in effect to be admissible. This discretion, if reasonably exercised, ought not to be interfered with on appeal unless it can plainly be seen that it has been abused. It is evident from the record that the defense of provocatory articles was fully presented to the jury. In view of the fact that the appellant has not more specifically pointed out the alleged error of the trial court in rejecting this evidence, we think it unnecessary to discuss the matter further.

Evidence of Plaintiff's Feelings and Belief.

[3] It is next contended by the appellants that—

> "The court erred in admitting the testimony of plaintiff's belief respecting the influence that the libel complained of had upon the feelings of his wife, and also his testimony respecting his own sympathetic sufferings in consequence."

One of the elements entering into damages for a libel is the injury to the feelings of the person libeled. That injury may be inferred by the jury from the testimony with relation to the social status of the person libeled. There seems to be no good reason, however, why this inference should not be supplemented by the direct statement of the plaintiff to the effect that his feelings were injured and that he did believe that the community were influenced by the publication and that the members of his family were affected thereby. Such testimony is not received to establish the actual effect upon the community or upon the members of his family, but to prove the effect upon himself. The general purport of the defense in this case is that the libel occurred in a prolonged newspaper controversy which nobody took very seriously, not even the newspapers themselves. If the plaintiff also took this view of the matter, it is clear that his feelings were not greatly injured; whereas, on the other hand, if he believed, as he testified he did, that it had affected his standing in the community and the happiness of members of his family, it was clearly proper for him to so testify, as tending to prove the injury to his feelings. Appellants state that the record would seem to indicate that the evidence must have been proffered and admitted upon the untenable theory that plaintiff's belief—irrespective of its being a correct belief—constituted an element of damages for which plaintiff was entitled to recover, namely, injury done to him through his sympathetic participation in what he took to be his wife's resulting humiliation and sadness.

Appellants call attention to Dennison v. Daily News Publishing Co., 82 Neb. 675, 118 N. W. 568, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362, in which it was held that the plaintiff should not have been allowed to testify to his wife's agitation on reading the newspaper publication, and that her crying worried him all the time so that he could not eat or sleep as he had been accustomed to. The plaintiff here did not testify to the effect of the article upon his wife, or of her grief, if any, upon him, but merely as to his own belief as to its effect upon her; that is to say, as to its effect upon his own mind. The case of Couch v. Mining Journal Co., 130 Mich. 294, 89 N. W. 936, is cited to the same effect. In that case the plaintiff sought to prove the effect upon the members of his family, which was held to be improper, while in this case the court was careful to instruct the jury that they were not to consider the plaintiff's testimony as evidence of the fact that the wife was affected by the article. The case of Sheftall v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 123 Ga. 589, 51 S. E. 646, is also cited to the same effect. The distinction between these cases and the one at bar may be made manifest by an illustration. Suppose that a man feared that his wife might commit suicide when she read the article in question? This belief, however erroneous it might be, is one which would cause him mental suffering. The wife might commit suicide, and neither that fact nor the effect of the suicide upon the husband could be offered in evidence to establish the measure of his damages. On the other hand, the wife might take a very cheerful view of the situation and comfort her husband instead of committing suicide. In either view the plaintiff is entitled to recover for such mental worry as is proximately caused by the article, although not by the mental worry caused by the suicide, for such worry would not be a proximate result of the article. A similar conclusion was reached by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of S. S. McClure Co. v. Philipp, 170 Fed. 910, 96 C. C. A. 86, where the plaintiff was permitted to testify, over objection, that when he read the libel he was much distressed because of the effect it would have upon his family, friends, business acquaintances, and his social and financial standing. It was there said:

> "It is quite true that in, perhaps, the majority of cases the question is presented to the jury as a deduction from established facts. In the case at bar, with all the facts relating to the plaintiff's domestic, social, and business relations established, arguments as to the effect of the false charges upon his mind might, it would seem, have been presented as effectively without the testimony complained of as with it. Before coming to the question of damages the jury necessarily had to reach the conclusion that the defendant had falsely accused the plaintiff of being a criminal and the conclusion that he had suffered great mental anguish from such a charge would naturally follow. But what may be considered by the jury may be proved, and where the question relates to the mental suffering of the plaintiff no witness can speak ex cathedra but the plaintiff himself."

To the same effect is the case of Chesley v. Thompson, 137 Mass. 136.

While the question of such mental suffering might ordinarily be most properly left to be inferred by the jury, it is evident that under the peculiar circumstances of this case the plaintiff felt compelled to offer direct testimony on that subject. There was no error in the reception of this evidence.

Instructions as to a Libelous Retort to a Libel.

[4] The defendants complain of the refusal of the trial court to give the following instruction:

> "The law justifies one in repelling a libelous charge by denial or an explanation, * * * and if he does so in good faith, and what he publishes is fairly an answer and is published for the purpose of repelling the charge, and the same is not published with malice, it is privileged, though false."

Even if this instruction were a correct statement of the law, which may well be doubted, in this state, where the statute itself expressly defines what articles are privileged and what are not (Civ. Code, § 47), it is sufficient to say that the principle of law has no application to the case at bar. The article complained of does not in any sense comply with the specifications in the instruction as to what constitutes a privileged communication. It is neither a denial nor an explanation, nor a fair answer to the charge, and for that reason, under the instruction, as submitted, it could not be "privileged, though false." It would be germane to the discussion of this point to state at this time the nature of the so-called "newspaper controversy" but we will postpone that statement to a later portion of this opinion, but such statement will emphasize what we have just said. It is sufficient at this time to say that the appellants' claim of the relevancy of the instruction to the facts in the case at bar is thus summarized by them:

> "In brief, plaintiff accused defendant of being a character assassin, either for hire or for the money that was to be made out of printing sensational items of news looking to the ruining of private reputations, and defendant replied in kind that plaintiff's silence with regard to crime —and particularly with regard to crimes of the character of those committed by the Long Beach perverts—constituted a defense of the guilty to which plaintiff was moved for what there was in it, and also that his attacks upon defendants for their journalistic policy was pharisaical."

Accepting this statement for the moment as a fair characterization of both articles, it appears therefrom that defendants merely replied to one libel by another one of a somewhat similar type. This course is not approved by the law.

Appellants' contention, when applied to the facts of this case, amounts to the proposition that one libel can be repelled by one of similar import. The instruction was properly refused.

Instruction as to Relevancy of Injury to Defendants.

[5] The appellants complain of the giving of the following instruction during the progress of the argument of defendant's counsel:

> "The question of any injury that may have been done Mr. Otis or Mr. Chandler or Mr. Andrews is wholly irrelevant to any of the issues in this case, and not to be considered by the jury."

This instruction resulted from a prolonged colloquy between court and counsel during the argument. The defendants' counsel was arguing to the jury that the plaintiff had not shown a dollar's worth of injury. Plaintiff's counsel protested to the court against the propriety of the defendants' argument on the ground that as there was no special damages pleaded in the complaint they were not entitled to prove damages in terms of dollars, but that they were limited to presenting the facts and circumstances of the plaintiff to the jury, who were therefrom to appraise the injury to the plaintiff. During the course of this colloquy respondent's counsel stated:

> "The Court: What is the instruction asked?
> "Mr. Meserve: I want your honor to instruct the jury that Mr. Earl could not make proof to this court of any damages in this case except by the showing of his standing in the community, his position, the character of his business, and his family. He could make no proof of special damages or special money loss.
> "The Court: Gentlemen of the jury, you are instructed that Mr. Meserve's statement of the law is adopted as correct by the court in its application to this case, wherein there is no claim in the plaintiff's complaint for any special damages."

Thereupon Mr. Beach, arguing the case for the defendants, said:

> "Well, gentlemen, since his honor's instruction and Mr. Meserve's objection, we are confined to the question of Mr. Earl's feelings. Was Mr. Earl hurt one bit more by that publication than Harry Andrews or Harry Chandler or General Otis, sitting over there, when they came out with that publication calling him a pervert?"

To this respondent's counsel objected, stating, among other things:

> "* * * They cannot offset one libel against another, or one damage against another, and the jury are not to consider that question at all."

Thereupon the court gave the above instruction. We think it must have been clear to the jury, from the foregoing colloquy and from other portions which we will not quote, that the purpose of the instruction was to advise them that they could not subtract from the damages they found plaintiff was entitled to any offset due to damages to the defendants. So understood, the instruction was correct.

It was evidently not intended, either by the court or by respondent's counsel, by this instruction, asked and given during the argument, to completely reverse the rulings which had been uniformly made by the court during the trial that such articles as were offered on behalf of the defendants to show provocation were relevant. The court consistently ruled that the provocation was relevant matter, and in the instructions to the jury, given after the argument, the relevancy of the evidence of provocation was fully explained to the jury. We do not think the jury could have been misled by the instruction under consideration, even if it were not literally true that the feelings of the defendants were irrelevant.

Their feelings were relevant, and the court so instructed the jury upon the question of provocation, and thus indirectly upon the question of the amount of punitive damages.

Refusal of Instruction Authorizing Nominal Damages.

[6] Appellants next complain of the fact that the court refused to give several instructions to the effect that the jury might render a verdict for nominal damages if they found that the libel was published without malice and that plaintiff was not appreciably damaged thereby. The defendants are not entitled to such an instruction. As the jury were instructed that they could only award compensatory damages, if they found that there had been no actual damage suffered, the verdict, without the instruction, would necessarily be for the defendant. The instructions asked, therefore, instead of being to the advantage of the defendants, would be to the advantage of the plaintiff, for they are to the effect that the jury must bring in a verdict for at least nominal damages even if they found there was no substantial injury. In any event, the verdict of the jury having been for $25,000 compensatory damages, error cannot be predicated upon the fact that the court failed to instruct them that they could, if in their judgment no damages whatever were suffered, allow nominal damages.

The Nature of the Newspaper Controversy.

A further statement of facts is necessary in order that the situation presented by the record may be understood. The Los Angeles Times had published the fact that some 30 or more residents of Long Beach had been convicted of the charge euphoniously described as "social vagrancy." It had also published an account of the arrest of an agent of a charitable corporation who was charged with the offense of rape upon one of his wards. The plaintiff's newspapers characterized these publications as "brutal journalism," and roundly denounced the course of the defendants' newspaper in making such publications. The defendants in reply took the position that it was the proper function of a newspaper to print these news items. This controversy has been extended into the briefs in this case, and each side not only contends for the righteousness of its own position but also denounces the attitude of its opponent. Whether or not such publications should be made is one of the difficult problems of all newspapers which claim to publish all matters of current interest. On the one hand the emphasis is put upon the welfare and the desires of the public, and on the other hand upon the welfare of the individual and the corresponding welfare to the public. The various articles and cartoons published in the course of this controversy were all admitted in evidence. The plaintiff's newspaper, The Tribune, in addition to denouncing the defendants' newspaper for its "brutal journalism," printed a cartoon entitled "The Brute" on December 1, 1914, to which it is claimed the article herein sued upon was a legitimate reply. The central figure in the cartoon is a hog wearing eyeglasses, and with a pencil over his left ear. The hog is dressed in a man's clothing, and has features characterizing those of a man. The nostrils are indicated by a dollar sign. Its snout and left fore foot are dripping with mud from a mud hole. This mud hole in which the hog is wallowing is labeled "Filth," "Indecency," "Character Assassination," "Salaciousness," and "Unverified Rumor." The hog is pictured as saying, "This story will wreck a dozen innocent lives but—I should worry." The purpose and effect of the cartoon is thus described in the innuendo of the cross-complaint of the defendant corporation, to wit:

> "That in and by said cartoon plaintiff intended to charge, and was understood by the readers of said paper as charging, that cross-complainant is a brute; that it is a hog; that, like that animal, it wallows in filth and indecency; that it is an assassinator of character; that salacious matter and unverified rumor is its entire stock in trade, and that it uses both to ruin the lives of men and women; that it is controlled neither by conscience nor feeling; that it carries on its business in a brutal and conscienceless manner; that it practices constantly, and is the embodiment of, brutal journalism; and that it is controlled and actuated solely by a desire to accumulate money, regardless of the means employed to accomplish that purpose; that each of said charges is false and untrue, and was known by plaintiff to be false and untrue when made by him, as herein alleged."

Provocation in Mitigation of Compensatory Damages.

[7] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the articles and cartoons published by plaintiff and set up in the answer might be considered in mitigation of compensatory as well as punitive damages. The court did instruct the jury that such cartoons and articles might be considered in mitigation of exemplary damages. The court also instructed the jury that if it appeared from the evidence that there existed between the newspapers a newspaper controversy, the jury could also consider the fact of such controversy in determining the amount of compensatory damages. In other words, that provocation, considered as a separate and distinct element in the case, was only to be considered as disproving actual malice or mitigating the punitive damages resulting from actual malice. But the articles relied on as showing provocation might also establish the fact that a newspaper controversy was in progress, and the fact of such a controversy was entitled to be considered by the jury in assessing compensatory damages. By these instructions all the defendants who were responsible for the libel, whether aware of the provocative articles or not, were responsible for the same amount of compensatory damages. Defendant H. G. Otis, for instance, who knew nothing about the provocative articles or about the article made the basis of plaintiff's complaint, was assessed for the same amount of compensatory damages as was the defendant Harry Andrews, who knew of the provocative articles and approved the article complained of by the plaintiff. If merely provocative articles are to mitigate compensatory damages, it would seem to follow inevitably that the amount of the verdict against the different defendants should have been for different amounts, according to whether or not the respective defendants were thereby provoked.

It is evident that the articles of the plaintiff may be characterized both as provocative and controversial. In the first aspect the court instructed the jury that the articles should only be considered in mitigation of punitive damages based upon malice. On the other subject the jury were instructed that they had a right to take the controversy into consideration in determining the amount of compensatory damages awarded to the plaintiff. It is not necessary for us on this appeal to determine whether or not the court was correct in its instruction to the effect that the controversy could be taken into consideration in determining the amount of compensatory damages, as this instruction is, to that extent at least, in harmony with the contentions of the appellant, and if it is true that the defendants were not entitled to have the compensatory damages mitigated because of provocation the appellants cannot complain of the instructions. We think it clear that under our practice, wherein an award may be made for both compensatory and punitive damages, the only purpose of showing provocation is for the purpose of mitigating the punitive damages which might otherwise result from the finding of malice. If there are no punitive damages imposed by the jury, then the question of provocation becomes of no moment on the question of damages. In so far as such articles were a part of a controversy between the papers, they were received in evidence, and the court instructed the jury to consider the controversy in connection with the question of compensatory damages. Whatever may have been the ancient rule, particularly in jurisdictions where the distinction between punitive and compensatory damages is not carefully maintained, it is clear that the instruction of the jury limiting the effect of the provocative articles to the exemplary damages was correct. 25 Cyc. 523; Taylor v. Hearst, 118 Cal. 366, 50 Pac. 541; Turner v. Hearst, 137 Cal. 232, 70 Pac. 18, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 894, note.

Juror's Alleged Misstatement on His Voir Dire.

[8] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing a new trial upon the ground of the misconduct of a juror named William Noble. It is contended by appellants that his testimony upon the voir dire was so false and misleading as to constitute misconduct on his part by which the defendants were surprised into accepting him as a juror.

Upon his voir dire he was questioned and answered as follows:

"Q. Which one of the daily papers do you take? A. I am not subscribing for either one of them at the present time.

"Q. But as a rule? A. The Times, usually; sometimes I read them both.

"Q. So far as you know, there is nothing in your own mind that is in any way prejudicial to either party, plaintiff or defendant, in this case? A. No, sir.

"Q. And you know of nothing that would cause you to hesitate to accept the responsibilities of a juror in this case? A. No, sir.

"Q. Mr. Noble, have you any feeling of prejudice or bias against the Times or any of the defendants? A. No, sir.

"Q. If selected as a juror in this case, would you be guided solely by the evidence adduced here, and the law as given you by the court? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you say whether you take either of those papers—the Times, the Tribune, or Express? A. I am not taking either one of them regularly; I buy them occasionally.

"Q. Do you take any paper? A. As I say, I buy them—I am not a subscriber for either one.

"Q. Not a subscriber for any Los Angeles paper? A. No, sir.

"Q. You say you buy any of them and read any of them? A. I buy the Express, Tribune, or Times generally once a day, one or the other of them.

"Q. If you were a litigant would you be willing to have your cause tried by 12 men each of whom entertained the same feelings towards the parties and the matters in controversy that you do in this case? A. Yes, sir."

Upon the motion for a new trial the defendants offered an affidavit of Charles Burton, who was in charge of the Times route covering the district within which the juror Noble resided, who made affidavit that on October 2, 1916, he had called upon said Noble for the purpose of collecting the subscription rate for the previous month; that Noble then stated:

> "I don't want the Times any more; I want you to stop my subscription to the paper. I have nothing against you personally, but since the Times came out for the wets I have decided to stop it. * * * There are one or two saloons in the block in which I own property, and the saloons are a detriment to my property and an injury to me, and I will not support a paper that supports the wet proposition. * * * The Times is always knocking the laboring man, and for that reason I have no use for the editorial policy of the paper."

The affiant further stated:

> "That at that time said Noble appeared from his manner and tone of voice incensed against the policies of said Los Angeles Times."

The examination of the juror on his voir dire occurred November 16, 1916.

George P. Adams, one of the attorneys for the defendants, made affidavit for use on the motion for a new trial that on November 30, 1916, Mr. Adams casually met Mr. Noble and in the course of the conversation Noble stated:

> "If affiant had pressed the said Noble upon his examination touching his qualifications as a juror that the said Noble would have been compelled to have stated that he had been a subscriber to the Times, but that he had become so enraged at the said Times that he had fired it from his home; but that as he was not asked the question he did not volunteer the information."

The defendants argue their right to a new trial on the theory that the statement made on October 2, 1916, to the reporter, and the one subsequently made to Mr. Adams, convict the juror of perjury in his answers on voir dire, wherein he stated that there was nothing in his own mind in any way prejudicial to either party and nothing which would cause him to hesitate to accept the responsibility of a juror; that he had no feeling of bias or prejudice against the Times or any of the defendants; that he would try the case on the evidence adduced; and that if he were litigant he would be willing to have the case tried by a juror who was in the same frame of mind as he was towards the parties in the matters in controversy in the case. At the threshold of the matter the question that presents itself is this: Does the fact that a month and a half before he was examined as a prospective juror he made the statements attributed to him, while angry at the Times for its editorial policy concerning prohibition and labor matters, show his testimony to be false, or prove him, notwithstanding his direct statements to the contrary, to be so prejudiced as to require a new trial of the case? It is to be noted that he had at that time become angry with the newspaper and terminated his subscription thereto, but, according to his testimony given at the trial, he continued to read the Times more frequently than either of the other papers. He expressed no opinion concerning the merits of the controversy that was to be tried in court, and he swears that he felt himself competent to decide that controversy on the merits. As to the statements made to Mr. Adams, it is evident that the juror had fully in mind at the time he testified the fact that he had stopped his subscription to the Times and was prepared to make that statement if the questions had been directed to that point. Instead of a confession of a guilty withholding of information, it seems to be an indication that he was perfectly willing and intended to answer the questions fully and fairly if they were propounded. Any juror who has been long in court knows how strenuously counsel object to any volunteer information given by witnesses under examination. Such volunteer statements are almost invariably stricken out instantly by the court upon motion as not responsive to the question.

Unless we are prepared to indulge in the presumption of guilt rather than that of innocence it must be apparent that in the mind of the juror there was nothing inconsistent between his statement that he could try the case fairly and impartially and the fact that six weeks before he had in a fit of anger stopped his subscription to the Times. If the witness upon his voir dire had been asked the very questions which it is now suggested that he evaded, namely, whether or not he had at any time stopped his subscription to the Times because he was angry with the editorial policy of the paper, and, if he had answered in the affirmative and had stated that notwithstanding that fact he could fairly try the case and the court under those circumstances had accepted him as a juror, the action of the trial court would have been sustained on an appeal. The case differs altogether from numerous cases cited by the appellant in his brief, wherein jurors either had expressed an opinion upon the merits of the case which they were about to try or had indicated a desire to get upon a jury for the purpose of deciding the case against one of the parties. It is apparent from the foregoing discussion that the order of the trial court denying a new trial cannot be reversed for the reason stated.

As to a Defective Verdict.

[9] The next point urged by the appellant is that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground of the failure of the jury to agree upon a verdict. It appears that the jury returned two separate verdicts: The first, a verdict for compensatory damages of $25,000 against all the defendants; second, a verdict of $5,000 punitive damages against the defendant corporation alone. When the jury were polled it developed that nine of the jurors were in favor of the $25,000 compensatory damages and ten jurors in favor of the $5,000 punitive damages, but three of the jurors who voted for $5,000 punitive damages did not concur in the verdict for $25,000 compensatory damages, and two of the jurors who did not concur in the $5,000 punitive damages were in favor of the $25,000 compensatory damages. Only seven of the individual jurors, when polled, stated that they concurred in both verdicts. The following occurred on the polling of the jury:

> "The Court: Poll the jury, Mr. Clerk, first on the question of compensatory damages. Gentlemen of the jury, this is now on the $25,000 portion of the verdict for the plaintiff. If it is your verdict answer yes.
> "The Clerk: Mr. Ives, is this your verdict?
> "Juror Ives: Your honor, there were two votes—whether there was any compensatory damages, then the amount.
> "The Court: The question is, Mr. Ives, is this your verdict?
> "Juror Ives: Can I answer that in part?
> "The Court: No; the question is merely, did you and do you agree to this verdict which is returned here?
> "Juror Ives: No, sir.
> "The Clerk: Mr. Shafer, is this your verdict?
> "Mr. Scott: Could they not—
> "The Court: They are being polled as to compensatory damages.
> "Juror Shafer: And, your honor, it is not a poll as to whether we find for the plaintiff or not?
> "The Court: No; the poll is whether you agree in this verdict which has been returned, namely, a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $25,000 as compensatory damages.
> "Juror Shafer: No."

Juror Adams also answered "no," and the others, "yes." Whereupon the clerk announced: "Nine 'yes,' your Honor; three 'no.'" The court thereupon directed the clerk to poll the jury upon the question of punitive or exemplary damages against the defendant Times-Mirror Company. Jurors Noble and Sydnor voted "no," all the others "yes"; whereupon the following occurred:

> "Mr. Beach: I now move for a judgment for defendants, nine jurors not having agreed upon a verdict, there being five of them who have not agreed.
> "The Court: I do not understand what you mean.
> "Mr. Beach: It is one of our contentions in this case that there can be but one verdict.
> "The Court: Oh, the motion is denied."

It is clear that the point now insisted upon here was not made clear to the court at that time, namely, that the defendants contend the same nine jurors must agree upon both items of the verdict.

It should be observed that the jurors who dissented from the $25,000 compensatory damage verdict were not given the opportunity of explaining their position at all. They may have been in favor of a larger verdict. Juror Ives volunteered the proposition that the jurors first voted upon whether or not there should be any compensatory damages and then took a second ballot on the amount. When Juror Ives asked if he could answer the question in part the court informed him that his answer must be "yes" or "no."

There can be no question under this state of facts that, nine jurors having agreed upon a verdict of $25,000 compensatory damages against all the defendants, a judgment against all the defendants following this verdict would be proper. Whether or not the verdict of $30,000 against the Los Angeles Times, which includes an item of $5,000 punitive damages, can be sustained is not so clear. Two of the jurors, Noble and Sydnor, who voted for $25,000 compensatory damages, voted against the imposition of the $5,000 punitive damages upon the defendant corporation. The question is whether two jurors who voted against the item of $25,000 compensatory damages and who voted for the $5,000 punitive can properly be considered in place of the two jurors who voted for $25,000 compensatory damages and against the punitive damages to make the nine necessary to return a verdict. It is true, as counsel stated to the trial court, in one sense, that the verdict is an entirety. That is to say, the net result of any verdict is the imposition of a judgment against the defendant for a certain amount fixed in the verdict. So far as the judgment is concerned and the collection thereof, it is utterly immaterial whether the damages are classified as punitive or compensatory. They constitute the amount of the award made by the court in favor of the plaintiff. The only reason for segregating items of punitive and compensatory damages is to aid the trial court and the appellate courts to determine the basis upon which the jury has acted. It is always desirable, for that reason, to segregate the verdict, so that if it appears from the verdict that the jury has made no award whatever for punitive damages the rulings of the trial court and the instructions with reference to punitive damages, although erroneous, may be seen to be without prejudice to the parties, in view of the fact that no punitive damages are allowed. The advantage of such segregation is manifest here, for the reason that it appears that nine jurors concurred in the verdict of compensatory damages against all the defendants, and thus such verdict can stand, notwithstanding the complications arising with reference to the question of punitive damages. The total verdict against the Los Angeles Times is $30,000. It is clear from the record that only seven jurors united in the determination that the defendant corporation should pay $30,000, to wit, $25,000 compensatory and $5,000 punitive damages. It is clear, therefore, that the verdict for punitive damages cannot stand against the corporation. In aid of the verdict we might assume that the two jurors who were not allowed to express their opinion on compensatory damages, other than to say that they did not agree in the amount of the verdict as returned, fixed the compensatory damages at a higher figure. Even with this assumption, however, such jurors did not concur in the verdict as rendered, and not being willing to join therein, either because this verdict was too large or too small, their votes cannot be now considered as giving validity thereto. If the objection of the appellant had been made more clear to the court at the time the verdict was returned, the matter could have been quickly cleared up by questions that would show the exact status of the jurors and by then requiring the jury to retire for further deliberation. The procedure upon such a situation is outlined in section 618 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is therein provided that upon the polling of the jury that—

> "If upon such inquiry or polling, more than one-fourth of the jurors disagree thereto, the jury may be sent out again, but if no such disagreement be expressed, the verdict is complete and the jury discharged from the case."

It is clear, however, that nine jurors did not agree upon the verdict of $30,000 against the Los Angeles Times. If at the time the verdict had been returned the jury had been advised of that fact and required to retire, they might have returned a verdict against the defendant corporation in which nine jurors concurred, but, as the record stands, we must conclude that nine jurors concurred in a verdict of only $25,000 against the Los Angeles Times, and that the verdict for punitive damages failed because, so far as the record shows, some of those who voted for the $5,000 verdict as punitive damages might not have been willing to vote for a general verdict for as much as or more than $25,000. The situation may be summed up thus: Nine jurors agreed that a libel had been committed upon the plaintiff and that he had been damaged thereby to the extent of $25,000. Only seven of these nine jurors concurred in the conclusion that in addition to the compensatory damages the defendant corporation should be compelled to pay an additional amount by way of punishment. The three other jurors who were willing to agree to $5,000 as punitive damages, so far as the record discloses, did not concur in the amount of $25,000 compensatory damages, and may have been unwilling to have returned a verdict for more than $5,000 all told. In other words, although their verdict shows that they believed that there should be a $5,000 penalty imposed, this conclusion may have resulted from their belief that the actual damages suffered were very small, and that a public example should be made of the defendant by the imposition of a penalty.

Excessive Verdict.

[10] Appellants' next contention is that the verdict for compensatory damages is excessive, and that for that reason the trial court should have granted a new trial. It is, of course, conceded that this court is powerless to interfere with the determination of the jury unless "there is reason to believe * * * that passion, prejudice, or sympathy has influenced the jury to give more than the facts reasonably warrant." Bond v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. See, also, Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513; Wheaton v. N. B. & M. Railroad Co., 36 Cal. 591; Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 363; Harris v. Zanone, 93 Cal. 59, 28 Pac. 845; Howland v. Oakland Cable Street Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983; Dunn v. Hearst, 139 Cal. 239, 73 Pac. 138; Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 273, 104 Pac. 312; Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 Pac. 83; Diller v. Northern California Power Co., 162 Cal. 531, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908; Meek v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 175 Cal. 53, 164 Pac. 1117; Nolen v. F. O. Engstrum Co., 175 Cal. 464–467, 166 Pac. 346; Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 184 Pac. 672. Appellants quote, as the only evidence upon which compensatory damages could be imposed, the following testimony of the plaintiff as to the effect of the libel upon himself:

> "It affected me and my feelings. It humiliated me. It disturbed my peace of mind; it disturbed my home; it made my wife very unhappy; it destroyed my sleep, and since its publication it has affected me. It has injured my reputation. It has discredited me with many people who read it, whom I have reasons to believe believed the accusations. * * * It is my belief and conviction that many people believed the article and believed I was dishonest, and believed I had been purchased to defend criminals, and indirectly that I was a sodomite and a degenerate."

Appellants then argue that—

> "There does not seem to be any evidence that plaintiff suffered any serious pain, mortification, humiliation, or injury to his feelings. To say that one's 'peace of mind' and his 'home' are 'disturbed' and his sleep 'destroyed' is to employ terms more fitted to describe the effects of the usual spring housecleaning than to depict the results of a cataclysmic soul quake."

Appellants then proceed:

"There is left, then, for consideration the extent of plaintiff's injury due to his loss of reputation, and this also is to be determined from plaintiff's own testimony."

Counsel then states:

"Assuming, then, the correctness of our position that the sole evidence of any importance before the court on the question of damages related to plaintiff's loss of reputation—and that the evidence of plaintiff himself—it must be plain, after even a casual consideration, that an award of $25,000 compensatory damages is not supported by the evidence, even if it be true, as stated in Childers v. San Jose Mercury Printing & Pub. Co., 105 Cal. 284, 289, 38 Pac. 903, 45 Am. St. Rep. 40, that damages for loss of reputation 'may be recovered in the absence of actual proof; and to the amount that the jury estimates will fairly compensate plaintiff for the injury done.'"

The respondent in his brief prints a summary of the evidence upon which he relied to sustain the verdict, and we cannot better present his view than by quotations from his brief, as the facts are uncontroverted:

"The plaintiff was a man in the prime of life. He had lived in Los Angeles for 20 years. He entered the newspaper business early in 1901, nearly 14 years before this * * * attack. * * * On July 14, 1911, * * * he commenced the publication of the Tribune, a morning paper, sold for one cent. * * * He was, and for many years had been, engaged in many large and extensive business enterprises in Los Angeles, in Los Angeles county, and throughout the state, and was a particularly active and enterprising citizen of Los Angeles county, and throughout the state, and was a particularly active and enterprising citizen of Los Angeles, the community in which he lived, having been, besides acquiring and conducting the far-flung business of publishing his two newspapers, a large and active investor in real estate, stocks, and bonds, and the erector and owner of several of the most important business blocks in Los Angeles, including the Central building, at Sixth and Main streets, the Union Oil building, at Seventh and Spring streets, and Bullocks, at Seventh and Broadway. In other words, he was a man of large affairs and many enterprises, the success or failure of which was dependent largely upon his personal character and his reputation for business integrity. Moreover, these various business interests naturally and necessarily made him widely known throughout the state, and caused him to be directly or indirectly connected with a vast number of people in a business way. Besides that, by reason of his widespread business activities, he, of course, had a wide circle of business acquaintances and friends, and his social circle must, of necessity, have been large. All of this was obviously true, not only as to the place of his immediate residence and adjacent thereto, but throughout the state of California and elsewhere.

"He was also a man of family—a husband and father—the head of a household, the natural protector of a wife and four minor children, three boys and one girl, of whom he was doubtless the idol, and upon whom any breath against his reputation (as he conceived and believed) must have fallen like a blight. * * * It [the Times] circulated far and wide in the community where the plaintiff and the plaintiff's family lived, where he had built up and was building up and carrying on his many splendid public-spirited enterprises, and where the larger number of his business friends and enemies lived, and where any stab at his reputation, either personally or in the matter of his business ventures, would sink most deeply. It [the Times] also circulated largely throughout this, his native, state of California and elsewhere in the United States.

"At the time of the publication of the editorial which forms the basis of this suit [the Times] * * * had a daily circulation of between 60,000 and 70,000 a day—in other words, commanding a reading public of 200,000 or 300,000.

"To this great reading public in this home of the plaintiff, and throughout the state of his nativity, in which he had struggled to succeed and had succeeded, to his family—his wife, his boys, and his girl just on the verge of young manhood and young womanhood, to his friends and to his business associates and business clientéle, and (perhaps even worse) to his enemies and business antagonists (for every redblooded, successful business man, in this world where there obtains much malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness, has many enemies who would gloat over and use to his detriment every morsel of possible detraction, every hint of any step aside from rectitude), there went forth broadcast on this morning of December 3, 1914, thousands and tens of thousands of the defendants' great and widely influential newspaper; and on its editorial page, the very heart of this publication, was the * * * attack upon plaintiff and upon plaintiff's newspapers—'The Defense of Degenerates.'

"In the homes of his fellow citizens, upon the streets of his home city, with his subscribers everywhere, in the business houses of his advertisers, among the social friends of himself and his wife, with the schoolmates and companions of his children, all up and down the length and breadth of this great state, and even in widening circles all throughout this great country—his country—he was, by this article, branded in unmistakable terms as a defender of degenerates for hire, in the general business of taking money from such for the suppression of their malodorous practices, * * * and as the hired protector of 'those who violate the laws of God and man,' as the degraded and degrading publisher of a 'Morning Sodomite' and an 'Evening Degenerate,' and * * * with countenancing and defending those unspeakable things and sheltering and protecting for a paid price those who indulged in them. * * * The success or failure of such enterprises depends absolutely upon the good will of the community in which the papers circulate, and the confidence of that community in such publication. Destroy that confidence, and you destroy the very foundation of their successful existence."

While we have quoted somewhat fully from the statement of facts and the argument of the respondent in favor of the verdict, we have omitted many considerations pressed in the respondent's brief in justification for the verdict. Sufficient has been said, however, to indicate that the article in question might have caused a very direct and serious pecuniary loss to the plaintiff growing out of the attack upon his reputation and character. Such attack would necessarily affect him in his business as a publisher, not only by destroying the influence of his newspapers, but also by affecting their circulation, and while no special damages were pleaded in that regard and none are claimed, the respondent relying solely upon the injury to the plaintiff's feelings and to his reputation, enough has been said to indicate the extent of the plaintiff's reputation, growing partly out of his publication of two daily newspapers and partly out of his business activities, to indicate that any impairment of his reputation for honesty or integrity would have a very serious effect upon him in his future business as a publisher of newspapers and as a man of large affairs in the business world. In measuring the effect of a libel upon an individual, the jury is not confined to a consideration of the nature or purport of the words used, but is to consider also the effect upon the reputation of the plaintiff. It follows that, even though smaller judgments for more opprobrious words have been sometimes held to be excessive, it may, nevertheless, be true that the reputation of a man widely known, and who is seeking to maintain a reputation for public-spiritedness and broad-mindedness, may be greatly damaged by words of much less serious import. A man of less extensive reputation may, to some extent, overcome the effects of a libel by moving from one location in a city to another or from one community to another, while the man who is well known throughout the entire city or community cannot escape the effects of a libel, even if he had the desire to move from one place to another for that purpose.

It is sufficient for us to state that in view of the uncontradicted acts we cannot say that the jury was influenced by either passion or prejudice in appraising the compensatory damages awarded the plaintiff, and that therefore we cannot interfere with their verdict.

The Cross-Complaints of the Times-Mirror Company and of H. G. Otis.

[11] Appellants claim that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the cross-complaints of the defendant corporation and of the defendant Otis for damages for libel alleged to have been published concerning them by the plaintiff, to wit, the publication of the cartoon entitled "The Brute," heretofore described.

The contention that the cross-complaint should have been allowed to stand seems to be met and disposed of by the decision of this court in MacDougall v. Maguire, 35 Cal. 274, 95 Am. Dec. 98. In that case the defendant had committed a libel against the plaintiff and the next day the plaintiff committed an assault upon the defendant because of the libel. It is there held that these two torts were not a part of the same "transaction," within the meaning of the Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 57) § 47, which is the same as the provisions of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court there said:

> "The matter set up is clearly not a counterclaim, within the meaning of this provision. Pattison v. Richards, 22 Barb. 143; Murden v. Priment, 1 Hilton, 76; Barhyte v. Hughes, 33 Barb. 320; Schnaderbeck v. Worth, 8 Abb. 38. * * * The party may have an independent cause of action, but it has no relation to the pending action."

The court there quoted with approval from Pattison v. Richards, as follows:

> "The court said, 'If the defendant has a remedy against the plaintiff upon the matter set up, he must seek it in a separate suit.'"

By parity of reasoning a cause of action for libel on one day could not be set up as a counterclaim to a cause of action for libel arising the next day, even though the second libel was the result of the first. They are separate and distinct transactions, and, though connected in the sense that one is the result of the other, they are, in contemplation of law, entirely separate. Nor can it be said that the second libel "relates to the transaction" upon which the action is brought, within the meaning of section 442, C. C. P., authorizing the filing of a cross-complaint "whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought * * * he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross complaint." Appellants, however, base their claim that the court erred upon section 438, defining a counterclaim, which contention, as we have shown, is disposed of in MacDougall v. Maguire, supra. We need not consider the question of whether a slander occurring in the course of the same conversation or assault or counter assault in the same fistic encounter is a part of the same "transaction." within the meaning of section 438, Code of Civil Procedure. In such cases it has been held by some courts that a cross-complaint or counterclaim is permissible. Powell v. Powell, 160 Wis. 504, 152 N. W. 168, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 113; 34 Cyc. 706, 710. Appellants suggest as a reason for allowing the counterclaim the desirability of settling the entire dispute between the parties in one action. We need not discuss the question of whether or not such a procedure would be desirable, as our decisions heretofore made have established a rule of action in this state under which the parties herein and the court below have proceeded. Furthermore, we have heretofore held that the mere desirability of settling all the disputes between the parties in one action is not a sufficient reason for permitting a cross-complaint or counterclaim to be filed. Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 499, 74 Pac. 40, cited to the same effect in Clark v. Kelley, 163 Cal. 207, 124 Pac. 846. If the rule is now to be changed, it should be done by the Legislature and not by the court.

Is the Publication Complained of Libelous Per Se?

[12] In appellants' reply brief, filed nearly 2½ years after the transcript herein, the appellants for the first time claim that the complaint herein does not state a cause of action, for the reason that the alleged publication is not libelous per se. It is also claimed that, even if the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to state a cause of action by reason of the innuendoes therein, under the evidence showing the facts and circumstances of the publication it was error for the court to instruct the jury that the publication was libelous per se.

The contention of the appellants may best be stated in their own language, as contained in their final brief, as follows:

> "(1) That mere vituperation does not constitute a libel. (2) That charging the doing of a lawful act is never a libel, no matter how opprobrious the epithets are by which the writer characterizes the acts. (3) That in determining the purport of the publication, the article must be read as a whole; its publication must be taken into consideration, so that words apparently actionable may, in the light of the context and in view of the circumstances attending their publication, appear not to be actionable. (4) That when an article is mainly directed at one person or one proposition, and harsh expressions are also applied hypothetically and by way of argument or incidentally to a second person, the second person cannot maintain an action for libel based on the article, even though the expressions applied to him might be libelous if they stood alone. * * *
> "And after analyzing the article sued upon, and applying the foregoing principles of law to it, appellants pointed out that it could be justly said that the language in the article here sued upon did not import anything of a defamatory character concerning the plaintiff; that the force of the article was directed against sodomites and degenerates, and the avowed policy of plaintiff and his newspapers that such persons should be shielded from publicity, which it had the legal right to adopt, and was not directed to plaintiff; that the defendant might have used daintier language, but that mere vituperation does not constitute libel."

In support of these propositions the appellants have carefully and elaborately reviewed the cases, not only in this but in many other jurisdictions, upon the subject. In view of the character of this publication and our own decisions upon the question of libel, we believe it entirely unnecessary to review these authorities. It is perfectly manifest on the face of the article that it accuses the plaintiff of conduct so reprehensible that it must necessarily affect his standing in the community and expose him to obloquy and contempt. It thus comes clearly within the statutory definition of libel in this state, and, although it was said in Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 226, 227, 64 Pac. 290, that the statutory definition of libel (section 45, Civ. Code) is a mere codification of the common-law definition, we deem it sufficient to point to the language of our statute and to call attention to our decisions upon similar contentions heretofore made without discussing these cases or quoting therefrom. The effect of the article, we think, is justly characterized by the respondent in the following paragraph which we take from his reply brief. While the statement in the brief is in the form of a question, we will omit the question:

> "* * * It had the strongest possible tendency to ruin the plaintiff's reputation personally by holding him out as the protector and champion of the lowest class of degenerates and the most disgusting types of degeneracy, and to destroy his standing as a newspaper man by charging him with taking hire from those sodomites for defense."

The respondent gives the following illustration to show the effect of the article which we think is apt and therefore quote:

> "To illustrate: Suppose the plaintiff, as the proprietor of his two newspapers, had changed their names, the one to 'the Morning Sodomite' and the other to 'the Evening Degenerate,' and had advertised in their columns that it would thereafter be his policy in their publication and through them to 'coddle criminals,' 'to conceal their crimes,' to protect 'those who violate the laws of God and man' from punishment, and shelter them from publicity, and to defend for hire—for money—make a 'purchased defense' of—degenerates and the acts of evildoers 'who are as lecherous as goats and as conscienceless as jackasses in April,' would such names for his papers, and such an announcement of his policies, have exposed him, as their proprietor and editor—the formulator of their policies—to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or have caused him to be shunned by his fellow men, or have tended to injure him in his occupation as a newspaper publisher?"

We think it is obvious that the foregoing question must be answered in the affirmative and that the article was libelous per se; that therefore the complaint states a cause of action and the court correctly instructed the jury. This view is in accord with our decisions on what renders an article libelous per se. Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 Pac. 713; Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 266, 46 Pac. 103; Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 Pac. 290; Adams v. Cameron, 27 Cal. App. 625, 150 Pac. 1005, 151 Pac. 286; Fitch v. De Young, 66 Cal. 339, 5 Pac. 364.

As to the contention that the surrounding circumstances in evidence disprove the innuendoes in the complaint and show that the article was not libelous per se, it is only necessary to compare the plaintiff's statement of his purposes in refraining from the publication of such incidents as the Long Beach scandal with the purposes of the plaintiff, as stated by the defendant in the article complained of, to show that the latter article in effect charged plaintiff with rank hypocrisy, and such a charge has been held libelous per se. In Newby v. Los Angeles Times, 173 Cal. 387, 160 Pac. 233, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 186, it is said: "It is libelous per se to falsely charge that a person is a hypocrite." Defendants' statement concerning plaintiff's purpose in suppressing such "news" in the article complained of has already been stated herein. The plaintiff's statement of his purpose is of a directly opposite character and is contained in an editorial from the Tribune, published November 19, 1914, which we quote, as follows:

"Journalism That is So Brutal That It Kills.

"Brutal journalism sometimes becomes homicidal journalism. Several instances are supplied by the recent record of local events. Driven to desperation because they were made the victims of sensational publicity, men have sought refuge in death from the attacks that were made upon them. They preferred to meet the instant judgment of God rather than face the merciless clamor of men.

"It is the business of newspapers to print the news, but that duty should be performed in decency and with discrimination. No man is so well fortified in the respect and regard of the community, by even a lifetime of good conduct, as to be immune against causeless attack. It is within the power of any abnormal person actuated by malice, moved by blackmail or stirred merely by a love of sensationalism, to bring accusations of a frightful character. Such charges ought not to be given publicity until proof of their truth formally has been adduced. Otherwise an irreparable injury is inflicted even upon the wholly guiltless.

"No interest of society is subserved by the premature exploitation of such accusations. The public will be as well protected against the offender if publicity is withheld until conviction shall have been secured. The adoption of such a policy would spare the victims of false witness the frightful shame and unendurable disgrace that now so often permanently attaches itself to the accused even when acquitted. Sometimes it happens that men of high spirit and extreme sensitiveness, unable to endure the reflection that they have been held up to public scorn, take their lives rather than to face, even though innocent, the biting contempt of a censorious world too prone to give prejudgment on insufficient evidence.

"It should not only be the policy of decent newspapers to withhold publication of charges affecting honor and character until there shall have been a legal adjudication of guilt or innocence, but public officials themselves should exercise a superior discretion in dealing with cases of this nature. Morbidity that finds gratification in publicity, abnormal natures that are in fact affected with psychic disturbances, blackmailers ever seeking to find victims—all these go in endless procession to the offices of public officials with tales and accusations that ought not to be the basis of public official action except after the most rigid and exacting inquiry.

"The character of an honorable man is dearer to him then his physical life. His good name is esteemed by him as is his most precious possession, and accusations of infamy, supported by official proceedings based thereon, and reinforced by the publicity given by a sensational newspaper, inflict a strain that never can be eradicated. The world should act upon the principle that the accused is innocent until he is proved guilty.

"Let us have an end of the wicked, cruel system that now obtains and begin here a reformation that will reach in its influence to the uttermost extent of the Union. Guilt must be punished! True, but punishment of the guilty is not endangered by withholding publicity until proof makes it certain that innocence takes no injury."

Again, in an editorial in the Tribune of November 22, 1914, it is stated:

"The Tribune and the Express do not believe that there is any 'scoop' in printing scandalous stories which frequently are untrue, or founded on blackmail, the publication of which will serve no good purpose and the only result of which will be to harm and injure the individual. The Tribune and Express do not believe that the public ever want to read this sort of stuff, and are resolved, even if there is a demand for this class of matter existing in a few depraved minds, that those persons will have to look elsewhere for the filth they seek. It long has been the custom of the Tribune and the Express to throw such matter in the waste basket."

We therefore think that the surrounding circumstances of the publication accentuate its libelous character rather than diminish the effect imputed thereto in the complaint.

[13] It is also contended by the appellants that in view of the fact that the respondent was a publisher of two daily newspapers, and therefore in a sense a public character, they were entitled to discuss his character with more freedom than they would a more private individual. The fact that a man is the publisher of a newspaper does not justify libelous attacks on him on the theory that he is a public character. If the fact that he is a publisher in any way reduces the damage he actually suffers by the publication, it can be considered by them in appraising his damages. That the publication of a newspaper by the plaintiff, as a matter of the law, affects either the liability of the defendants to respond in damages, or the right of the plaintiff to recover for a publication which would be considered libelous as to any other person, is a proposition that cannot be successfully maintained. The decision in the case of Newby v. Times-Mirror Co., supra, supports this conclusion. It is there stated:

> "The duty of a newspaper to the public does not justify the publication of false and defamatory matter concerning a private citizen merely because he is active in promoting his own political views."

The trial court is directed to reduce the judgment to $25,000 against all the defendants, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; SLOANE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I concur in the judgment and in the foregoing opinion.

On the question of the reduction of the judgment to $25,000 it is perfectly clear that nine jurors did not agree upon a total award of more than $25,000, and without such concurrence I do not see how judgment for a larger amount can be sustained. There seems to me to be no authority for the practice followed in this case of allowing the jury to render separate and distinct verdicts upon the questions of compensatory and punitive damages, or, at any rate, in regarding, for the purposes of judgment, each of such verdicts as a separate and distinct verdict. Whatever may be the special issues submitted to a jury in a case of this character, there can be but a single award, and this single award must be concurred in by three-fourths of the jury. Of course, there is no objection to a jury finding a verdict for say $30,000 stating in its verdict that $25,000 thereof is for compensatory damages and $5,000 for punitive damages, but in such a case it is essential that three-fourths of the jury shall concur in the total award of $30,000. Otherwise we have a judgment against a defendant for a larger sum than three-fourths of the jury have agreed on. In this case the concurrence of every one of the nine jurors who declared for $25,000 compensatory damages was essential to the award of the additional $5,000 included in the judgment, for without this there could be no concurrence of three-fourths of the jury in the total award against the defendant. Under the practice followed in the trial court the concurrence of only six of the jurors who agreed on the $25,000 award for compensatory damages would be essential to the award of an additional $5,000 punitive damages, provided the three who did not concur in the $25,000 award were willing to agree on a $5,000 award of punitive damages. In such a case we would have an award for a total sum concurred in by only one-half of the jury. In this case, as appears in the main opinion, only seven of the jurors concurred in both of the awards.

OLNEY, J. (dissenting). I concur with Judge WILBUR except in his conclusion that because the same nine jurors who agreed upon the verdict of $25,000 for compensatory damages did not also agree upon the verdict of $5,000 for punitive damages, the latter verdict cannot stand. With that I cannot agree. The two verdicts are separate and each is supported by the requisite number of jurors and that would seem to be enough.

Judge WILBUR'S reasoning, as I understand it, proceeds upon the proposition that—

> "So far as the judgment is concerned and the collection thereof, it is utterly immaterial whether the damages are classified as punitive or compensatory. They constitute the amount of the award made by the court in favor of the plaintiff."

With this proposition as the basis, he then reaches the conclusion that there was but one verdict for $30,000, and that nine jurors are not shown to have concurred in this verdict. If this reasoning be true, it would certainly seem to mean that the verdict for $25,000 compensatory damages must fall as well as the verdict for $5,000 punitive damages. The reasoning whereby he holds that the verdict for $5,000 punitive damages cannot stand can be applied with equal force to the verdict for compensatory damages. If there is but one verdict, then it is for $30,000, and nine jurors have not concurred in it. Why it should be void as to one element and not as to the other, I do not see.

The fallacy in the reasoning seems to me to consist in the assumption that there was in reality but one verdict. There was not one verdict, but there were two. The statement that—

> "So far as the judgment is concerned and the collection thereof, it is utterly immaterial whether the damages are classified as punitive or compensatory. They constitute the amount of the award made by the court in favor of plaintiff"

—is, of course, true, but we are not dealing here either with the judgment or its collection. We are dealing with the matter of rendering a verdict, and certainly two verdicts were rendered, as the opinion itself states, and each upon a separate and distinct issue, and each supported by the requisite number of jurors. Furthermore, there is no inconsistency between the verdicts. Each verdict implies that the defendant is liable for a libel. Upon the issue as to the amount of actual damages, nine jurors believed that such damages in the amount of $25,000 had been suffered, and so found. On the other hand, on the issue as to punitive damages, nine jurors likewise believed that the libel was malicious and that the proper amount to be allowed because of this element was $5,000, and so found. Two or three of the jurors who had concurred in the verdict fixing the amount of compensatory damages did not agree with this, either because they did not believe the libel was malicious or because they did not agree with the amount fixed as punitive damages. The point of the matter is that there were two verdicts, not one; that all the jurors who concurred in either verdict agreed that the defendant was liable for a libel; that they disagreed only upon the separate and distinct issues as to the amount of damages actually suffered, and the amount of punitive damages, if any, which should be assessed; that upon each of these distinct issues a verdict supported by nine jurors as required by law was returned, and that the vote of no juror upon either of these verdicts was inconsistent with his vote upon the other. The case is nothing more than one wherein what were really special verdicts were asked upon distinct and separate elements of damage, and such verdicts were returned. Upon their being returned, the court took the assessments so arrived at of the two elements of damage, added them together to obtain the total amount for which the defendant was liable, and gave judgment accordingly. This would seem to be exactly what the Code provides may be done. Sections 624 and 625, Code Civ. Proc.

KLEIST et ux. v. PRIEM et ux. (Civ. 3638.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 6, 1921.)

1. Fraud 🔑52—Evidence of value of property given in exchange admissible.

In an action for damages for false representations, made in exchange of lands, evidence as to the value of the property delivered by defendant in exchange held admissible.

2. Trial 🔑165—Facts elicited on cross-examination of adverse party may be relied on to take case from jury.

Where facts brought out on defendant's own cross-examination tended to support the allegations of the complaint, motion for nonsuit was improperly granted.

3. Frauds 🔑64(1)—Representation as opinion or statement of fact, question for jury.

In an action for damages for fraud in an exchange of lands, the question whether defendant's statements as to values were mere expressions of opinion or statements of fact is for the jury.

4. Fraud 🔑52—Evidence of value of lands exchanged admissible.

In an action for damages for fraud in an exchange of lands, evidence as to the value of the lands exchanged by plaintiff is admissible on the issue of fraud and as a circumstance to be considered in construing the contract, and evidence that certain of defendants' properties did not have the improvements represented, etc., and were subject to limitations contrary to representations, is also admissible.

5. Trial 🔑139(1)—Nonsuit must be denied if there is any substantial evidence to prove plaintiff's case.

A motion for nonsuit must be denied if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case without passing on the sufficiency of such evidence.

6. Evidence 🔑434(11) — Parol evidence of fraud admissible.

Where defendant was alleged to have been guilty of false and fraudulent representations as to lands which he exchanged for those of plaintiff, evidence as to defendant's oral representations is admissible, although the agreement of exchange was reduced to writing, for a contrary rule would be for the protection of those contemplating fraudulent schemes.

7. Trial 🔑165—In passing on motion for nonsuit, every favorable inference should be given to plaintiff's evidence.

In determining whether the evidence is sufficient to require submission of the case to a jury, every favorable inference and every favorable presumption arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of plaintiff.

8. Trial 🔑165—On motion for nonsuit, favorable construction must be accepted in favor of plaintiff.

Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, the construction in favor of plaintiff must be accepted on motion for nonsuit, and contradictory evidence must be disregarded.

9. Trial 🔑165—Plaintiff entitled to benefit of all evidence.

On motion for nonsuit, plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of every bit of evidence which tends to prove his case.

10. Trial 🔑165—Evidence improperly admitted may be considered on question of nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given by the court the benefit of its full probative strength, and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of witnesses cannot be considered.

11. Trial 🔑139(1), 165—Where plaintiff has made out prima facie case, nonsuit must be denied; on motion for nonsuit, evidence taken strongly against defendant.

On motion for nonsuit, the evidence must be taken most strongly against defendant, and, if plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case, the motion, if made on the close of his case, should be denied.

12. Fraud 🔑64(1)—Nonsuit held improper.

In an action for damages for fraud, in an exchange of land, the granting of a motion for nonsuit held improper.

13. Fraud 🔑49—Elements of damage not pleaded cannot be considered.

Proper elements of damage in an action for misrepresentations in effecting exchange of lands cannot be considered, where not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by John H. Kleist and wife against B. E. Priem and wife. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

Marcus D. Wolff, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Olin L. Berry, of San Francisco (A. Walter Allen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action against defendants, husband and wife, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the former in the sum of $11,360 as the result of an exchange of real properties by and between said parties induced by false and fraudulent representations made by defendant B. E. Priem, acting for himself and his said wife. The wives of the parties were made parties solely because of respective marital relations. This being so, reference will be made only to the principals.

The property parted with by plaintiff is situated in Douglas county, Or., and will be referred to as the Oregon property, while the property received by him from defendant, consisting of several lots, parcels, and tracts of land situated in the counties of San Francisco, Alameda, San Mateo, Contra Costa, and Napa, in this state, will be referred to as the California properties.

The gravamen of the action is to be found in the allegations of the amended complaint charging false and fraudulent representations made by defendant as to the values of the several lots or tracts of the California properties, the state of improvements thereon and subsisting liens standing against the same.

Defendant denied specifically all of the material allegations of the amended complaint, and, in turn, by cross-complaint, charged plaintiff with falsely and fraudulently misrepresenting the value of the Oregon property to his damage in the sum of $11,000. At the close of plaintiff's case the court granted defendant's motion for nonsuit, and judgment was accordingly entered. Plaintiff appealed from said judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

A statement of the facts essential for an understanding of the orders appealed from, and the court's decision, may be thus briefly made: Plaintiff was at the time of said exchange, and for several years prior thereto had been, a resident and owner of farm and orchard lands situate eight miles from the nearest town or village in Douglas county, Or., and engaged in conducting the same. His property consisted of 75 acres, 50 of which were planted to bearing fruit trees. The remaining 25 acres were used chiefly for growing grains. The improvements and equipment were modern and fully ample for the purposes to which the land was devoted. The uncontradicted evidence is that the Oregon property on the day of the exchange, was of the value of $18,000, but carried an incumbrance of $1,500.

Plaintiff and his wife had grown anxious to become residents of California, preferably San Francisco. It seems that the husband had fallen into conversation with one E. J. Sanford, "a neighbor," whom he describes as having known for a period of about one week. Sanford, having thus been made aware of plaintiff's desires, represented that he was a real estate operator of 35 years' activity and volunteered to go to San Francisco and obtain for him a "good trade." This occurred during the latter days of September, 1917. Plaintiff furnished Sanford with a list of his property, together with photographic views, and the latter very shortly thereafter arrived in San Francisco and very promptly wrote to plaintiff that he had procured a good trade, and advised him to make the exchange. The evidence indicated that upon arriving in San Francisco Sanford went direct to the offices of defendant B. E. Priem, who then had offices in the Phelan building. Whether a prior acquaintance existed between the two does not appear. On October 1, 1917, Sanford wrote a letter to plaintiff from San Francisco, in which he enclosed a list of properties made out and offered by defendant Priem in exchange for his Oregon property. The list described in a general way several lots or "tracts" of land.

Closely following the Sanford letter, defendant Priem forwarded a second list to plaintiff. Sanford hurried back to Oregon and advised plaintiff to make the trade. At this juncture Sanford withdrew from the transaction as mysteriously as he had entered it. Plaintiff at once came to San Francisco. It was his first trip to this state, and consequently he was a stranger. He went to Priem's office, was entertained by him, and received his close personal attention throughout his stay. He seems to have had no independent advice or to have conversed or advised with any one but defendant. He was hurriedly shown the several pieces of property afterwards passed to him by the exchange, except the Napa City and Mathews lots, which he did not see. His visit to or examination of any one of said lots or tracts of land did not exceed five minutes and in some instances not more than one minute. The properties were quite widely separated, being in four counties. At the expiration of the third day of his visit plaintiff informed defendant that he had concluded not to make an exchange of properties, and announced his intention of starting for his home. Defendant insisted on accompanying him, and did accompany him to Oregon, stating that he wanted to see his "ranch anyway" and also the country. After three or four days of negotiations at the Oregon ranch, defendant revised his property list by adding two Berkeley lots, and represented by positive statements that the properties listed, exclusive of said two Berkeley lots, were worth $18,000, and that said two lots were worth $2,500, less an $800 mortgage. This was sufficient to induce plaintiff, who had been theretofore in an uncertain frame of mind, to execute, on October 23, 1917, the contract of exchange. An exchange of deeds soon followed, both sides executing warranty deeds.

[1] It is an allegation of the amended complaint, and was the offer of plaintiff at the trial, to show by competent testimony that the value of the California properties had been grossly misrepresented by defendant, and that the aggregate value thereof was inequitable as compared with his Oregon property. The aggregate value of the California properties as represented by defendant, after balancing incumbrances and liens, had been so adjusted by the second list, exclusive of the Berkeley lots afterwards included, as to make them appear to equal the actual value of plaintiff's Oregon property. At the trial plaintiff offered to show by numerous witnesses that the actual or market value of each lot, piece or parcel of the California properties was at least 50 per cent. below its represented value. Defendant objected to any and all offers to prove values, and the court sustained each of his objections. This ruling was erroneous. The only evidence as to the value of the California properties permitted by the court was brought out on the cross-examination of the plaintiff.

[2] Upon what theory evidence of this character was excluded under the issues as framed does not clearly appear. Possibly it was excluded on the theory that plaintiff had full or equal opportunity with the defendant to investigate for himself, or that the representations as made were mere expressions of opinion rather than the affirmation of facts. Under the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record of the case, these questions were matters of fact to be determined by the jury, and not mere questions of law for decision by the court. The cross-examination of plaintiff on the subject of values seems to have been made on the theory that it afforded an opportunity of impeachment by a comparison of the allegations of the original complaint with the allegations of the amended complaint. Whatever the purpose may have been, the evidence was elicited, and, under the rules governing motions for nonsuits, it must be given its full probative effect. The cross-examination showed the actual values to be far below the values as represented.

It was the evidence that plaintiff had been a farmer practically the whole of his life, had had no previous real estate knowledge or business training, and was wholly ignorant of California conditions and values, and therefore relied solely upon defendant's statements of values. In fact, he had never seen the Napa City property. Defendant, on the other hand, was the owner of lands situate in several counties of the state, occupying a business office, and, doubtless, was well informed as to realty values. A fair inference from the facts stated would be that he was a real estate broker. His assertion, rather boastfully, was that he did not need an attorney to transact business for him.

[3, 4] Whether statements as to values are tantamount to an affirmation of an existing fact rather than a mere expression of opinion, and were the inducing cause of entering into a contract of exchange, are questions of fact for the determination of the court or jury. Herdan v. Hansen, 189 Pac. 440. "Evidence as to the value of lands exchanged at the time of the exchange is admissible and relevant to an issue of fraud connected with the exchange, and also as a circumstance to be considered in construing the contract." Beverly v. Blockwood, 102 Cal. 83, 36 Pac. 378; Bonnarjee v. Pike, 185 Pac. 479. Surely the representation that the Napa City property, property situate in a county he had never visited and about which he had no knowledge, possessed certain valuable sidewalk, curb, sewer, and street improvements and was of a value greatly in excess of its actual value, standing in the face of uncontradicted testimony that it did not possess said improvements and was far below its represented value, brings this case within the rule above announced.

It was while in Oregon, several hundreds of miles removed from the situs of the California properties, that plaintiff was induced to make the exchange. Whether plaintiff, judged from the circumstances of the situation, had reasonable means of investigating the question of values for himself, and whether he relied upon the statements of value made by defendant, were questions of fact that should have been submitted to the jury. There was no such acquaintance with, examination or tests made by plaintiff of, the properties received in exchange as is found in the cases cited by defendant. There was direct evidence that the Napa City lots did not possess anything like all the street improvements as represented. This would very substantially affect value. It constituted an element of damage. There was evidence, perhaps not as definite or satisfactory as was obtainable or desirable, touching the costs of making the improvements agree with the representations set out in the contract of exchange.

[5] But a motion for nonsuit must be denied if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case without passing on the sufficiency of such evidence. Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Co., 185 Pac. 388.

It appears that the Burlingame property, which was warranted to be "free and clear of all incumbrances," was subject to a lien for street improvement work in the sum of $110, which had not been wholly paid at the day of the trial. The Behrens tract was warranted by the agreement of exchange to be "free and clear of all incumbrances." It subsequently developed that Mrs. J. M. Hamill held a contract for the purchase of said tract. As a part of the original agreement, defendant covenanted to clear the title either by obtaining a quitclaim deed from Mrs. Hamill or by the institution of an action to quiet title thereto. Neither was done. As an answer to plaintiff's complaint for failure to comply with said covenant defendant at the trial of the case presented to plaintiff for the first time a quitclaim deed executed by Mrs Hamill long after suit had been commenced, asking damages because of such failure. Surely defendant should not be permitted to profit by such methods.

The Cortland avenue lot, the most valuable of the listed properties, was shown to be materially less in area than it was represented to be. It was described as "75 feet on Cortland avenue." Its full dimensions were at no time given, not even in the deed. As a matter of fact, it was of "flat-iron" shape, 75 feet on Cortland avenue, and tapered down to a width of 47 feet at the rear. It was the testimony of plaintiff that this lot was represented to be 75x70 feet. Strange as it may appear, the complaint contains no allegation of damage because of such misrepresentation. The dimensions of the lot were admissible, however, as affecting value. The treatment of this lot throughout the transaction, whenever reference was made to it, was such as to leave room for an unwary person to be misled as to its actual size.

[6] There is no merit in defendant's contention that because the agreement of exchange had been reduced to writing no evidence concerning false representations should have been received with respect to any statement made prior to its execution. No attempt is here made to vary the terms of a written contract nor to explain away an ambiguity. Its purpose was to establish the fact that the instrument was procured by fraud and the transfer of properties was made because of fraudulent representations as alleged in the complaint. Parol evidence has always been held to be admissible to establish fraud. Persons contemplating fraud may not be expected to reduce their fraudulent purposes to writing. To exclude parol evidence in such cases would bar inquiry into many fraudulent transactions. Such a rule would afford a fortress of protection to those contemplating fraudulent schemes. The decisions decisive of this question are: Zirbes v. Mounsey, 176 Cal. 677, 169 Pac. 368; Ayres v. S. P. Co., 173 Cal. 75, 159 Pac. 144, L. R. A. 1917F, 949; Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 630; Bechtold v. Coney, 183 Pac. 841; Troy, etc., Co. v. Drivers, etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 152, 111 Pac. 121.

The case of Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 166 Pac. 808, relied upon by defendant, is not in conflict with the rule that has always obtained in this state. It simply reaffirms the familiar rule that the terms of a written contract cannot be varied by parol evidence. By an agreement in writing, as stated in said case, the vendor sold a tract of land by metes and bounds with no reference to acreage. Inasmuch as the contract described it as a sale in gross, parol evidence was not admissible to show that false representations were made as to its acreage. This principle of law has no application to the instant case. No attempt was made to vary the terms of a written agreement. The inquiry here is as to the means employed in procuring the execution of an instrument faultless on its face.

Not only the two lists sent to plaintiff from San Francisco, the second of which contained a brief description of each separate parcel of land offered and containing the words, "My price" (naming a stated sum), or statements as to its cost to defendant, or amounts expended by him for improvements, or prices which nearby lots had brought, were admissible in evidence, but also the oral representations made to plaintiff in Oregon to the effect that the property offered by him was of the value of $18,000. The acts and conduct of the parties are also important.

[7-11] In determining whether or not the evidence is sufficient to require the submission of a case to a jury, every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced, must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiff. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiff. If contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac.

252. The plaintiff must also be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments, and such evidence must be viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff's claim. Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 Pac. 381. Evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given by the court the benefit of its full probative strength, and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered. The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made on the close of his case, should be denied. Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 97 Pac. 709; In re Estate of Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787; Wassermann v. Sloss, 117 Cal. 425, 49 Pac. 566, 38 L. R. A. 176, 59 Am. St. Rep. 209; Lassen v. S. P. Co., 173 Cal. 71, 159 Pac. 143.

[12] Applying the foregoing rules to the evidence, we think the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous. It was also error to exclude evidence as to the values of the properties passed by the deeds of exchange. The discussion of the evidence in this decision must be considered solely in reference to a motion for nonsuit.

[13] In conclusion, it may be stated that the amended complaint is faulty both in substance and in form. The allegations as to value are weak and indirect, and those in reference to damages are somewhat vague and incomplete. Proper elements of damage not pleaded were attempted to be made issues at the trial. This cannot be done, and while these matters were not properly presentable upon motion for nonsuit, they are such as should be corrected upon a retrial of the case.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Water company's agreement to supply water to certain land at specified rate, where the rates for the use of such water had not been fixed by public authority, held not against public policy.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑249—Owner could compel water company to supply water though in arrears in payment for past service.

Landowner could compel water supply company engaged as a public service corporation in supplying water to the public to supply such owner with water at rates fixed either by the rate-fixing power, or in the absence of rates having been so fixed by the company itself, upon a reasonable basis or a basis not prohibitive, even though in arrears to the company in payment for past service.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of San Francisco against D. W. Carmichael. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McLaughlin and R. L. Shinn, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Gavin McNab, Nat Schmulowitz, and H. S. Derby, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This is the second appeal in this cause. The first trial of the case resulted in a judgment for the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff appealed, and the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court, the decision being rendered and filed on June 18, 1918. See 178 Cal. 446, 173 Pac. 999.

On the former appeal, as on this, the principal question submitted for determination was whether a certain written instrument, which was and is made a part of the complaint, and which was identified evidentially as Exhibit B, does or does not constitute an account stated or evidence of such as account, the plaintiff's action being entirely based upon said instrument, as to which the theory of the complaint was that it was a stated account between defendant and the American Canon Water Company (subsequently transferred to plaintiff), whereby the former acknowledged an indebtedness to the said Water Company in the sum of $4,126.65, being a settlement of previous contracts or transactions between them. The pleadings are as they were originally settled, and upon which both the first and the present trials were had. The complaint sets out in sufficient detail the transactions culminating in the alleged stated account. The answer denies the making of a stated account, and then sets up some matters of affirmative defense, the general nature of which it will be the more convenient and just as orderly to refer to hereafter.

In the first trial, the trial court "made findings to the effect that no account had been stated by the said parties, and that no sum was found due to the water company from the defendant, Carmichael, and that he never agreed to pay said sum of money," and judgment was accordingly entered. At the last trial, resulting in the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, the court, presumably acting largely upon its understanding of the purport of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case on the former appeal, and conceiving no doubt that the facts brought out by the evidence were substantially the same as those established at the former or first trial of the action, found that a stated account had been made and agreed to by and between Carmichael and the Water Company. As before suggested, however, it is here contended by the appellant that the finding that an account stated was made between Carmichael and the Water Company derives no support from the evidence. It is further contended that it is not squarely held by the Supreme Court in its opinion in disposing of the former appeal that the instrument upon which the action is founded constitutes an account stated. It is further urged that there was a failure of consideration.

The respondent contends that the facts brought out at both trials of the case are substantially the same, and therefore invokes the doctrine of the "law of the case," claiming that the decision on the former appeal must be accepted as the law applicable hereto as to all the questions involved in the controversy adjudicated by said decision; that the Supreme Court distinctly held, in its said decision, that the instrument pleaded and entirely relied upon by the plaintiff was an account stated, and that said account was made and agreed to by Carmichael and the Water Company.

The general facts established at the first trial are clearly stated, and the law applicable thereto plainly, unambiguously, and definitely expounded in the opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, voicing the views of the court on the former appeal, as follows:

"Carmichael was the owner of a tract of land containing 1,126.64 acres, more or less, which he proposed to subdivide and sell to purchasers in small tracts. He desired to make some arrangement whereby water could be furnished for irrigation and domestic use on said tracts. With this in view he and said Water Company, on December 16, 1912, entered into an agreement whereby the Water Company agreed that for a sum equal to $10 an acre for each acre of Carmichael's land, the area to be determined by a subsequent survey, which sum Carmichael thereby agreed to pay to said Water Company, it would execute to each of the expected buyers of tracts of such land a contract to furnish the tract bought by them with water perpetually, at the yearly charge of $4 per acre for irrigation and $1 a month for domestic use, the said right to be appurtenant to such tract so bought. The agreement recited that Carmichael had paid to the Water Company $7,000 of the sum agreed to be paid by him as aforesaid. The second agreement was as follows:

" 'Sacramento, Calif. December 16, 1912. This is to acknowledge that American Canon Water Company has this day received from D. W. Carmichael on account of contract of even date herewith, for the furnishing of water on 1,126.64 acres of land on the Haggin grant, the sum of $7,000.00, gold coin of the United States of America, as part payment of the said contract. That the balance due on said contract is the sum of $4,126.65. American Canon Water Company, By O. G. Hopkins, Attorney.

"'I hereby acknowledge the foregoing to be a correct statement of the amount paid and the amount still due and unpaid on said contract. D. W. Carmichael.'

"An account stated is defined as 'an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties.' It is not necessary that there should be cross-demands between the parties, or that the defendant's acknowledgment that a certain sum is due from him to the plaintiff should relate to more than a single debt or transaction. Baird v. Crank, 98 Cal. 297, 33 Pac. 63.

"'An account stated is a document, a writing, which exhibits the state of the account between parties and the balance owing from one to the other, and when assented to, either expressly or impliedly, it becomes a new contract.' Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556, 37 Pac. 504; Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 574, 150 Pac. 994.

"The first agreement created an indebtedness from Carmichael to the Water Company. On its face it showed that the amount of the original debt was $11,266.40 with a credit thereon of $7,000, which would leave a balance of $4,266.40.

"The second agreement expressly states that the balance due on the original debt is $4,126.65. The evidence shows that the first contract is dated November 30, 1912, and that it was acknowledged on that day by the executing officers of the Water Company, that some time after that date the second agreement was prepared, and that both were finally executed by delivery on the same day, December 16, 1912. It is conceded that the second refers to the first. The recital in the second that the first is 'of even date' with the second was a clerical error. The difference in the balance shown in the respective documents would appear to have been the result of error, or of payments made after the partial execution of the first. It is apparent from the terms of the second that its delivery, in contemplation of law at least, succeeded the delivery of the first. It assumes the pre-existence of the first agreement as a subsidiary contract. It does not itself create the original obligation, as claimed by respondent; it refers to the first agreement as the foundation thereof. The authorities cited by respondent to the effect that 'an account stated cannot be made to create a liability when none existed before' are therefore not in point.

"Nor does the second agreement constitute a mere calculation of the amount due as fixed by the terms of the first agreement, so as to bring it within the rule declared in cases like Jasper v. Lamkin, 162 Ala. 388, 136 Am. St. Rep. 34, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1237, 50 South. 337, where it was held that a statement of the amount due for principal and interest on promissory notes, made by the holder thereof and assented to as correct by the maker, is not an account stated. Here the amount to become due was not fixed with certainty by the first agreement. It was made to depend on the number of acres in the tract of land, which was to be ascertained by a survey. The second agreement obviated the necessity for a survey, or was the result thereof. In either case it differentiates this case from those referred to."

[1, 2] It seems to us that, after reading the above language, no one could doubt that it is thereby distinctly held that the instrument sued on is an account stated. The very fact that the court points out the distinction between this case, as it was presented to it, and the case of Jasper v. Lamkin, 162 Ala. 388, 50 South. 337, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1237, 136 Am. St. Rep. 33, between which and this counsel for the appellant sought on the former appeal to establish an analogy if not a pronounced similarity, is itself sufficient to indicate that in its opinion the court intended to hold, and does squarely hold, that the action was on a stated account. Note the following language of the court in that connection:

> "Here the amount to become due was not fixed with certainty by the first agreement. It was made to depend on the number of acres in the tract of land, which was to be ascertained by a survey. The second agreement obviated the necessity for a survey, or was the result thereof. In either case it differentiates this case from those referred to."

Thus, it will be observed that, in referring to the instrument sued on and the circumstances bringing it into existence, the court by its own language describes an account stated—that is, an agreed balance due on an account subsisting between the parties. The court, however, followed the above quoted language from its opinion with this observation:

> "But even if it could be said that the instrument cannot be sued on as an account stated, the plaintiff would still be entitled to recover. The complaint alleges its execution, a copy of it is made a part of the complaint, and there are allegations that defendant agreed to pay the amount stated therein, that payment has been demanded of him, and that he has failed to pay the same or any part thereof. The instrument is an acknowledgment of a debt due, the law implies a promise to pay the same, and it is a good foundation for an action, being in effect a duebill."

It is from this particular language that counsel for appellant here educe the proposition they so vigorously press upon us here that the Supreme Court did not hold, in its decision disposing of the former appeal, that the instrument represents an account stated. We do not so understand the language just quoted. The entire opinion must be read as a whole to ascertain the precise conclusion arrived at and announced. Viewing the language referred to alone and by itself or without reference to the preceding parts of the opinion, it might be capable of the construction which counsel ascribe to it; but when it is considered in the light of the language preceding it, the observations of the court upon which counsel appear to place sole reliance to support their view of the purport of the decision clearly enough justifies the conclusion that what the court intended to and in effect does say is this: That, while the instrument sued on is an account stated, the defendant, under the allegations of the complaint, could not in any event prevail, since the instrument, whatever it may be designated technically, involves the acknowledgment by the defendant of a debt due the plaintiff. It will be noticed that the court, after declaring in effect that the instrument is an account stated, uses these significant words in introducing the proposition last stated, "Even if it could be said," etc., which clearly shows, as we have in different language stated, that what the writer of the opinion had in mind and all he intended to say was that even if the court was required to adopt counsel's theory of the nature of the instrument sued on—a theory which the preceding language of the opinion plainly shows that it did not adopt—still the plaintiff was entitled to recover, inasmuch as the instrument involved the acknowledgment of a debt, etc.

[3] If then, it be true that, as counsel for respondent contend is the fact, that the evidence received at the two trials of the action is substantially the same in all vital particulars, it of necessity follows that the doctrine of the law of the case applies, and per consequence the instrument sued on must be held to involve a stated account; and this would be so even if it were necessary to concede that the Supreme Court was in error in holding that said instrument involved an account stated. See 2 Hayne, New Trial and Appeal, p. 1658; Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374; Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685; Gunter v. Laffan, 7 Cal. 588; Cordier v. Schloss, 18 Cal. 576; Phelan v. S. F., 20 Cal. 39; Haynes v. Meeks, 20 Cal. 288; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75; Ritter v. Stevenson, 11 Cal. 27; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 847; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 27 Pac. 356; Jaffe v. Skae, 48 Cal. 540; Sharpstein v. Friedlander, 63 Cal. 78; Blakenship v. Whaley, 142 Cal. 566, 76 Pac. 235; Franz v. Mendonca, 146 Cal. 640, 80 Pac. 1078; Lambert v. Bates, 148 Cal. 146, 82 Pac. 767; Ellis v. Witmer, 148 Cal. 528, 83 Pac. 800; Emerson v. Yosemite, 149 Cal. 50, 15 Pac. 122; Reeve v. Colusa, 151 Cal. 29, 91 Pac. 802.

In Brett v. S. H. Frank & Co., 162 Cal. 735, 739, 124 Pac. 437, 439, the court said:

> "It has been sometimes said that the doctrine of the law of the case is invoked only when the former decision as to the law is erroneous; that its application presupposes a previous error by which the court is bound. It does, indeed, go that far, if it becomes necessary to do so. But the last decision would be the same in a case where the first decision was not erroneous. The doctrine means simply this: That the court having once decided the law, and the cause having gone back to the lower court for further proceedings in accordance with the law as thus established, and the parties and the lower court having acted in reliance upon that law, this court will not, upon a second appeal, again enter into a consideration of the question, but, if the facts and circumstances are substantially the same, will treat it as settled law regardless of its accuracy. See Allen v. Bryant, 155 Cal. 258, 100 Pac. 704."

[4] We are, however, not to be understood as intimating the opinion that the Supreme Court was in error in holding that the instrument in question is an account stated. To the contrary, we think the court was right in so holding, and should ourselves say, upon further consideration of the case (this court originally held that the instrument sued on here was not an account stated—see 26 Cal. App. Dec. 302)[1] and, having again examined the documentary and oral evidence taken at the former trial, that it was thus clearly shown in said trial that the instrument was the culmination of a settlement of prior differences existing between the parties resulting from business transactions between them, and that it was agreed and so stated in the writing that a balance amounting to the sum of $4,126.65 remained due to plaintiff from defendant after said settlement was had. In other words, said evidence disclosed that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in a large sum of money; that they had a settlement of the account which resulted in the payment by defendant to plaintiff of the larger portion of such indebtedness, and that the parties then and there agreed and the defendant acknowledged in writing that there was a balance due from him to plaintiff, as a result of the transactions as to which the settlement was had in the sum of $4,126.65. This latter agreement and acknowledgment clearly amounted to an account stated within the definition of such a transaction as given by Mr. Justice Shaw in his opinion deciding the case.

To the above may be suggested an added consideration, viz.: That the Supreme Court, in its decision, distinctly holds, as we have seen, that, even if the instrument sued on could properly be held to be nothing more than a duebill or the acknowledgment of a debt, the plaintiff, under the averments of its complaint and the evidence disclosed by the former record then before the court, would be entitled to recover. Indeed, counsel for the defendant themselves, while not admitting that the instrument is a stated account, expressly concede that, if the instrument were supported by a consideration, it would form a sufficient basis for a recovery. This is the precise language of their brief:

> "We concede that this instrument [referring to the instrument sued on] admits an indebtedness. We concede that in a proper action this document could be made the basis of an action at law. We concede that if there was any consideration for this duebill, the defendant in this case cannot hope to escape."

[1] For opinion of Supreme Court, see 173 Pac. 999.

Now, as to the evidence in the record now before us. As above stated, we have examined the evidence taken at the former trial and compared it with the evidence received at the second trial, and we have not been able from such examination and comparison to perceive any substantial difference in the evidence of the two trials. The defendant went into the details of the several transactions leading to the execution of the instrument in question a little more elaborately at the second than he did at the first trial, but we have found absolutely nothing in his later testimony which tended to show that there was not, after the settlement referred to, an agreed balance due from defendant to plaintiff in the sum specified in the stated account upon which the action is based.

There is, however, this additional testimony given by defendant (responding to allegations of the answer to that effect) that, at the time of the settlement and the balance due from him was struck, the Water Company agreed to accept certain notes of a corporation designated and known as the "California Corporation" of the aggregate equal value to said balance in full payment thereof —that is, if said notes were found by the company upon investigation to be valid. Upon this testimony the argument is predicated that the instrument sued on was intended as a mere memorandum or duebill of the balance due which was to be paid by the delivery to the company of said notes. But, assuming that this evidence was not incompetent because its effect would be to insert a provision in the writing that it does not contain, and further assuming that an agreement such as the defendant said was had as to the mode of payment of the balance would take from the instrument sued on the characteristic of a stated account, there is, in our opinion, a conflict in the testimony upon that proposition. Mr. Hopkins, an attorney, acting as such for the Water Company in all the transactions involved herein between the Water Company and the defendant (and so far as the evidence in the record shows, the only person who was present and acted for the company in the settlement) testified at the last trial that he had some recollection of the defendant on some occasion proposing to him, as the agent of the Water Company, to pay the balance which it was agreed was due the plaintiff from the defendant with the notes of the California Corporation, but that he knew that if he said anything to defendant about the proposition "it was only to the effect that I had no authority to accept the notes; I don't recall any conversation on that date (date of the execution of the instrument sued on) on those notes." It will be seen that, while Mr. Hopkins did not directly or specifically testify that no such agreement was had relative to the payment of the balance of the debt with said notes, he in substance and effect did so testify. It was, at any rate, sufficient to produce a conflict in the evidence upon the proposition.

Counsel, however, vigorously assert that the evidence shows that there was no consideration for the account, and also a failure of consideration for the preceding agreements.

[5, 6] A written instrument imports a consideration for its execution—that is to say, a written instrument carries with it the presumption that it was made for a consideration. Civ. Code, § 1614. And, while, as a general rule, such presumption is a disputable one and may be controverted by proper evidence, it has been held that it is not subject to be disputed in the case of a stated account, unless fraud, duress, mistake, or other grounds cognizable in equity for the avoidance of an instrument, be pleaded or made an issue.

> "It is not open to a defendant," says the Supreme Court in Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 576, 577, 150 Pac. 994, 996, "to attempt to defeat the legal effect of such a contract by showing a lack of consideration in any other way [than that it was procured through fraud, etc.]. Thus, it is not open to a defendant in such a case merely to show that the account stated was based upon a disputed claim of the plaintiff's, which claim subsequently proved to be invalid. Nor would it be open to a defendant to show that the amount justly due was very much less than the amount named in the account stated. All such evidence going to a total or partial lack of consideration is forever debarred by the convention and agreement of the parties, for this is of the very essence of an account stated."

There is no claim here that the account stated was procured through fraud or duress practiced by the plaintiff or the mutual mistake of the parties or otherwise. Therefore, unless it was shown that there was, either in fact or in law, a total failure of consideration for the transactions or agreements out of which the stated account arose (and it was not so shown), the question of consideration is wholly foreign to the case.

[7] But, if it were important here to show that the record affirmatively discloses that the writing sued on and the agreements from which it resulted were supported by a consideration, there would be no difficulty in doing so, or in showing that there was not a failure of consideration. Indeed, from the defendant's own testimony, it clearly appears that he was indebted to the plaintiff in a large sum of money, that he paid in cash the larger portion thereof and at the same time executed a written acknowledgment that there was still due from him to the Water Company the sum of $4,126.65. His testimony that the Water Company had agreed to accept the notes of the California corporation as in payment of said sum is pregnant with an admission that he still owed that amount to the company, and that it was a debt incurred for a consideration. If there was no consideration for the instrument in question, it was a nudum pactum and not enforceable; he was under no obligation to pay it; then why offer to pay or express a willingness to pay as he does in his answer, in the said notes or at all? Moreover, the transactions, of which the stated account was the outgrowth, had been going on for some years, and involved several written agreements, one of which, in addition to the one to which the instrument sued on expressly refers, involved a lien given by him to the Water Company on certain of his lands, embraced in "Carmichael Colony No. 1," and other property, to secure the payment of money for water delivered and to be delivered to defendant's said lands, and in the negotiations culminating in the execution of the instrument evidencing the account stated, it was insisted by the defendant that said lien should be released, and it was released. There was also a controversy between the parties relative to unpaid water claims due the company for supplying water to "Carmichael Colony No. 1." The defendant said that, in securing an adjustment of all their previous transactions and in securing an agreement for water for Carmichael Colony No. 2, there was considerable "bickering" between them, he trying to get what he wanted for as little money as possible, while the Water Company was trying to get out of him all that it could. Finally an agreement was reached whereby the lien of Colony No. 1 was released and the agreement to supply Colony No. 2 with water and the instrument sued on were executed. It is not necessary further to go over the evidence herein, for we think we have stated enough of it to show that, as stated, the record discloses an abundance of evidence affirmatively showing that the stated account was and is supported by a consideration.

There are several other special matters of defense pleaded in the answer, but as to two of them there is no evidence in the record. These are: (1) That the property and water rights of the Water Company were, in the year 1913, under a trust deed, covering all said property and water rights, executed by the Water Company to the First Federal Trust Company, to secure a bonded indebtedness in the aggregate sum of $300,000, sold by said First Federal Trust Company, thereby divesting the Water Company of all right, title, and interest in and to said property and water rights, and therefore rendering the agreement of the Water Company to furnish Colony No. 2 with water impossible of performance; (2) that there was no promise by defendant to pay for water at rates in excess of $4 per acre per annum for irrigation purposes and $1 per month for domestic purposes, such rates being those fixed in agreements between the Water Company and water users owning lands adjoining those of the defendant. As to the latter proposition, it is to be added that it is at variance with the written agreement made at the time the stated account was executed and expressly referred to by the latter instrument.

[8] There is another point, however, which counsel for the appellant vigorously press upon us and it is this: That the agreement to furnish water to defendant at rates fixed by the agreement of the parties themselves is against public policy, and therefore void, inasmuch as the Water Company is a public service corporation, engaged in supplying a public use, which is subject to regulation by the public authorities vested by law with that power. This question was considered and disposed of adversely to the position of counsel on the first appeal by the Supreme Court. The court in its decision said:

> "Respondent suggests that the first agreement was an attempt to bind a public water company by a contract to furnish water for a fixed sum and at a fixed rate, and intimates such a contract is against public policy and invalid. But such a contract is valid unless the proper public authority interferes. Unless the public authorities find cause to abrogate or modify such contract, and until they do so, it is valid and enforceable between the parties" citing Southern Pac. Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 173 Cal. 291, 297, 159 Pac. 865, 867 (L. R. A. 1917E, 680).

In the last-named case, dealing with a contract whereby the Water Company agreed to deliver water into certain tanks of the appellants (Railroad Co. et al.) continuously and for an indefinite period of time and without further charge than that agreed to in said instrument, the court said, replying to the contention that said contract was against public policy and for that reason invalid:

> "We perceive no valid reason for holding the contract void because opposed to public policy. It is not claimed that it was not freely made, or that it was procured by fraud or undue influence. There is nothing inherently wrong in such a contract to give water service upon payment in advance. * * * Where the rates for water devoted to public use have not been fixed by public authority, the person in charge of the use and the consumer may freely contract regarding the price of service and the manner of payment, and such contracts will be deemed valid by the courts, and may be enforced by any appropriate mode. Fresno Canal, etc., Co. v. Park, 129 Cal. 437, 62 Pac. 87; Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 725, 730, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359, 93 Pac. 858; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 90, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, 106 Pac. 404.

There is sufficient in the evidence to warrant the conclusion that the American Canon Company was a public service corporation, engaged in supplying a public use, and was therefore subject, in the matter of its rates for water, and as to the manner in which such use should be administered, to regulation by public authority, but the record is absolutely barren of evidence tending to indicate or show that the public authorities had ever fixed the rates for the supplying of water by said company, or otherwise done anything or taken any step which would have the effect of interfering with or abrogating the agreement between the parties to this action.

We cannot see wherein the cases cited by the appellant are in point here. In Crow v. San Joaquin, etc., Irr. Co., 130 Cal. 313, 62 Pac. 562, so cited, the action was to recover damages for the refusal of the water company, which was engaged in supplying a public use, to furnish the plaintiff water for the irrigation season of a certain year. The Water Company undertook to defend against the action on the ground that the plaintiff had failed and refused to pay his water bills to said company for water furnished him in previous years, claiming that the contract under which it supplied the plaintiff water during said years had annexed to it the company's regulations, to which he subscribed, whereby it was made a condition precedent to the right to receive water from the company that all dues and claims for previous supplies should be paid. The court held that the use of water, in this state, is a public use (Const. art. 14, § 1), and that to carry out that provision of the Constitution the Legislature had passed an act (Stats. 1885, p. 95) making it the duty of the company administering such use, "upon demand therefor and tender of the established water rates, to sell, rent, or distribute such water to the inhabitants" within the territory of such water supply "at the established rates regulated and fixed therefor, as in this act provided, whether so fixed by the board of supervisors or otherwise," etc. The court in its opinion further said that if the regulations of the company referred to "could be considered as * * * binding upon the user of water for all future time, it would be without consideration; for it was the duty of the defendant company to furnish the plaintiff with water whether he agreed to the regulations or not."

[9] Of course, it would be doubted by no one that if this was a case where the company had refused to supply the defendant with water for any reason, the latter could compel the company to supply him with water at rates fixed either by the rate-fixing power or in the absence of rates having thus been fixed, by the company itself upon a reasonable basis or a basis not prohibitive, even though the defendant were in arrears to the company in payment for past service. As shown, the latter case is the situation here, so far as we are advised by this record, and there is no claim that the rates agreed upon between the parties or exacted by the plaintiff are exorbitant or so unreasonably high as to be prohibitive.

Among the other comparatively recent cases referred to by appellant on this question are Lowe v. Yolo Co., etc., Power Co., 157 Cal. 503, 108 Pac. 297; Lowe v. Yolo Co., etc., Water Co., 8 Cal. App. 169, 96 Pac. 379; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, and many other earlier cases, in none of which have we been able to discern anything inconsistent with the view that a private contract between a water company and a water user for water in cases where the public authorities have not established the rates which the company may charge for supplying water to the public is not against public policy and void.

We have found no reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is accordingly affirmed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

1. Estoppel 🔑9—Allegation in pleading binding on mortgagor, commissioner, and privies in subsequent action.

Where plaintiff in foreclosure of mortgage alleged that a certain person was a legal trustee under a deed of trust, such allegation was binding on the mortgagee, the commissioner in the foreclosure suit, and a subsequent purchaser of the lands from the mortgagee, which bid in the property, and they were estopped to deny that such person was the proper and legal trustee when he subsequently made tender to redeem; such person having performed the duties of trustee under the deed of trust and having been recognized as such, although he was not appointed trustee in strict accordance with the provisions of the trust deed.

A bondholder under a trust deed was, as such, a creditor of a company owning the property, and was entitled to a lien upon the property by virtue of the deed of trust as security for the payment of the bonds held by him, and was in a position as a lien creditor to redeem the property from a sale under foreclosure of a prior mortgage, under Code Civ. Proc. § 701.

3. Mortgages 🔑606—Notice of redemption constructive notice to subsequent purchasers.

Where person having right to redeem from sale of land under foreclosure gave a sufficient notice in writing to the commissioner, and forthwith filed a duplicate thereof with the recorder of the county where property was situated, subsequent purchasers of the land had constructive notice thereof, and it was immaterial that a subsequent purchaser was led by purchaser at foreclosure sale to believe that no redemption had been attempted, and had exercised due diligence to learn from the records of the county if any notice of redemption had been filed, but, through some error or oversight in the recorder's office, obtained no actual knowledge of the filing for record of such notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by John Mitchell as trustee, etc., against George W. Price as commissioner, etc., in which Charles C. Polk intervened. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

C. L. Claflin and Kaye & Siemon, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Foster & Barnhart and T. F. Allen, all of Bakersfield, for respondent and intervener.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for a writ of mandamus. In the month of August, 1903, A. J. McVean was the owner of the real property described in the complaint, and in that month he executed a mortgage thereon to the Kern Valley Bank for the purpose of securing payment of a promissory note in the sum of $1,000. Thereafter and prior to August, 1905, he conveyed the property to the Buckeye Refining Company, a corporation, which on the 1st day of that month executed to Luther Allen a deed of trust thereof as security for the payment of bonds to the amount of $12,000, to be issued by the Buckeye Refining Company, and which were in fact issued to the extent of $10,000. Neither McVean nor said corporation paid the note given by the former to the Kern Valley Bank, and the corporation also defaulted in the payment of principal and much of the interest which became due upon said bonds. At some time prior to the month of February, 1908, the bank commenced an action to foreclose its mortgage, and obtained judgment, under which, in the said month of February, 1908, the defendant George W. Price, the commissioner in said foreclosure suit, sold the property at public sale; the Kern Valley Bank becoming the purchaser thereof.

In December, 1908, an action was commenced to foreclose the deed of trust by John Mitchell, the plaintiff herein, in which he alleged the death of Luther Allen and the appointment of himself as the successor of said trustee, and that such action was commenced by him in his capacity as trustee and also as one of the owners and holders of bonds secured by said trust deed, and in behalf of and for the benefit of all the bondholders. In that action judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the trustees of said Buckeye Refining Company, then a defunct corporation, for the amount due, with appropriate recourse against the security. In the meantime, and within one year after the sale under the bank's foreclosure suit, the plaintiff herein, as trustee and bondholder as aforesaid, on his own behalf and that of his fellow bondholders, offered in writing to redeem said property from said sale, and at the same time tendered to said commissioner the full amount due upon said judgment in favor of the Kern Valley Bank. The commissioner refused to accept the tender or to give to the plaintiff a deed to the property, whereupon the amount of money so tendered was deposited by the plaintiff in the Bank of Bakersfield, a bank of good financial standing, and written notice of said deposit was served upon the defendant. A duplicate of the notice of redemption was also filed with the county recorder.

After the expiration of one year from the entry of said judgment in foreclosure, and on February 6, 1909, the defendant executed and delivered a commissioner's deed of the property to the Kern Valley Bank, which shortly thereafter transferred its interest therein to certain persons, including Charles C. Polk, the intervener herein, who later acquired the interests of his cotenants.

With two exceptions, the trial court in the present suit found in favor of the plaintiffs substantially on all the issues, but found that no action had been taken as provided in the said deed of trust for the appointment of a successor to Luther Allen, the original trustee, and that John Mitchell was not the trustee under the deed of trust. The trial court also found that the intervener before purchasing the property made diligent search through the records of Kern county to ascertain the condition of the title thereto, and found nothing therein to disclose any tender to redeem said property from the foreclosure sale, and that neither he nor any of his predecessors in interest had any actual knowledge of the tender or offer to redeem the property, or that said plaintiff was at all interested therein. Upon these two findings judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] As to the first of these findings, it is true that the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff was appointed trustee in strict accordance with the provisions of the trust deed, but we think that neither the defendant nor the intervener is in a position to raise the point. From the record it appears that the plaintiff had performed the duties of trustee under the deed of trust, and had been recognized as such by the officers of the Buckeye Refining Company, for at least two years, and that while acting as such trustee he had recovered a judgment foreclosing the trust deed; that in the foreclosure suit of the Kern Valley Bank the Buckeye Refining Company and John Mitchell, plaintiff herein, were made parties defendant, and in the complaint therein it was alleged that John Mitchell was the legal trustee under the deed of trust. This allegation was binding upon the Kern Valley Bank, and no doubt would estop, not only the bank and the defendant Price (who as commissioner in effect represented the bank), but also the intervener, the successor in interest of the bank, from denying in this action the status of the plaintiff as trustee under the deed of trust.

[2] Aside from this, plaintiff was entitled to maintain this proceeding for another reason. It is not disputed that he brought this proceeding, not only as trustee, but also as a bondholder, on behalf of himself and numerous other bondholders. As such bondholder he was a creditor of the Buckeye Refining Company, the owner of the property at the time of the foreclosure sale, and accordingly was entitled to a lien upon the property by virtue of the deed of trust as security for the payment of the bonds held by him, and, consequently, was in a position as a lien creditor to redeem the property. Code Civ. Proc. § 701; Frink v. Murphy, 21 Cal. 108, 81 Am. Dec. 149; Jones on Mortgages, § 1055.

[3] With regard to the other finding concerning the notice of redemption, it appears that the intervener had been led by the bank officials to believe that no redemption had been attempted, and had exercised due diligence to learn from the records of the county if any notice of redemption had been filed, but through some error or oversight in the recorder's office he obtained no actual knowledge of the filing for record of such notice. But it is undisputed that the plaintiff gave a sufficient notice in writing to the commissoner, and forthwith filed a duplicate thereof with the recorder of the county where the property is situated, which was all that he was required under the law to do in order to effect a redemption and to impart constructive notice thereof to subsequent purchasers.

Notwithstanding the attack made by the appellant upon the judgment in this case, the respondent has not seen fit to give to the court the benefit of his familiarity with the case nor his investigation of the law bearing upon it, preferring, perhaps, to reserve his energy for the preparation of a petition for rehearing.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the findings in the cause.

MOSHER v. JOHNSON. (Civ. 3740.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 20, 1921.)

Appeal and error ⚷755—Duty of respondent to assist court on appeal.

It is the duty of a respondent who has secured a meritorious judgment to assist the court on appeal by pointing out the reasons why the action of the lower court should be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by George T. Mosher against Gertrude B. Johnson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Forgy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. D. Colling, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action for damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of the refusal and failure of the defendant to purchase certain personal property, the furniture of an apartment house, according to the terms of a written agreement, which provided that the price therefor should be determined by arbitration. Judgment was accorded to plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

It was alleged in the complaint, and the court found, that it was the agreement of the parties relating to the purchase and sale of the furniture that, if the parties could not agree upon the price, said price should be determined by "arbitration in the usual mode," each of said parties selecting one arbitrator, and these two securing a third, the decision of any two to be decisive as to the price to be paid, which was to be the reasonable value of the furniture at the time of the sale. The contract also provided that should the defendant not exercise her option to purchase the furniture the plaintiff might require her to do so, and if they could not agree upon the value at that time, it should be "forthwith determined by arbitration as aforesaid," referring back to the former provision. After the original contract was entered into, the parties modified it by a supplemental agreement extending the time for the purchase of the furniture by the defendant, and again stipulated that, in the event of a failure to agree upon the price, the amount "was to be settled upon the same terms as in the original agreement, viz. each party to elect one person, in case of disagreement these two parties to select another, other conditions being the same." When the plaintiff demanded that defendant purchase the furniture, the parties being unable to agree, plaintiff selected Victor E. Stedman and the defendant designated Thomas B. Clark, as appraisers, who appraised the furniture at $5,666.54. This finding was reduced to writing, signed by each of the appraisers, and served upon each of the parties.

The court further found the amount arrived at by the appraisers to be the fair and reasonable value of the furniture on the date of the appraisement, and that the defendant acquiesced and agreed to all the acts of the arbitrators, or appraisers, and accepted and ratified their findings. It accordingly gave judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $5,666.54 and costs.

Appellant contends that these findings have no support in the evidence, resting her contention, we think, more upon an interpretation of the contract than upon the insufficiency of the evidence. The respondent has not been sufficiently interested in the matter to enter an appearance in this court, no respondent's brief having been filed. We have no way of reaching parties who thus shirk the responsibility cast upon them by the appeal, and who, having secured a meritorious judgment, do not recognize the duty incumbent upon them of pointing out to the appellate tribunal the reasons why the action of the lower court should be sustained. It is as much the duty of the respondent to assist the court upon the appeal as it is to properly present a case, in the first instance, in the court below.

Notwithstanding respondent's neglect, we have examined the record, at the expense of our own time, and are satisfied that the judgment should be sustained. The lower court found, in effect, that the action of the parties, in arriving at the price the defendant was to pay plaintiff for the furniture, was a substantial compliance with their agreement, and that the finding of the arbitrators, or "appraisers," if the appellant likes that term better, was acquiesced in and agreed to by the defendant. There is evidence which, if believed by the trial judge, was amply sufficient to warrant the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOLTMAN v. BUTTERFIELD et al.

(Civ. 3676.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 17, 1921.)

2. Trial 🔑136(3)—Meaning of unambiguous letter is a question for the court.

The meaning of an unambiguous letter, claimed to constitute a promissory note, is a question of law for the court and not a question of fact for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Mattie Berkley Holtman against Charlotte M. Butterfield and another, executors of the estate of F. D. Butterfield, deceased. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action against the executors of the estate of F. D. Butterfield deceased, basing her claim upon a written instrument alleged to be a promissory note. The defendants denied the existence of any such note or other promise to pay to the plaintiff, on the part of the decedent. When the case came on for trial, a jury having been selected, plaintiff produced a witness who was sworn. Thereupon defendants objected to any evidence being offered or received in the case, upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the objection. The jury was discharged and a judgment of dismissal was entered, from which plaintiff has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

It is alleged in the complaint that on January 4, 1916, F. D. Butterfield, the decedent, made and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note in the sum of $15,000, payable three years after date, and bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, no part of which note had been paid except the sum of $1,200. After the death of Butterfield a claim, based upon and containing a copy of the alleged note, was duly presented to his executors and was by them rejected. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action. A copy of the instrument upon which plaintiff seeks to recover, and which was set forth in the claim, is as follows:

"Los Angeles, Jan. 4, 1916.

"Mrs. Mattie Berkley Holtman—My dear Mattie: Herewith you will find my note for fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000.00) payable in three years from date with interest at six per cent. Now dear Mrs. Holtman, you will remember I have often told you that I owed my present health and happiness to your totally unselfish and loving care of me while in the mountains two years ago, and elsewhere.

"I hand you this token that you may know how much out of my abundance I appreciate the kind regard have always shown to me during the last few years. When I see again I will endeavor to explain to you personally how much I have always appreciated your totally unselfish kindness. In the meantime accept the inclosed with my love and best wishes for your future health and happiness.

"Sincerely, F. D. Butterfield."

It is not claimed that a promissory note for $15,000, or for any other amount, was inclosed in or with the above instrument, or that there was any other writing delivered to or received by plaintiff other than said letter. Appellant contends, nevertheless, that the document is a promissory note; that it was recognized by the decedent during his lifetime as a valid obligation, evidence of which recognition, she asserts, is to be found in the fact that during his lifetime he paid her interest amounting to some $1,200, as alleged in her complaint. Her argument, in substance, is that this payment and alleged recognition of the obligation amounted to a construction put upon the document by the parties, that is binding upon the court if it appear that the instrument in question is ambiguous or indefinite. We are not impressed with this argument.

[1] It requires only a casual reading of this instrument to demonstrate that the trial court was correct in holding that no cause of action against the decedent's estate could be predicated thereon. It in no way rises to the dignity of a promise to pay $15,000, or any amount, to the plaintiff. It is very apparent that this particular instrument is nothing but a letter intended by the writer to accompany a promissory note, which he may have fully intended to execute and deliver to the plaintiff, and which by reason of the context of the writing, we may assume, he believed he was inclosing with it.

[2] We see nothing ambiguous or uncertain in the words contained in the letter sent by the decedent to the plaintiff. Their meaning was properly a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Swain v. Grangers' Union, 69 Cal. 186, 187, 10 Pac. 404; Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 330, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Heffner v. Gross, 179 Cal. 738, 742, 178 Pac. 860.

CANDEIAS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MERCED COUNTY.

(Civ. 2287.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 21, 1921.)

Certiorari 🔑5(2)—Will not issue where there is right of appeal.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, authorizing a writ of review when an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal, or any speedy and adequate remedy at law, the writ will not be issued to review a judgment alleged to have been without jurisdiction, from which an appeal would lie and in fact was taken, though the court refused to fix the amount of the appeal bond.

Petition by A. S. Candeias against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Merced for a writ of review to annul a judgment in an action of unlawful detainer. Writ discharged and proceedings dismissed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 957.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco, and O. F. Meldon, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding by A. S. Candeias to obtain a writ of review to annul a judgment of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Merced, in an action wherein William Pfitzer and Emily Pfitzer are plaintiffs and petitioner herein is the defendant.

A writ of review was issued out of this court December 15, 1920, commanding the respondent to certify to this court a transcript of the record and proceedings in said action. Respondent has appeared by a demurrer to the petition and a motion to dismiss the proceeding.

From the petition it appears that petitioner was a tenant of Pfitzer of an 80-acre dairy farm under a five-year lease, expiring December 31, 1922. At the time of the execution of the lease there were about 45 acres of the land planted to alfalfa, and among other conditions of said lease, the petitioner agreed to "keep all stock off of the alfalfa when the same is wet; * * * and in the event that any of the alfalfa is trampled out by stock, said party of the second part (petitioner) agrees to reseed the same at his own cost and expense."

The petitioner conducted said premises as a dairy farm and had about 80 head of dairy cows thereon.

April 21, 1920, the lessors commenced an action against the petitioner, in unlawful detainer, basing their cause of action upon an alleged violation of the foregoing provision of the lease, and in support of said action further alleged service of notice to surrender possession of said property and vacate the same within three days of service thereof, and that more than three days had elapsed since such service, and that the defendant (petitioner) refused to vacate and still continued in possession of the demanded premises. A copy of the demand is annexed to the complaint and made a part thereof. The demand is not in the alternative, requiring a performance of the covenants of the lease, or to deliver possession, but is a demand that the premises be surrendered, for failure to comply with the terms of the lease in "that you have pastured the land in alfalfa with your stock and allowed them to run thereon while the land was wet." Defendant answered denying the averments of the complaint as to his failure to comply with the terms of the lease. After a trial of the issues, the court made findings favorable to plaintiff and entered its judgment in accordance therewith. In due time defendant perfected his appeal to this court and made application to the trial judge, under the provisions of section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to fix the amount of a bond on appeal and for an order to stay the execution of the judgment upon the filing of the bond pursuant to section 1176 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but said judge refused and still refuses to fix the amount of said bond. It is further alleged in the petition that, if said judgment be not annulled in this proceeding, the same will be carried into execution before the cause can be heard on the appeal, and that there is no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy.

It is the contention of petitioner that, in an action in unlawful detainer, the jurisdiction of the court is special and limited, and the jurisdictional facts must clearly appear upon the face of the complaint, and unless they so appear the court acts in excess of its jurisdiction in trying the issues or rendering judgment thereon. He claims that the notice to deliver possession, not being in the alternative, as provided in subdivision 3, § 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, is insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court, and therefore this court should annul the judgment.

Under the view we take of this proceeding it is unnecessary to pass upon the questions raised by petitioner as to the sufficiency of the demand or the question of jurisdiction as those matters will be properly before the court on appeal. In actions of this character a right of appeal is given by section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, and of this provision of the law defendant has availed himself. Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides when a writ of review may issue as follows:

> "A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a police or justices' court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

In Noble v. Superior Court, 109 Cal. 523, 42 Pac. 155, after citing 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, it is said:

> "From this provision it is made manifest that three concurring requisites are essential to the issuance of the writ of review, viz.: (1) An excess of jurisdiction by the inferior tribunal, etc., exercising judicial functions; (2) that there is no appeal; (3) that there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

It thus clearly appears that one of the prerequisites to the granting of the writ of review is that there is no appeal. The defendant, having a right of appeal in the action sought to be reviewed, is therefore not entitled to the writ. The demurrer to the petition is sustained, the writ of review discharged, and the proceedings dismissed.

BREZZO v. BRANGERO. (Civ. 3523.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟹3(2)—Husband held entitled to withdraw from bank funds of deceased wife for necessities without administration.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1454, authorizing a surviving husband or wife without administration to collect from any bank deposits of deceased, not exceeding $1,000 on making affidavit, a husband after his wife's death, having made the proper affidavit, held entitled to withdraw a fund amounting to $320.70 from a bank, but such withdrawal did not give the husband title thereto; the intent of the statute being to provide a temporary fund for immediate necessities.

2. Husband and wife ⟹151(7)—Husband financially able to pay wife's funeral expenses cannot recover them from wife's estate.

Where a surviving husband is financially able to pay his wife's funeral expenses out of his own property without recourse to the money of the wife, he cannot maintain a cross-complaint to recover such expenses in an action by the wife's executor to recover the wife's bank deposits withdrawn by him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Isabella Brezzo, as executrix of the last will and testament of Margherita Brangero, also called Margherita Oldano, against Pietro Brangero. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Mazza, of San Francisco, and Geo. T. Kerr, of Watsonville, for appellant.

John L. McVey and M. Martino, both of Oakland, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff, as executrix of the last will of Margherita Brangero, deceased, brought this action to recover the sum of $320.70, which the appellant, the surviving husband of the deceased, withdrew from the Bank of Italy, after his wife's death, upon filing the affidavit provided for in section 1454 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and without procuring letters of administration. In such affidavit the defendant stated that he was the surviving husband of the deceased and that the total amount left by her on deposit in all the banks of the state of California at the time of her death did not exceed $1,000. It was stipulated at the trial that all of the money so withdrawn by the defendant was used by him in payment of the hospital expenses, doctor's bills, and funeral expenses of the deceased wife. The lower court decided adversely to Brangero, and gave judgment against him for the fund withdrawn from the bank. From that judgment he appeals.

Section 1454 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as pertinent to this appeal, reads as follows:

> "The surviving husband or wife [or other heirs, as the case may be] may, without procuring letters of administration, collect of any bank any sum which said deceased may have left on deposit in such bank at the time of his or her death; provided, such deposits shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars. Any bank, upon receiving an affidavit" stating the requisite facts, "may pay to said affiant or affiants any deposit of said decedent, if the same does not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, and the receipt of such affiant or affiants, is a sufficient acquittance therefor."

[1] On the former hearing of this appeal, in an opinion written by Mr. Justice (pro tem.) Beasly, this court said:

> "It seems to be conceded by respondent that under the provisions of section 1454 the person or persons therein authorized—denominated by the appellant as the next to kin—may collect from the bank deposits when the aggregate amount thereof does not exceed $1,000, but it is contended that the right to so collect does not affect the title to the fund as against legatees of the decedent to whom such fund is bequeathed; that the party entitled to collect the money from the bank may do so, but must keep the fund intact, subject to the order of the executor or administrator subsequently to be appointed.
> "The purpose of the Legislature in enacting the section is, we think, quite clear. It was to provide the family of the deceased with temporary funds for such immediate necessities as funeral expenses, and perhaps to provide ready money for their support pending the probate of their estate. This being so, the husband, having made the proper affidavit, was entitled to withdraw the fund from the bank, but this did not give the husband title to the fund, that is to say, it was not intended by the provisions of the section that the fund should become the property of the husband."

We are satisfied with, and adhere to, the conclusion thus announced, on the first question presented by the appeal.

In addition to claiming the fund as his own, the appellant filed a cross-complaint in the action, in which he sought a set-off amounting to $163.50, based on the fact that that sum was paid by him for the funeral expenses of his deceased wife. He had previously filed a claim against the estate for this amount, which not being acted upon, he elected to treat it as rejected, and based his cross-complaint thereon. The trial court disallowed the prayer of the cross-complaint. This court held its action improper and reversed the judgment in that respect. A petition for a rehearing was granted upon the single question as to the right of the appellant to recover upon his cross-complaint, and the matter was ordered placed upon the calendar for further hearing and determination of that question alone.

[2] Upon a further consideration of the question, and an examination of additional authorities bearing on the matter, we have reached the conclusion that the lower court was right in denying the defendant any set-off against the estate for the amount expended by him in payment of the funeral expenses of his deceased wife. If, as was the case in Re Estate of Mathewson (Sup.) 184 Pac. 867, the husband does not have sufficient income to pay the funeral expenses of the deceased wife, it may be proper under some circumstances, as indicated in that decision, to make an allowance to the husband for such purpose. But here the court found that the defendant, the surviving husband of Margherita Brangero, deceased, was financially able to pay the funeral expenses out of his own property and estate, without the necessity of any recourse to the moneys of the deceased wife. Consequently, he was bound to bury the deceased wife in a suitable manner, and to defray the necessary funeral expenses. In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 346, 34 Pac. 825.

The judgment is affirmed.

PALMER v. PALMER. (Civ. 3744.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Jan. 20, 1921.)

Divorce 🔑130—Evidence held to show extreme cruelty rendering denial of divorce error.

In an action for divorce, evidence held to show extreme cruelty, rendering it error for the court to deny plaintiff a divorce, where plaintiff's evidence showed that defendant had on several occasions brutally maltreated her physically, and some of such acts were sufficiently corroborated, and that defendant's conduct with other women inflicted great mental suffering upon plaintiff; defendant offering no rebutting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Ora Clark Palmer against William G. Palmer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest E. Noon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff in an action for divorce instituted by her against the defendant, her husband, alleging acts of cruelty and adultery upon his part. At the conclusion of the evidence for plaintiff the court directed that judgment be entered in favor of the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

It seems quite clear from the course pursued by the trial judge during the introduction of plaintiff's evidence, and particularly from his remarks at the conclusion thereof, that he was of the opinion that the plaintiff was seeking a divorce on the single ground of the defendant's adultery, and that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a decree in her favor upon that ground; whereas in truth her action was also based upon the ground of physical and mental cruelty, which the evidence abundantly established and in the absence of evidence on the part of the defendant in contradiction thereof, left the cause in such guise that the action of the trial court in dismissing the suit was erroneous.

The plaintiff and defendant were married in February, 1894, and at the time of the trial there were living as the issue of this marriage four children—Ethel, aged 16; Chester, aged 13; Oran, aged 12 years; and Paul, aged 5 years. The plaintiff testified to various incidents occurring between herself and the defendant, some of which we will refer to: The defendant is a member of a so-called religious sect known as "Holy Rollers" and a preacher and expounder of its doctrine. On one occasion (we will hope when he was off duty) he tore off all the plaintiff's clothes. Upon another he dragged her out of bed, and threw her across the room, and then drew her out onto an adjoining sleeping porch, took off her gown, and then beat her with his clenched fist, striking her upon the breast. As a result of this struggle she was sore all over for several days, and later the pain in her side and breast became so serious as to necessitate a surgical operation by removing the breast. At another time the defendant went to plaintiff's bedroom in company with a woman (named as the corespondent in this case), a Mrs. Walker, and awakened the plaintiff. Learning that the defendant desired to make some sort of confession to her the plaintiff objected to the presence of Mrs. Walker, who thereupon withdrew, and the defendant then got down upon his knees at the bedside of his wife, and informed her that Mrs. Walker had refused to become a member of their church, which she contemplated doing upon the following day, unless he had confessed to the wrongs he had done his wife, whereupon he stated that he had trifled with and been intimate with four women. Later that morning the defendant communicated to the plaintiff that Mrs. Walker was going to stay with them at their home. The plaintiff protested. Her objection was met by the defendant telling her that she had nothing to say about the matter; that "the Lord says Mrs. Walker is going to stay here, and she will stay." After this introduction to the plaintiff's home the defendant and said corespondent the next morning left for their church, the defendant telling the plaintiff that Mrs. Walker would be home for dinner. Notwithstanding the plaintiff's protest, Mrs. Walker returned with the defendant, and a place was arranged for her at the family table by one of the children. Subsequently, during Mrs. Walker's stay of three weeks at the Palmer home, and on one Saturday night after the plaintiff had cleaned her house and "put it in order for Sunday," and while she was getting the baby ready for bed, the defendant surprised his wife by transporting her bed and bedding from the upper to the lower floor of the house, saying that she should sleep downstairs, against which she unavailingly protested. While upon this point (as upon others) the record is not clear, apparently from December 2 to 28, 1917, when the plaintiff left her home she, her daughter, and the baby slept downstairs, while the two other children, their pastor father, and his newly found convert slept upstairs.

On this subject of the curious intimacy existing between this "Holy Roller" preacher and his coadjutor, the plaintiff also testified that "they had a bed in the study, where they spent a good many hours alone with the door locked"; that she objected to the defendant complying with Mrs. Walker's request to rub and hold her hand to relieve her fingers of numbness, and to his serving this intruder with breakfast in bed. On the morning before the plaintiff left the defendant and their home, she ordered Mrs. Walker to leave the house. On the following day, the 28th of December, it appears that a Mrs. Susie Barnell, a sister of the defendant, called to talk with him about his conduct towards the plaintiff. This lady was a witness at the trial, and testified that she at that time said to the defendant: "I am going to order Mrs. Walker out of the house. I am not going to have her tormenting Ora (plaintiff)." For this purpose she went upstairs, followed by the defendant, who warned Mrs. Walker, saying: "Lock the door. Susie is coming." A quarrel ensued in the upper hall between the two women, Mrs. Walker pushing Mrs. Barnell through the hall and down onto the landing, the while tearing her underclothes to pieces. On her part Mrs. Barnell struck Mrs. Walker with an empty revolver at which the defendant became violent, so that the plaintiff directed two of the children, the girl and the baby, to leave the house, saying to the girl, "Papa may kill you." Mrs. Barnell having thrown the pistol downstairs, the defendant went after it, and, meeting his wife at the bottom of the stairs, struck her on the back of the head, knocking her to the floor and stunning her, and also pushed his sister Susie out of the house. It was this scene of violence which culminated in the plaintiff leaving defendant's home and not returning. Its details were given in testimony both by the plaintiff and Mrs. Barnell, and parts of it were corroborated by Oran Palmer, one of the children of the parties, 12 years of age. Ethel Palmer, their daughter and eldest child, testified that upon an occasion about 3 years prior to the trial, the defendant struck the plaintiff with his hand and took her into another room, where she heard her mother crying. Other witnesses testified that the defendant was with Mrs. Walker on two occasions at least alone at the church with the doors locked.

From this reference to the evidence, it is too clear to require argument that in the absence of rebutting testimony the plaintiff was entitled to a decree of divorce from the defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Her own evidence showed that the defendant had on several occasions brutally maltreated her physically, and some of these acts of cruelty were sufficiently corroborated, and the defendant's open association with Mrs. Walker, and insisting upon her retention in the home of the parties against the protest of the plaintiff, and his conduct there with and demeanor toward this woman on the one hand and the plaintiff on the other, constitute a plain instance of conduct on the part of a married person calculated to inflict great mental suffering upon his spouse, which the law regards as ground for dissolving the bonds of matrimony under which such a course of conduct is possible. MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 102 Pac. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45; Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 82 Pac. 967.

Counsel for the defendant in the trial court cross-examined none of the witnesses who testified for the plaintiff, nor did he call any witnesses on behalf of the defendant. He rendered no better, although less efficacious, service to his client in this court, where he has filed no brief nor presented any argument on his behalf. Thus unassisted, we think it follows from what we have above set forth that the judgment should be reversed.

It is so ordered.

GEARY v. DE ESPINOSA et al. (Civ. 3639.)

1. Statutes 🔑181(1)—Construed to effect legislative intent.

Statutes must be read and considered in conjunction with the legislative intent, and must be liberally construed to effect such intent.

2. Partition 🔑19—Authorized by remainderman out of possession.

Under the amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 752, by St. 1919, p. 319, which omitted from the section the original provision that plaintiff in partition must hold and be in possession of real property, a remainderman out of possession can maintain partition, though he could not do so under the section before amendment.

3. Partition 🔑12(5)—Remainder may be divided or sold subject to life estate.

In a suit for partition by a remainderman out of possession, where the property was all in possession of one life tenant, the interests of the several remaindermen may be partitioned by division or sale subject to the life estate, without interfering with the possession of a life tenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action of partition by J. L. Geary against Josefa Boronda De Espinosa and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition, and dismissing it, plaintiff and defendants Manuel D. Espinosa and others appeal. Reversed.

L. T. Jacks, W. G. Banta, and J. L. Geary, all of San Francisco, for appellant Geary.

R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for other appellants.

Russell Scott and C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent Spreckels Sugar Company.

Z. B. Stuart, C. W. Byrer, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for other respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action seeking to partition three parcels of real property. The lower court entered a judgment of dismissal upon the ground that the action could not be maintained under the provisions of section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the plaintiff, a remainderman out of possession, while the holder of the life estate was in possession. Plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll.

The action is one for the partition of three parcels of real property in Monterey county, containing more than 10,000 acres of land, possession of all of which, as alleged in the complaint, is held by the defendant Josefa Boronda De Espinosa as life tenant. The entire remainder in fee is held by the plaintiff and 15 of the defendants, as tenants in common, subject to certain leases and mortgages of individual interests of certain of the remaindermen in the property.

A general and special demurrer to the complaint was interposed by one of the defendants and overruled. Thereupon the life tenant and all of the defendant remaindermen answered. The answer of the holder of the life estate, Mrs. Espinosa, alleges her ownership in fee simple of 30 acres of the property, but otherwise admits all the material allegations of the complaint, and prays for a partition. All of the defendant remaindermen, except 2, in their answers also consent to partition. One of them, Z. B. Stuart, in his answer as first filed, averred that the entire property could be readily and beneficially divided without a sale, and joined in the prayer of the other defendants for the partition. Subsequently, by an amendment to his answer, Stuart denied that a partition could be had without great damage to him, and further alleged that litigation over their respective interests in the property was pending between himself and certain other defendants. Defendant B. A. Soberanes, as trustee for Salvador Espinosa, denies that partition can be made at all, for the reason that the defendant life tenant Josefa Boronda De Espinosa holds, and will hold, possession of the entire property, subject to the leases above mentioned, during her life.

The action was brought on for trial, and at the outset, upon the hearing, objection was made to the introduction of any evidence in support of plaintiff's case. After argument the court refused to admit the introduction of such testimony, reversed its former ruling, and sustained the demurrer to the complaint, theretofore interposed, without leave to amend. The plaintiff elected to stand upon his complaint. A judgment of dismissal of the action was thereupon entered.

The sole subject of investigation before the court on this appeal is whether or not the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. More specifically stated, the question to be determined is whether or not a remainderman out of possession, and not entitled to the present right of possession, may compel partition of the remainder while the life tenant is in possession of the entire property. It is the general rule, prevailing in England and in many jurisdictions in the United States, that no person has the right to demand a court to enforce a compulsory partition, unless he has an estate in possession—one by virtue of which he is entitled to enjoy the present rents, or the possession of the property as one of the cotenants thereof. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 446; Mills v. Stump, 20 Cal. App. 84, 89, 128 Pac. 349. Section 752 of our own Code of Civil Procedure, under the provisions of which this action may be maintained, if at all, as it stood before the amendment adopted in 1919, was as follows:

> "When several cotenants hold and are in possession of real property as parceners, joint tenants, or tenants in common, in which one or more of them have an estate of inheritance, or for life or lives, or for years, an action may be brought by one or more of such persons for a partition thereof, according to the respective rights of the persons interested therein, and for a sale of such property, or a part thereof, if it appear that a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners." (The italics are ours.)

While recognizing that in some of the states the statutes are broad enough to include the holders of nearly every estate that can exist in lands as proper parties plaintiff in this kind of an action, the Supreme Court held that in this state under the section as it then stood, it was only the cotenants mentioned therein who held and were in possession of real estate, who could bring an action for partition, and that it was only that real property which was thus held by them that could be partitioned. Jameson v. Hayward, 106 Cal. 682, 686, 39 Pac. 1078, 46 Am. St. Rep. 268.

In 1919, however, and before this action was brought, the section was amended to read as follows:

> "When several cotenants own real property as joint tenants, or tenants in common, in which one or more of them have an estate of inheritance, or for life or lives, or for years, an action may be brought by one or more of such persons for a partition thereof," etc. Stats. 1919, p. 319.

[1] Appellant argues that by this amendment the bar of the common law and of the former statute in this state has been removed, and that he is now entitled to maintain the action, although not now in, or entitled to, possession of the property sought to be divided. His contention appears to be based upon a reasonable construction of the section as it now stands. Statutes must be read and considered in conjunction with the legislative intent, and then be liberally construed with the object in view to effect such intent. Odell v. Rihn, 19 Cal. App. 713, 719, 127 Pac. 802.

[2] When adopting the amendment of 1919 to the section, the Legislature had before it the bar of the common law and of its own enactment as it then stood. It was then, as now, the law in a number of states that a remainderman, although not in possession, might bring a partition suit. Crowley v. Sutton (Mo.) 209 S. W. 902, 903; Doerner v. Doerner, 161 Mo. 407, 61 S. W. 802; Deadman v. Yantis, 230 Ill. 243, 250, 82 N. E. 592, 120 Am. St. Rep. 291; Stahl v. Buffalo R. & P. Ry. Co., 262 Pa. 493, 106 Atl. 65, 67; Hanson v. Ingwaldson, 77 Minn. 533, 538, 80 N. W. 702, 77 Am. St. Rep. 692. These decisions appear to be based upon statutes reading so like ours as to be practically the same in effect.

Consequently we think it but fair to assume that, when the Legislature so amended section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure as to strike from it the provision that in order for a cotenant to maintain an action in partition he must hold and be in possession of real property, and permitted the action to be brought by one who may merely own real property, as such tenant in common, it must have intended to remove the restriction of the common law and of its own prior enactment. To so hold does no violence to settled rules of law, for while it may be true, as pointed out by the respondent, that more jurisdictions interpose the common-law bar of a right of possession, as a prerequisite to maintaining an action in partition, than hold to the contrary, it was well within the province of our own Legislature to adopt either rule, as it deemed best. It therefore becomes unnecessary for us to enter into a minute discussion of the cases cited by the respondent, which support the rule in force in this state before the amendment to this section.

We are of the opinion that it is now the rule in this state that actual possession, or a right of actual or immediate possession, is no longer necessary in order to enable a cotenant to maintain an action in partition, if he otherwise falls within the provisions of section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it now reads. Fitts v. Craddock, 144 Ala. 437, 439, 39 South. 506, 113 Am. St. Rep. 53; Easly v. Easly, 78 Wash. 505, 510, 139 Pac. 200. Clearly under the decisions above noted the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action against all the other holders of remainder interests in the real property. It is unnecessary for us to further consider the question whether or not the action will lie against the defendant Josefa Boronda De Espinosa, owner of the life estate, which is raised by some of the authorities (Smalley v. Isaacson, 40 Minn. 450, 42 N. W. 352), for she joined in the prayer of the plaintiff and certain of the other defendants that the real property be partitioned in conformity with the interests of the respective parties. It is certain, of course, that the decree in the partition suit can in no wise affect her rights.

[3] Furthermore, there is no necessity for disturbing the interest of Mrs. Espinosa, for there can be an actual partition, as between the reversioners, by each taking his share in severalty, subject to her life estate, or the whole may be sold subject to her interest. Hanson v. Ingwaldson, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

HARDY v. FREY et al. (Civ. 3340.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⟹151(3)—Mechanic's lien superior to subsequently delivered mortgage.

Where, after plaintiff, pursuant to contract, entered upon a lot and commenced construction work, a mortgage executed by the owner was delivered, plaintiff's mechanic's lien is superior under Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, declaring that liens provided for are preferred to any mortgage which attached subsequent to the time when building was commenced; there being nothing to show that plaintiff was estopped from asserting the superiority of his lien over the mortgage because of its deposit in escrow before the commencement of building.

2. Appeal and error ⟹907(3), 931(1)—Findings must be construed most favorably in support of the judgment.

Findings must, where possible, be construed most favorably in support of the judgment, and, in the absence of the bill of exceptions, they are presumed to be true for the purpose of the appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⟹907(3) — Presumption that there was no evidence offered on issue on which there was no finding.

Where there was no finding on the issue of estoppel raised by defendant's answer and the appeal was on the judgment roll alone, judgment for defendant cannot be sustained on the theory that the affirmative answer which is deemed to be denied should be taken as true, for since there was no finding the appellate court will presume no evidence was introduced in support of that allegation of the answer.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by H. M. Hardy against Mrs. Elizabeth C. Frey and others and John F. Tanner. From a judgment for defendant John F. Tanner, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. L. Brady and J. L. Brady, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment went against plaintiff, from which he appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

It appears from the findings that on October 9, 1914, defendant Elizabeth C. Frey acquired by purchase a lot, title to which prior to said date had been vested in the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank. In anticipation of the purchase and while negotiations therefor were pending, she, on September 17, 1914, entered into a contract with plaintiff whereby he undertook and agreed to erect a dwelling house upon the lot for her. In pursuance of the contract he, on October 5, 1914, entered upon the lot and commenced the work of constructing the house. Four days later, to wit, on October 9th, the property was conveyed to Mrs. Frey, at which time a mortgage thereon, which, known to plaintiff, she had theretofore signed and acknowledged, was, by the party in whose hands it, with other papers, had been deposited in escrow, delivered to defendant John F. Tanner and filed for record. Upon these facts the trial court as a conclusion of law found the mortgage so given to Tanner was superior to plaintiff's lien for constructing the house.

[1] In so doing the court, in our opinion, erred. An indispensable requisite to the validity and operation of a mortgage is delivery thereof. While, as found by the trial court, plaintiff knew that Mrs. Frey had signed and acknowledged the mortgage in question, and that Tanner had agreed to loan her $1,200 upon the same, this cannot be construed as equivalent to a finding that the mortgage was delivered; and especially is this true since the court further found the mortgage was not delivered until October 9, 1914. Hence the lien of the mortgage did not attach to the lot until a date subsequent to that upon which the plaintiff commenced the work of constructing the house, and therefore, as provided in section 1186, Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff's lien must be deemed superior to the mortgage.

While it appears that the mortgage and other papers relating to the transaction were, at the time plaintiff commenced the erection of the house, deposited in escrow, the nature of the agreement under which the deposit was made is not shown; nor, conceding the agreement to have been of such character that the deposit of the mortgage in pursuance of its terms could be said to constitute delivery thereof to Tanner, nevertheless it is not made to appear that plaintiff had knowledge or notice of the fact that such deposit in escrow was made. No facts are found upon which to insist that plaintiff was estopped from asserting his claim of lien. The argument of respondent's counsel and theory upon which the trial court apparently based its conclusion appears to rest upon the fact alone that, since plaintiff knew Mrs. Frey had signed and acknowledged the mortgage, the subsequent consummation of the loan and delivery of the mortgage rendered it superior to plaintiff's lien. To so hold would be contrary to the express provision of section 1186, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that—

> "The liens provided for in this chapter are preferred to any * * * mortgage * * * which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building * * * was commenced; * * * also to any * * * mortgage * * * of which the lien-holder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time the building * * * was commenced."

[2, 3] In his answer and by way of estoppel, defendant alleged:

> "That the said Hardy agreed to and with this defendant on or about August 22, 1914, that the said lien of defendant's said mortgage was and is superior and paramount in time and right over any alleged lien or claim of lien upon the part of the plaintiff Hardy or of any one or all of the plaintiffs hereinbefore mentioned or of any other person, firm or corporation whatever"—which affirmative allegation is deemed to be denied.

Notwithstanding such denial, the court made no finding in response to the issue. Nevertheless, since the evidence is not brought up, respondent insists that we must accept the allegation of the answer as being true. We do not so understand the law. Findings must, where possible, be construed most favorably in support of the judgment (Ballou v. Sunflower, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 559, 132 Pac. 1036), and in the absence of a bill of exceptions, they are presumed to be true for the purposes of the appeal (Freman v. Marshall, 137 Cal. 161, 69 Pac. 986). Nevertheless a judgment cannot be upheld unless it is supported by the findings. Appellant is not complaining of any error due to the failure of the court to find upon defendant's affirmative allegation. He is not prejudiced by reason thereof, and hence, since there is no finding that the allegation is true, we must presume no evidence was introduced in support thereof. Engebritsen et al. v. Latin-American Pub. Co., 38 Cal. App. 141, 175 Pac. 652.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by T. E. Berry against the Miami Cycle & Manufacturing Company, in which defendant cross-complained. Judgment for defendant on cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis Sherman Jones and Edward E. Gray, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cates Robinson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged breach of the warranties of an agreement entered into between the parties, by the terms of which the plaintiff and one F. M. Hodge were made the sole and exclusive agents of the defendant for the sale of a certain type of motorcycle, known as Flying Merkle motorcycle, throughout certain portions of Southern California, and by which said agreement, according to the plaintiff's contention, the defendant warranted said motorcycles to be free from imperfections in the nature of latent defects arising from the process of manufacture, but that a large number of said motorcycles were defective in these respects, and for that reason unmerchantable, to the damage of the plaintiff and said Hodge in a certain sum. Hodge is alleged to have conveyed his right of recovery to the plaintiff prior to the inception of the action. The defendant in its answer denied the averments of the plaintiff's complaint as to any breach of warranty on its part and as to any damage resulting therefrom, and by way of cross-complaint sought to recover from the plaintiff the sum of $723.71 upon a book account for motorcycles and motorcycle parts sold to plaintiff, and for which he had failed and refused to pay.

Upon the trial of the action evidence pro and con was presented by the respective parties, which covers 710 pages of the reporter's transcript on appeal. The trial court from this evidence found against the plaintiff's claim as to the defendant's breach of its warranties in the respects indicated, and expressly found that the motorcycles delivered to the plaintiff were in every particular free from imperfections in material and workmanship, and were in serviceable working order at the time of their said delivery, and that, with the exception of four of said motorcycles, they were free from the specific latent defects specified by the plaintiff as existing in them, and as to these defective machines their depreciation in value by reason of the existence of said latent defects amounted altogether to the sum of $18.50. The court further found that the defendant was entitled to recover from the plaintiff upon its cross-complaint in the sum of $723.71. It accordingly rendered judgment against the plaintiff for the difference in these two sums, namely, the sum of $705.21. It is from this judgment that the plaintiff has prosecuted the present appeal.

[1] The sole contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the trial court. He has failed to file in support of this contention or present any supplement to the typewritten transcript, or any adequate statement of the evidence embraced within its 710 pages, and the sole reference to the evidence in the case is contained in a scant seven pages of his brief. A cursory examination of the transcript shows that practically the whole thereof is occupied with testimony upon the main issue in the case, and that upon that issue the defendant presented many pages of testimony, consisting, for example, in the evidence of its agents in charge of the manufacture of these motorcycles, who testified as to the careful tests to which every machine issuing from its factories was subjected before leaving the same, both in the factory and on the road, which strongly tended to show the practical impossibility of the existence to any considerable degree of the defects which the plaintiff claimed to exist in these motorcycles. There was also evidence presented on the part of its sales agents, who came in contact with the plaintiff and his associate Hodge during the several years when they were acting as the defendant's representatives in the sale of these motorcycles, and whose testimony showed that no complaint had ever been made by either of them as to the existence of the particular defects to which they testified at the trial. The defendant also offered numerous letters written by the plaintiff in ordering parts for replacement in motorcycles already delivered and in use, in none of which did it appear, either that complaint was made of these claimed defects, or parts ordered for their replacement. Evidence of this character is scattered all through this voluminous transcript, and is such in volume and amount as to amply sustain the finding of the trial court that the particular defects to which the plaintiff testified on the trial of the cause had no existence in fact or to any greater extent than that found to exist in four of these machines. The evidence as to the plaintiff's indebtedness to the defendant in the sum set forth in its cross-complaint also amply sustains the finding of the trial court in that regard.

[2, 3] The appellant's contentions herein are utterly without merit, and he should be penalized for taking and prosecuting a frivolous appeal. This court would have no hesitation in affixing this penalty were it not for the fact that to impose it would redound to to the benefit of the respondent herein, who on its part is grossly at fault in this case for failing to present or file in this court a respondent's brief, and for which, did the statute permit, it should also be penalized.

PHŒNIX v. GIBSON. (Civ. 3683.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Conclusions of fact not disturbed where supported by evidence.

Trial court's conclusions of fact will not be disturbed on appeal where supported by sufficient evidence.

2. Quieting title 🔑44(3)—Evidence held to prove agreement to sell land and reimburse defendant's intestate for improvements made.

In action to quiet title, evidence held to sustain defendant's claim that her intestate had made improvements on the land under agreement with plaintiff's intestate that, on completion of the improvements, the property should be sold and defendant's intestate reimbursed for making improvements.

3. Quieting title 🔑49—Court might order property sold pursuant to owner's agreement to sell and compensate another for improvements.

Where plaintiff's intestate owning land made agreement with defendant's intestate whereby the land was to be sold after defendant's intestate had made improvements thereon and that defendant's intestate was to be compensated for such improvements out of proceeds of sale, equity had jurisdiction, in the absence of any intervening rights of other parties, to order that the property be sold and that defendant be compensated out of proceeds for improvements made by intestate.

4. Appeal and error 🔑301—Contention urged for first time on appeal not considered.

The contention that the judgment is excessive, not urged in motion for new trial but made for the first time on appeal, not considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by Josie Phœnix, as administratrix of the estate of Hilario Lopez, deceased, substituted for Hilario Lopez, against Dorothy Gibson, as administratrix of the estate of William Gibson, deceased. From judgment for defendant on her cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. R. Van Wormer, Dist. Atty., of San Luis Obispo, for appellant.

Webster & Ryan, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant upon her cross-complaint in an action to quiet title to certain real estate. The action was one originally begun by one Hilario or "Joe" Lopez, who died during its pendency, and the present plaintiff, as the administratrix of his estate, was substituted in his place. Lopez was during his lifetime the owner of the property in question, but it is averred by the defendant in her cross-complaint that an agreement had been entered into between said Lopez and one William Gibson, of whose estate she is administratrix, that said William Gibson would improve and rebuild a dwelling house upon said premises, and that after the same had been completed the property should be sold, and from the proceeds of such sale said William Gibson should be reimbursed for the moneys expended by him in making said improvements, and that said Gibson had performed his part of said agreement at an expenditure of the sum of $1,200, no part of which had been paid. The plaintiff denied these allegations, and upon the issues thus raised the cause went to trial, at the conclusion of which the trial court made its findings in favor of the defendant upon her said cross-complaint, and thereupon entered judgment directing that the property in question be sold, and that from the proceeds of such sale the defendant be paid the sum of $1,200, together with her costs. It is from this judgment that the present appeal has been taken.

The first point urged by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the trial court as to the existence of the agreement upon which the defendant predicates her right of recovery. The proof of the agreement in question principally consisted in certain letters claimed by the defendant to have been written by said Lopez to William Gibson, the most important of which was a letter couched in the following terms:

> "Taft, Cal., Jan. 16, 1917.
> "Mr. Gibson: In reply to your note in regards to the property, you go ahead and fix things up and pay the taxes and when I come over we will try and sell it and you can get your money out. I haven't seen or heard from the girls for some time.
> "Yours respectfully, Mr. Lopez."

This letter appears upon its face to be an answer to a note or letter written by Gibson to Lopez, with the contents of which we are not made acquainted, and both of these were preceded by another letter from Lopez which read as follows:

> "Taft, Cal., Oct. 9, 1915.
> "Mr. Gibson: In regards to note about that property you go ahead and build you a house on 25 feet of it, and you can have it. You keep the taxes paid up in full. I went to Bakersfield to see Lola, but she was away, so if you want to pay the taxes and take twenty-five feet of that lot you can. As ever and respectfully—if you pay the taxes let me know.
> "Joe Lopez."

[1] This letter also appears to be an answer to a communication of some sort from Gibson the purport of which can only be inferred from the reply of Lopez. The authorship of these letters from Lopez was denied by him while a witness during the trial, and the proof of their authenticity rests upon a comparison of the signatures of Lopez with his admitted signature in other documents. The trial court had the original of each of these signatures before it, and had also before it the witness Lopez, whose testimony in relation to his ability to write and to his having made the agreement with Gibson was quite materially impeached upon cross-examination. From our own examination of these signatures we are of the opinion that the conclusions of the trial court as to the genuineness of the letters of Lopez is sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case, and will not therefore be disturbed upon appeal.

[2] The next question before us is as to whether or not these letters of Lopez afford sufficient proof of the agreement upon which the respondent relies to justify the court's findings as to the nature and effect of said agreement. It must be conceded that these letters, and especially the one under date of January 16, 1917, upon which the respondent chiefly depends, are indefinite as to the nature and extent of the work of improvement which Gibson was to do in relation to the building already upon the premises. This uncertainty would probably have been removed had the note to Gibson to which this particular letter was a reply been produced. It, however, was in the possession of Lopez, if in existence, which Lopez denied, and of which he also failed or refused to disclose the contents. His subsequent acts and conduct, however, in relation to the work which Gibson actually did in the way of improving the property, shed a strong light upon the understanding between the parties as to what the proposed improvements were to be at the time Gibson was directed to "Go ahead and fix things up," in the words of the letter of January 16, 1917. We are of the opinion that taking all these things into consideration the trial court was justified in making its finding to the effect that such an agreement as the defendant pleaded in her cross-complaint was made.

[3] This brings us to the appellant's concluding contention, which is that the evidence is insufficient to show that it was the intention of the parties to the said agreement to create a lien in Gibson's favor for the value of the work which he was to do in improving the building upon the premises in question. The trial court, however, does not so find, nor do we think such a finding was necessary to sustain that portion of its judgment which directs a sale of the premises and the payment from the proceeds of such sale of the amount due the estate of Gibson. All that the trial court did was to find that there was an agreement between the parties that after the improvement of the premises had been made the property was to be sold, and that out of the proceeds of such sale the costs of such improvements were to be paid. The letter of Lopez dated January 16, 1917, justifies the making of this latter finding, and all that the trial court undertook to do in this equitable proceeding was to carry this portion of the agreement between the parties into effect. We are pointed to no authority which denies this power to a court of equity, and have no doubt that it existed in the particular case before us in the absence of any intervening rights of other parties.

[4] The claim of the appellant that the judgment was excessive was not made to the lower court upon her motion for a new trial, and is urged for the first time upon appeal. It therefore comes too late; but, even if it were otherwise, our inspection of the record satisfies us that said claim is devoid of merit.

Judgment affirmed.

HARPER & REYNOLDS CO. et al. v. HAMMOND LUMBER CO. et al.

(Civ. 3183.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 14, 1920. On Rehearing Jan. 14, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 14, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⟹151(3)—Deed of trust given by owner to materialmen is prior to mechanics' liens.

Where an owner, to enable the contractor to obtain material, gives a deed of trust to a materialman, such deed of trust takes priority over the claims of subcontractors and other materialmen; consequently, where the deed of trust was given to the contractor to enable him to procure materials, and he assigned it to a lumber company, it still takes priority.

2. Mortgages ⟹151(3)—Deed of trust given contractor by owner takes priority over claims of mechanics, not being fraudulent.

Where a contract for the improvement of a building provided for payment of a sum to be raised by mortgage, and further provided that the owner should give the contractor a note secured by a second deed of trust, and in event that the expense of the work exceeded the two amounts the owner should pay the same, and it appeared from the fact that the work was being done on a cost plus basis that the deed of trust was to enable the contractor to obtain material, such deed of trust, having been assigned to a lumber company, takes priority over claims of materialmen in subcontractors or mechanics' liens; it not being open to attack as a constructive fraud upon them.

On Rehearing.

3. Mortgages ⟹151(3)—Trust deed given contractor held prior to mechanics' liens.

Where a contract for the alteration of a building provided that the owner should pay an amount realized by mortgage, and should give his note secured by second deed of trust to the contractor, who was working on a cost plus basis, and further required the contractor to submit all contracts to the owner, the contractor cannot be deemed an original contractor, so that the execution and acceptance of the trust deed was an attempt to assign a portion of the contract price, but the second trust deed stands on the same footing as the first mortgage, which was executed to obtain funds for the work, and having been assigned to a lumber company for materials, takes priority over the claims of subcontractors and materialmen.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Harper & Reynolds Company and others against the Hammond Lumber Company and others to foreclose mechanics' liens, the several actions being consolidated. From a judgment for plaintiffs foreclosing the lien, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Richard J. O. Culver, Behymer & Craig, and Wheeler & Sweet, all of Los Angeles (Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

WELLER, J. This appeal is from a judgment for plaintiff for the foreclosure of certain mechanics' liens. The only question in controversy is as to priority of the mechanics' liens over the lien of a trust deed on the property, executed by the owner to the general contractor as part payment, or as security for part payment, of the contract price. This trust deed was executed and recorded prior to the time when the building improvement was commenced, and before the commencement of the work or furnishing of materials which gave rise to the mechanics' liens. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll.

The findings material to the issue here are as follows:

"That on said April 29, 1915, the defendant Lawrence Holmes, as owner, entered into a contract with Fred W. Siegel, as contractor, wherein and whereby it was agreed that said Fred W. Siegel should furnish the necessary labor and materials to alter and repair said building, and to construct an addition thereto, of two stories of brick and of four floors and basement of brick in the rear of said building. That in and by said agreement it was agreed that said Holmes would pay to said Siegel the sum $11,500, which he would procure by way of a loan from Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, and would give to said Siegel his promissory note in the sum of $12,500, and secure the same by a trust deed upon the real property hereinbefore described, upon which said building was to be erected, in payment for work performed and materials furnished in the alteration and repair and addition to said building, as aforesaid. * * * That said trust deed referred to in paragraph 8 of these findings, to secure a note for $12,500, was executed on the 8th day of May, 1915, at Los Angeles, Cal., by the defendant Lawrence Holmes as party of the first part, the defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company as party of the second part, and the defendant Fred W. Siegel as party of the third part, and duly recorded on the 17th day of May, 1915, in Book 5987, page 252, records of said Los Angeles county. * * * That said Fred W. Siegel did on or about the 8th day of May, 1915, for valuable consideration, sell and assign said note and duly indorsed the same, together with said trust deed, to the defendant W. H. Elliot, and the said defendant W. H. Elliot was acting as agent for and in behalf of the defendant Hammond Lumber Company, a corporation; that said defendant W. H. Elliot, as such agent of Hammond Lumber Company and on its behalf, agreed to pay to said Siegel for said note and said trust deed, the sum of $12,500, in credits and materials, which credits and materials have been extended and furnished to said Fred W. Siegel, by the defendant Hammond Lumber Company.

> * * * That the execution of the trust deed referred to in paragraph 8 of these findings, by Lawrence Holmes, as owner of the real property and building upon which it was proposed to construct said alterations, repairs, and additions, as hereinbefore found, for the benefit of the defendant Fred W. Siegel as contractor for the construction of said alterations, repairs, and additions, prior to the construction of said alterations, repairs, and additions, upon said real property, was a constructive fraud upon the persons, firms, and corporations who are found herein to be entitled to enforce mechanics' liens upon said real property and the building situate thereon, under or through said Fred W. Siegel, as herein found. That in accepting said trust deed and the note which it secured, and in assigning the same as herein found, said contractor, Fred W. Siegel, attempted to assign a portion of the contract price for the construction of said alterations, repairs, and additions."

Thereafter the various claims of subcontractors and materialmen which form the basis of this action accrued. Ultimately, under a trustee's sale on default in payments on the note secured by the trust deed, the property in question was conveyed by the trustee to the appellant Elliot, as agent of the appellant Hammond Lumber Company, assignee of the promissory note secured by the trust deed.

There is no question raised as to the validity of the trust deed and subsequent sale and conveyance of the property by the trustee, except that it is claimed by respondents that it was in fraud of their rights as lien claimants and subject to their liens; and no dispute exists as to the validity of the lien claims other than the contention of appellants that they are subordinate to the trust deed.

The trial court found that the execution of this trust deed was a constructive fraud upon the persons, firms, and corporations entitled to mechanics' liens, and that the same was transferred by the contractor to the agent of the appellant Hammond Lumber Company in an attempted assignment of a portion of the contract price for the construction of the alterations, repairs, and additions to the building on the premises in question.

The theory upon which it is sought to subordinate this trust deed to the claims of the respondents is that the indebtedness evidenced by the promissory note to the original contractor and the trust deed securing the same was, and still continued to be, merely another form of security for the payments that would from time to time fall due under the contract for the building, and that the assignment to the appellant Hammond Lumber Company is subject to all the equities that respondents could claim, if the original contractor had continued as the direct beneficiary of the trust deed, and was himself claiming, as against subcontractors and materialmen, a preferential right in the money still owing under the contract from the owner.

As we understand respondents' contention, it is that the contractor obtained no new or superior claim on the funds that should become due and payable under his contract by virtue of the special promise to pay under the promissory note, and no higher security therefor by reason of the trust deed, than he would have had under the mechanic's lien law; and that the contractor or his assignee is limited to such recovery as is prescribed by section 1193 of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely:

> "Only such amount as may be due him according to the terms of his contract, after deducting all claims of other parties for work done and materials furnished."

It must be conceded that if the purpose of the note and trust deed was merely to prevent the materialmen and subcontractors from exercising their preferential claim on all moneys remaining due and unpaid from the owner to the contractor, the transaction could not be upheld against a claim of fraud.

To the finding that the transaction in question is constructively fraudulent as against the respondents, objection is interposed that there is nothing in the pleadings raising an issue of fraud, and that in any event the finding is but a conclusion of law deduced from the terms of the contract. The contract is found by the court as set out in hæc verba in the pleadings; and it is claimed that its nature and effect must be determined as a question of law from its undisputed terms.

It is contended by appellants that the note and trust deed were made and accepted as an advance payment on the contract price, and not merely to secure payments in the future as they became due. The contract itself is susceptible of that construction, and the court in its findings expressly so construes it. As recited in the contract:

> "It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that in case the money supplied for the construction of said building by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, amounting to $11,500, together with the second trust deed made to Fred W. Siegel, amounting to $12,500, should not be sufficient to pay the total cost of the construction of said building as herein provided, then and in such event the party of the second part agrees to immediately supply such amount of money as may be necessary for the completion of the aforesaid building," etc.

Under paragraph VIII of the findings it is declared:

> "That in and by said agreement it was agreed that said Holmes would pay to Siegel the sum of $11,500, which he would procure by way of loan from Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, and would give to said Siegel his promissory note in the sum of $12,500, and secure the same by a trust deed upon the real property hereinbefore described, upon which said building was to be erected, in payment for work performed and materials furnished in the alteration and repair and addition to said building as aforesaid."

Respondents appear to have placed the same construction on the contract providing for this note and trust deed. In the complaint in the action filed by the respondent Harper & Reynolds Company, in an averment setting up the substance of this contract, it is stated that in said agreement it was agreed that—

> The said Holmes "would give to said Siegel his promissory note in the sum of $12,500, and secure the same by a trust deed upon the real property hereinbefore described in paragraph 6 of this complaint, in payment for work performed and materials furnished."

Substantially the same allegation is contained in the complaint filed by respondent H. T. Miles & Son. In the cross-complaint of Emil Brown, another of the respondents, it is alleged that—

> "Said promissory note and said trust deed were given by said Lawrence Holmes as part of the contract price for the alteration and repair of and the addition to a building on the real property described."

On the day of the execution of this note and deed of trust, the contractor, Siegel, assigned them to the agent of the Hammond Lumber Company, one of the appellants, in consideration, as found by the trial court, of the sum of $12,500 in credits and materials, which were then agreed to be and were thereafter extended and furnished to Siegel by the Hammond Lumber Company. There is no finding that the credits and materials so obtained were for or entered into the building under contract, neither is there anything in the findings or the record to the contrary; but we think the conclusion cannot be escaped that the purpose of the note and trust deed was to furnish collateral to enable the contractor to purchase material for this building.

As bearing upon this point, attention should be called to the nature of Siegel's employment. His contract was to supply the material and the labor for this building for its actual cost, plus 10 per cent. thereon for his own remuneration. The $11,500 which the owner borrowed from the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, and the $12,500 evidenced by this note and security, made up the principal sum to cover the transaction, with the further agreement that if it was not enough to meet all the demands the owner was to supply the additional amount, and if it provided a surplus it was to be applied on the debt evidenced by the promissory note.

[1, 2] Had the owner, Holmes, executed the note and trust deed directly to the Hammond Lumber Company, there could be no doubt as to the validity of the transaction, or as to the priority of the lien over the claims of subcontractors and materialmen. Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 84 Pac. 58; Rose v. Munie, 4 Cal. 173; Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Ass'n, 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. 85; Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 383, 19 Pac. 641, 11 Am. St. Rep. 288. We can see no legal or equitable distinction where precisely the same end was reached through the contractor as an intermediary. If the owner had raised this $12,500 by mortgage of the property to some third person, and paid the money to his contractor, who, in turn, had paid it out to the Hammond Lumber Company for credits and materials, there would be no question as to the first lien of the mortgage or the application of the money. Under the mechanics' lien law, since the amendment of 1911, there has been no requirement for partial and reserve payment. The owner is privileged to pay the entire contract price in advance, and he is empowered to create, by mortgage, preferred liens on the property to raise the money for that purpose, which take precedence to subsequent mechanics' lien claims. So far as the record discloses, no more than that was done in this case. Subsequently the materialmen and subcontractors dealt with the contractor with notice of the pre-existing liens on the property. They may have relied upon the personal responsibility of the parties, or upon the statutory bond which it appears was executed in this transaction. Their equities would seem to be no greater in their character, and not so good in point of time, as those of the Hammond Lumber Company, which gave full consideration for the note and security assigned to it.

There is no allegation of fraud in any of the pleadings, and nothing in the contract or assignment to suggest fraudulent intent. No facts are set forth in the findings from which corrupt motives on the part of any of the contracting parties could reasonably be inferred. Nowhere does it appear that subsequent to the recordation of the trust deed the proceeds were diverted from the purpose for which they were intended, with the intent to deprive the lien claimants of their priority. The finding, therefore, that the execution of the trust deed was a constructive fraud on the lien claimants is not within the issues as framed, hence, not justified.

As this finding constitutes the basis of that portion of the decree which is attacked by appellants, it follows that the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

On Rehearing.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the foreclosure of certain mechanics' liens, and is prosecuted upon the judgment roll. There is but one question presented by the appeal. The appellant Hammond Lumber Company claims a priority over the liens of the respondents under a certain trust deed through a breach of the conditions of which it holds a grant deed to the property which is subject to the decree of foreclosure rendered by the trial court.

On April 29, 1915, Fred W. Siegel, as the party of the first part, and Lawrence Holmes, as the party of the second part, entered into an agreement, the entire text of which, after its introductory parts, follows:

"That the said party of the first part in consideration of the covenants on the part of the said party of the second part, hereinafter contained, hereby covenants with the said party of the second part, that the said party of the first part will order and have furnished all labor and material necessary for the erection and completion of the additions and alterations to 702 West Third street, the additions to consist of adding two stories of brick to the present structure and building an addition of four floors and basement of brick in the rear; the alterations to consist of converting part of the existing stores into a hotel lobby and altering positions of partitions, plumbing, etc., on the second floor, said building being in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, on the northerly thirty-one (31) feet of the easterly forty-five (45) feet of lot nine (9), block S, and the easterly forty-five (45) feet of lot ten (10), block S, of the Mott Tract, as per book 14, page 7, of miscellaneous records of said county, according to the plans and specifications hereto attached and made a part hereof.

"It is further understood and agreed by the parties hereto that all labor, material and subcontracts, employed in the construction of said building shall be approved by the party of the second part before any purchase or contract is consummated. All material to be purchased as cheaply as possible and all subcontracts to be let on competitive bids.

"It is further understood and agreed between parties hereto that in case the money supplied for the construction of said building by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, amounting to eleven thousand and five hundred ($11,500) dollars, together with second trust deed made to Fred W. Siegel, amounting to twelve thousand and five hundred ($12,500) dollars, should not be sufficient to pay the total cost of the construction of said building as herein provided, then and in such event, the party of the second part agrees to immediately supply such amount of money as may be necessary for the completion of aforesaid building as herein provided, and in case there shall be more money than required same shall be applied on trust deed.

"And the said party of the second part in consideration of said covenants on the part of the said party of the first part hereinbefore contained, agrees to and with the said party of the first part that the said party of the second part will on demand and as bills are presented, checked off and approved, pay all bills for material and labor as same are used and furnished in the construction of the said building.

"The party of the first part agrees to superintend the construction of said building, to order all material and labor, and to generally look after the erection and economical construction of said building, and the party of the second part agrees to pay to the party of the first part for said services a sum equal to ten per cent. of the total cost of the construction of said building, including all labor and material, laid on the ground, including everything of every nature up to the time of the completion of said building; payment to be made to said first party by said second party as the bills are paid by said second party, this ten per cent. being an additional payment to the cost of construction aforesaid.

"It is also agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that said party of the second part will insure the said building when the rough lumber is delivered on the ground.

"Time is the essence of this contract, hence all work shall be rushed as much as possible. The said party of the first part shall not in any event exceed one hundred and fifty working days from date hereof; but the time during which the party of the first part is delayed in said work by the acts or neglects of the owner or his employees or those under him by contract or otherwise, or by the acts of God which the party of the first part could not have reasonably foreseen and provided for, or by stormy and inclement weather which delays the work, or by any strikes, boycotts or like obstructive action by employees or labor organizations, shall be added to the aforesaid time for completion, by a fair and reasonable allowance; also any additional time required for additional or extra work ordered by the owner."

The second trust deed mentioned in the agreement was executed by Holmes on May 8, 1915, Siegel being the beneficiary under it, and Holmes then also made and delivered the promissory note for $12,500, for the payment of which the trust deed was security. On the same day Siegel transferred the note and the trust deed to the appellant Hammond Lumber Company, the consideration for the transfer being the agreement of the latter to pay to Siegel the sum of $12,500 in "credits and materials." This payment was later made.

The trust deed was placed of record on May 17, 1915. The various agreements of the respondents to furnish labor and materials for the job mentioned in the contract were of date, respectively, August 12, September 3, and September 21, 1915, and March 10, 1916. The power of sale in the trust deed was exercised, on account of a breach of conditions named in the deed, and pursuant to the sale the grant deed was executed to the appellant Hammond Lumber Company November 4, 1916, and it was recorded January 13, 1917.

The trial court found that the execution of the trust deed for the benefit of Siegel was a constructive fraud upon the respondents, and that, in accepting the note and trust deed, Siegel attempted to assign a portion of the contract price for the performance of the work contemplated by the agreement. Upon these findings it was decreed that the lien claims of the respondents are superior to the rights of appellant Hammond Lumber Company accruing to it pursuant to the provisions of the trust deed.

Our first and practically our only labor must be to place a construction upon the agreement entered into between Siegel and Holmes. The respondents contend that the instrument made Siegel an original contractor for the performance of the work mentioned in it, and the findings of the trial court constantly so term him. It is apparent from the nature of the particular findings above specifically noted that the trial court so considered him. On the other hand, appellants view the contract as one consummating an employment of Siegel as a mere representative or agent of Holmes, so constituted for the purpose of raising funds for the carrying on of the work as well as to purchase material and to superintend construction.

[3] The terms of the contract, loosely drawn as it is, furnish some basis for these warring claims as to its meaning; but probably the strongest argument to be made in support of the contention that under it Siegel was an original contractor is to be found in the fact that he executed a bond to secure laborers and materialmen in the performance of labor and the furnishing of materials for the job. We are far from satisfied, however, that Siegel was an original contractor. The fact that, according to the terms of the agreement, he was to "order and have furnished all labor and material necessary" for the work; that "all labor, material and subcontracts employed in the construction" of the improvement were to be "approved" by Holmes "before any purchase or contract is consummated"; that the money to the extent of $11,500 supplied by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, "together with the second trust deed made to Fred W. Siegel, amounting to" $12,500, was supposed, in the first instance, at least, to "be sufficient to pay the total cost of the construction of said building as herein provided"; that Holmes would, "on demand and as bills are presented, checked off and approved, pay all bills for material and labor as same are used and furnished" in construction; that Siegel "agrees to superintend the construction of said building, to order all material and labor, and to generally look after the erection and economical construction of said building"; that Holmes "agrees to pay to" Siegel "for said services a sum equal to ten per cent of the total cost of the construction of said building"—these circumstances, we say, convince us that the construction of the agreement which is contended for by appellants is the correct one. That being so, the Siegel trust deed, in so far as the rights of the beneficiary under it are concerned, stands exactly in the same position as the trust deed which, pursuant to the terms of the agreement, was executed in favor of the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association. As the latter instrument was plainly superior to the lien claims of the respondents (W. P. Fuller & Co. v. McClure, 191 Pac. 1027), so was the trust deed to Siegel. The findings of the trial court to the effect that the execution of the Siegel trust deed was a constructive fraud upon respondents, and that Siegel, by accepting the trust deed, attempted to assign a portion of the contract price, are not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

WILLEY v. WILLEY. (Civ. 3745.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 20, 1921.)

Divorce 🔑203—Court not limited by inartificially drawn prayer as to power to require defendant husband to pay wife alimony.

In a wife's action for divorce, the complaint being founded on a charge of desertion and willful failure to provide, the court was not limited, by the inartificially drawn prayer of the complaint for order that defendant pay plaintiff $75 a month as temporary alimony pending the trial of the action, as to its power to require defendant to pay plaintiff alimony in the action based on charges of desertion and failure to provide sustained by showing of plaintiff's necessities and of defendant's financial ability to relieve them; the court possessing such power under Civ. Code, § 137, and power to modify its orders in such respect from time to time under the express reservation of its first order and also under section 139.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action for divorce by Eleanor H. Willey against Harry E. Willey. From judgment awarding alimony, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collamer A. Bridge, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newton M. Todd, of Long Beach, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from a portion of an interlocutory decree in an action for divorce. The complaint in said action is in two counts, one founded upon the charge of desertion, and the other upon the defendant's willful failure to provide for plaintiff the common necessaries of life. In this latter count of her complaint the plaintiff alleges that the defendant has for a long time been employed in various positions in which he has been receiving salaries amounting to $200 or more a month; that the plaintiff has no means whatever and is in such physical condition as to render it impossible for her to accept employment of any kind so as to properly support herself or prosecute this action; that the sum of $75 a month is a reasonable sum for temporary alimony, and certain other sums are reasonable for attorney's fees and costs. The prayer of her complaint is for divorce, and it embraces the further prayer for an order of court that the defendant "pay to the plaintiff the sum of $75 per month as temporary alimony pending the trial of this action," and certain other sums for attorney's fees and costs.

The defendant's answer by specific denials puts in issue the foregoing averments of the plaintiff's complaint, and he also presents a cross-complaint containing specifications of alleged cruelty on the part of the plaintiff, and praying for a divorce on his part. To this the plaintiff answered with specific denials, and in her said answer prayed for general equitable relief.

A trial ensued, at the conclusion of which the court made its findings in plaintiff's favor on both counts of her complaint, and thereupon entered its interlocutory decree in the following form:

> "Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said plaintiff is entitled to a divorce from defendant; that when one year shall have expired after the entry of this interlocutory judgment a final judgment and decree shall be entered granting a divorce herein, wherein and whereby the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said plaintiff and said defendant shall be dissolved, and at that time the court shall grant such other and further relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of this action.
> "And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendant pay to the plaintiff as alimony the sum of thirty ($30) dollars per month, said sum to be paid on or before the 10th day of each and every calendar month, commencing with the first day of August, 1918."

The appellant has taken this appeal from that portion of the above interlocutory decree which awards alimony to the plaintiff, and his contention upon this appeal is that the trial court was not entitled upon the pleadings and issues in the case to award the plaintiff alimony in its said interlocutory decree. This contention on the appellant's part is based upon his claim that the plaintiff in her prayer in her complaint limited her demand for alimony to "temporary alimony pending the trial of this action," and by so doing limited not only the issues in the case, but the power of the court to deal with the subject of alimony in making its interlocutory decree.

This contention is utterly without merit, and finds no support in the authorities which the appellant refers to as sustaining it. The issues in cases of this character are made by the pleadings taken as a whole, and these show the plaintiff to be entitled to alimony from the defendant if the averments of her complaint were supported by the proofs in the case. The findings of the court show them to have been thus supported. It is true that the plaintiff in the prayer of her complaint referred only to "temporary alimony," but this did not limit the power of the court to grant her the relief to which she was entitled and which she was awarded by the court's interlocutory decree, since by that decree the court expressly retained the power to grant in its final decree "such other and further relief as may be necessary to a complete disposition of this action." It will thus be seen that the alimony which the court awarded the plaintiff in its interlocutory decree did not purport to be other than temporary alimony, which it would have been entitled to allow under the most rigid interpretation of the prayer of the plaintiff's complaint. We hold, however, that the court was not limited by the somewhat inartificially drawn prayer of the complaint as to its power to require the defendant to pay plaintiff alimony in the action based upon charges of desertion and failure to provide sustained by a showing of the plaintiff's necessities and of the defendant's financial ability to relieve them. It possessed that power under section 137 of the Civil Code, and it also possesses the power to modify its orders made in that respect from time to time under its express reservation of that power, and also under section 139 of the Civil Code. Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 87 Pac. 205; Mathews v. Mathews, 193 Pac. 586; Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 545, 46 Pac. 609, 55 Am. St. Rep. 86.

The case of Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, in no way militates against this conclusion, since in that case there was nothing in either the complaint or judgment touching the subject of alimony, nor was that subject presented or litigated in the action until long after the judgment in the case had become final, when the plaintiff moved the court for an order modifying the judgment so as to award her alimony. The Supreme Court rightly determined that there was nothing to modify in such a judgment. There is no parity between that case and the case at bar, since in the instant case the issue of the right and need of the plaintiff to alimony of some sort was raised by her pleadings, established by her proof, and found by the trial court to exist; whereupon said court by its interlocutory decree awarded her alimony, but in so doing expressly reserved the power to modify its judgment in that regard in its final decree.

The respondent has filed no brief on this appeal. Had she done so, this court would be disposed to fix a penalty upon the defendant for having taken and prosecuted a frivolous appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMSON v. LANGTON et al. (Civ. 3617.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 22, 1921.)

1. Partnership ⟹328(3)—Evidence held to show partner guilty of misconduct.

In an action to dissolve a partnership, evidence held to show that the defendant was guilty of excluding plaintiff from any participation in the business and of making a secret profit from firm transactions, so as to authorize a dissolution before the time fixed for termination.

2. Partnership ⟹267—Where assets destroyed and business could not continue firm will be dissolved at suit of partner.

Where the assets of a partnership had been so reduced by destruction by fire that the firm could not continue business without raising additional capital from the partners or by borrowing, the partnership will be dissolved at the suit of one partner, since a partner cannot be compelled without his consent to make contributions to the capital in addition to those which he agreed to make.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by James S. Thomson against John M. Langton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant and certain others appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel H. French, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is a suit for dissolution of a copartnership. Judgment went for plaintiff, and certain of the defendants appeal.

The only questions presented for determination are whether or not the evidence warrants a judgment of dissolution, and whether or not certain moneys paid upon a policy of insurance on copartnership property belong to plaintiff individually or to the copartnership.

Eleanor Jane Langton and John M. Langton, Jr., are mother and son, and they are the sister and nephew, respectively, of Matilda Thomson, the wife of the plaintiff. Langton, Jr., and his father had been conducting a sash and door business for some time in Los Angeles, but prior to the formation of the copartnership sought by this suit to be dissolved, Langton, Sr., had transferred his interest to his wife and son. Langton, Jr., and his mother, being in need of more capital in the business, the former approached his aunt, Mrs. Matilda Thomson, in January, 1916, with a request that she advance the necessary funds. Instead of consenting to make a loan, she agreed to take a one-third interest in the said business in the name of her husband and to pay the Langtons therefor the sum of $3,000. Thereupon articles of copartnership were entered into by Langton, Jr., Mrs. Langton, and James S. Thomson, wherein it was agreed in part that they should each hold an undivided one-third interest in and to the property of the Langton Door & Sash Company. Langton, Jr., and Langton, Sr., were each to receive a salary of $100 per month, and Thomson was to receive a salary of $50 per month, which was to be increased at the expiration of six months to such sum, not to exceed $100, as could be paid out of the business. As a consideration for such salaries the partners agreed to give their entire time and attention to said business. The enterprise was to continue for two years from and after January 19, 1916.

Plaintiff's contention in support of the judgment of dissolution is that, notwithstanding that the duration of the partnership was fixed by agreement at a definite time, he had the right under the law (Civ. Code, §§ 2451, 2452) to dissolve it sooner without being liable in damages because of the serious misconduct of his copartners and because the business could only be further conducted at a loss.

As the result of a trial, at which much evidence was presented, the court found that Langton, Jr., claimed that the firm was indebted to Langton, Sr., for services in the sum of $654, when he well knew that this amount was at least $200 in excess of the sum actually due; that said Langton, Jr., at divers and sundry times refused to admit plaintiff to the office of said firm and locked him out therefrom, and refused to allow him to examine the books and accounts of said firm, and also at numerous times refused to consult with him in the affairs or management of said business; that Langton, Jr., in the manner aforesaid and in other ways, exercised such arbitrary and despotic control over the affairs of the copartnership that it made impossible any relation of trust and confidence between him and the plaintiff. The court further found that on or about the 30th day of January, 1917, said Langton, Jr., pretended to sell to said copartnership a certain lot of doors, 1,408 in number; that said pretended sale and purchase was without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff; that said defendant Langton, Jr., represented that he purchased said doors and turned the same in to said partnership at and for the cost price to him, to wit, $1,600, but the court finds that all of said transaction was carried out with the funds of said firm, and that the cost price of said doors to said Langton was several hundred dollars less than $1,600, and that in said transaction said Langton, Jr., made a secret profit for himself of several hundred dollars, and concealed the fact from said plaintiff, and plaintiff did not know until after said pretended sale of said secret profit so made by said Langton, nor that said defendant was not the sole owner of said doors. The court also found that a certain loss by fire which took place February 4, 1917, was in excess of one-half of the total assets of the business of the copartnership; that there was available for the resumption of business less than $5,000 in assets; and that a resumption of the business would require a substantial contribution by the partners. On this subject it further found:

> "That said copartnership could not incur indebtedness for said amount without impairing its credit and standing; that said outlay would involve an expenditure not contemplated in the articles of copartnership, and could not be provided for out of the present assets, and would involve the assumption by the parties of a liability in addition to the amount contributed or agreed to be contributed to the capital of said firm; * * * that on account of said loss by fire and the necessity aforesaid for the expenditure of money in procuring machinery and replacing the mill building and merchandise, and the necessary expenses of the business, it will not be possible to carry on the business of the partnership further except at a permanent loss; that said business cannot be rehabilitated and restored to a prosperous and active business under said copartnership agreement."

Coming now to the proposition of the insurance, the court found substantially as alleged by plaintiff, as follows: That defendants had failed and refused, notwithstanding the requests of plaintiff, to procure insurance against loss by fire on said property of said firm or any part thereof, and there was no insurance on said property so destroyed by said fire except the sum of $2,000, which has been paid for and carried by plaintiff under an agreement with said Langton, Jr., and said Eleanor Jane Langton that in case of loss no part of the moneys on account thereof should be claimed by either of the defendants or regarded as partnership property, but that the same should stand as indemnity and reimbursement for any loss on plaintiff's share in the partnership property; that plaintiff should pay for said insurance and carry the same for and on his own account.

The evidence supports the findings. One of the causes of difference between the partners was the conduct of Langton, Sr., who, principally on account of his convivial excesses, was often absent from business, and when present his conduct was offensive and his work unsatisfactory, occasionally amounting to drunken violence. The conduct of Langton, Jr., was even more flagrantly in violation of his duties to the plaintiff as a partner. The evidence shows that he declined to treat the plaintiff as a partner in the conduct of the business, refused to disclose to him or to give access to information as to process necessary for the proper conduct of the enterprise, resulting in loss of customers; that he locked the door of their place of business and refused plaintiff access thereto; and, finally, as found by the court, that he used the funds of the firm to make a secret personal profit.

With respect to the trial court's finding that as a result of the fire, which destroyed a large proportion of the plant and property of the copartnership, the business could not be rehabilitated and restored to a prosperous and active business under the copartnership agreement, it appears that as a result of said conflagration the assets of the firm were reduced from $16,144 to $4,294; that Langton, Jr., was unable to pay his debts and was without credit; and it was stipulated that the only way in which the firm could have obtained money to resume business, if at all, was by borrowing it.

As to the question of the ownership of the money derived from the payment of the policy of fire insurance already referred to, the plaintiff testified that, following a conversation between his wife and Mrs. Langton, the latter said that neither she, her husband, nor her son cared to carry any insurance on the business; that they would not do so, but that if Mrs. Thomson cared to have insurance to have it, and that Langton, Jr., and she, if the policy were taken in the name of the partnership, would assign their interest therein to plaintiff in the event of the occurrence of a loss. This witness also said that he was present at a conversation between an agent of an insurance company soliciting insurance from the firm, at which time Langton, Jr., told the agent positively that "he would not take out insurance." Other testimony in the record is to the effect that a policy of insurance was to be taken out to the credit of the firm; that the premium thereon was to be paid by the firm and charged to plaintiff's account, and in the event of loss by fire said policy was to be regarded as having covered plaintiff's one-third interest in the firm.

[1, 2] The foregoing brief reference to the testimony abundantly shows that Langton, Jr., was guilty of serious misconduct entitling the plaintiff to a dissolution of the partnership. In addition to this, it appears clear from the evidence that after the loss by fire the business of the concern could be conducted only at a permanent loss unless sufficient money could be borrowed by the firm or obtained by means of a further contribution to its capital by the copartners. But it is settled law that where there has been a substantial impairment of the original capital a partner is not required to furnish money or to engage his personal credit in order to rehabilitate or restore the partnership business. In Van Ness v. Fisher, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 236, 241, it is said:

> "The partnership was not formed on any other idea or understanding by either party than that of doing the business contemplated upon the capital stipulated to be furnished, to wit, $2,000, or as much more as the parties might voluntarily furnish. Nothing appears in the articles from which it can be inferred that a resort to the credit of the concern was contemplated as a means of carrying on its business. * * * Upon the loss of the $2,000 neither party could call upon the other to furnish more; consequently, upon the loss of the capital, no more business could be done, unless by mutual consent; for, if either could use the credit of the firm to procure the means of going on with the business, he could compel his copartner to furnish more capital than he agreed to furnish."

In 1 Bates on Partnership, § 251, it is stated:

> "Where four persons agreed to (and did) buy oil lands for resale, each contributing in specified proportions to be repaid from sales, and the lands had greatly depreciated, and one filed a bill calling upon the others to make up the difference between the amounts contributed by him and them, those contributions are capital and not advances, and hence there was no right to compel contribution."

From the authorities it is apparent that a partner cannot be forced to make a contribution of additional capital, and it necessarily follows that he could not be compelled to join in raising money by borrowing it, for this would be nothing more in effect than an enforced contribution.

It follows from the foregoing that the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment which he recovered dissolving the partnership and awarding him the money collected upon the policy of insurance.

The judgment is affirmed.

50 Cal. App. 768

MELROSE v. COOLEY et al. (Civ. 2141.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 31, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife ⚷47(4)—After conveyance, the grantor cannot convey to third person right of land.

After husband had conveyed a mining claim to his wife he could not convey right of way to a third person.

2. Mines and minerals ⚷34—Pipe line held not "appurtenant" to placer claim at which point waters were diverted.

Where a pipe line was placed on a mining claim merely because it was at that point that the diversion of the water of a ravine with which it was connected was accomplished, and the waters were carried for use in a mine elsewhere, the pipe line cannot be deemed appurtenant within Civ. Code, §§ 661, 662, to the claim on which the diversion occurred, so as to pass by conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Appurtenance—Appurtenant.]

3. Fixtures ⚷21—Pipe line held not a "fixture."

Where a pipe line was used to carry water from a point of diversion on one mining claim to another mining claim, it was not a "fixture" within Civ. Code, § 1013, with respect to the mining claim on which the line originated where the diversion occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fixture.]

4. Mines and minerals ⚷34—Pipe line not appurtenant to land over which it was laid.

A pipe line, carrying water from a point of diversion on one mining claim to another mining claim, is not appurtenant to an intervening mining claim over which it was let run.

5. Husband and wife ⚷47(4)—Presumption of license over land conveyed by husband to wife.

Where a husband conveyed a mining claim to his wife, but after the conveyance executed a deed for right of way for a pipe line over the claim, and the line thereafter was maintained without objection, it will be presumed that the pipe line was laid under license.

6. Mines and minerals ⚷34—Option contract held not to provide for forfeiture of pipe line.

Where the owner of a mining claim who had granted a license to run a pipe line thereover gave the mining company using the pipe line an option to purchase the claim, provisions for forfeiture in case of failure to exercise the option should not be deemed to extend to the pipe line.

7. Property ⚷9—Plaintiff held to have only half interest in pipe line for mining purposes.

In an action in trespass and conversion by plaintiff, the wife of a judgment debtor, who asserted that the water pipe line, built for mining purposes, sold under execution against the husband, belonged to her, evidence held to show that plaintiff by mesne conveyances had acquired only a half interest therein.

8. Appeal and error ⚷994(1)—Credibility of witnesses not for appellate court.

The question of the credibility of witnesses is not for the appellate court.

9. Appeal and error ⚷930(4)—Presumed that jury based verdict on injury to whole pipe line, where case was tried on erroneous theory that plaintiff was sole owner.

Where an action of trespass and conversion was tried on the theory that plaintiff was the sole owner of a pipe line when plaintiff was in fact the owner of only a half interest, the judgment for damages in plaintiff's favor should be reversed, for the jury will be assumed to have considered in reaching their determination the damage done to the entire pipe line.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by F. A. Melrose against Lucy W. Cooley and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Columbia Consolidated Mines Company and E. C. Klinker appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Nilon & Nilon, of Nevada City, for appellants.

J. M. Walling, of Nevada City, James Snell, of Hollister, and Searls & Searls, of Nevada City, for respondent.

HART, J. The appeal in this action is from a judgment for plaintiff in the superior court of Nevada county for $750, based on a complaint which sets forth two causes of action—the first for trespass, in tearing out a certain pipe line, and the second for conversion by the defendants of the pipe line so removed. The amount sued for was $14,800, being double the amount of actual damages claimed to have been suffered, the complaint alleging that the trespass was malicious and one with an evil intent to vex, annoy, and injure the plaintiff. The cause was tried before a jury.

This action grows out of a sale of a pipe line under an execution issued on a judgment entered on the 20th day of April, 1916, in an action wherein one J. H. Hunt sued the plaintiff's husband, N. M. Melrose, to recover the sum of $494.23, alleged to be due said Hunt from said Melrose.

The complaint in the present action alleges that the plaintiff was the owner of a water right on Missouri ravine, in Nevada county, and was also the owner of a pipe line leading from Missouri ravine to Iowa ravine and thence to a reservoir, and that the defendants had knowledge of this ownership; that within one year preceding the commencement of the action (the action was commenced April 18, 1918), but at a date unknown to the plaintiff, the defendants tore out the pipe line and flume mentioned and removed pipes comprising a part of said line, and converted 1,300 feet thereof to their own use.

The controversy is as to the ownership of the pipe line and flume seized and sold under the execution issued in the action of Hunt v. N. M. Melrose, above referred to, the plaintiff claiming that she acquired ownership thereof through a conveyance from her husband and also from one Fontz prior to the issuance and levy of said execution, and the defendants contending that the conveyance by her husband did not carry with it the pipe line, etc., and the conveyance of Fontz, if it passed any title at all to plaintiff, vested her only with a one-half interest in the property sold as indicated.

The evidence shows that N. M. Melrose, on or about January 1, 1914, purchased a mining claim known as the "Missouri Placer"; that the Missouri placer embraced the ground on which the diversion of the waters of a stream named and known as Missouri ravine was effected; that after said Melrose became the owner of the Missouri placer, he constructed the pipe line and the flume, which are involved in this action, and which pipe line led from Missouri ravine, he testifying that he built the pipe line for the purpose of using the waters of Missouri ravine in working the Ocean Star mine for the Ocean Star Mining Company, of which he was then president and manager. All the pipe line and the flume, which are referred to in the complaint, with the possible exception of about 96 feet of the pipe line, were placed by Melrose, and were at all times maintained on and across lands owned by one Lucy W. Cooley. At the time that the pipe line, etc., was built, the Cooley properties, which embraced the Ocean Star mine, and which had previously been acquired by Lucy W. Cooley from her husband, were under option for the sale thereof to the Ocean Star Mining Company. Subsequently to the construction of the pipe line by Melrose, the latter, by deed dated April 15, 1915, conveyed the Missouri placer mine, together with the improvements thereon, to his wife, the plaintiff herein. In said deed of conveyance the pipe line was not specifically mentioned. N. M. Melrose continued to operate and manage the Ocean Star Mining Company's business until the month of October, 1915. At this particular time the option held by said mining company on the Cooley property had expired and was forfeited. On August 1, 1915, however, the Ocean Star Mining Company sold all its right, title, and interest in and to the said pipe line to Kohler and Olson for the stated consideration of $1,868. On May 1, 1916, Kohler and Olson sold and transferred the pipe line to Fontz, who, on October 7, 1916, sold an undivided one-half interest in the pipe line to the plaintiff, F. A. Melrose. The instrument conveying said property to Kohler and Olson was signed as follows: "Ocean Star Mining Co., pr. N. M. Melrose, Pres. and Gen'l Manager. A. Perry, Secty & Treasurer, Vic. Pres. [Seal.]"

J. H. Hunt, plaintiff in the action against N. M. Melrose, in which the former obtained a judgment against the latter in the sum of $484.23, bought the pipe line at the sale under the execution issued on said judgment, and, there having been no redemption, a sheriff's deed including said pipe line, was executed to Hunt, who had previously granted his interest in the pipe line to defendant Klinker.

In the month of March, 1916, the defendant Klinker took possession of the Cooley properties which, as seen, had been under option to the Ocean Star Mining Company. Klinker, when taking such possession, was the representative of the defendant Columbia Consolidated Mines Company. This company had become the owner of several mines, including the Ocean Star. Possession of the Cooley properties was taken by the Columbia under an option from Lucy W. Cooley.

[1] The plaintiff, over the objection by defendants, was allowed to introduce in evidence a deed, dated March 16, 1914, from M. D. Cooley, purporting to convey to the Ocean Star Mining Company a right of way for a pipe line across what was known as the German quartz claim. There was, however, introduced by defendant a deed from M. D. Cooley to his wife, Lucy W. Cooley, dated October 25, 1913, granting to her said German quartz claim. There was no evidence showing that Lucy W. Cooley was not the owner of the German quartz claim by virtue of the latter deed at the time of the purported granting by her husband of a right of way for a pipe line over said mine. It follows, therefore, that M. D. Cooley, when attempting to grant said right of way to the Ocean Star Mining Company, had no interest in the German quartz claim which he could convey.

[2, 3] The question of the ownership of the pipe line in dispute would seem from a mere superficial examination of this record to be enveloped in more or less obscurity or, at least, confusion; but a careful analysis of the evidence, considered in the light of the law respecting appurtenances to real property, has made it clear to our minds that the plaintiff acquired no interest in the pipe line by virtue of the conveyance to her by her husband of the Missouri placer mine. There was no mention of the pipe line in said instrument of conveyance, and the said pipe line was neither appurtenant to nor a fixture of said mine, for it was not used or even intended to be used with that mine for its benefit (Civ. Code, § 662), or in working or developing said mine (Civ. Code, § 661). Nor, in our opinion, was it a fixture to the Missouri placer within the meaning of section 1013 of the Civil Code, for it was placed on the property of said mine merely because it was at that point that the diversion of the waters of Missouri ravine, with which the line was connected, was accomplished, and, moreover, did not become an integral part of the property of said mine, and could be removed at any time without injury to the premises to which it was affixed. Civ. Code, § 1019.

[4-6] Nor do we think the pipe line was appurtenant to or a fixture of the Cooley properties. It is to be conceded that the grant of the right of way for the pipe line by M. D. Cooley over and across the Cooley properties, having been made subsequent to the time that M. D. Cooley conveyed all his right, title, and interest in and to said properties to his wife, was apparently without legal force; it not appearing that in making the grant he was acting under due authority from his wife. But it may be assumed, from the fact that the pipe line was allowed to be laid across Mrs. Cooley's properties and was so maintained until the pipe line was sold by the Ocean Star Company to Kohler and Olson, that the grant of the right of way over her properties for the pipe line by her husband was acquiesced in by her, and that therefore the same was so constructed and maintained under a license from both Mrs. Cooley and her husband. Nor does the provision in the option agreement that failure by the Ocean Star Mining Company to pay the stipulated sum for the Ocean Star mine at or within the specified time shall operate to forfeit said option "and all rights thereunder," etc., give Mrs. Cooley title to the pipe line of which there is no specific mention in the option. There could be no forfeiture of the title to property which she did not own. That provision obviously meant and was intended to work a forfeiture only of the option to purchase the quartz mine at the price specified in the option.

[7] But, obviously, the ownership is somewhere or in some person or persons, and it is our conclusion, after a painstaking examination of the evidence in the record before us, that, originally, the pipe line was the property of the Ocean Star Mining Company, and that the plaintiff in this action was the owner, by virtue of the conveyance from Fontz to her, above mentioned, at the time of the seizure and sale of the pipe line under the execution issued in the case of Hunt v. N. M. Melrose, only of an undivided one-half interest in said property, so taken and sold.

N. M. Melrose testified that he constructed the pipe line solely for the purpose of installing power for the Ocean Star mine, which was being operated by the Ocean Star Mining Company, and that the pipe line was used exclusively for that purpose. The pipe line, therefore, if appurtenant to or a fixture of any property at all, it was to or of the Ocean Star mine. But, as before suggested, it is reasonably clear that the pipe line was established and maintained either by N. M. Melrose or the Ocean Star Mining Company over and across the Cooley properties, which, as seen, included the Ocean Star mine (sometimes known as the German mine) under a license from the Cooleys, and that the pipe line was the property of, and so regarded by all the parties, either N. M. Melrose or the Ocean Star Mining Company. And now we come to consider evidence of singular significance upon the proposition of the original ownership of the pipe line. N. M. Melrose testified, it is true, that he constructed the pipe line at his own expense, and that the line belonged to him; but he further testified that the pipe and the other materials used in installing the pipe line were ordered in the name of the Ocean Star Mining Company, and that it was by the latter's checks that all bills incurred in the construction of the pipe line were paid. As above shown, the pipe line and the water rights with which it was connected were conveyed to Kohler and Olson by the Ocean Star Mining Company, "per N. M. Melrose, Pres. & Gen'l Mngr.—A. Perry, Sect. & Treasurer, Vice Pres." Kohler and Olson sold to Fontz, who, as seen, conveyed an undivided one-half interest to the plaintiff. N. M. Melrose testified, it is also true, that he caused the Ocean Star Mining Company to order the materials for the pipe line, and to pay therefor with its checks as a matter of convenience and upon the assumption that the order would be the more readily filled by ordering through that channel, but that he reimbursed out of his own private funds the company for the money paid by it for the materials.

[8] It is not, of course, within the province of this court to determine the credibility of the witnesses, and, indeed, it is not requisite for us to essay that task here to show that the title acquired by Kohler and Olson to the pipe line through the conveyance by the Ocean Star Mining Company and consequently the title of Fontz to the pipe line were legally impregnable. It may first be observed that if it be true that N. M. Melrose and the plaintiff honestly believed that the ownership of the pipe line was in him and that he conveyed it to his wife, the plaintiff herein, by virtue of his conveyance of the Missouri placer properties to the latter, it is a singularly strange circumstance that the plaintiff should have conceived it to be necessary to take a conveyance of one-half of the property from Fontz. We may assume that N. M. Melrose knew of the Fontz conveyance, since it was to his own wife. Mrs. Melrose, the plaintiff, was not a witness in the case, and N. M. Melrose did not attempt to explain the reason for the Fontz conveyance, so we are in the dark as to the purpose of that transaction, except in so far as we may be furnished light upon the circumstance by N. M. Melrose's testimony to which we have referred and inferences which may reasonably be educed therefrom. It is also worthy of note that the record does not show that Mrs. Cooley ever made any objection to the transfer of the pipe line by the Ocean Star Mining Company to Kohler and Olson. But, be that as it may, we are justified in concluding that the conveyance of the pipe line to Kohler and Olson by N. M. Melrose, as the manager of the Ocean Star Mining Company, acting for and in behalf of said company, had the effect of vesting in the said grantees a perfect title to the pipe line, even though said Melrose, and not the said company, was then the actual owner of the property, since it is unquestionably true that Melrose, having taken part in the making of said conveyance and thereby impliedly at least assured the company's title to the pipe line, is forever estopped from setting up his own ownership of the property so conveyed. No one would be found to say that, had N. M. Melrose undertaken to have the Ocean Star's conveyance to Kohler and Olson set aside solely on the ground that he was the real owner of the property so conveyed, his complaint would not, under the circumstances, have fallen under a plea of estoppel.

It follows from the foregoing views that the present record shows that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided interest only in the pipe line in controversy.

[9] The trial was had upon the theory that plaintiff was the sole owner of the entire pipe line system and the pipe, flume, etc. This is shown by the refusal of the court to give a certain instruction, preferred by the defendants. The jury, we may therefore assume, in reaching their conclusion as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, considered the damage done to all the pipe and other essential concomitant property. The judgment will consequently have to be reversed.

We are not required herein to say who is or may be the owner of the other half of the pipe line. Nor are we prepared to say whether another trial may not develop competent evidence showing that plaintiff was at some time, either by her own act or in some other legal way, divested of her title to her interest in the pipe line prior to its seizure and sale under the execution referred to. It is sufficient for us to be convinced, as we are convinced, that, according to the present record, she is entitled to recover only such damages, both compensatory and punitive, if it be shown that the injury was done maliciously, as may be just for any injury done to her one-half interest, and no more, in the pipe line in dispute.

We do not regard it necessary to review elaborately the objection preliminarily urged by counsel for respondent, that the bill of exceptions was not settled within the time prescribed by law, and is therefore not legally before this court, and as a result there is here no record subject to review. It is sufficient to say that we think that the trial court's order, relieving the defendants from the consequences of their delay in bringing the bill to settlement, represented, on the showing made by them, the exercise only of a sound and just discretion.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

COUTS v. O'NEILL. (Civ. 3242.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 25, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⟹38(1)—Finding that deed was not mortgage held justified.

In an action to have deed declared to be a mortgage, finding that deed was not a mortgage held amply and substantially justified by the evidence.

2. Costs ⟹260(4)—Claim that appeal is frivolous not considered, where claimant employs hundreds of pages to show appeal not meritorious.

Appellate court is not inclined to seriously consider an assertion that an appeal is frivolous when the maker of the assertion has employed 299 pages in an endeavor to demonstrate that it is not meritorious.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Cave J. Couts against Richard O'Neill. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. B. Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for appellant.

E. S. Torrance, Eugene Daney, and E. Swift Torrance, all of San Diego, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was instituted for the purpose of having two deeds, absolute in form, decreed to be mortgages. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The transactions out of which the controversy arises were between the appellant and Richard O'Neill, who, although of the same name with the respondent, was the respondent's predecessor in interest in the land which is the basic subject of the litigation, and who departed this life in 1910. Whenever, in the course of this opinion, Richard O'Neill, or O'Neill, is mentioned, it will be understood that the reference is to the deceased person of that name, and not to the respondent.

On November 4, 1895, Richard O'Neill promised to lend appellant the sum of $10,000, and, during the succeeding year, redeemed his promise by advancing to appellant various sums aggregating a little more than the amount named. On October 16 and November 12, 1896, appellant and his wife executed to O'Neill, in consideration of the loan, their two promissory notes, and they also, on the first-mentioned date, delivered to him their grant deed to certain lands in San Diego county. This instrument is one of those asked by appellant, in his complaint, to be decreed a mortgage, but the litigation is devoid of all interest as far as it is concerned, for it was beyond all question intended by the parties to be a mortgage, and the trial court found that it was one.

On October 10, 1901, within a week prior to the expiration of five years from the execution of the deed just mentioned, the appellant executed to Richard O'Neill a second deed, conveying the same property as the first, and it is upon the effect to be given to this second instrument that the appeal turns.

The appellant asks for a reversal of the judgment upon but two grounds, each presenting a question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the trial court. He contends, in the first instance, that the evidence fails to justify the finding that the deed of October 10, 1901, was an absolute conveyance and not a mortgage.

The evidence tending to support the finding, if any such there be, is, then, to be marshaled and considered. The appellant having failed to satisfy the obligation secured by the deed of October 16, 1896, O'Neill took up with Wm. J. Hunsaker, an attorney at law, on September 23, 1901, the matter of his relations with appellant. On the next day Hunsaker wrote Couts:

> "Mr. O'Neill came up yesterday for the purpose of talking over his business with you. Inclosed you will please find copy of a letter I have this morning written him, which explains itself. Mr. O'Neill declines to take a new mortgage, but is willing to take a deed to the property and give you an option to purchase it within a year. I hope you will be able to find some way out of your present difficulties."

The letter to O'Neill, copy of which was inclosed in the letter to appellant, contained the following introductory statement:

> "In response to your request for a statement as to the amount due from Mr. Cave J. Couts to you, and of the method by which you can take a deed to the property, and give Mr. Couts an option to purchase it within a year from the date of the deed, I beg to say."

The letter then set forth a statement of figures and proceeded:

> "As I understood you yesterday, you do not feel, under the circumstances, like taking a new mortgage, as your notes have now run nearly five years, and there has been no payment on account of principal or interest; but that you are willing to give Mr. Couts an opportunity to repurchase the property within one year, and that if Mr. Couts is not satisfied with this arrangement that your purpose is to have your mortgage foreclosed. In this connection you might call Mr. Couts' attention to the fact that your mortgage was executed before the amendment to the law of 1897, extending the time for redemption to twelve months, and that the Supreme Court has recently decided that as to mortgages executed before this amendment, the mortgagor has but six months within which to make redemption. If you should agree with Mr Couts for a conveyance of the property to you in satisfaction of the amount due you under your mortgage, the transaction will have to be brought about in this way: In consideration of the satisfaction of your indebtedness and a surrender of the notes to Mr. Couts, he will make a deed to you, which will vest in you the absolute title to the property. At the same time you would execute and deliver to Mr. Couts an instrument giving him the option to purchase the property from you within twelve months at a figure to be named in the option—this figure should be such amount as will cover interest on the amount due you and taxes on the property. As you have determined not to accept a new mortgage from Mr. Couts, the only course left open to you for the protection of your interests is to enter into such an arrangement with Mr. Couts as is above suggested, or to commence proceedings to foreclose your mortgage before the 16th of next month."

On October 7, 1901, Hunsaker wrote appellant, "Inclosed you will please find copies of a letter and papers which I have just mailed to Mr. O'Neill." The "letter" to O'Neill refers to the "papers" mentioned in the quotation in the following excerpt from it:

> "Inclosed you will please find carbon copies of the papers which should be executed to consummate the business consisting of a deed from Couts to you for the property described in your mortgage, a release and discharge of Mr. Couts from all indebtedness to you, * * * a quitclaim deed from you to Mr. Couts, and the escrow agreement, under the terms of which the deed is to be deposited with the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of this City."

The "deed from Couts to you" was the one above mentioned as having been executed on October 10, 1901. The "release and discharge of Mr. Couts from all indebtedness to you" contained this language, among other things:

> "I have remised, released and forever discharged the said Cave J. Couts from all claims of every kind, nature and character soever against him, from the beginning of the world to this day."

The "quitclaim deed from you to Mr. Couts" was in the ordinary form. The "escrow agreement" was in the following language:

> "The within quitclaim deed from Richard O'Neill to Cave J. Couts is herewith deposited in escrow by said Richard O'Neill with the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles, California, which is to deliver the same to the within named Cave J. Couts, if said Cave J. Couts shall, on or before the 16th day of January, 1902, place to the credit of said Richard O'Neill in said Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, the sum of $18,467.34; or shall, on or before the 16th day of April, 1902, place to the credit of said Richard O'Neill with said bank, the sum of $18,914.99; or shall on or before the 16th day of July, 1902, place to the credit of Richard O'Neill in said bank, the sum of $19,387.86; or shall on or before the 16th day of October, 1902, place to the credit of said Richard O'Neill in said bank, the sum of $19,860.73, and shall also place to the credit of said O'Neill in said bank such amount or amounts of money as said O'Neill may hereafter expend in the payment of taxes on the property mentioned in said deed, or in effecting redemptions from sales thereof made for delinquent taxes, which amounts shall be evidenced by delivery by said O'Neill to said Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of the tax receipts or certificates of redemption therefor. Time is hereby expressly declared to be of the essence of this agreement; and if said Couts shall fail to so place to the credit of said O'Neill the amount of money above specified on or before the 16th day of October, 1902, said deed shall thereupon be returned by said bank to said O'Neill for cancellation and destruction."

Hunsaker testified that he, O'Neill, and appellant met in San Diego on October 10th, or the day before, and he continues:

> "My recollection is * * * that Mr. Couts, Mr. O'Neill and I had a talk * * * before the papers were executed. That Mr. O'Neill asked Mr. Couts if the papers which he had received, copies of which he had from me, were all right. Mr. Couts said they were if Mr. O'Neill would not consent to taking a new mortgage. Mr. O'Neill said to Mr. Couts that he would not take a new mortgage, that Mr Couts had not paid the interest for years, and that he, Mr. O'Neill, had had to pay the taxes, and that unless this arrangement which was set forth in these papers was satisfactory to Mr. Couts that he would foreclose the mortgage. Mr. Couts then said it was all right."

The various papers were then executed, and, according to Hunsaker, "the original notes were delivered by me to Mr. Couts."

The appellant himself testified that he received the notes from Hunsaker, but he was not sure whether they were delivered at the time of the execution of the papers or a few days later. At any rate, he kept them until his deposition was taken in the case, and they were offered in evidence at the trial. They then had certain memoranda upon them, and the appellant testified that these were in his handwriting and were placed upon the notes at the time he received them from Hunsaker. On one of the obligations the memorandum was as follows:

> "Paid by deed to Richard O'Neill of all the property securing this, computing interest in full at 10% net on whole amount compounded semiannually, and to be reconveyed to me within one year from Oct. 16, 1901, if I can pay the amount with 10% interest net payable quarterly. Couts."

On the other note the appellant wrote:

> "This note paid the same as that of Octr. 16, 1896, for $10,000. Couts."

When the various instruments were executed at San Diego on October 10, 1901, Hunsaker kept the release and discharge mentioned in his letter to O'Neill of the 7th. On October 21, 1901, he forwarded that document to appellant under cover with a letter in which he said:

> "Inclosed you will please find the satisfaction of the O'Neill mortgage and general release executed by Mr. O'Neill at the time of the settlement between yourself and Mr. O'Neill. This satisfaction and release as you will observe by the indorsement on it, has been recorded."

This instrument was retained by appellant until his deposition was taken and was produced at the trial.

In the meanwhile, the grant deed from appellant to O'Neill, the quitclaim deed from O'Neill to appellant, and the escrow instructions, all signed in San Diego on October 10, 1901, had been deposited by Hunsaker with the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles. This was done immediately after the meeting of the three men in San Diego. The papers remained with the bank for more than a year, or until after the last day upon which payment could be made by the appellant under the escrow instructions and a purchase of the property by him result. The payment was not made, although Hunsaker reminded the appellant by letter that his option was about to expire, the letter being dated eight days before the time fixed for that event, and Hunsaker procured a return of the instruments from the holder of the escrow. O'Neill took possession of the land on November 18, 1902.

Richard O'Neill died on May 7, 1910, and he had, nearly five months, at least, before that time, made a will in which he left to his son, the respondent, the real property conveyed by the appellant's deed of October 10, 1901. Hunsaker testified that he had a conversation with the appellant on or about December 13, 1909, during which he informed appellant that O'Neill had disposed of the land "in a way I am not prepared to tell you, but it is not to you." This was in response to a question addressed by the appellant to Hunsaker, by which appellant asked whether O'Neill had disposed of the property. The appellant himself testified:

> "I had heard from others before Mr. O'Neill's death that he had disposed of his property, I understood by deeds and not by will,"

—and he gives his recollection of Hunsaker's answer to his question, above mentioned, as follows:

> "Mr. O'Neill disposed of his interest" in the property covered by the deed of October 10, 1901, "the same as he did of all the rest of his property, but I am not at liberty to tell what that was."

The estate of O'Neill passed through the due course of administration and the land devised to the respondent by the will was distributed to him on January 6, 1911. The appellant did not commence this action until September 10, 1915.

[1] We would not have it understood, from the foregoing statement of the evidence supporting the finding of the trial court, that there was no conflict in the evidence introduced under the issue from which the finding arose. Upon that issue there was a serious conflict, as there is much evidence in the record which is not in harmony with the matters which we have been at such pains, on account of the importance of the litigation, to state. We are not, however, concerned with the conflict in the evidence. That was for the trial court, and we are satisfied, from a careful examination of the record, that the trial judge was justified in resolving the conflicting evidence as he did. The finding that the deed of October 10, 1901, was not a mortgage is amply and substantially justified by the evidence.

The appellant's second point is that the evidence fails to support a finding of the trial court to the effect that the cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by the laches of the appellant in instituting the action. This point we need not consider. Having reached the conclusion already stated as to the effect of the deed, it becomes immaterial whether or not the commencement of the action was unreasonably deferred.

[2] Before concluding this opinion there is, however, a matter which we must notice. The appellant's opening brief covers 90 pages. The respondent felt it necessary to reply in a far from laconic "brief" of 282 pages. The appellant's reply brief is 38 pages in length, and the respondent, notwithstanding his earlier broadside, interposes a final brief of 18 pages. The last page of this brief is devoted to an attempt to show that the appeal is frivolous. Surely, after all we have suffered from respondent, we might have been spared that 1 page! We are not inclined to seriously consider an assertion that an appeal is frivolous when the maker of the assertion has employed 299 pages (it will be noted that we exclude the 1 page) in an endeavor to demonstrate that it is not meritorious.

It is unjust and improper to afflict the courts with briefs as voluminous as the first brief filed by the respondent on this appeal. The courts of this state are heavily burdened with work, and their labors are made more onerous by the presentation of such briefs as the one now before us. We have a right to expect that the profession will aid and not hamper us in our endeavor to keep pace with a flood of litigation, and we embrace this opportunity to remind them of their duty in that regard. In order that our comment may not be improperly applied, we should state that, although the names of all counsel listed as attorneys for respondent at the head of this opinion are on the transcript on appeal, only the first name on the list is signed to the two briefs of the respondent.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF ANTIOCH v. FICKERT.

COMMONWEALTH NAT. BANK OF KANSAS CITY, MO., v. SAME.

(Civ. 3619, 3620.)

1. Estoppel 🔑72—Maker held estopped to set up nonnegotiability of notes assigned before maturity.

In action upon notes given for the purchase price of jennets, defendant held estopped to set up the nonnegotiability of the notes which were assigned before maturity and for valuable consideration without notice of pretended existing equities against them, since, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer in view of Civ. Code, § 3543.

2. Evidence 🔑442(6)—Parol agreement inadmissible in action for purchase price of stock under complete written contract.

In an action on a note given for the purchase price of certain jennets, where defendant set up breach of an oral contract by plaintiff's assignor, from whom the jennets were purchased, to repurchase the jennets and their colts, evidence of such parol agreement held improperly admitted; the written agreement of sale being full and complete, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and of Civ. Code, § 1625.

3. Evidence 🔑420(5)—Written contract for absolute sale of stock cannot be varied by parol agreement making sale conditional.

In an action on notes given for the purchase price of certain jennets pursuant to a written contract of sale, evidence of parol agreement whereby the seller was to repurchase the jennets and their offspring held inadmissible as varying the terms of the written contract by changing it from an absolute to a conditional or contingent sale.

Appeals from Superior Court, Kern County; H. A. Peairs, Judge.

Separate actions by the First National Bank of Antioch and by the Commonwealth National Bank of Kansas City, Mo., against Phillip Fickert. Judgments for defendant in each case, and plaintiffs appeal. Judgments reversed, with directions.

Edward F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, and Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Anderson & Borton, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. These are appeals from judgments made and entered in favor of defendant in two separate actions brought by plaintiffs herein to recover upon two certain promissory notes.

Agreeable to stipulation of the parties, an order of this court was heretofore made that both appeals be submitted upon the same briefs. The notes in each action are alike in amounts, identical in form and substance, except as to the time of payments, and arise out of the same transaction and contract. Both were indorsed and sold to the respective assignees, plaintiffs herein, before maturity and for a valuable consideration, in due course of business. Plaintiffs' assignor entered into the following agreement of sale with defendant:

> "Tehachapi, Cal., June 1, 1914. This agreement made and entered into this day by and between H. B. Thornberry, of Los Angeles, Cal., hereinafter mentioned as party of the first part, and Phillip Fickert, of Tehachapi, Cal., hereinafter mentioned as party of the second part, witness as follows: The party of the first part agrées to sell and does sell to the party of the second part twenty head of jennets for the consideration of thirteen thousand dollars, all of said jennets to be registered stock and to be imported from Missouri, and the party of the second part agrees to accept such jennets as may be selected by the party of the first part as satisfactory stock, and pay for same as follows: Giving on this date one note for thirty-two hundred fifty dollars due seven months after date, said note to be given as deposit on said stock, said payment to be forfeited for failure to accept such stock as delivered, or to furnish the following payments as hereinafter mentioned; second note for thirty-two hundred fifty dollars at seven per cent., due one year; third note for thirty-two hundred fifty dollars at seven per cent. due in two years; fourth note for thirty-two hundred fifty dollars at seven per cent. due in three years. From delivery of said stock at Tehachapi, Cal. It being also agreed and understood that all of the said jennets shall be in foal or said party of the first part shall forfeit one hundred dollars for each jennet which shall prove to fail to be in foal. Said delivery to be made on or before November 1, 1914. [Signed] H. B. Thornberry, Party of the First Part.
> "Accepted by Phillip Fickert, party of the second part."

The above is the only written instrument evidencing the agreement of sale and purchase of the animals therein described.

The four notes provided for in said agreement were accordingly made, executed, and delivered by Phillip Fickert to H. B. Thornberry, plaintiffs' assignor. The first and second notes were paid some time after they fell due. Payment of the third and fourth having been refused, these actions were brought September 28, 1917, to enforce said payments. Said notes, being for like amounts, were in the following form:

"$3,250.00. Bakersfield, Cal., Oct. 14, 1914.
"Thirty-two months after date, I promise to pay to the order of H. B. Thornberry thirty-two hundred fifty and no/100 dollars, for value received, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from date, and if the interest be not paid annually, to become as principal, and bear the same rate of interest. This note is negotiable and payable without defalcation or discount and without any relief or benefit whatever from stay, valuation, appraisement, or homestead exemption laws.
"Phillip Fickert."

The complaints are in the usual form of actions to recover on promissory notes.

By way of answer and as a separate and special defense, defendant alleged that on the 14th day of October, 1914, a certain transaction and agreement was made between defendant and H. B. Thornberry, plaintiffs' assignor, by the terms of which said Thornberry sold defendant 20 head of jennets for the price of $13,000, of which sum the promissory notes set out in plaintiffs' complaint, respectively, evidenced only a portion of the consideration therefor, that it was the agreement of said parties thereto that any male colts born to any of said jennets would, upon demand of defendant, be purchased by Thornberry from defendant at the time when such male colts were ready to be weaned, for the sum of $1,000 each, and that at any time during the pendency of said contract, and before the final payment of any of the promissory notes given as the purchase price of said jennets, said Thornberry would upon demand of defendant receive back the said jennets or such of them as then survived, and all the progeny thereof, and would in addition thereto cancel and release him from all obligations then subsisting on account of said purchase of said jennets and repay all sums of money paid by defendant to said Thornberry. It was further alleged that there had been born to said jennets while in defendant's possession eight male colts, all of which had been weaned, and that a demand had been made upon said Thornberry to purchase the same at the agreed price of $1,000 each, but he had at all times refused to purchase the same, that on November 30, 1915, defendant notified said Thornberry of his election to rescind in accordance with said agreement by offering to return the survivors of said jennets, numbering eighteen, and the progeny thereof, numbering, on November 30, 1915, eight (four jack colts and four jennet colts), upon condition that said Thornberry return to defendant the promissory notes then outstanding against him, including the notes set forth in plaintiffs' complaints, together with the amounts which he had theretofore paid, but that said Thornberry refused to accept said offer.

Defendant further alleges that the consideration for said promissory notes had wholly failed, in that said Thornberry had repudiated it and refused to perform the foregoing contract which constituted a material portion of the consideration for said promissory notes.

The answer concludes with an allegation that defendant had at all times been willing to deliver over and sell said eight male colts to said Thornberry for the sum of $1,000 each, and closes with an offer to sell said colts to said Thornberry at said price of $1,000 each.

The foregoing constitutes all the material matters set out in defendant's answers.

The court found that the said promissory notes were made, executed, and delivered as alleged in the complaints respectively; that before said notes became due and payable, and for a valuable consideration, said Thornberry assigned and sold said notes and the indebtedness evidenced thereby to said respective party plaintiffs, and that said plaintiffs are the legal owners and holders thereof; that no part of the principal or interest has been paid on said third note except the sum of $227.50, paid October 14, 1915, being the installment of interest due on that day, and $545 paid on the same day on account of principal. The court then proceeded to find that every material allegation of the answer was true, but that it was not true that there was due to the First National Bank of Antioch, on January 18, 1919, the sum of $3,089.55 on account of principal and unpaid interest, or any sum whatsoever. A similar finding was made against the fourth assigned promissory note, owned by plaintiff Commonwealth National Bank of Kansas City, Mo., as to any amount being due or owing from the defendant, although a large amount remained unpaid on account of the note it held against said defendant.

It is further expressly found that plaintiffs had no knowledge of any representations made by said Thornberry to said defendant at the time, to wit, October 14, 1914, said contract and agreement, which was in parol, was made, as to the progeny of said jennets or as to any representations or statements made by said Thornberry as to the subject-matter of said contract or agreement.

As a conclusion of law from its finding of fact the court determined that the promissory notes set out in said complaints are not negotiable in form and were purchased and received by plaintiffs subject to all equities and defenses existing in favor of and against plaintiffs' assignor, Thornberry, and defendant was declared, therefore, to be entitled to judgment for his costs.

We are of the opinion that the trial court's conclusion is erroneous.

Every material fact essential to entitle plaintiffs to judgment is either found by the court or admitted to be true, except that the notes in question were in form nonnegotiable, and that the evidence received to establish the parol agreement over the objection of plaintiffs was properly admitted and was sufficient to defeat the actions.

[1] It would serve no practical purpose to follow counsel through learned disquisitions as to what impedimenta commercial paper may carry and still retain its negotiable character. The instant case appears to fall wholly within the rule of stare decisis. The identical language, even as to the arrangement of words and sentences, relied upon by defendant to outlaw said notes from the negotiable instrument class, was passed upon in Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 309, 132 Pac. 256, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861. The instant cases, upon the facts, places plaintiffs in a more favorable position than was plaintiff in Flood v. Petry, supra. There plaintiff had knowledge of an existent contract between Flood and defendant Petry's assignor. Here it is found that plaintiffs had no knowledge of any contract or condition of any kind that did or could affect the notes upon which the present actions were brought. Defendant here, as in the case last above cited, must be held to be estopped from setting up the defense of nonnegotiability of said notes, which were assigned before maturity and for a valuable consideration and without notice of any pretended existing equities against them. "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." Civ. Code, § 3543; Flood v. Petry, supra; Spotton v. Dyer, 184 Pac. 23.

[2] We further think that the evidence tending to establish the parol agreement was improperly admitted. The written agreement of contract, dated June 1, 1914, seems to be full and complete and is presumed to contain all of the engagements of the parties thereto. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; section 1625, Civ. Code; Langan v. Langan, 89 Cal. 194, 26 Pac. 764.

There is nothing ambiguous or uncertain about the terms of the contract, nor does it appear to be oppressive or inequitable. It is not attacked upon the ground of fraud, mistake, or accident. Section 1640, Civ. Code. No attempt was made to reform it.

[3] It is the claim of defendant that the evidence received to establish the parol contract was admissible to show the true nature of the consideration and not to vary the terms of the contract. The alleged subsequent parol contract does, however, substantially change the terms of the written contract, and reduces it from an absolute to a conditional or contingent sale. It makes for the parties another and different agreement. This may not be done. Lompoc Valley Bank v. Stephenson, 156 Cal. 350, 104 Pac. 449; Carver v. San Joaquin Cigar Co., 16 Cal. App. 761, 118 Pac. 92; Hardin v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 166 Pac. 808; Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby, 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319; Langan v. Langan, 89 Cal. 194, 26 Pac. 764; Bledsoe v. Stuckey, 190 Pac. 217; Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 90 Pac. 948.

Defendant and his wife gave testimony in support of the alleged parol agreement, while Thornberry denied that any such agreement had been made. Letters written by defendant's wife, at his dictation, in answer to repeated demands made by Thornberry for payment of the notes in accordance with the written contract, tend strongly to support the claim that the contract of sale was absolute, and not conditional. One of the excerpts from a letter written at defendant's direction to Thornberry, and others to the same effect are in the record, is as follows:

> "I don't want you to think I am trying to get out of the deal. I know the money is due you, and should be paid, and will be, as soon as I can make the required arrangements."

If the oral agreement had been made as contended for, defendant voluntarily placed himself in an embarrassing situation by not reminding Thornberry of that fact at the times when he was being harassed by demands to pay in accordance with the written agreement. From the view we take of the law of the two cases presented there seems to be no avenue by which defendant may escape from plaintiffs' demands. A retrial would be unavailing to defendant.

The judgments appealed from are therefore reversed with directions to the court below to enter judgments in favor of plaintiffs as their respective interests are shown by the record.

BROWN v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO.

(Civ. 3657.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 14, 1921.)

1. Abstracts of title 🔑3—Acknowledgment 🔑6(2)—Obvious mistake as to date of acknowledgment does not prevent recording.

Where the certificate of acknowledgment was dated two years before the date of the conveyance obviously by a mistake in inserting the day of the month for the number of the year in the blank, and the deed referred to in the certificate of acknowledgment showed by exception of taxes for that year from the warranty that the acknowledgment certificate was a mistake, the defect does not prevent the deed from being entitled to recordation, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1202, prescribing proceedings to correct a defective certificate, and such mistake does not make false a certificate that the title appeared of record in the name of the grantee in the deed.

2. Acknowledgment 🔑31 — Acknowledgment obviously dated wrong presumed to have been taken on date of deed.

Where the date stated in the certificate of acknowledgment was obviously wrong on its face, the certificate is to be treated as undated and is presumed to have been made on the date of the execution of the deed.

3. Abstracts of title 🔑3—Statute regulating evidence of defectively acknowledged deeds held inapplicable in action against title examiners.

In an action against a title company which had given a certificate that the title appeared of record in the grantee named in a deed the acknowledgment certificate to which was obviously incorrectly dated, Civ. Code, § 1202, providing for validation of instruments notwithstanding defects in acknowledgment in admitting them in evidence with like effect as copies of an instrument duly acknowledged, provided it is shown the original instrument was genuine when the copying in the record book occurred within 15 years prior to the trial, has no application.

4. Abstracts of title 🔑3—Defective acknowledgment certificate does not render abstractor liable for forgery through grantee's negligence.

The fact that the deed to grantee in the chain of title which a title company certified appeared of record in the grantee had an erroneous date in the certificate of acknowledgment does not render the title company liable for damages caused by the fact that grantor, using a fictitious name by which he was recognized in the deal by plaintiff, the trust company, and the notary, had forged a conveyance to himself from the true owner, since the loss was sustained by the grantor's negligence, and not by the error in the certificate, which at most would have subjected the owner only to the costs of a suit to correct it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by George W. Brown against the Title Insurance & Trust Company for damages occasioned by the fraud of a third person in a real estate transaction. From a judgment dismissing the action after demurrer to plaintiff's third amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal of the action entered after order made sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's third amended complaint without leave to amend.

The facts are quite fully stated in the complaint. The defendant at the times therein mentioned was a corporation duly organized and, as alleged, "engaged in the business of examining the record titles to real property in Los Angeles county, issuing its written guaranty as to the true condition of such titles, as shown by the records in the recorder's office of said county, and holding money and papers in accordance with instructions given it by the respective parties creating such escrows."

The action was brought against defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company to recover the sum of $4,750 as damages sustained by reason of a fraud imposed upon plaintiff by a third party in a real estate transaction by the alleged fault of defendant.

The facts relied upon to maintain this action are identical with those related in Brown v. Rives, 184 Pac. 32. There the action was brought by this plaintiff against the notary public, E. E. Rives, and his surety for damages in the sum of $4,750, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of said notary in taking the acknowledgment of a person who represented himself to be Helmer E. Rabild and the owner of the property described by the conveyance in which plaintiff, Brown, was named as grantee, without personal knowledge or proof of said Rabild's identity.

Judgment for defendant was affirmed on appeal on the sole ground that any negligence on the part of the notary, Rives, was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. Brown v. Rives, supra.

By the instant action plaintiff seeks to recover from defendant a like amount as damages alleged to have resulted from the issuance to him of a false certificate as to the condition of the record title of the same lots or property described in said former action and also in having disregarded plaintiff's instructions in the payment of said sum to impostor Rabild.

The complaint sets out two causes of action. No argument is made to support the second cause of action. The view taken by the court as to the law of the case makes the second cause of action unimportant.

For many years prior to May 26, 1914, Martin L. Kelsey and Anna B. Kelsey, his wife, had been and then were owners of lots 15, 16, and 17, block 9, Van Ness Avenue square, city of Los Angeles, as shown by the records of Los Angeles county.

On May 26, 1914, one Leonard C. Canfield laid a general plan to defraud by forging the names of said Kelsey and wife and a notarial certificate of their acknowledgments to a deed purporting to convey their title to said three lots to a fictitious person, to wit, Rabild, and caused the same to be placed of record. Canfield in the preparation and furtherance of his plan to cheat and defraud had, prior to the making of said forgery, assumed the name Helmer E. Rabild, and retained said name throughout his transactions with both plaintiff and defendant.

On or about June 10, 1914, said Canfield, now Rabild, called plaintiff on the telephone, and, after introducing himself as Helmer E. Rabild, stated that he was the owner of said three lots actually owned by the Kelseys, and offered the same to plaintiff for the sum of $4,750. He also in this conversation agreed to furnish plaintiff with three certificates of title, one for each lot, to be issued by defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company free from all incumbrances except the taxes for the year 1914–15, and also certain building restrictions and easements. Plaintiff stated to Canfield, whom he accepted as Rabild, that he would place $4,750 with defendant trust company with instructions to pay the same to him whenever said trust company issued its certificate in usual form that title to said property was vested in plaintiff. Subsequent to said conversation and on the same day plaintiff deposited with said trust company said sum of $4,750, with written instructions to said trust company to "pay said sum to Helmer E. Rabild when it could issue its certificate of title in usual form that title to said property appeared from the records of Los Angeles county as vested in plaintiff." (Italics are ours.)

Plaintiff had no personal acquaintance with Canfield as Rabild or at all. They did not meet at any time pending the transaction. Neither did Canfield present himself as such or as Rabild at the trust company's offices, nor does it appear that he was known to any of its officers. He made no physical manifestations to either plaintiff or defendant, but employed the telephone and United States mail as exclusive methods of obtaining and imparting information necessary for the accomplishment of his purposes. On June 24, 1914, he sent to defendant trust company through the mail an instrument in the form of a deed, in which Helmer E. Rabild was the named grantor and George W. Brown, plaintiff, was named as grantee, describing the same three lots described by the forged Kelsey deed. Defendant on the same day filed said deed for record, executed three separate written guaranties that title to said lots, as such appeared from the records of said county of Los Angeles, were on said date vested in George W. Brown, and, without further communicating with plaintiff, mailed said check or money order addressed to Helmer E. Rabild, Monrovia, Los Angeles county, which was received and appropriated by the person in whose name it was sent. The witnessing clause of the deed was in the followings words and figures:

> "Witness my hand this 12th day of June 1914.
> "Helmer E. Rabild."

The notarial certificate was in words and figures as follows:

> "State of California, County of Los Angeles–ss.:
> "On this 12th day of June, 1912, before me, E. E. Rives, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared Helmer E. Rabild, known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument, and acknowledged that he executed the same.
> "Witness my hand and official seal.
> "[Notarial Seal] E. E. Rives,
> "Notary Public, Los Angeles County, California."

E. E. Rives was in fact a duly appointed, qualified, and acting notary, and had, so far as he knew, actually taken the acknowledgment of Rabild. In form the certificate of acknowledgment complies with the requirements of section 1189, Civil Code.

No other questions affecting title from other sources were presented in either case.

Upon the foregoing statement of facts it is argued by counsel for plaintiff that the "defective certificate of acknowledgment" showed upon its face that Rabild had appeared before the notary as grantor in said deed two years before title could have passed to him and at a time when it was incontrovertibly in the Kelseys, and that this constitutes actionable negligence on the part of defendant. It is insisted that the defect above pointed out was sufficient to have put defendant as the agent of plaintiff upon inquiry, and defendant should have refused to file said deed for record, as it was not entitled to recordation.

It is apparent from an inspection of the instrument itself that said defect was a clerical error. No fraudulent design is charged against the notary who committed the error. The figures intended to correctly state the day of the month were repeated in the blank space provided for the insertion of the current year, not an uncommon slip of the mind.

The argument made by plaintiff's counsel to the effect that the deed was absolutely void under our Code sections, and not, therefore, entitled to be placed on the public records by reason of its defective certificate of acknowledgment, is reduced to secondary importance by the conclusion we have reached that said defect is not the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss.

[1] However, reverting for the moment to the subject of recordation of instruments, it is significant that section 1202, Civil Code, contemplates defective certificates and provides that, when "an instrument is properly made, but defectively certified, any party interested may have an action in the superior court to obtain a judgment correcting the certificate."

The fact that a notarial certificate is dated earlier than the deed, when it is clearly shown by a reference to the deed that such date is erroneous, does not alone invalidate the certificate.

It has been held no error to admit a deed in evidence, although the certificate of acknowledgment bears date prior to the acknowledgment of the deed if from the instrument it appears that it was actually made at the time of its acknowledgment, and that the conflict in dates arises from a mere clerical error. Mosier v. Momsen, 13 Okl. 41, 74 Pac. 905; Fisher v. Butcher, 19 Ohio, 406, 53 Am. Dec. 436; In re Dahlem's Estate, 175 Pa. 455, 34 Atl. 807, 52 Am. St. Rep. 848; 1 C. J. 828; 1 R. C. L. 286.

States having statutes requiring that the true date of the making of an acknowledgment of an instrument shall be stated in the certificate thereof have held the rule to be that it is sufficient if the date appears by evidence within the instrument itself. In re Dahlem's Estate, 175 Pa. 455, 34 Atl. 807, 52 Am. St. Rep. 848; Boswell v. First Nat. Bank, 16 Wyo. 161, 92 Pac. 624, 93 Pac. 661; Kelly v. Rosenstock, 45 Md. 389.

If the rule recognized by other jurisdictions may be applied to the situation here presented, plaintiff's contention that the deed of June 12, 1914, was not entitled to be recorded and imparted notice to no one is not sustainable.

The notarial certificate makes direct reference to the deed dated June 12, 1914. The certificate declares that Helmer E. Rabild, known to the notary to be the person whose name was subscribed to the within instrument, personally appeared before him and acknowledged that he executed the same. The deed further contains the following provision which would have been a very significant circumstance to any one that the acknowledgment was not made prior to a time when taxes for the current year, to wit, 1914, became a lien upon the property:

> "Subject to the 1914 and 1915 taxes, also subject to restrictions, reservations and conditions as recorded in Book 4192, page 201, of Deeds."

[2] This was notice to the world that at least the taxes assessed against the property for the year 1914 had not been paid and the title was subject to other conditions. The instrument itself contained the evidence that the acknowledgment had not been taken prior to a time when taxes became payable. The claim that the acknowledgment was taken on the day named in the certificate being shown to be erroneous removes it from all consideration, and the presumption that it was taken on the day the deed bears date must be indulged. Where no date appears in the certificate or if it is rendered by evidence within itself so doubtful as to destroy its force, the certificate will be presumed to be made, under all the authorities, at the date of the instrument.

[3] Section 1207, Civil Code, which provides, upon conditions therein stated, for the validation of instruments affecting title to real property, notwithstanding any defect, omission, or informality in their execution or in the certificate of acknowledgment or the absence of any such certificate, is relied upon by plaintiff as being conclusive against any avenue of escape from liability. The closing lines of said section provide that certified copies of any instrument described in said section "may be read in evidence with like effect as copies of an instrument duly acknowledged and recorded, provided, when such copying in the proper book of record occurred within fifteen years prior to the trial of the action it is shown first that the original instrument was genuine."

The above section is not applicable to the facts of the instant case. There are no facts in the instant case upon which the rule of evidence as stated may operate. It is not necessary, therefore, to proceed further with a discussion of this subject for reasons above stated.

[4] Plaintiff contends that the deed in question was false, inasmuch as Rabild had but mythical existence. But the truth of the matter is, plaintiff, Brown, by his written instructions to defendant gave to Helmer E. Rabild corporeal existence and fitted him to his newly chosen name. Defendant had no part in bringing plaintiff, Brown, and impostor Rabild together.

Defendant was instructed by plaintiff to deal with one Helmer E. Rabild as the owner of said lots. The identical person whom plaintiff had bargained with, using the same name given to defendant, was the person received by and dealt with by defendant. So far as this transaction is concerned, Rabild cannot be regarded as a fictitious person in his business dealing with defendant. Plaintiff was the author of his own misfortune.

The main facts of the instant case in plan and purpose are quite similar to those set out in Bank of Savings v. Murfey, 68 Cal. 455, 9 Pac. 843. The impostor in the instant case seems to have employed the same methods that were practiced by the impostor in the former case. Defendant Murfey was a notary public. Wright Leroy was an impostor and swindler. Leroy introduced himself to Murfey as M. B. West and requested Murfey to draw a deed from him to Henry Harmon for a lot in Oakland. Murfey prepared the deed as directed. Leroy signed the name of M. B. West, and in that name acknowledged its execution. Murfey affixed his certificate to the deed in the usual form. Later Leroy presented himself at the banking house of plaintiff, introducing himself as Henry Harmon to E. C. Sessions, its president, and stated that he desired to borrow $4,000 on the property described in the West deed. After some preliminary arrangements the examination of the title was referred to a searcher, who reported the record title in M. B. West. Later Leroy presented himself at the bank and handed Mr. Sessions the forged deed. A note and mortgage in the agreed amount of $4,000 were prepared, the mortgage duly executed and acknowledged before one of the bank's officers, who was a notary, and the money paid to Leroy. None of the officers of the bank had ever seen Leroy until he presented himself to the bank in this transaction. An action for damages was brought against the notary, Murfey, for negligence in certifying Leroy to be West, the owner of the property. The court held that, while the notary was negligent and careless in taking and certifying the acknowledgment to said deed without knowing or requiring proof that the person subscribing the name M. B. West to said deed was in fact West, nevertheless plaintiff's damage was not proximately caused by Murfey's negligence, but the result of plaintiff's negligence in failing to inquire as to the identity of the person to whom it was making a loan and taking a note and mortgage therefor and accepting a person who was not personally known or proven to its president or some of its officers to be the person whose name was subscribed to said instrument.

The question of proximate cause as it pertinently applies to the facts of the instant case is exhaustively discussed in the Murfey Case, supra. Plaintiff in the instant case gave defendant no instructions to take the acknowledgment of Rabild. Impliedly plaintiff made Rabild his agent to select any qualified notary he might choose. Rabild selected Rives.

Plaintiff prepared the way for the commission of the fraud perpetrated upon him by giving verity to Rabild's identity. Rives, the notary, had certified that Rabild, personally known to him to be the person whose name was subscribed to the deed had executed the instrument. The deed from Kelsey and wife to Helmer E. Rabild was already of record.

If the notarial certificate had been faultless as to date, plaintiff, admittedly, would have received all that he had bargained for, to wit, a deed formally executed by Rabild in accordance with instructions and which would have been sufficient to have justified defendant in issuing its certificate "that title to said property appeared from the records of said Los Angeles county as vested in him." But such a deed would have conveyed to him nothing. A specious deed yet stood between him and actual title. Plaintiff's only chance of circumventing an unsuspected forgery is now urged in an action against defendant as a ground for damages for the commission of an error in the consummation of a transaction that would have resulted in certain loss to plaintiff except for the intervention of said error.

To sustain the right to maintain an action for damages on a mere naked error, where no substantial benefit could possibly come to the person urging such as a basis of damage, would be repugnant to every principle of equity as well as the sound policy of the law. It is not pretended that defendant was an insurer of plaintiff's title.

If the deed in question had been genuine, in the absence of intervening rights, the only damages plaintiff could have suffered would have been the costs of maintaining an action to correct the error in the manner provided for by statute. Nothing could have been done, under the circumstances of the situation, to have made plaintiff whole. An action to correct the defect would have been an idle thing.

Plaintiff having stated his cause as broadly and as favorably to himself as the facts would permit, and it appearing that there is no theory upon which the action may be maintained against defendant, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

1. Mandamus 🔑10—Writ cannot be invoked to compel performance of ineffective act by city council.

If a proposed city ordinance relative to the matter of material to be used in street construction and surface work does not fall within the purview of the initiative reservation, petitioners for writ of mandate against the mayor and common council of the city to compel them either to pass the ordinance or submit it at a special election have no right to insist that the city council pass the ordinance or call election and submit it to vote, as nothing would be thereby accomplished, while a writ of mandate is never to be invoked to compel the performance of act without effect in law.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑79—City can include within charter requirements as to procedure for street improvements which will prevail over general law.

Under the grant of municipal power a city has the right to include within her charter provisions requirements as to the manner and procedure to be adopted for the guidance of her officers in improvements of the streets, and such provisions will prevail over general law.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑78—State law controls matter classed as municipal affair, in absence of charter provisions.

Where no particular provisions are made in a city charter covering a matter falling within the classification of a municipal affair, the state law controls.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑282(4)—Vrooman Act confers on council discretion in determining character of pavement, exercise being administrative act not within initiative and referendum.

The Vrooman Act, the general law of the state under which street improvement work is prosecuted, confers a discretion on the city council to determine the kind of material to be used in the improvement of a street, which discretion is not intended to be exercised by a blanket declaration or ordinance, but with respect to the particular work, as it becomes necessary, and in the exercise of such discretion the council performs an administrative act not legislative in character within the meaning of the constitutional provision reserving to the people the right to initiate and refer legislation.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑282(4)—Neither city council nor electors can modify or restrict power given council by Vrooman Act to determine paving material.

The Vrooman Act, the general law of the state under which street improvement work is prosecuted, defines the powers of city councils and boards of trustees in respect of determining with what material paving work shall be done, and neither the city council itself nor the electors, by approving at an election an ordinance constituting a blanket determination by the council of the kind of paving material to be used, have the right to change, modify, or restrict the power given the council under the statute.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑78 — State law controls where no special procedure outlined touching municipal subject.

Under Const. art. 11, § 6, where no special procedure is outlined touching a municipal subject, the state law always controls.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by C. L. Hyde and others against Louis J. Wilde and others. From judgment directing issuance of the writ, defendants appeal. Judgment reversed, and superior court ordered to enter order dismissing the proceeding.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., F. McCleneghan, Deputy City Atty., and M. R. Thorp, all of San Diego, and Paul S. Honberger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles C. Crouch, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs, alleging themselves to be duly qualified and registered voters within the municipal limits of the city of San Diego, brought this proceeding against the mayor and common council of said city to compel the council to either pass or submit at a special election a certain ordinance desired to be put into effect by the petitioners. A judgment for the issuance of a peremptory writ was made after hearing had, and defendants have appealed.

The proposed ordinance had to do with the matter of material to be used in street construction and surface work, and the material clause thereof is as follows:

"Section 1. That from and after the adoption of this ordinance, it shall be unlawful to construct, or for any person or official of the city to order the construction of, any patented pavement, or patent process pavement, upon any of the public streets, alleys, or rights of way in the city of San Diego, until the owner of such patent shall have transferred to the city all right to the use of the same therein, with the privilege of any person to manufacture and lay the same upon the streets under any contract that may be awarded to him, or entered into by him with the city of San Diego, or the superintendent of streets of the said city."

[1] Numerous grounds of objection to the claim of the petitioners were raised by the answers made to the petition, and it is insisted here that, upon either of the grounds alleged, the petition should have been denied. It will not be necessary to give particular attention to each of the grounds urged by appellants. A determination of the one main question argued in the briefs is all that is essential to a consideration of this appeal. This contention is, briefly, that the city of San Diego is governed by the general law of the state in the matter of the improvement of her streets; that under the state law the appropriate authorities of the city are given the right to determine the kind of material to be used in street improvement work, and that the provisions of the proposed ordinance, if valid, would effect a modification and repeal of the state law; that only the state Legislature, or the electors of the state as a body acting under the initiative, may change the state law. The last proposition is extended by the argument that the proposed ordinance would likewise operate to amend the freeholders' charter, authority for which, in the manner proposed, does not exist in law. The basis for the latter argument will more fully appear in the statement hereinafter made. It is admitted that the petition presented by the plaintiffs was sufficient in form and substance. The question is, Was the subject-matter of the proposed ordinance a matter of legislative nature such as is intended to be covered by the right reserved in the people to initiate or prevent legislation? If the proposed ordinance does not fall within the purview of the initiative reservation, then petitioners would have no right to insist that the city council pass the ordinance or call an election and submit it to a vote, for nothing would be thereby accomplished, and mandate is never permitted to be invoked to compel the performance of acts which will have no effect in law. Navajo, etc., Mining Co. v. Curry, 147 Cal. 582, 82 Pac. 247, 109 Am. St. Rep. 176; Wiedwald v.

Dodson, 95 Cal. 450, 30 Pac. 580. In State ex rel. Davies v. White et al., 36 Nev. 334, 136 Pac. 110, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 195, it is said:

> "The proposition that a writ of mandate will not issue to compel respondents to submit to the electors of the city a proposed ordinance that would be void even if approved by a majority of the electors is too clear for discussion or the citation of authorities. It remains only to consider whether the proposed ordinance would be valid if enacted."

Our Supreme Court, in the case of Hopping v. Council of the City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 Pac. 977, has said:

> "Executive powers are frequently committed to the city council, and they are sometimes exercised by declarations in the form of an ordinance or resolution. The fact that executive action is taken by ordinance or resolution would not make it subject to the power of the referendum. With respect to such action, no matter how effected, the people, under the constitutional reservation, would not have the power of invoking the referendum to reject or approve them by popular vote. * * * We think the provisions of the referendum should be held applicable to all ordinances and resolutions which constitute an exercise of legislative power. * * * To allow it to be invoked to annul or delay executive conduct would destroy the efficiency necessary to the successful administration of the business affairs of a city. In many cases it would entirely prevent the exercise of the executive power necessary to carry out the acts determined upon by the legislative department. In the absence of a very clear declaration to the contrary, it must be presumed that the power of referendum was intended to apply solely to the legislative powers of the city. * * * If the council should, either by resolution or ordinance, do something purely executive in character, unmixed with any exercise of legislative power, the provisions of this section should be held inapplicable thereto."

We cite this case more particularly to the point that electors, by the mere filing of a petition otherwise sufficient proposing an ordinance for adoption, have not the right to compel either the adoption of the ordinance or the submission of the same to a vote of the electors, regardless of the subject-matter contained therein. The freeholders' charter of the city of San Diego contains this provision:

> "The mode and manner for the improvement of streets, lanes, alleys, places or courts in this city, where an assessment is levied for the payment of any part or portion of the expense thereof, shall be as prescribed by the general law of the state of California, relative to the improvement of streets, lanes, alleys, places or courts in municipalities, in force at the time proceedings were taken for the improvement of the same."

[2] No other provision is contained in the charter referring to the matter of the improvement of streets, etc. Under the grant of municipal power a city has the right to include within her charter provisions requirements as to the manner and procedure to be adopted for the guidance of her officers in improvement of the streets, and such provisions will prevail over the general law. Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 Pac. 436; Hayes v. Handley et al. (Sup.) 187 Pac. 952.

[3] Where no particular provisions are made covering a matter falling within the classification as a "municipal affair," the state law controls. Hence the condition with respect to the San Diego charter is the same as though no reference had been contained in the charter affecting the matter of public streets at all, for the provision quoted is merely declarative of the law which would control in the absence of such declaration. Clouse et al. v. City of San Diego et al., 159 Cal. 434, 114 Pac. 573. The Vrooman Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1715), which is the general law of the state under which street improvement work is prosecuted, provides that when the public interest requires the city council may order streets or ways to be graded, planked, paved or repaved. The act further provides as follows:

> "The words 'paved' or 'repaved,' as used in this act, shall be held to mean and include pavement of stone, whether paving blocks or macadamizing, or of bituminous rock or asphalt, or of iron, wood or other material, whether patented or not, which the city council shall by ordinance adopt."

By this provision two things seem clear: First, that a discretion is conferred by the state law upon the city council to determine as to the kind of material to be used in the improvement of a street; second, that the discretion confided is not intended to be exercised by a "blanket" declaration or ordinance, but is to be exercised with respect to the particular work to be done as the same becomes necessary. If discretion is given to the city council by statute to make the selection of material, then the ordinance proposed, as appellants argue, would have the effect, if valid, of repealing in part the state law.

[4] We are of the opinion that the statute of the state does confer a discretion upon the city council; that in the exercise of that discretion the council performs an administrative act, not legislative in character, within the meaning of the constitutional provision reserving to the people the right to initiate and refer legislation. To make the position clearer, we may here inquire, Could the city council, under the authority of the law, pass and adopt an ordinance providing that in the future all streets of the city should be paved or repaved with rock and no other substance? Would such an ordinance have any binding effect upon the council or a succeeding council when the matter of determining the work to be done on a particular street might arise?

We think clearly that no such ordinance could be adopted which would have such general effect. It would fall within the class of matters which, as the court said in Thompson v. Board of Trustees, 144 Cal. 281, 77 Pac. 951—

> "it was beyond the powers of the board by ordinance or otherwise to divest itself and succeeding boards, for a longer or a shorter period, of powers vested in it by the general law for the benefit of its constituents. For this would be to repeal pro tanto the general law. Nor, if this objection could be obviated, would it have been competent for the board thus to bind its successors."

In the case of Hopping v. Council of City of Richmond, supra, the court had in mind undoubtedly the question as to whether the power of the initiative and referendum could be made to extend at all to street improvement procedure, when it said:

> "There may be grounds for excluding from the operation of these powers legislative acts which are special and local in their nature and in which the entire body of citizens who shall exercise the power of referendum and initiative is not interested, such as resolutions to make local improvements and the like. This question is not before us, for the matters determined by the resolution are not local to any particular part of Richmond."

In Chase v. Kalber, 28 Cal. App. 561, 153 Pac. 397, wherein was concerned a mandate petition to require the town clerk to act with respect to a referendum petition filed against a certain resolution passed by the board of trustees establishing the grades of streets and avenues, the court declared in denying the writ:

> "However, as before stated, we have been led to the conclusion upon a reconsideration of the case that, notwithstanding that resolutions of intention to establish grades or otherwise improve streets are of a legislative character, none of the steps necessary to be taken in proceedings for street improvement was intended by the people to come within either the power of the initiative or that of the referendum as delegated by the people through their Constitution to the electors of municipal corporations."

As expressive of the same impression as to the law, this court in Starbuck v. City of Fullerton, 34 Cal. App. 683, 168 Pac. 583—that being a referendum case where it was sought to cause to be submitted to a vote of the electors an ordinance of intention to open a street, passed by the local board of trustees—said:

> "In our opinion, the constitutional provision giving and guaranteeing to electors the right to the initiative and referendum was not designed to furnish a means by which street improvements local in character can be either commenced or prevented by the use of the initiative or referendum."

[5] In this case it is not necessary to place the decision upon the ground that no part of street improvement proceedings may be subjected to these rights reserved to the people. We hold simply that the state law defines the powers of city councils and boards of trustees in the matters concerned in the proposed ordinance, and that neither the city council itself nor the electors, in the manner here attempted, have the right to change, modify, or restrict the power given under the statute.

[6] It is said by respondents that, as the city charter contains a provision authorizing the council "to contract bonded indebtedness for any other purpose authorized by this charter or the general law of the state of California," somehow some work might be done by way of improvement of streets which would not come within that class mentioned in the charter provision making the general law applicable "where an assessment is levied for the payment of any part or portion of the expense thereof." Our attention is not called to any provision of the charter defining or limiting the power of the city council to determine what material shall be used in any class of street work, and it is very clear that the power in that respect is all derived from the state law, by which it must be concluded that discretion is made to vest in the municipal board to select material as occasion requires. We have already made it clear that the condition of the charter wherein street improvement work is referred to is of no different effect than had no reference whatsoever been contained therein. Where no special procedure is outlined touching a municipal subject, the state law always controls by force of the Constitution. Section 6, art. 11, Const. Cal.

In our opinion, the petitioners were not entitled to the writ awarded to them by the trial court.

The judgment is reversed; it is further ordered that the superior court enter its order dismissing the proceeding.

1. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Opinion ordinarily not actionable.

As a general rule an expression of opinion or belief, if so understood and intended, is not a representation of fact, and, although false, does not amount to actionable fraud.

2. Fraud 🔑64(1) — Whether representation constitutes opinion or statement of fact ordinarily for jury.

Where there is any doubt as to whether a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion or as a statement of fact, the question is not one of law, but of fact, for the jury or trial court.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(4)—Representation as to value may be statement of fact.

A statement by the vendor as to the value of the property and the value of the wood which can be cut therefrom may be made, not as a matter of opinion, but as a statement of fact, and, when so made and relied on by the party to whom it is made, it may be a fraudulent misrepresentation, warranting rescission.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(1)—Inspection by purchasers generally charges them with knowledge.

The fact that purchasers made an inspection of the property before buying, as a general rule, charges them with the knowledge that would ordinarily be acquired by such inspection, and in such a case they cannot rely on misrepresentations by the vendor.

5. Exchange of property 🔑5—Complaint in action to rescind for fraud held to show reliance on representations notwithstanding investigation.

In an action to rescind a contract for the exchange of property on the ground of fraud, a complaint alleging that the plaintiffs investigated the property they were to receive before they signed the contract, but that the husband was too ill at the time to make a careful inspection, and that the wife was unfamiliar with business matters, sufficiently excuses the failure of the plaintiffs to detect the falsity of the misrepresentations as to the value of the property and the timber thereon, so as to be good against demurrer.

6. Fraud 🔑41—Complaint held to state cause of action for fraud in exchange of property.

A complaint alleging that the defendant made false representations of fact concerning the value of property which he transferred to plaintiffs in exchange for their property, which representations the defndant knew to be false, and which were made to induce plaintiffs to convey their property for a grossly inadequate consideration, and that, relying upon the statements, the plaintiffs made the contemplated exchange, contains all the allegations necessary to state a cause of action based on fraud, under Civ. Code, § 1572.

7. Exchange of property 🔑5—Complaint for fraud held to excuse delay.

A complaint to rescind a contract for the exchange of property based on fraud, which alleged that after the contract plaintiffs, who were aged and infirm, did not reside on the property they acquired, but gave to defendants the contract to cut the timber therefrom, and did not learn until two years after the exchange that the representations as to value of the land and the timber thereon were gross exaggerations, alleges facts ample to excuse the delay in bringing the suit to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by N. S. Stockton and another against John Hind and others for rescission of a contract for exchange of land on the ground of fraud, in which Clara Stockton, as special administratrix of the estate of N. S. Stockton, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff for N. S. Stockton. Judgment for defendants, after demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained, without leave to amend, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

Archibald J. Treat, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment following an order sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to amend in an action for the rescission of a contract on the ground of fraud.

Stripped of its legal verbiage, and as stated by the plaintiffs in their opening brief, the averments of the second amended complaint may be summarized as follows: The plaintiffs are husband and wife. The defendants are the Hind Ranch Company, the California Pacific Title Insurance Company, the Hind Company, Incorporated, a corporation, Alice R. Hind, George U. Hind, and C. P. Chamberlain. In May, 1916, the plaintiffs were the owners of an 1,180-acre tract of land in Merced county. The defendant John Hind was the owner of 335.02 acres of land in Napa county. The property of the plaintiffs was subject to a first mortgage in the sum of $40,000, accrued interest in the sum of about $3,000, and water rates of about $1,800; said property and other property of the plaintiffs was also subject to two deeds of trust, in about the sum of $26,500, and certain judgments or attachments, not exceeding the sum of $1,000. By the terms of an agreement (Exhibit A, attached to the complaint) the plaintiffs and John Hind were to exchange their properties, the latter to pay the amount due under said deeds of trust, but not to exceed $26,500, and said judgment and attachment liens, not to exceed the sum of $1,000, which sums were to be secured by a two-year deed of trust upon the Napa county property, which the Stocktons were to acquire in exchange for their Merced property. The personal property upon the Napa county land was to go with it, but the plaintiffs were to give a chattel mortgage thereon to Mr. Hind. It was further provided that the net proceeds of timber cut upon said Napa county land were to be applied to the liquidation of the indebtedness of the plaintiffs.

The complaint further alleges that the holders of one of the deeds of trust had advertised the Merced property to be sold on May 22, 1916; that 10 days previous to said advertised date of sale the defendant John Hind had proposed to plaintiffs the exchange of the lands referred to, and had made to them the following express statement of existing facts:

> "That the reasonable market value of his said land and property in Napa county, hereinabove referred to in paragraph V, was at least the sum of $75,000, and that there was timber and cordwood upon his said land of such a value that the same could be marketed at a profit to the plaintiffs of $55,000, and that although plaintiffs would be required to give a mortgage of about $30,000 upon the Napa county lands to effect the exchange contemplated, the sale of the timber and cordwood would bring enough to liquidate this mortgage, and that plaintiffs thereupon would acquire title to the said Napa county lands free and clear of all incumbrances in return for their equity in the said Merced county lands."

The plaintiffs knew nothing concerning the Napa county property. They visited it for the first time two days after the proposition was made them by Mr. Hind, and they were upon it but two hours. Mr. Stockton was ill and unable to inspect it, and the time was too short for Mrs. Stockton to do so. The plaintiffs had implicitly relied upon the statements of Mr. Hind and his reputation for business integrity. At the time of negotiations Mr. Stockton was about 84 years of age and feeble. His wife was inexperienced in business affairs, and was without knowledge or experience as to the value of the Napa county property, or of the cord or timber wood upon it. John Hind, taking advantage of the great age of Mr. Stockton, and knowing that they believed in him and his good reputation, and knowing that the representations made by him as to the value of the Napa county lands were false, and that they were not worth $75,000, in fact not worth to exceed $15,000, and that the timber thereon was not worth $30,000—in fact, not worth to exceed $1,000—fraudulently made the representations referred to for the purpose of inducing the plaintiffs to exchange their Merced county land for a grossly inadequate consideration; that relying upon the truth of the representations of Mr. Hind the agreement (Exhibit A) was signed on May 20, 1916, and on June 1, 1916, the plaintiffs deeded their land to Mr. Hind and executed papers necessary to carry said agreement into effect, and received from him a deed to his Napa county land.

There was no income from the Napa county property, and the Stocktons had no other property. Because of his great age Mr. Stockton was unable to support himself by labor, and his wife had to labor to support him. She was employed in Merced and Stanislaus counties from the date of the exchange to December, 1918. At no time did she reside upon the Napa county property, and only visited it infrequently. In May, 1917, she suffered a fractured skull, which physically incapacitated her; yet even before she had fully recovered from her accident, and for some time thereafter, she unsuccessfully endeavored to let a contract for the cutting of wood upon the Napa valley property. In October, 1917, the plaintiffs gave to certain of the defendants permission to cut, remove, and sell timber and cordwood from the Napa property, the net proceeds to be credited upon plaintiffs' indebtedness; $2,000 was to be advanced by John Hind, Alice R. Hind, and the Hind Company, for cutting, removing, and selling the timber and wood; the latter was to be sold by the Hinds, who, after reimbursing themselves for said advance and interest at 7 per cent., were to credit the indebtedness of the plaintiffs with anything remaining. If the wood could not be sold at a profit, the plaintiffs were nevertheless to repay all sums advanced, with interest. The plaintiffs were denied the right to themselves cut, remove, or sell timber or wood.

Pursuant to this agreement the Hinds cut, removed, and sold a portion of the timber and cordwood, but for a long time—i. e., from October 31, 1917, the date of the agreement, to July, 1918—refused to account to the plaintiffs. In July, 1918, plaintiffs for the first time learned that, if the whole of the timber and cordwood upon the Napa property were cut and sold, the net proceeds therefrom would not exceed $1,000, instead of the sum of $30,000, which they were induced to believe by John Hind would be the net derivable amount. This information as to the timber and cordwood led the plaintiffs to make inquiry as to the truth of the statements of John Hind as to the Napa land, the discovery that they could not pay off the indebtedness to John Hind from the sale of timber and cordwood, and that they parted with their $80,000 equity in the Merced land for lands in Napa county without value over the deed of trust thereon given to Hind. Promptly upon discovery the plaintiffs notified John Hind that they rescinded the agreement of exchange, offered to reconvey the Napa land and to reimburse him for advances and improvements, and to restore him to his original status, which offer Mr. Hind refused. The plaintiffs further offered to do all things which in equity and good conscience they ought to do to restore John Hind and the other defendants to their original status, providing only that the defendants likewise did equity to the plaintiffs. The defendant John Hind parted with his title to the Merced county land in favor of the defendant Hind Ranch Company, Incorporated, and the plaintiffs to secure their obligation to repay John Hind, conveyed their title in the Napa county land to the California Pacific Title Insurance Company as trustee.

The stockholders of the Hind Ranch Company are John Hind, George U. Hind, and C. P. Chamberlain, said three persons also constituting its board of directors, and each of these individuals had knowledge that the representations of John Hind were false and fraudulent, and that they were made with fraudulent purpose and intent. At the time John Hind refused to rescind the agreement of exchange the plaintiffs did not know that he had parted with his title to the Merced county land.

The principal point raised by the demurrer and discussed in the briefs is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that it does not disclose that Hind made any misrepresentation as to a material fact. In support of the ruling of the court upon the demurrer it is argued that the averments that said defendant represented that the reasonable market value of the property to be conveyed to the plaintiffs was $75,000, and that the sale of the timber and cordwood that could be cut therefrom would bring enough to liquidate the mortgage which the plaintiffs as a part of the transaction were to give upon said land, were not statements of fact, but merely expressions of opinion.

[1, 2] It is conceded that the general rule is that an expression of opinion or belief, if nothing more, and if so understood and intended, is not a representation of fact, and, although false, does not amount to actionable fraud. Ordinarily a person has no right to rely upon such statements, and, if he does so rely, he cannot treat them as fraudulent, either for the purpose of maintaining an action in damages for deceit, or for the purpose of rescinding the contract. Where there is any doubt as to whether or not a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion or a statement of fact, the question is one not of law but of fact for the court or jury. 20 Cyc. 15 et seq.; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 395, 92 Pac. 1011; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 36.

[3] The defendant Hind is charged in the complaint with making a fraudulent express statement of material existing facts. He is alleged to have stated, not as a matter of opinion, but as a fact, that the reasonable market value of the property was $75,000. and that the cordwood on the premises was worth in effect a certain amount. That such may be regarded as representations of fact is supported by numerous authorities:

"A statement as to the value of property is not always made as a mere expression of opinion, upon which the other party has no right to rely. It may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made. When it is such, it is like any other misrepresentation of fact, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation warranting rescission. The rule in regard to this matter is stated by Mr. Pomeroy as follows: 'Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only a matter of opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to the transaction, so that the other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, then the statement clearly becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation.' 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878. He further says that the statements which most frequently come within this branch of the rule are those concerning value." Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 776, 93 Pac. 1018.

"True, of course, it is that expressions of opinion honestly made are not actionable. Equity has no concern with them. But equally true it is that a false statement of an opinion expressed to one entitled to rely upon it may form the basis of an action for deceit, like any other misrepresentation of fact." Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 77, 141 Pac. 926.

"The rule that mere expressions of opinion cannot constitute actionable fraud is, no doubt, subject to some qualification. A party inducing another to contract in reliance upon estimates or opinions professedly based upon alleged facts known to the party stating them to be nonexistent will not be permitted to escape responsibility by the plea that he was merely declaring his opinion." Henry v. Continental Bldg., etc., Ass'n, 156 Cal. 680, 105 Pac. 960.

[4, 5] Defendants further contend in effect that, even if it be conceded that the representations in question were of matters of fact, still, since the complaint shows that the plaintiffs inspected the property, they are chargeable with such information and knowledge as would ordinarily flow from such inspection. It is true that where material statements of fact are made to a vendee by a vendor, the former is under no obligation to verify and investigate the statements; and if they be false and the vendee suffer from his reliance thereon, he is entitled to relief. But if the vendee make an investigation of the property on his own account he cannot rely upon the representations. Here, however, it is shown by the complaint that while the plaintiffs visited the property and were afforded by the defendants an opportunity to inspect the same, no such inspection was in fact made by reason of the illness of Mr. Stockton and the inexperience of Mrs. Stockton in business affairs, which may properly be regarded as a sufficient excuse for their not having made such inspection.

[6] The complaint shows that the defendant Hind made certain false representations of fact concerning the Napa county property, which the defendants knew to be false, and that they were made for the purpose of inducing the plaintiffs to enter into an agreement to convey their property for a grossly inadequate consideration; that relying upon these statements they entered into the agreement, and later the contemplated exchange of properties was made. Here are all the allegations necessary to constitute a cause of action based on fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572; Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 683, 58 Pac. 271.

[7] Nor can it be held from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiffs acquiesced in the fraud alleged to have been practised upon them. There can be no doubt that the alleged facts entitle the plaintiffs to the relief demanded; and we are also satisfied that no argument is necessary to show that the plaintiffs were guilty of no laches. While considerable time elapsed between the making of the exchange and the commencement of this action, the facts pleaded show ample excuse for the delay. Upon the discovery of the fraud the action was promptly commenced.

It follows that the court was in error in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the second amended complaint. The judgment entered thereon is reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule said demurrer, and permit the defendants to make answer to the said complaint.

MOORE SHIPBUILDING CORPORATION et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9542.)

1. Master and servant ⚷347—Compensation allowance to dependents valid.

Const. art. 20, § 21, authorizing the Legislature to enact laws to compensate employees for injuries in the course of employment irrespective of the fault of either party, empowers the Legislature to extend compensation to a workman's dependents deprived of support by his death, whether their maintenance has been voluntarily and gratuitously assumed in good faith legally imposed; and the legislative discretion to determine what dependents shall become distributees of the indemnity is not measured by the analogies of the common law or the limitations of compensation acts in force at the time this constitutional provision was adopted.

2. Master and servant ⚷417(7)—Compensation by commission's findings of dependency conclusive.

Under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the commission's findings of total dependency, and that the relationship of the dependent child to decedent's household existed in good faith, must be accepted an established.

3. Master and servant ⚷388—Child of undivorced wife, living in adultery with unmarried man, held a "dependent" member of his "family" or "household" within Compensation Act.

Where deceased servant, an unmarried man, was living in adultery with an undivorced wife, whose three year old daughter he was also supporting, the three constituted a family or household, and though the relationship between him and the woman was not in good faith, bad faith could not be imputed to the child, and she was entitled to death benefits as a "dependent" member of his "family" or "household" in good faith within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9, subd. 11(1) and (2), and section 14, subds. (a), (b), (c).

Wilbur and Shaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding by Horace Guitard, as guardian of Ida Miller, a minor, for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of Albert Bauer, opposed by the Moore Shipbuilding Corporation, employer, and the Ætna Life Insurance Company, insurer. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award in favor of said minor, and the employer and insurer petition for certiorari. Petition denied.

E. L. Stockwell and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is a proceeding to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding a death benefit of $3,400 to one Ida Miller for total dependency as a dependent of Albert Bauer, an employee accidentally killed in the service of the plaintiff Moore Shipbuilding Corporation.

The only question in dispute is the status of Ida Miller as a dependent member of the "family or household" of the decedent. The admitted facts disclose that for a year or more preceding his death decedent Albert Bauer was living in adulterous cohabitation with Lola Miller, the undivorced wife of one Samuel Miller. Ida Miller, who at the time of Bauer's death was three years of age, is the daughter of Lola and Samuel Miller. Miller deserted his wife just prior to the birth of the child, and has not been heard from since. Bauer, an unmarried man, appeared on the scene as a friend of Mrs. Miller and the child soon after the latter's birth. He contributed to the support of the mother and daughter for a year or more before he and the mother began living together, and frequently sent them by mail remittances of money addressed to the little girl. Later, at Bauer's solicitation, Mrs. Miller, with her little daughter, came to live with him. Thereafter, the couple lived together ostensibly as man and wife with Ida as their putative daughter, and Bauer, until his death, supported both the mother and child, and by his conduct and declarations indicated his purpose to rear and care for Ida as if she was his own daughter. The evidence would justify the conclusion that it was his intention that the relation should be permanent.

The claims of the mother as a dependent of the deceased were disposed of before the Industrial Accident Commission by stipulation between the parties to this proceeding, and the only relevancy on this appeal of the relations between her and Bauer is as to the effect of their unlawful cohabitation upon the status of the child as being a member in good faith of decedent's household.

[1] The first point to be considered in its logical relation to the case is the objections raised to the power of the Legislature under the Constitution of California to enact into the workmen's compensation law (Laws 1917, p. 831) provision for an allowance to dependents of a deceased employee not connected with him by either legal or natural ties. The constitutional authority for the enactment of a workmen's compensation law in this state is provided by section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, and so far as pertinent to the matter before us is comprised in the words:

> "The Legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employees for any injury incurred by the said employees in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of either party."

That this provision must be construed to empower the Legislature to extend compensation in the event of death of such employee to certain dependents is not questioned by petitioners, but they contend that such allowance must be limited to dependents having a legal or moral claim to support from the employee in his lifetime.

The basis for a construction upholding allowances to surviving dependents is that in authorizing a workmen's compensation act the constitutional provision is presumed to have been adopted to cover the whole scope and purpose of the workmen's compensation laws as commonly enacted and in force at the time of its adoption. That under the general scheme of such laws death benefits to dependents are commonly recognized is conceded.

This construction of section 21 of article 20 of the California Constitution is fully upheld in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390. In the carefully considered opinion in that case by Mr. Justice Sloss, concurred in by a majority of the court and with concurring opinions by Chief Justice Angellotti and Mr. Justice Shaw, it is declared that—

> "The constitutional amendment, as is perfectly apparent from its terms, was designed to establish the authority of the Legislature to pass laws making the relation of employer and employee subject to a system of rights and liabilities different from those prevailing at common law. That system was one which had already been adopted in many jurisdictions. The statutes putting it into force were commonly known as workmen's compensation laws. In every one of those laws, provision was made not only for compensation or indemnity to an employee who survived his injury, but for payment to the heirs or dependents of an employee who had received a fatal injury. * * * The two kinds of payment have always been regarded as component parts of a single scheme of rights and liabilities arising out of a given relation."

The power of the Legislature to provide for dependents being established, the question that follows is as to the legislative discretion in determining what classes of dependents shall come within the law.

If we are to be governed in this respect by the common-law rules of kinship, inheritance, and liability for maintenance and support, it will at once appear that the claimant here is outside the pale of legislative recognition, but, as is said in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, the workmen's compensation system "was designed to establish the authority of the Legislature to pass laws making the relation of employer and employee subject to a system of rights and liabilities different from those prevailing at common law"; and again that "the analogies of the common law cannot be applied too closely to this new scheme which undertakes to supersede the common law altogether and to create a different standard of rights and obligations." The Supreme Court of Connecticut, in holding an illegitimate child entitled to the benefits of the act, thus defines the scope and purposes of the new system of relation between employer and employee:

> "Compensation is not awarded either as the price of fault or as a measure of duty owed to the injured employee. * * * The underlying principle of this kind of legislation is that the ends of justice and equity will best be subserved, and the general good promoted, by lifting from the shoulders of the unfortunate victims of industrial mishaps and of their dependents some measure of the resulting burden, and casting it upon the industry which occasioned it, and through that industry upon society at large. * * * In its final distribution society bears it. These children and all other children similarly circumstanced, * * * must be supported. If their means of support is withdrawn, society is compelled to supply it. Why may it not as well and fairly supply it in the method provided by the workmen's compensation legislation as in any other." Piccinim v. Connecticut L. & P. Co., 93 Conn. 423, 106 Atl. 330.

In Temescal Rock Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 180 Cal. 637, 182 Pac. 447, this court has upheld an award under the precise provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act that is involved here, to a woman who was living with the decedent as his wife, without having been married to him. It is true that they thought they were married and had sustained this relation in good faith. But their honest intentions in the matter did not remove the fact that their relations were illegal and wholly without the sanction of the law. The decision holds that the claimant could not take as the wife of the deceased employee, but that she was entitled to an allowance as a member in good faith of his family and household. The court says:

> "If the applicant is a member of the family or household of such employee in good faith, compensation may be awarded, although he or she may not bear any relation by adoption, blood, or marriage to the employee."

In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn. (S. F. No. 9218), no opinion involving liability under a state of facts substantially like those existing in this case, this court denied a petition for writ of review, which circumstance is, of course, not conclusive as to the point under discussion because, as suggested by counsel for petitioners here, we have consented to review the proceedings in this matter. We see no reason, however, for arriving at a different conclusion from the one implied in the denial of a writ under that petition. The need of relief from the deprivation caused by the death of the employee and the questions of public policy involved rest upon the fact that the employee has in good faith taken into his home and assumed the support of one without other means of subsistence. The hardship to the individual dependent, and the incidental burden to the insurer or to society from the death of a breadwinner are no different whether the maintenance of the dependent has been voluntarily and gratuitously assumed or legally imposed.

As has been pointed out, the benefits of this law are not provided as an indemnity for negligent acts committed or as compensation for legal damages sustained, but is an economic insurance measure to prevent a sudden break in the contribution of the worker to society by his accidental death in the course of his employment. From this economic standpoint it makes no difference whether the workman's earnings are being distributed to those whose support he has voluntarily assumed, or to those who are legally entitled to such support. In either case they are the reliance of dependent members of society. The only difficulty is that where there is no legal dependence it is harder to determine that the contribution of support has been made so as to constitute the recipient a dependent in good faith.

The power of the Legislature to extend the benefits of industrial accident insurance beyond the wage-earner himself being recognized, it is left to reasonable legislative discretion in the light of the general purposes of these laws to determine what dependents shall become the distributees of the indemnity assessed against the industry, and we do not think we are compelled to look to analogies of the common law, or to the limitations of compensation acts in force at the time our constitutional provision was adopted, to fix the measure of the legislative power thus conferred.

[2, 3] It only remains to determine whether Ida Miller, the claimant here, comes within the terms of the California statute. Section 9, subdivision 11 (1) and (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act provides that "in case a deceased employee leaves a person or persons wholly dependent upon him for support" such dependents shall be allowed certain indemnity benefits. Section 14 (a) provides that the wife and children under certain conditions are conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent. Section 14 (b) provides that in all other cases the questions of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who constitute dependents, and the extent of their dependency, shall be determined in accordance with the fact, "as the fact may be at the time of the injury to the employee"; 14 (c) provides, that "no person shall be considered a dependent of such employee unless in good faith a member of the family or household of such employee, or unless such person bears to such employee the relation of husband or wife, posthumous child, adopted child or stepchild, father or mother, father-in-law or mother-in-law, grandfather or grandmother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, brother-in-law or sister-in-law, nephew or niece."

The two classifications here, one of persons who are in good faith members of the employee's family or household, and the other of persons having specific relations of kinship, are clearly used in the alternative, and are to be separately considered. Temescal Rock Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., supra. As Ida Miller belongs to none of these degrees of relationship, either by birth, marriage, or adoption, we are only concerned with the first division.

There are three vital conditions required to establish dependency in this case under the Compensation Act: First, was Ida Miller actually dependent upon the decedent for her support; second, was she a member of his family or household; third, was the relation or connection sustained in good faith.

The Industrial Accident Commission has found on these points as follows: That "Ida Miller, a minor, was, at the time of the injury of Albert Bauer, referred to in said findings, totally dependent in fact upon him, and was a member of his family and household within the meaning of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917." Under the provision of the act making the findings of fact of the commission conclusive on this court, the fact of total dependency, and that the relation of the child to decedent's household existed in good faith, must be accepted as established.

The only question open to discussion is whether as a matter of law the relation shown by the undisputed evidence constitutes bona fide membership in a "family or household" on the part of the claimant. There is little to be gained by reviewing the numerous definitions given by the courts and lexicographers of the words "family" and "household." They mean different things under different circumstances. The family, for instance, may be an entire group of people of the same ancestry, whether living together or widely separated; or it may be a particular group of people related by blood or marriage, or not related at all, who are living together in the intimate and mutual interdependence of a single home or household. Again, the word "household" is variously used to designate people, generally, who live together in the same house, including the family, servants, and boarders; or it may be used as including only members of the family relation. It is probable that the two terms are coupled together in this statute to indicate that they are used synonymously, the "family" to include only those of the household who are thus intimately associated, the "household" to exclude those of the family not living in the home. There can be no doubt that Bauer, Mrs. Miller, and the little girl constituted a family or household. They were living together in all the interdependency and intimacy of man and wife and their legitimate offspring. The only thing to exclude Mrs. Miller from the benefit of this relationship was lack of good faith. She and Bauer were living together in open and conscious defiance of law. In Temescal Rock Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comn., supra, a similar state of facts existed as to the unlawful relation, but the court there held the man and woman to constitute a "family or household," and that they were such in good faith because they were cohabiting under the belief that they were married. In this case Bauer and Mrs. Miller were not in good faith because they knew their relations were unlawful. We cannot, however, agree with counsel for petitioners that the bad faith of the mother must be imputed to the child. It is true that for many purposes the status of the parent fixes that of their minor children. It may be conceded that such is the law in the matter of domicile, but, as we have seen, so far as her domicile is concerned, Mrs. Miller was also a member of Bauer's household. But the bad faith of Bauer and Mrs. Miller in their relations with each other cannot rebut entire good faith in the act of Bauer in assuming the maintenance and support of the child and accepting her as a member of his family. He might have adopted her, and thus made her a legal dependent, but the meretricious relations between him and Mrs. Miller would have remained the same. This suggestion answers the claim made by petitioners that there could be no family relation to include the child while the mother was living in adultery with Bauer, for the reason that the law would take the child from them and make her a ward of the juvenile court. So it could, if there has been a legal adoption, or if Bauer was the father of the child. It may be plausibly urged that if the evidence showed that Bauer was only maintaining the daughter in furtherance of his illegal relations with the mother, it would follow that he was making her a member of his household in bad faith, but the commission has found, and we think the facts justify the conclusion, that Bauer had in good faith assumed the support of Ida Miller and made her a member of his household for her own sake and because of personal care for her. It is true the child was too young to entertain either good or bad faith, but if that is a legal obstacle it would apply as well if she had been taken into the household as a homeless and abandoned waif. We think that Ida Miller was a member in good faith of Bauer's household. The courts should not be called upon to visit the iniquities of the parents upon the children, beyond the penalties inherent under natural law.

The petition is denied.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.

OLNEY, J. I concur in what Judge Sloane has said, and would add merely a word. It seems to me that in view of the finding of the commission that Bauer had assumed the relation of father toward the child, the character of his relations with the child's mother is a false quantity in the case. The final question was, Did Bauer stand in loco parentis toward the child, had he genuinely assumed toward the child the relation of father? If he had (and the commission finds he had and the finding is supported by the evidence), it makes no difference how or why he had. The relation was there, and by virtue of it the child was a member of his household in good faith, and that is enough. If an unmarried man should pick up some waif, become attached to it, have it live with him, support it and look after it, assume toward it in every way the character of a father, could any one seriously doubt that it was a dependent member of his household? If it would be a dependent member of his household under those circumstances, how is the relation changed or affected by the fact that it originated in an unlawful relation with the child's mother? That fact might have some weight in determining whether he had genuinely assumed the relation of father toward the child, but if it appeared that he had, the reason or reasons why he had done so become wholly unimportant.

WILBUR, J. I dissent. In the case of Temescal Rock Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 180 Cal. 637, 182 Pac. 447, the parties believed in good faith that the procurement of a marriage license constituted them husband and wife, and in good faith entered upon that relation. Under the common law and in this state prior to 1895, such acts would constitute them husband and wife. Only a mistake of law prevented such conduct constituting a valid marriage. There was no moral turpitude in the conduct of the parties, and they did not discover the invalidity of the marriage before the putative husband was killed; in such a case there was no injustice in giving validity to the actual bona fide intention and relationship of the parties.

In the case of Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., the commission had allowed compensation to two minor children whose mother had married the decedent and who he apparently believed to be his wife. The children were being supported by the deceased as members of his family. After his death it was discovered that the mother of the children had married decedent the day before an interlocutory decree of divorce had been entered in an action for divorce against the husband and father of the children. The mother claimed that she entered into the relationship in good faith, although the commission found otherwise. The petition for a hearing in this court was denied. Whatever force that denial may have as a precedent it does not cover a case where the employee deliberately enters upon an adulterous cohabitation with the wife of another man. Such a relationship violates the law of God and man. Deut. v:18; Matt. v:27, 28; Pen. Code, 269a. The woman and child were the family of another man. How can it be said that a family altar had been erected in good faith. It is one thing to hold that parties may establish a family in good faith where both are acting under a mistake of law, and quite another to hold that a family may be established where both the man and woman deliberately assume the family relationship in conscious violation of the criminal law and where such conduct is malum in se. Indeed, the commission found that such relationship was not in good faith, and consequently disallowed compensation to the woman, except $500, as stipulated. The question, then, is whether the infancy of the child can justify an allowance to it where the two adult parties to the relationship were not acting in good faith in establishing the relationship. In other words, can the good faith of the child, or rather its lack of bad faith, characterize the family as one existing in "good faith" sufficiently to cover the bad faith of the mother and of the employee? To so hold would, in effect, strike out the words "good faith" from the statute. For assuredly the intent of the minor child could not be determinative of the case. The support of the child was, no doubt, a mere incident to the meretricious relationship, and we may well assume one of the considerations moving from the man to the woman for her continuance of the relationship.

To assume that the Legislature, in the enactment of the Workmen's Compensation Act, intended to reward parties to a relationship entered into in defiance of the penal laws of the state and against good morals is to violate the most fundamental canons of statutory construction. It should be said, however, that the commission found that the husband of Mrs. Lola Miller died before she began to cohabit with the deceased. Presumably this finding is the result of the application of the presumption of innocence, but is in opposition to her statement that they intended to get a divorce.

Whatever may be said as to the rights of a child taken into the home with a bona fide intent to continue its support, coupled with actual support for a long time, it seems clear that where the consent of the child's mother to a criminal relationship is an essential element in such conduct, such a family or household is not established in good faith, and the child is not a member of decedent's family in good faith. Our previous decisions in favor of those who ignorantly violate statute law have, I think, gone to the utmost limit in liberality in favor of the employee's family and against the employer.

SHAW, J. I concur with Justice WILBUR.

GLOBE MFG. CO. v. HARVEY. (L. A. 6358.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 4, 1921.)

1. Contracts 🔑322(3)—Evidence held to show defendant not guilty of breach of manufacturing contract.

In an action for breach of a contract to manufacture goods, evidence held to support a finding on conflicting evidence that the defendant had not failed, neglected, or refused to proceed with such manufacture, as alleged, but had diligently proceeded with the work.

2. Evidence 🔑442(6)—Where contract did not adjust rights under superseded contract, evidence as to such arrangements admissible.

Where a contract to manufacture automobile self-starters was superseded by a second contract, which, being in the form of a quotation of defendant manufacturer accepted by plaintiff, did not purport to set forth that part of the agreement which adjusted the rights of the parties in regard to what had been done under the first contract, evidence as to arrangements as to such matters was admissible, provided the arrangements were not inconsistent with the terms of the written agreement embodying the second contract.

3. Contracts 🔑247—In action for breach, evidence held to show payments intended under second contract, and that purchaser was to pay for changing manufacturing patterns.

In an action for breach of a second contract to manufacture automobile starters, evidence held to justify the conclusion that all the starters were to be paid for under the terms of the second contract and none under the terms of the first, and to justify a finding that plaintiff assumed to pay for the cost of changing patterns under supervision of plaintiff purchaser's agent.

4. Evidence 🔑377—Where party testified of own knowledge as to correctness of statement, unnecessary that his bookkeeper testify to correctness.

In an action for breach of a manufacturing contract, where defendant's statement or summary of expenditures, admitted under Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5, because the original consisted of numerous accounts, which could not be examined without great loss of time, was made from original bills, of the payment of which defendant had personal knowledge, defendant was competent to testify to the correctness thereof; his bookkeeper's testimony as to correctness being unnecessary.

5. Appeal and error ⟹843(2)—Matters not necessary to decision not considered.

On appeal from a judgment for defendant in an action for breach of a manufacturing contract, the claim that there was no evidence to support the finding that defendant had no knowledge of plaintiff's contractual obligation to furnish the articles ordered by defendant to others need not be determined, where defendant was adjudged not in default in the performance of the contract.

Department 2

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Globe Manufacturing Company against Leo M. Harvey, doing buiness under the fictitious name and style of the Harvey Machine Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James I. Shepherd and John E. Carson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. Hazlett, of Los Angeles, and Burritt S. Allen, of El Centro, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action for damages for breach of contract. The undisputed facts, briefly summarized, are these:

The plaintiff corporation and the defendant entered into an agreement, dated March 5, 1918, whereby defendant agreed to manufacture and deliver to plaintiff, at Los Angeles, 1,000 self-starters for Ford automobiles, to be known as "Globe starters," a device covered by patent of which plaintiff was the owner. Plaintiff agreed to pay defendant $8 apiece for said starters, paying $1,000 in advance and $7 each per starter as and when deliveries of any number of said starters were made. Plaintiff paid the $1,000.

On April 16, 1918, after considerable negotiations between the parties, plaintiff and defendant entered into a second contract, which it was agreed was to take the place of the prior agreement. By the terms of the second contract plaintiff was to pay $10 each for 1,000 starters in the following manner: The $1,000 already paid under the first contract was to be considered as a first payment under the second contract. Plaintiff was to make another $1,000 payment on May 1, 1918, and was to pay $8 each for the starters as delivered. Six days after the execution of this second contract, namely, on April 22, 1918, the president and vice president of the plaintiff corporation, who conducted all the arrangements on behalf of plaintiff, called at defendant's place of business and had a conversation with defendant in regard to the progress of the work contracted for. During that conversation, defendant presented for payment by plaintiff a bill of approximately $200. Whether or not defendant unjustifiably refused to perform his part of the contract of April 16, 1918, unless plaintiff paid the bill so presented, was the primary point for determination by the trial court in the instant case.

Shortly after the conversation of April 22, and without further communication with defendant, plaintiff, on April 29, 1918, instituted the present action for damages for alleged failure and refusal of defendant to proceed under the contract. Defendant denied the allegations that he had failed or refused to carry out the contract, and filed a cross-complaint, alleging a breach of contract on the part of plaintiff in failing to make the $1,000 payment called for by the contract on May 1, 1918, and claiming damages for such breach. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant and cross-complainant in the sum of $1,698.93.

[1] It appears that 5 starters, the only ones which have been manufactured or delivered by defendant, were received by plaintiff from defendant on April 13, 1918, three days prior to the consummation of the second contract. It also appears that, when the first contract was made, plaintiff transferred to defendant certain patterns for use in the manufacture of the starters, that some changes in these patterns were later found to be necessary and were authorized by a Mr. Poole, a mechanic in the employ of plaintiff, who was the inventor of the starter, and was placed by plaintiff in defendant's shop for the purpose of supervising and making suggestions for the proper carrying out of the work and directing changes that he found necessary in the construction of the starters. The said changes in the patterns were ordered and paid for by defendant. The items of the bill presented by defendant, during the conversation of April 22, for payment by plaintiff consisted of charges for the alterations to the patterns and $50 for the 5 starters delivered on April 13.

It was the testimony of the president of the plaintiff corporation, corroborated by that of the vice president, who is the father-in-law of the president, that, upon their refusal to pay this bill when presented by defendant at his office on April 22, defendant declined to continue with the work on the starters. On the other hand, defendant himself positively and repeatedly testified that, while he urged the payment of the bill on that occasion, he did not refuse to go ahead with the work under the contract if the bill was not paid, but, on the contrary, that he endeavored to point out to the two officers of the plaintiff corporation that the work was progressing with all possible rapidity. When asked by the court as to whether he said that he would not proceed with the work under the contract unless the bill was paid, defendant answered: "No, sir. I wouldn't say it, even if I wanted to say it." Plaintiff contends that this voluntary statement of defendant accompanying the denial was so evasive as to destroy the force of the denial. The statement may have been superfluous and not responsive to the question, but it can scarcely be designated as evasive. Moreover, this denial is only one of several denials by the same witness to the same question, the rest of which are clearly unqualified.

Defendant's testimony in this behalf was corroborated by that of his sister, who, during the whole of the conversation in question, was sitting at her desk, which was located a few feet away from where the parties sat during their conversation. This witness' desk was in a room adjoining the office in which the conversation was held, and was beside an open window in a wooden partition which separated the two rooms. Defendant's testimony was further corroborated by the assistant manager of defendant's business, who was summoned by defendant and introduced to the president of the plaintiff corporation for the purpose of assuring him of the progress of the work. Plaintiff suggests that the corroborating testimony is without force, because it does not appear that either witness heard all of the conversation in question. Both witnesses repeated in detail what they heard said in regard to the payment of the bill. The conversation so reported by them corresponded exactly with that testified to by defendant, and amounted to nothing more, on the part of defendant, than mere requests for payment and assurances that the work was progressing. Both witnesses testified that, after the conversation in regard to the bill had been closed, defendant took the plaintiff's representatives about the shop, endeavoring to demonstrate that the work was progressing as rapidly as possible. The testimony of these two witnesses indicates that they heard all of the substantial and material part of the conversation, and is sufficiently clear and definite to possess weight in corroborating the statements of defendant.

The testimony in behalf of defendant upon this phase of the case is amplified by inferences naturally and reasonably arising from the proven circumstances. There is little likelihood that, a few days before the second $1,000 payment became due under the contract, defendant would have made a refusal of performance contingent upon the payment by plaintiff of a bill amounting to less than $200. The possibility is rendered more negligible by the steps which had already been taken by defendant in carrying out the contract. Admittedly a large amount of castings for use in making the starters had been delivered to defendant, and defendant had placed an order for springs to be used in said starters with an Eastern firm. There was testimony to the effect that as many men as could be spared were engaged in setting up machinery in defendant's shop preparatory to working on the starters, and that the necessary plans, etc., had been prepared. Defendant continued to accept deliveries of castings and keep men at work upon the starters after the conversation of April 22, and until it became apparent, by the institution of the present suit 2 days before the $1,000 payment was due from plaintiff, that plaintiff had no intention of performing the contract. The order for springs was not canceled until after the present suit was commenced. It would seem that all this tends to show sufficient activity of the defendant to indicate an effort on his part in good faith to perform the obligations of the contract, particularly when it is remembered that the contract had been in existence only 6 days when the demand for such evidence was made by plaintiff.

Plaintiff insists that, in passing upon the question of whether conditions indicated that defendant was proceeding in good faith, consideration should be given the fact that the preparation relied upon by defendant did not cover a period of only 6 days, but extended back over 40 days to March 5, the date of the first contract. It is admitted that little was actually accomplished under the first contract. The reason for this, according to findings of the trial court based upon competent testimony, is to be found in the fact that, after the first contract was signed, plaintiff decided upon considerable changes in the construction of the starters, which made the manufacture of them more expensive. In addition, defendant discovered that it was impossible to obtain the springs necessary for the starters at the price which the president of plaintiff had represented they could be obtained, and that they could not be obtained in Los Angeles in the quantity required, as said president had represented, but must be ordered from a distance. For these reasons, it was found impossible to manufacture the starters at the price fixed in the contract of March 5, and, after considerable negotiating, new terms were agreed upon, and, therefore, most of the preparations above set forth were taken after the new agreement was reached, on April 16. Furthermore, both contracts were made at a time when defendant was engaged on work required by the government for war purposes, to which other work was necessarily subordinate, and, because of this situation, defendant refused to consent to specify the times of delivery in the contract with plaintiff. These facts, we think, are sufficient to show that there was no unreasonable delay on the part of defendant in proceeding under the contract.

From what has been said it is apparent that this appeal, for the most part, presents the oft-recurring and fruitless question of the correctness of a decision of a trial court based on a consideration of conflicting, competent evidence. In view of the sufficiency of the evidence in support thereof, the trial court must be upheld in its finding that—

> "It is not true that defendant failed, neglected and refused, or failed or neglected or refused, for a period of 42 days, or for any period, or at all, to proceed with the work of manufacturing said starters, but on the contrary it is true that at all times after the 5th of March, 1918, defendant diligently proceeded with said work."

[2, 3] Plaintiff complains of alleged errors in regard to the admission of evidence bearing upon the question of damages. The first alleged error is the admission in evidence of the bill for alterations to the patterns and for the 5 starters delivered on April 13, and including the amount thereof in the damages awarded defendant. It is claimed that plaintiff did not agree to pay for the changes to the patterns and did not owe more than $35 for the 5 starters for the reason that they were delivered under the terms of the first contract. Inasmuch as the written contract of April 16 was in the form of a quotation of defendant accepted by plaintiff, it does not purport to set forth that part of the agreement which adjusted the rights of the parties in regard to the steps which had previously been taken under the contract of March 5. Therefore, evidence of these arrangements was admissible, provided they were not inconsistent with the terms of the written agreement of April 16. Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786; Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571; Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 594, 96 Pac. 319.

In view of the total absence of any agreement making a special exception of the 5 starters delivered, and in view of the fact that the whole of the $1,000 paid under the contract of March 5 was to operate as consideration under the new contract, and that the prior contract was superseded for all other purposes by the contract of April 16, we think the trial court was amply justified in concluding that it was the intention of the parties that all of the starters should be paid for under the terms of the second contract. Likewise the conditions under which the patterns were altered, namely, the authorization for the changes by the man employed by plaintiff to supervise and direct the work of construction and the knowledge of the president of the plaintiff corporation that the changes were being made, were sufficient to warrant the finding that plaintiff assumed the payment of the cost thereof. No question was raised as to the reasonableness of these charges.

[4] An itemized summary of the expenditures of defendant under the contract was admitted in evidence under the issue of damages. Plaintiff assigns this as error for the reason that the person who kept defendant's books did not testify to their correctness. The statement, or summary, was admitted under subdivision 5 of section 1855 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because the original consisted of "numerous accounts or other documents, which cannot be examined in court without great loss of time." Defendant maintains a card system of bookkeeping, and testified that he personally made up the statement in question by going over the cards and checking up the entries thereon with the original bills, which he retained and which he knew had been paid. Therefore the statement was, in fact, made from the original bills, of the payment of which defendant had personal knowledge, and defendant was competent to testify to the correctness of the items thereof upon his own knowledge, which he did. For this reason, testimony by the bookkeeper as to the correctness of the books of defendant was unnecessary and the statement was properly received in evidence.

It is contended that there is no evidence to support the finding that "immediately after making said agreement [referring to the agreement of March 5] defendant ordered certain castings to be used in said starters." This finding is immaterial and unnecessary to support the judgment, for, even if there is no evidence of this particular fact, there is ample evidence, as previously stated, to support the general finding that defendant proceeded diligently with the work at all times after March 5. Plaintiff complains of the finding that the order of April 16 was "supplementary" to the order of March 5, claiming that it was an entirely new agreement, and the order of March 5 was canceled. The rest of the finding in which this word appears discloses that there can be no implication from the use of the word "supplementary" that the court found that the order of March 5 was continued in force and added to by the order of April 16, for the finding is that the "supplementary" order of April 16 was made "in place of and in substitution for said order of March 5, 1918."

[5] It is claimed that there is no evidence to support the finding that defendant had no knowledge of plaintiff's contractual obligations to furnish to third persons the starters ordered by it from defendant. We need not determine this question, for, in view of the fact that defendant was adjudged not in default in the performance of his part of the contract, this fact became immaterial.

It is true, as pointed out by defendant, that plaintiff might have been more impartial in setting forth extracts from the evidence in the supplement to his brief. However, we do not deem the omissions so flagrant as to call for an order requiring plaintiff to reimburse defendant for costs and attorney's fees incurred in printing a supplement to defendant's brief containing testimony in defendant's favor.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUTTE COUNTY WATER USERS' ASS'N et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (Sac. 3111.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑216—Statute, providing for prorating water between irrigation company's voluntarily admitted consumers, held valid.

St. 1913, p. 84, placing water companies under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission and providing in section 6 that as between consumers voluntarily admitted by a corporation to participate in its water supply there shall be no priority, and that in time of shortage the water shall be prorated, is valid.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑256—First consumers contracting after prorating act have no greater right than subsequent consumers.

Consumers contracting with a water company after the passage of St. 1913, p. 84, providing for prorating between consumers in case of shortage of supply, could be given no greater right than permitted by such act, and would be required to accept a prorating with subsequent contracting consumers.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Relation of public utility company and consumer established by contract obligation to furnish water without actual delivery.

Where owners of land contracted with a water company to furnish irrigation waters for the season, such owners became consumers, if the company had authority to so admit them, and it was not necessary that water be actually delivered upon the lands to make them consumers in the legal sense; the company's obligation being sufficient to establish the relation of public utility company in consumer.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Public utility company may take on new consumers without Railroad Commission's permission.

A public utility company furnishing water for irrigation of lands has authority to take on new consumers without, though not against, an order of the State Railroad Commission, for St. 1913, p. 85, §§ 5, 6, does not require the Railroad Commission's permission.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Public utility company may admit new consumers, but not beyond the limit of its water, by leaving a reasonable factor of safety.

A public utility company supplying water for irrigation does not have the power to take on new consumers without limit, and has no right to take them on after reaching the limit of its water supply, and should allow some factor of safety against exceptional dry seasons, which should be greater in localities where crops are wholly dependent upon irrigation than in other places; the matter being one of judgment, to be exercised conservatively by the water company in the absence of any regulatory order of the Railroad Commission.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Railroad Commission's conclusions that water company acted reasonably in admitting new consumers held decisive.

The Railroad Commission's finding that a public utility company furnishing water for irrigation had acted reasonably in admitting owners of additional lands as consumers, being sustained by the evidence, is decisive.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Decision of Railroad Commission on conflicting evidence conclusive if supported by any evidence.

A finding of the Railroad Commission upon conflicting evidence that a public utility company furnishing irrigation water had acted reasonably in taking on new consumers, in view of the amount of available water, cannot be disturbed upon appeal, where there is some evidence to support it.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑256—Facts held to justify public utility company in taking on new consumers.

Facts held to justify a public utility company furnishing irrigation water in taking on new consumers who must share ratably with prior consumers in case of water shortage.

In Bank.

The Butte County Water Users' Association filed a complaint with the State Railroad Commission against the Sutter Butte Canal Company to prevent the latter from supplying water to additional lands, the owners of such lands, as the Sutter County Water Users' Association, opposed the application, and the Commission decided that the water should be prorated between all consumers in case of shortage. The Butte County Water Users' Association brings certiorari to review the Commission's order. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Arthur H. Redington, of San Francisco, for interveners W. H. Carlin and others.

OLNEY, J. This is an application by an association of those consumers of the Sutter Butte Canal Company, who were consumers prior to 1920, to annul an order of the Railroad Commission that, beginning with the year 1920, that company serve with water some 14,400 acres of land not theretofore served by it. The company was organized as, and has always been, a public utility company supplying water for irrigation, and its articles of incorporation empower it to sell and distribute water in the counties of Butte and Sutter. It takes its water from the Feather river near Oroville in Butte county, and its water rights, which are appropriation rights, are all for water for public sale and distribution. From a comparatively small beginning the system of the company was extended and enlarged gradually as the market for its water grew until in 1919 it was supplying some 55,000, or slightly more, acres of land, mostly in Butte county. In September of that year the company contracted with the owners of 14,400 acres of land in Sutter county that it would extend its system to supply their lands, and pursuant to this contract the company made the necessary enlargements and extensions of its system, at a cost to it of between $200,000 and $250,000. The making of this contract, the enlargement and extension of the company's system, and the purpose of the company to serve the 14,400 acres of additional lands were, the commission finds, a matter of common knowledge in the region served by the company. Nevertheless, no objection was made to the company so doing. The company's rules require that applications for water for the ensuing year be filed by the 1st of January, and by that date in 1920 the owners of the 14,400 acres had filed their applications and paid the company's regular charge. The three preceding winters had been winters of light rainfall, and the winter of 1919–20 was exceptionally dry, so that by spring it became evident that there was a serious danger of a water shortage. The company's old consumers, through the instrumentality of their association known as the Butte County Water Users' Association, thereupon filed a complaint with the Commission against the company, alleging in brief that the company would not have water enough to irrigate both their lands and the 14,400 acres of additional lands, and asking for an order of the Commission directing the company not to supply the latter. The company answered the complaint, and the owners of the 14,400 acres on their part organized themselves into an association known as the Sutter County Water Users' Association, and intervened in the proceeding, alleging that they had been accepted by the company as consumers, and in reliance thereon they had prepared their lands at large expense for the raising of rice by irrigation, and asking for an order from the Commission directing the company to serve them. The owners of certain of the 14,400 acres also intervened in their individual capacities in opposition to the complaint of the old consumers.

The matter was promptly heard and decided by the Commission, its order being handed down on April 21, 1920. At that time, of course, it was not possible to know with exactness just what water conditions during the summer to come would be. The Commission's decision finds that the 14,400 acres were within the area which the water company was organized to serve and for serving which it had made its water appropriations; that in a normal year the company's supply of water was adequate for the needs of the 14,400 acres as well as for those of the lands theretofore served; that at the time the contract between the company and the owners of the 14,400 acres for the supply of those lands was made, and at the time the applications of those owners for service were presented and accepted, it was reasonable to expect that the company would have a sufficient supply for all during the ensuing year, and the company was justified in accepting the applications. The critical month in supplying water by the company's system, that is, the month when the demands for irrigation are most apt to approach or exceed the available supply, is the month of August. The Commission found that at the time of hearing, that is, in April, it appeared that the company would, so far as could be determined, have in August sufficient water from its then existing supply to irrigate 70,000 acres (all the land) for from 80 to 90 per cent. of the time, and in addition could obtain a further substantial quantity under a water right which it had recently obtained for the diversion from the Feather river of some additional 500 second feet. Upon the facts so found, the Commission held in effect that the owners of the 14,400 acres had the status of consumers of the company, and were entitled to be served, and made its order that they be served, on an equal basis with the company's other consumers. The reasons of public policy underlying its decision, the Commission states as follows:

> "It would be uneconomical, and would retard the development of this state if an irrigation company were restricted in its delivery of water to only that area for which it would have a sufficient supply in the driest years. A restriction such as this would prevent the cultivation of large areas of land which would otherwise be cultivated and produce a crop a very large proportion of the time. As a matter of fact, years of drought such as this do not ordinarily occur more frequently than from 10 to 20 year periods, and it would be unjustly restricting the expansion of the agricultural pursuits of the state if a company were permitted to serve only the area for which it would have available water during years of extreme drought and consequent minimum water supply.
> "Applicants applying to a utility for an extension of service, whose applications are accepted in good faith by the utility at a time when it could reasonably expect to have available a sufficient supply of water in addition to > that needed for the lands theretofore served, should in justice receive their ratable proportion of the available supply if a shortage occurs, even though that shortage may occur prior to the actual delivery of any water to them."

After the decision, the old consumers petitioned the Commission for a rehearing, and being refused, commenced the present proceeding before this court for the annulment of the Commission's order. The contentions of the petitioner are three in number. The first, as stated by its counsel, is as follows:

> "The orders of the Railroad Commission do not make any provision for the supplying of prior consumers before the 14,400 acres are taken care of. On the contrary, said orders specifically direct the Sutter Butte Canal Company to prorate the available supply in the event of a shortage. The effect of this order is to deprive petitioners of property without due process of law and without compensation."

[1] Assuming that the owners of the 14,400 acres had entered into relationship with the company as consumers, the ground so stated is not so much an attack on the Commission's order as it is on the validity of a statute adopted by the Legislature. It may well be that in advancing this ground of attack petitioner's counsel do not make the assumption stated, but their position on the point is not entirely clear, and it will make clearer what we believe to be the real point in the case, if we make the assumption. Assuming, then, that the owners of the 14,400 acres had entered into relationship with the company as consumers, the contention of the petitioner is that the old consumers of a public utility water company have a vested right to water in preference to new consumers, so that in case of a shortage the water is not to be prorated, but the old consumers take all they require and the new consumers get only what is left. But the act of April 25, 1913 (Stats. of 1913, p. 84; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 4348a), which places water companies under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, provides in section 6 that—

> "As between consumers who have been voluntarily admitted to participate by the corporation in its supply of water or been required to be supplied by an order of the Railroad Commission, in times of shortage there shall be no priority or preference, and such corporation in times of shortage shall be required to apportion such supply ratably among its consumers."

If the foregoing provision of the statute is valid, manifestly the order of the Commission in the case is valid, so far as the ground of attack under consideration is concerned, for the order is merely in accord with the explicit direction of the statute. The statute is attacked only through the attack upon the order of the Commission, that is, inferentially, but the only ground upon which it can be attacked, and the only ground upon which it is attacked, even inferentially, is that the consumer of a public water company has a vested right, not merely to service from the company, but to service in full in preference to later consumers, so that the respective rights of the company's consumers are ranked, as it were, in the order of time in which they have become consumers. This is rather a novel doctrine, and one whose statement alone is well-nigh sufficient for its rejection. In fact, it is not stated by petitioner's counsel as we have stated it. It is said merely that the right of a consumer, particularly of a consumer taking water for irrigation of his lands, is a vested right of which he cannot be deprived by the diversion of water to others. This proposition is undoubtedly correct, so far as a diversion to other objects or to persons not consumers goes, but it does not support the contention that as between consumers one has a vested preference over another in times of a water shortage. No authority supporting that contention is cited, and we doubt if any can be found. It is a contention directly contrary to the principle upon which Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation District, 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, was decided, and wholly opposed to the fundamental principle that a public utility must hold itself out as ready to serve and must serve the public or its portion of the public without discrimination or preference other than such as corresponds to differences in the value or cost of the service rendered. It has taken years of struggle in this country to establish this principle and to compel its general observance, as witness the long struggle against discrimination by transportation companies. But it is now thoroughly established and its value recognized, and every reason of public policy supports it. In particular, in connection with a water company supplying water for irrigation, it would be most unjust and very injurious to the state to hold that in times of shortage the older consumers could have a full supply and the later none. In many instances, such a rule would mean, as to the later consumers, not only that their crops for the year would be lost, but that their orchards or plantings would be destroyed, when by prorating the water the orchards and plantings of all would be preserved with some impairment of crops for the time, but no serious permanent injury. The rule would operate directly to limit, in many parts of the state, the land available for orchard and similar plantings to such as could be certain of a full supply even in times of extreme drought. There is no occasion for any such extreme limitation, and it would be directly contrary to the economic welfare of the state. As between the consumers of a water company, even one supplying water for irrigation, the rule must be that in times of a shortage of supply the water available must be prorated.

[2] Certainly this is true as to every consumer in the present case who became such after the passage in 1913 of the act referred to. He could get no right greater than was permitted by the law in effect at the time he entered upon the relationship. There is no allegation in the present case that any of the water company's present consumers became such prior to 1914, and no right is claimed by reason of any of them having been consumers prior to the passage of the statute. This being the case, it must be held that the order of the Commission requiring a prorating is valid so far as the petitioner's first ground of attack is concerned.

[3] What we have just said has, of course, application only to the company's regular consumers; that is, to those who have entered into relationship with it and whom it has undertaken to serve on the basis of its having an adequate supply for that purpose. It has no application as between such consumers and what we may call surplus consumers; that is, consumers whom the company undertakes to serve only when and as it has a surplus over and above the needs of its regular consumers. As between these two classes, and very possibly even as between individuals in the second class a preferential right can properly exist. In no other way can use be made of the surplus water which any irrigation company is apt to have at times.

But in the case now before the court, the new consumers of the water company, if they properly became consumers at all, became such as regular and not as surplus consumers. They were admitted upon the basis of the company having an adequate supply and engaging regularly to supply them. They were therefore on an equal footing with the company's older consumers, provided the assumption with which we started is true, that they had properly been admitted as consumers. Whether they had been so admitted is, we believe, the real question in the case. It is directly involved in the second contention of the petitioner.

The petitioner's second contention is stated as follows:

> "Concededly the only authority which the Railroad Commission has to make an order in a matter of this kind is that contained in sections 5 and 6 of chapter 80 of the Statutes of 1913. The latter part of section 5 reads as follows:
> " 'The Commission shall likewise have power after hearing upon its own motion or upon complaint, to require any such water company to allow additional consumers to be served when it shall appear that to supply such additional consumers will not injuriously withdraw the supply wholly or in part from those who theretofore had been supplied by such public utility.'
> "This, and this alone, constitutes the authority and the power of the Railroad Commission to make the orders which petitioners ask to have set aside. It is respectfully submitted that there is nowhere in the opinion or the orders under review, in the evidence at the hearing, or in any part of the record, a determination, a finding, or a statement of any kind that the supply of water available to the Sutter Butte Canal Company during the year 1920 and thereafter will be sufficient to allow additional consumers to be served without injuriously withdrawing the supply in part from those who theretofore have been served by said utility. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears in the evidence and upon the face of the Railroad Commission's opinion that the old consumers will be injuriously affected by the delivery of water to the 14,400 acres which has not heretofore been supplied with water. In fact, the Commission, recognizing from the evidence that this result will undoubtedly follow, makes explicit provision for a prorating of the short supply."

Epitomizing this, it is that the Commission's only authority in this case was to make an order allowing additional consumers to be served only when it appeared that the former consumers would not be injuriously affected thereby, and that it affirmatively appeared and the Commission found that there was going to be a shortage of the company's supply during the coming summer, so that it of necessity appeared that the former consumers would be injured by admitting others to share in the supply.

We are not certain that the Commission's finding was really that the company's supply would not be adequate during the summer to follow for both the new lands and the old. Its finding is that at the intake of the company's canal there would be enough water available in the critical month of August for from 80 to 90 per cent. of the time to irrigate all the lands, and that in addition the company had a permit from the State Water Commission for the diversion of 500 second feet from the Feather at a point about 12 miles below, where a substantial quantity could be obtained. Nor are we certain that if this finding be one that, with the additional right of diversion mentioned, there would be no shortage, it is without support in the evidence. It was a case where the supply in normal years was more than adequate, and where it was sought to foretell, as well as possible, the extent to which that supply would fail during the particular summer because of an exceptionally dry winter just coming to an end. It was largely a matter of guessing, and it would be difficult to say that the Commission's guess that the company would have an adequate supply with what it could get by the further diversion it was authorized to make was so unreasonable as to be without support in the evidence. But however this may be, we may grant for purposes of discussion the contention that it did appear at the time the Commission made its order that because of the drought the company's supply would not be fully adequate during the summer for both the new and the old consumers, and that the Commission so found. Even so, it does not follow that the Commission's order was without authority.

The argument for petitioner assumes as its basis that the owners of the 14,400 acres of land were not consumers at the time of the application to the Commission, and that therefore the Commission's order, directing that they be served, was in effect an order that they be admitted as consumers, made under the authority of the provision of the statute quoted in the statement of petitioner's position. But the order of the Commission was not in fact that. It was not made on the basis of the owners of the new lands not yet being consumers, but on the basis that they were already consumers, and was not an order that new consumers be admitted, but that consumers already admitted, but at a later date than the company's other consumers, be served without preference against them. In its opinion denying the petitioner's request for a rehearing, the Commission placed its order explicitly upon this ground. If it be true that the owners of the new lands had already been admitted as consumers, then in accordance with our discussion of the petitioner's first contention it would follow that they were entitled to be served without preference, and the Commission's order was not only correct, but the only one which it could legally make. The order must be upheld, therefore, unless it appear that the owners of the new lands were not consumers at the time of petitioner's application to the Commission.

The facts in the matter are, as we have said, that in September, 1919, the company and the owners of the new lands contracted for service for those lands; that the company thereupon extended its system and the owners prepared their land, both at very considerable expense; and that prior to January 1, 1920, pursuant to the company's rules, the respective owners had made application to it for water for the ensuing year, and those applications had been accepted, and the owners had paid the company's charges. These facts are not disputed, and upon them certainly the owners had become consumers, provided only the company had authority to admit them as such. It was not necessary that water had been actually delivered upon the lands, to make the owners consumers in the legal sense; that is, persons whom the company was obligated to serve. The relation of public utility company and consumers was established as soon as the company came under obligation to serve and the owners came under obligation to take. Both these obligations had been assumed by the respective parties by January 1, 1920, so far as they could assume them. The actual delivery and receipt of the water thereafter would follow as a mere incident of the relation that had been entered upon. Unless, then, the company did not have the right to enter into this relation with the owners of the new land, the relation was in existence and those owners were consumers of the company prior to the petitioner's application to the Commission, and were entitled to water on an equal footing with the company's other consumers. The question, then, reduces itself to one as to the authority of the company, not of the Commission, to admit these new consumers.

[4] It is evident, we think, that on the one hand a public water company has authority to take on new consumers without, though not against, an order of the Commission, and, on the other hand, its authority is not without limitation, even in the absence of any order of the Commission. Certainly, in the absence of some prohibition upon it, either by statute or by order of the Commission, a water company, like any other utility, has the general power to take on new consumers. There was no prohibition by order of the Commission, nor was there any prohibition by statute, unless it be that the act of 1913 referred to provides that a water company may not take on new consumers without an order of the Commission. But the act does not in fact so provide. It provides merely that the Commission may forbid the taking on of more consumers, or may order their taking on, but it does not purport to limit or change the usual authority of the company in the absence of any order by the Commission. This is evident from a reading of the entire section (section 5) of the act which is pertinent to the point. It reads:

> "Whenever the Railroad Commission, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, shall find that any water company which is a public utility operating within this state has reached the limit of its capacity to supply water and that no further consumers of water can be supplied from the system of such utility without injuriously withdrawing the supply wholly or in part from those who have theretofore been supplied by such corporation, the Railroad Commission may order and require that no such corporation shall furnish water to any new or additional consumers until such order is vacated or modified by the said Commission. The Commission shall likewise have the power after hearing upon its own motion or upon complaint, to require any such water company to allow additional consumers to be served when it shall appear that to supply such additional consumers will not injuriously withdraw the supply wholly or in part from those who theretofore had been supplied by such public utility."

[5, 6] On the other hand, a water company supplying water for irrigation has not the power to take on new consumers without limit. Its power to supply water is, of course, limited by the amount of its supply, and when the demands of its consumers upon it have reached this limit, it has no right to take on new consumers to the necessary injury of those it has. But it is not always easy to determine just when the limit of supply is reached, and the factor of safety which should be allowed against exceptional seasons may vary from locality to locality. In those localities where the crops are wholly dependent upon irrigation and perish if deprived of it for any considerable period, the factor of safety which should be allowed is of necessity greater than in those localities where this is not true. The matter is one of judgment, a judgment which it may well be should be exercised conservatively, but a matter of judgment nevertheless. The exercise of this judgment is left to the water company in the absence of any regulatory order of the Commission, and if the judgment is reasonably exercised, the action of the company in admitting new consumers is valid. Upon this point the Commission found in the present case that the company had acted reasonably in admitting the owners of the 14,400 acres as consumers, and if this finding is sustained by the evidence, it is decisive of the case.

[7] It may be claimed with some truth that the commission based this finding in part upon the fact that the normal flow of the Feather river available to the water company, that is, the flow in the critical month of August, averaged over a period of years, is sufficient to supply both the company's old and its new consumers. It may also be claimed, and is in fact claimed, that such an average is not the true limit of the extent to which a water company may take on new consumers; that in effect there must be a factor of safety allowed against seasons of less than average flow. This claim has great force, which is hardly affected by the casual remarks in some decisions that the limit is the normal available supply. Blakeley v. Ft. Lyon Canal Co., 31 Colo. 224, 73 Pac. 249; First, etc., Bank v. Bitter Root, etc., Co. (D. C.) 251 Fed. 320. It has also, we believe, been the practice of the Railroad Commission in this state to allow some such factor of safety against the normal supply. On the other hand, it is evident that the permissible limit should not be held to the available supply in years of drought. There is no occasion for any such extreme rule. It would virtually destroy the irrigability for anything but annual crops of large amounts of land, when by a temporary prorated diminution in deliveries of water in years of drought, such years could be endured without permanent injury or too great loss. See, also, the opinion of the commission in Security Inv. Co. v. Palermo Land & Water Co., 7 Ops. R. R. Comn. 180.

But it is not necessary to make the present case turn on whether it is the normal, in the sense of average, supply, or the normal supply less a reasonable factor of safety for years of less than average supply, which should be taken as the limit to which an irrigation company may take on requirements against its system. What we have said on the point has been largely for the purpose of making clear the utmost position that the old consumers here can reasonably take, and then ascertaining if in view of that position the order of the Commission can be upheld. If there was evidence before the Commission which justified the conclusion that the company by taking on the new consumers would not increase the demands upon its system beyond the amount of its average supply less a reasonable factor of safety, it is evident that the order must stand; and this, although there may be a conflict in evidence, for it is the function of the Commission alone to resolve any conflict, and we can disturb its ruling only when there is no evidence whatever to support it.

[8] The testimony of the engineer for the Commission was that the average flow of the Feather river in August for the period from 1902 to 1913 was 1,681 second feet. The years subsequent to 1913 showed a very much higher average, but the flow for those years was not considered, since the natural flow was augmented by water stored in the mountain reservoir of the Great Western Power Company and released for power purposes during the summer with the right, or assumed right at least, on the part of that company to retake it. The lowest flow of the years from 1902 to 1913 was that of August, 1913, when it was only 969 second feet. The next lowest August flow was 1,350 second feet.

As to the other side of the balance sheet, the demands upon the company's system which it had assumed by January 1, 1920, the testimony was that they would aggregate 930 second feet delivered on the lands, and that about one-third should be allowed for loss in transportation, making the amount required to be diverted 1,395 second feet. Between this amount and the average flow of the river of 1,681 second feet, there was then a margin or factor of safety of 286 second feet. In percentages, there was a margin of 20 per cent. of the demands upon the system and of 17 per cent. of the average flow. Comparing the amount of demands, 1,395 second feet, with the flow in the particular years in the period taken to ascertain the average, it appears that with the exception of 1 year the lowest flow was 1,350 second feet, or but 36 second feet below the demands for 1920. This difference could undoubtedly easily be made up by reduction of wastage and by economies. In other words, the situation when the water company accepted the applications of the new consumers was that the demands upon the company's system could be met from the natural flow of the river for every year but one in the period of 8 years prior to the time when the natural flow was augmented by the power company's storage.

There was also evidence justifying the conclusion that instead of 935 second feet delivered being required to meet the demands for 1920, the amount as called for by the company's contracts and accepted applications was but 884 second feet. Allowing a loss of one-third in transportation, this would require a diversion of but 1,326 second feet, and leave a margin of 355 second feet between the necessary diversion and the average flow of 1,681 second feet. There was also evidence that the figure of 884 second feet delivered should be somewhat reduced for August, owing to the slackening in irrigation after July.

It is not possible, in view of these figures and this evidence, to say that the Commission was not justified in finding that the action of the company in taking on new consumers prior to January 1st, and before the dry character of the winter had become apparent, was reasonable and proper, even assuming that a factor of safety below the average flow of the river should have been allowed. The evidence showed that such a factor existed, and in a substantial amount. What the factor should be was a matter of judgment for the company in the first instance, and for the Commission in the second. It is a factor that must vary from locality to locality and from system to system. It is necessarily higher in extremely arid localities and in localities where the normal fluctuations in rainfall are high, and it is to be noted that Sutter and Butte counties are not of this character, and that in both crops can be grown and even orchards maintained without irrigation. It is not possible for us to say that the factor in this case was too small.

It should be said that in computing the water company's available supply counsel for the petitioner deduct from the figures we have stated 600 second feet diverted by the Western Canal Company, or which that company claims the right to divert. But we do not follow them in making such deduction. There is nothing to show that the right of the Sutter Butte Canal Company is not a prior right so far as the natural flow of the river is concerned, and it does appear that it was diverting water long before the Western Company. It also appears, inferentially at least, that the water claimed by the latter is water the Great Western Power Company stores in the mountains and releases in the summer; in other words, is water which is not a part of the natural flow in summer. It is for this reason, as we have said, that the high average flow in the years subsequent to 1913, when the reservoir of the power company was completed, was disregarded by the Commission's engineer in computing the average natural flow.

It should also be said, even at the expense of repetition, that the case was presented to the Commission and has been presented to us almost entirely as if the question involved were one as to the right of the Commission to permit the taking on of new consumers at the time of the hearing, in face of the coming shortage then apparent. The Commission did not so view the real question in the case, nor do we, and we express no opinion as to the right of the Commission to permit the taking on of new consumers in a year of known shortage, even though their being taken on would be amply justified under normal conditions. The vital point in the case is that the new consumers had already been taken on and at a time when there was no reason to anticipate a drought, and when, according to evidence upon which the Commission had a right to rely, the company could reasonably anticipate that it would have an adequate supply for both the new and the old consumers. This being the situation, it is worthy of note again that, while the result would be the same in the absence of any statute, the case comes directly within the provision of the act of 1913 that—

> "As between consumers who have been voluntarily admitted to participate by the corporation in its supply of water or been required to be supplied by an order of the Railroad Commission, in times of shortage there shall be no priority or preference, and such corporation in times of shortage shall be required to apportion such supply ratably among its consumers."

We have discussed the case upon the assumption that the company had the right under the appropriation under which it was diverting water and supplying it to the old consumers to divert the further amount required to supply the new consumers, if the water were there to divert. This right is questioned in argument, but the facts, if they exist, which would negative the right, were not shown. It does appear that the appropriation right claimed by the company was for 1,500 second feet. This was more than enough for both the old and new consumers. If the company did not in fact have the right to this amount or the right to divert a greater amount than it had previously been diverting, that fact should have been shown. The case as presented to the commission by the old consumers was practically one where relief was sought against the company supplying the new consumers on the ground solely that a shortage in the natural supply due to a season of extreme drought was threatened. The Commission's order denying relief upon this ground was supported by the evidence presented to it.

The conclusion so reached is decisive of the case, and renders unnecessary the consideration of the petitioner's third contention. It is really a contention by way of reply to one made by the company and the Sutter county consumers. The latter claimed that there had been a previous dedication of water for use on the Sutter county lands because water had in a preceding year been delivered to a small portion of them. The commission found that water had been so delivered, and the third contention of the Butte county consumers was that such delivery was not a dedication of water to those lands. But it is evident, in view of what we have said, that it is wholly immaterial whether this contention be correct or not. The owners of the Sutter county lands had nevertheless been properly admitted as consumers by the water company, and this fact required that they be served without preference against them.

Order affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.; LAWLOR, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). If the petitioners had shown that the water company had originally, by its declarations to proposed consumers, or by acts evincing to them an intention to that effect, held out that it proposed to use its water supply, so far as was necessary, for irrigation and other uses upon a definite area or district of farming land, embracing the lands of such consumers, including the petitioners, and that in pursuance of this purpose it had constructed a system of canals extending to said lands and no further, and had obtained consumers in that district on the faith of such purpose, and thereafter supplied them with water through said canals, I think it is clear, both from the Civil Code (section 552), from our decisions on the subject, and from considerations of sound public policy and justice, that such consumers would have a right to insist on the continuance of the supply to their lands, that such right would be paramount to that of consumers in any newly formed district to which the water company might afterwards undertake to supply water, and that such new users would be entitled to receive water only from the surplus of the company's water after the users in the first-mentioned district were supplied to the extent of their needs, not exceeding the amount per acre originally stipulated.

But as I understand the case the petitioners did not attempt to show such conditions. Their theory appears to be that the water company did construct its canals to the region in which their lands are situated, and by means thereof did supply water to their lands, and that inasmuch as this canal system was thus maintained and this water so supplied for a number of years without taking on new consumers, except for lands lying "under said canals," as the phrase goes, and without extending its canals to distinctly new territory, the water of the company must now be deemed to have been dedicated exclusively to the use of these first consumers and to lands lying "under said canals," so far as may be necessary for beneficial uses on said lands, and that consumers in other territories can have no right except to the surplus.

These facts do not establish the exclusive dedication so claimed. They do not show the intent to confine the service of water to the first users alone, and they are entirely consistent with the existence of the intent on the part of the company to continue the extending of their system and the service of a part of their original supply to other users in other territory.

The evidence shows that the rights of the original users of the water included among the petitioners, for the most part at least, were obtained under contracts with the Sutter-Butte Canal Company to serve water to particular tracts of land belonging to particular consumers for the term of the corporate existence of said company and at specified rates per acre for each year, and that these agreements contained a clause whereby the canal company reserved the right to "contract for the delivery of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second," and provided that when its water supply became less than 1,000 cubic feet per second, each user should be entitled only to a proportional share thereof. They also declared that the water right thereby created should be appurtenant to the land described. By these contracts the company agreed to deliver water at the rate of a constant flow of 1 second foot for every 160 acres of land. The landowner was to pay a lump sum of $13.50 per acre and a yearly rate of $2 per acre. By notice on or before January 1 of any year the landowner could have at $3 per acre 2 second feet more for each 160 acres for that year, only. Contracts in this form were made covering about 40,000 acres. Other contracts were made covering from 12,000 to 15,000 acres, which were similar in form, except that the water was to be used only for rice crops, the quantity was not limited, the landowner agreed positively to take it for a short term of 2, 3, or 4 years, and thereafter could take it or not at his option. No price was stated, but the evidence is that $7 per acre was charged for water on these contracts. Water was also furnished to other lands along the canals for a year, on application to the company, at rates fixed by the Railroad Commission. The proper irrigation of rice, it appears, required about three times as much water as is necessary for ordinary crops, the quantity varying with the composition and texture of the soil. There was evidence before the Commission showing that the area of land irrigated from this system had increased from time to time, until in 1919 the area irrigated for rice was 22,000 acres and that for other crops was 28,000 acres. The water required for the rice land would be the equivalent of that required for 66,000 acres in ordinary crops. The acreage irrigated for that year would require enough water, therefore, to irrigate 28,000 plus 66,000 acres, or 94,000 acres, at 1 second foot per quarter section, the minimum rate fixed by the contract, or a constant flow of 587 second feet.

The reservation by the aforesaid contracts, giving the company the right to make like contracts for supplying at least 1,000 second feet of water and to compel the landowners to prorate the water when less than that quantity was available, shows that the original proposal of the company was that the company would devote a water supply amounting to 1,000 second feet, constant flow, to all landowners who applied for water for irrigation of their land, under such contracts, until the water so contracted for amounted to that quantity, that the water used should not exceed the rate of 3 second feet for each quarter section of 160 acres, and that the particular land covered by this limited number of contracts should constitute the area, district, or territory to which this particular 1,000 second feet of water should be dedicated. This was a dedication to a public use. Traber v. R. R. Commission, 191 Pac. 370. The contracts did not prohibit the company from extending its canals into new territory and selling a part of the 1,000 second feet for use therein, or from furnishing at the rate of more than 3 second feet to each quarter section of land. The company could therefore dispose of the entire proposed supply of 1,000 second feet at such places and in such quantities as it pleased, without departing from the terms of the dedication, and such disposition would not constitute a new dedication of which any of such contract users could lawfully complain.

I am of the opinion that if the company had thus disposed of this entire supply, it would have amounted to a dedication of that quantity of water to public use for irrigation exclusively upon the lands described in the several contracts, and that neither the company nor the Railroad Commission could enlarge the dedication or expand the territory entitled thereto, so as to give to other lands an equal right to receive water out of that 1,000 second feet in common with the lands described in such contracts. The land so described would be entitled to preference in such use, and other lands could rightfully receive water only from the surplus remaining after the rightful users had taken the quantity they had respectively contracted for so far as it was required for beneficial uses on their lands. Civ. Code, § 552; Merrill v. Southside Irr. Co., 112 Cal. 435, 44 Pac. 720; Palmer v. R. R. Comn., 167 Cal. 174, 138 Pac. 997; Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 681, 140 Pac. 591, 948; South Pasadena v. Pasadena, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 588, 93 Pac. 490; Thayer v. Cal. Dev. Co., 164 Cal. 135, 128 Pac. 21; Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 321, 322, 324, 163 Pac. 54; Fallbrook Irrig. District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 161, 162, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369.

But here it does not appear that the company had yet dedicated the whole of this 1,000 second feet at the time it proposed to supply the additional 14,400 acres in 1920, to which the petitioners object. As above stated, the total area supplied up to and including the year 1919 required only a constant flow of 587 second feet. The 14,400 acres to be taken on in 1920, even if it were all irrigated for rice and required 3 second feet for each quarter section, would consume only 270 second feet in addition, making in all 857 second feet. This comes well within the proposal to supply 1,000 second feet, and the petitioners do not appear to have any legal reason for their claim to preference in the use of the small supply available. Their contracts require them to prorate with the other beneficiaries in that public use, in such a case. It does not appear from the evidence, so far as I am advised from the briefs, that those of the petitioners who have received water only under the yearly applications require more water than could be supplied out of the margin of 133 second feet remaining of the original 1,000 second feet to be devoted to these lands. They therefore cannot claim any greater rights than the original contract users.

I wish to say further that the mere fact that the notice of appropriation under which the water company originally diverted the water from the Feather river named the counties of Sutter and Butte as the places of use has, in my opinion, no significance whatever with respect to the question of the dedication of the water to any particular use or place. The facts in that respect are not essentially different from those considered in Palmer v. R. R. Comn., 167 Cal. 174, 138 Pac. 997, wherein it was held that the dedication of the water taken under appropriation notices designating the place of use by similar indefinite statements would be manifested only by the actual taking of the water and supplying it to particular tracts or districts of land, and that the appropriation notices did not constitute such dedication. I mention this because from the proceedings before the Railroad Commission it appears to have been assumed that these clauses in the appropriation notices constituted a dedication of the water to public use upon all the land embraced in the two counties named.

For these reasons I concur in the conclusion that the Railroad Commission acted within its powers in making the order here sought to be reviewed.

BOSBYSHELL v. CLINE, Sheriff of Los Angeles County, et al.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. BOSBYSHELL et al.

(Civ. 3442.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 20, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 21, 1921.)

1. Attachment 🔑63—Possession by debtor of property bought by mother held immaterial.

Where it appeared that a debtor transferred his interest in dairy cattle to his mother, who owned the remaining interest, but that at the time of the attachment all of the stock so transferred and their increase had died or been sold, and that the stock attached had been subsequently purchased by the mother from others with her own funds, the fact that there was no transfer of immediate possession of the property sold by the son to his mother as required by Civ. Code, § 3440, does not sustain the attachment.

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑299(13) — Employ of debtor by mother held not to indicate ownership of property.

Where a son had transferred his interest in a dairy farm and the stock thereon to his mother in satisfaction of his debt to her, the fact that he was thereafter retained by her at a salary as manager of the property does not indicate any ownership of property subsequently purchased with her money, which would subject such property to attachment for the son's debt.

3. Attachment 🔑63—Mortgage given by debtor held not to show ownership of property.

The fact that the attachment debtor, who was employed by his mother on a salary to manage her dairy farm, gave in his own name a mortgage for part of the purchase price of cattle paid for with the mother's money, does not subject such stock to attachment for the son's debts.

4. Attachment 🔑63—Defendant's claim mother was dependent held not to disprove her ownership of property attached as his.

The fact that a son, when asking for exemption from military duty, claimed his mother was dependent upon him, if competent evidence in determining the right to attach property as his under a writ levied before he made such claim, has no weight to shown his ownership of the property, where the mother was more than 70 years of age and feeble, so that she might be dependent on him, though she had property sufficient for her support.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Separate actions by Maggie J. Bosbyshell against John C. Cline, as Sheriff of Los Angeles County, the Hammond Lumber Company, and others, in claim and delivery for property attached, and by the Hammond Lumber Company against Maggie J. Bosbyshell and another, to set aside the transfer of real estate on the ground of fraud. From a judgment for the plaintiff in the first action, defendants therein appeal, and from judgment for the defendants in the second action, the Hammond Lumber Company appeals. Judgment in each case affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Richard A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The two above-entitled actions were tried together. The first one is in the nature of claim and delivery to recover certain personal property. In the second, plaintiff therein, alleging that certain real estate had been fraudulently conveyed by its debtor, William Bosbyshell, to Maggie J. Bosbyshell, sought to have the transfer thereof declared fraudulent and void. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in the first case and for defendants in the second, from which defendants in the one and plaintiff in the other have appealed.

As we gather from the meager statements and excerpts of evidence from the typewritten transcript, as printed in the briefs, the facts material to a decision of the cases are: That Maggie J. Bosbyshell is the mother of William Bosbyshell, who, prior to February 2, 1915, had been engaged in the business of building contractor, as a result of which he was at the time indebted to the Hammond Lumber Company in the sum of $6,323.67, for which on said date he made and delivered his promissory note in evidence thereof; that at the same time he was indebted to his mother in the sum of some $19,000, as evidenced by his promissory notes theretofore delivered to her. At the time, he and his mother were joint owners of a small ranch, upon which neither resided, but through employés they conducted a dairy consisting of some 15 or 20 head of cows, and possessed other personal property used in connection therewith, all of which they owned jointly. On March 1, 1915, William Bosbyshell, in payment of the indebtedness due to his mother, conveyed to her his one-half interest in the ranch, which deed was on the same day duly filed for record, and by bill of sale transferred to her his one-half interest in the cows and personal property thereon so owned by him, in consideration of which she canceled and surrendered to him the promissory notes evidencing his indebtedness to her. The note to the Hammond Lumber Company was reduced by payments made to the extent that on August 9, 1917, there remained a balance due thereon of $3,989.35, for which, on said date, William made and delivered to the Hammond Lumber Company his note for said sum, and upon which the Hammond Lumber Company, some four years after the alleged fraudulent transfer, to wit, on February 10, 1919, brought an action and therein caused a writ of attachment to be levied upon his interest in the real estate involved herein, and also to be levied upon all the personal property which at the time was located on the ranch. This property consisted of some 50 head of Jersey cows, heifers and yearlings, a bull, 6 head of horses, and other personal property, and constitutes the subject of the first-entitled action herein, and of all of which, as found by the court, plaintiff was the owner.

Appellant suggests no reason and makes no argument in support of a reversal of the judgment rendered in the case of Hammond Lumber Company v. Maggie J. Bosbyshell and William Bosbyshell.

[1] As to the other case, that of Maggie J. Bosbyshell v. Cline, Sheriff, etc., et al., it conclusively appears that at the time of the alleged transfer made on March 1, 1915, by William to his mother, he was justly indebted to her in the sum of upwards of $19,000. Indeed, appellants do not question the good faith of the parties in this transaction; but, invoking the provisions of section 3440, Civil Code, claim that the purported transfer was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of the property, nor followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things so transferred, and hence the alleged transfer as to the Hammond Lumber Company must be deemed to be void. Without quoting the testimony bearing upon the question, we may concede that, as claimed by appellants, the evidence is insufficient to support the finding to the effect that the transfer of title to the property made on March 1, 1915, was accompanied by an immediate delivery thereof and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. However this may be, such finding must be deemed immaterial, for the reason that the court, upon sufficient evidence, found that the writ of attachment was not levied upon any of the property so transferred, but—

> "That said cattle and the increase thereof so transferred by Wm. Bosbyshell * * * to the plaintiff herein, on the 1st day of March, 1915, were sold or died prior to the levy of the attachment on said property by the sheriff, * * * and that on the said date that said cattle were so attached, to wit, on the 13th day of February, 1919, no part of said cattle or personal property aforesaid were in the possession of said plaintiff;" and "that all of the personal property described in plaintiff's complaint herein and now in the possession of the sheriff, * * * hereinbefore found to be the property of the plaintiff, was by the plaintiff purchased with her own separate funds from persons other than the said Wm. Bosbyshell, * * * and has, at all times since said purchase and up to the unlawful taking by the said sheriff, * * * been in the exclusive possession of plaintiff, by and through her servant and agent;" and, further, "that in so far as Wm. Bosbyshell * * * has exercised any control or possession in connection with all of the said personal property described in plaintiff's complaint, he was at all times acting as the agent, servant and employé of the plaintiff herein and not otherwise."

Since no part of the property transferred by William to his mother on March 1, 1915, was made the subject of the levy of attachment, it is therefore immaterial whether or not the transfer was accompanied by the acts required by section 3440, Civil Code.

[2] Title to the ranch was, by deed duly recorded, conveyed to the mother on March 1, 1915, of which fact the Hammond Lumber Company must be deemed to have had notice; and while it is true that, commencing in June, 1915, and for a period of nearly four years prior to the levy of the attachment, she, at a salary of $150 per month, employed her son to manage the ranch and, as her agent, to care for the dairy stock and personal property, which she had, subsequent to March, 1915, purchased with her own funds and placed upon the ranch in his charge, such facts would not justify the conclusion that, as to debts contracted by him prior to March 1, 1915, the property, by virtue of such employment, should be deemed subject to the payment thereof, any more than if Maggie J. Bosbyshell had bought another farm, stocked it, and employed her son in charge thereof. He never was owner of the property, and had no interest therein.

[3] It was alleged and proved that on November 1, 1916, William Bosbyshell bought a herd of cows for which his mother paid a part of the purchase price in cash, and he, instead of his mother so doing, executed a mortgage thereon for the balance and immediately thereafter executed a bill of sale of the property to his mother, subject to the mortgage, which mortgage she thereafter paid. Appellants insist the judgment should be reversed because the court made no finding upon the issue as to the giving of this mortgage by William. We see no reason for so doing. The act of William in executing the mortgage at most raised a presumption that merely by virtue of his executing the mortgage he was owner of the herd of cows so purchased. The testimony touching the transaction and the fact that his mother paid the entire purchase price is ample to overcome such presumption.

[4] The fact that William, long after the making of the levy, to wit, on July 10, 1919, when asking for exemption from military duty, made an affidavit that his mother was dependent upon him, which affidavit, in view of the fact that she was more than 70 years of age and feeble, he might very well have made, is, if competent evidence, of no weight whatsoever touching the issue which was tried, namely, whether he or his mother owned the property. In Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 46 Pac. 95, it is said:

> "What constitutes an immediate delivery, or an actual and continued change of possession, in the sense of section 3440 of the Civil Code, is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence; and where, as in this case, the evidence tends to prove such delivery and change of possession, the finding of the court will not be disturbed."

And in Feeley v. Boyd, 143 Cal. 282, 76 Pac. 1029, 65 L. R. A. 943, the court says that such question is governed by no definite rule, but depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and where there is conflicting evidence and a variety of circumstances from which conflicting inferences may be drawn, the findings of the trial court must govern.

The judgment in each case is affirmed.

GILLONS v. TURNER OIL CO. (Civ. 3229.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 21, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⚷8(7)—Principal and agent ⚷89(5)—Complaint held sufficiently to allege delivery of oil under contract without allegation that oil was delivered under contract, a mere conclusion.

In an action for recovery of commissions for sales of oil to the defendant, assertion made by defendant that plaintiff's pleading contained no allegation that any oil was ever delivered to defendant "under the contract" between defendant and the seller was wholly without merit, being based apparently upon a contention that an allegation in terms was necessary to complete the statement of a cause of action, since such allegation would be but the statement of a conclusion that would be stricken on motion, the complaint setting forth the contract between defendant and the seller of the oil, and stating that a certain number of barrels of oil was delivered by the seller to defendant.

2. Pleading ⚷125 — Denial of indebtedness without traverse of averments showing indebtedness raises no issue.

Where complaint alleged the facts showing an indebtedness due plaintiff from defendant, and further that the amount of the indebtedness was due, owing and unpaid, a denial of the latter allegation without a traverse of the averments showing the indebtedness raised no issue, and a motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

3. Principal and agent ⚷89(5)—Answer in action for commissions held not to set up defense of fraud.

In action for commission on sales of oil from a third person to defendant, an answer that before the consummation of the agreement to purchase oil it was fraudulently represented that the oil proposed to be delivered to defendant did not have a foreign content in excess of a certain stated percentage of its volume failed to state a defense or counterclaim, where the contract as finally executed contained several provisions showing that defendant bound itself to take oil without limitation or diminution because of the presence in it of a foreign content of any percentage whatever.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by George H. Gillons against the Turner Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 190 Pac. 183, 185.

William H. Fuller and Earl L. Wisdom, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell & Mathews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for the recovery of commissions for certain sales of oil made by Graham-Loftus Oil Company to the appellant. The appeal is from a judgment for the plaintiff.

The respondent's cause of action is based upon a written contract between him and the appellant, reciting that he had rendered services in the obtaining of a contract between appellant and Graham-Loftus Oil Company; the appellant, in consideration of such services, promising to pay a commission of a certain amount for each barrel of oil delivered under the contract between the two companies.

[1] At the commencement of the trial the appellant objected to the reception of evidence on the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The objection was overruled, and it is claimed that the ruling was erroneous. This point is based upon the assertion, made in appellant's brief, that plaintiff's pleading contains no allegation that any oil was ever delivered to appellant "under the contract" between the two companies. The appellant evidently means to contend, strange as it may seem, that such an allegation, in terms, is necessary to the complete statement of a cause of action in a case like this. Such a proposition cannot be maintained. It requires no citation of authority to support the assertion that such an allegation would be but the statement of a conclusion, and that it would be stricken on motion. The complaint set forth the contract between the appellant and the other company in full, and stated that a certain number of barrels of oil was delivered by the Graham-Loftus concern. It was further alleged that statements of the amount delivered, made up pursuant to a scheme provided in the contract, were rendered to appellant and were retained by it. We are at a loss to perceive a better method of pleading plaintiff's cause of action without a violation of the salutary rule against the averment of conclusions. The complaint was, of course, sufficient.

[2] At the trial the plaintiff rested without the introduction of evidence, upon the theory that the state of the pleadings warranted that course, and the court determined that the burden of proof was upon the defendant under the allegations of its answer and counterclaim. A motion for a nonsuit was then presented and denied. Appellant assigns this ruling as error, upon the utterly untenable ground that the answer raised an issue by means of a denial contained in it "that there is now due or owing to plaintiff by virtue of or under" the contract sued on "the sum" for which judgment was asked in the complaint, "or that there is due or owing from said defendant to plaintiff any sum whatsoever." The complaint alleged the facts showing an indebtedness due the respondent from the appellant, and further that the amount of the indebtedness was due, owing, and unpaid. A denial of this latter allegation, without a traverse of the averments showing the indebtedness, raised no issue. Lightner v. Menzel, 35 Cal. 452. The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[3] The remaining contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in sustaining an objection to an offer of evidence intended to prove allegations of the answer and counterclaim to the effect that the appellant was induced to enter into the agreement with the Graham-Loftus Oil Company through fraudulent misrepresentation to which the respondent was a party. The facts constituting the alleged fraud are set forth in appellant's pleading with great particularity. Reduced to a brief compass, they amount to a charge that it was represented to appellant, before the consummation of the agreement between the two companies, that the oil proposed to be delivered to appellant did not have a foreign content in excess of a certain stated percentage of its volume. The difficulty is, however, that when the contract was finally executed it contained several provisions showing that appellant bound itself to take oil from the other company without limitation or diminution because of the presence in it of a foreign content of any percentage whatever. We need not refer to these parts of the contract. They are plainly apparent from a reading of it, and, moreover, they are specifically mentioned and pointed out in the brief of respondent; and the appellant does not, in its reply brief, attempt to harmonize their presence in the contract with its theory of fraudulent misrepresentation in its procurement. The point made by appellant is totally without merit, and its pleading failed to state a defense or counterclaim.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRTH et al. v. RICHTER. (Civ. 3353.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Partnership 🔑199—Action may be maintained in name of all partners, though contract was made by only two.

Where plaintiffs were copartners and had filed the required certificate, action may be maintained in the name of all of the partners under the doctrine of undisclosed principal, and in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 378, though the contract sued on was made in the name of only two of the several parties.

2. Sales 🔑264—Where seller states the kind of article sold, he warrants the kind.

Where the buyer in terms asks for an article of a particular kind, and the seller purports to comply with his request, or states that the article is of that kind, he must be deemed to warrant the article being of that kind; hence, where plaintiffs offered to purchase Valencia orange trees, and the seller pointed out a row of trees as Valencia and agreed in writing to furnish such trees, he must be deemed to have warranted that the trees furnished would bear Valencia oranges.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑46(9)—Action for breach of warranty of fruit trees does not accrue until they bear.

Where defendant, by written contract, warranted that trees sold were Valencia orange trees, such warranty included a warranty that the trees would bear Valencia oranges, so the cause of action for breach did not arise until the trees bore fruit when breach of the warranty could be discovered, hence, though more than four years elapsed between the sale and the action for breach, it was not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; the trees having begun to bear within less than four years of the time of commencement of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by John P. Firth and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Dry Bog Orange Company, against Ernest Richter. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Guy Knupp, of Porterville, and Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages resulting from breach of warranty. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The action is based upon a contract dated February 28, 1912, which, as written, was entered into between the defendant as party of the first part and E. J. Wilson and J. P. Firth as parties of the second part. It was provided therein:

> "That the party of the first part agrees to sell and the parties of the second part agree to buy nine hundred and ninety-six (996) Valencia orange trees, running in size ½ inch and up, said trees grown by O. M. Bert, near his pumping plant. Price to be paid for trees, One, twenty-five cents ($1.25) f. o. b. trees to be balled and scrubbed and defoliated delivered f. o. b. in good condition and to pass inspection before shipping."

It will be noted that the action is brought by Firth and Wilson and by George H. Bradley as copartners. It was alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs are and at all times mentioned therein were copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Dry Bog Orange Company, and that they had filed with the county clerk of Tulare county the certificate required by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, and have in all other respects complied with the provisions of said sections of the Civil Code; that the plaintiffs, as such copartners, are and at all of said times were the owners of certain described real property in the county of Tulare, which land was specially adapted to the growing of citrus fruits; that said agreement was made for and on behalf of and as the agreement of all the plaintiffs as copartners, and that the trees to be purchased under the terms of the agreement were purchased for the purpose of planting same upon said real property; that under the terms of said agreement the defendant delivered to the plaintiffs 996 orange trees which were accepted and paid for. It was further alleged:

> "That at the time of the delivery of said orange trees by said defendant, the said defendant represented said trees to be Valencia orange trees as provided in said contract hereinabove set forth, and that said plaintiffs accepted said orange trees relying on the representation of said defendant that they were Valencia orange trees. That at the time of the delivery of said orange trees it was impossible to tell or determine what kind of oranges said trees would bear, and that the said plaintiffs accepted said orange trees and planted all thereof upon the real estate hereinabove described, relying upon the contract hereinabove set forth and upon the representation of said defendant that said trees were Valencia orange trees; that the plaintiffs did not know and had no means of ascertaining whether or not the trees were of the kind as ordered by them and as represented by the defendant at the time of their delivery, and that the said plaintiffs in accepting said trees and in planting the same upon said real property relied upon the terms of said agreement and upon the warranty and representation of defendant that all of said orange trees were Valencia orange trees."

Further facts are alleged to the effect that in the fall of 1915 a part of the trees for the first time bore fruit, and in the fall of 1916 the remainder of the trees for the first time bore fruit, at which time it was for the first time discovered and for the first time became possible for the plaintiffs to discover that 183 of said trees were navel orange trees and not Valencia orange trees. Further facts are alleged showing the damages incurred. The findings of the court correspond to the allegations thus made. The amount of damages awarded and the method of measuring such damages are not attacked by appellant; his claim being that he is not subject to any liability whatever. The action was commenced on the 25th day of February, 1918.

[1] By demurrer to the complaint and by objections made at the trial and now renewed, appellant insists that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and that George H. Bradley is not a proper party plaintiff. We think that there is no merit in this objection. "As a rule a suit on a transaction in the name of the individual partner, but for the firm's benefit, may be brought, either by the party appearing in the transaction as the sole plaintiff, or, under the doctrine of undisclosed principal, by all of the partners." 30 Cyc. 563. This is in harmony with the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that (with exceptions not necessary to note here), every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and that all persons having an interest in the subject of the action and in obtaining the relief demanded may be joined as plaintiffs. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 378. See, also, 20 Ruling Case Law, 921.

[2] Counsel for appellant in his brief has contended that there is no warranty shown by the evidence in this case. Counsel for respondents dispose of the argument that there can be no implied warranty by denying that respondents place any reliance on an implied warranty, but do claim that the terms of the contract are such that, since they provide for a sale of the trees by description as Valencia orange trees, the defendant thereby expressly warranted, not only that they were Valencia orange trees, but that they were trees which would bear fruit of the kind known as Valencia oranges. The position thus taken by respondents appears to be sustained by authority in this state. Where the circumstances are such as to amount to a representation of fact on the part of the vendor that an article sold is of a particular kind or description, as, for instance, where the buyer in terms asks for a particular kind, and the seller purports to comply with his request, it was said that "he would probably be held to warrant the article as being of that kind, although he may not have made any declaration in words to that effect." Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co., 158 Cal. 54, 60, 109 Pac. 839, 842. In the case at bar it appears that the buyers definitely limited their request by asking for Valencia orange trees, and the seller not only delivered the trees in direct response to that request, but, further, in a written contract, agreed to deliver Valencia orange trees. We are aware that, as shown by the evidence to which we have been referred, the particular trees were first selected by the buyers. Appellant had bought from O. M. Bert a quantity of trees, including those delivered to respondents. The trees were growing in rows in Bert's nursery. At the request of appellant, Bert exhibited to respondents certain rows of trees which he said were all Valencia orange trees. Respondents then selected these particular trees from the rows thus designated, and those are the trees that were delivered. No charge of bad faith is made herein, but, on the contrary, the court found and the parties admit that there was no such bad faith or deception; nevertheless appellant assumed the responsibility of selling those trees as Valencia orange trees, and there is nothing in the evidence showing any conduct on the part of respondents which should estop them from claiming the benefit of that warranty. The terms used were sufficient to state an express warranty. Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573, 578, 579.

[3] Appellant next contends that the action having been commenced more than four years after the time when the contract was made and the trees delivered, it was barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations. It is an action upon a contract in writing executed within this state. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1. It is admitted that the time limited begins to run from the time of the breach of the contract. If the warranty in question was broken immediately when the trees were delivered (they being other than Valencia orange trees), and if the warranty was limited to the fact that they were then and there Valencia orange trees, then this action was commenced too late, and the plaintiffs cannot recover. It has been settled by decision in this state that a warranty of the kind here in question is not limited to the present fact that the trees are of the description given, but it is further a warranty that the trees will bear the kinds of fruit corresponding to such description. Shearer v. Park Nursery Co., 103 Cal. 415, 37 Pac. 412, 42 Am. St. Rep. 125. The statute of limitations was not applicable in that case, but it is authority upon the question as to the time when under facts like those in this case the breach of warranty actually occurred. In the Shearer Case the court after first stating its opinion that the warranty was to the effect above stated, said: "If so, the breach occurred when they first bore a different kind of fruit." This conclusion was not arrived at in conflict with the admitted rule that the plaintiff's right of action begins at the time when the warranty is broken, but it did apply the additional rule that the time of breach of the warranty was the time when the trees first bore fruit, that being the earliest date at which the purchaser discovered or could have discovered the breach of the warranty. See, also, Burge v. Albany Nurseries, Inc., 176 Cal. 313, 318, 168 Pac. 343. In Ingalls v. Angell, 76 Wash. 692, 137 Pac. 309, upon facts very similar to those in the present action, the statute of limitations was pleaded as a defense, and the question was directly presented: When did the cause of action accrue? The plaintiff had in writing ordered Carman peach trees. The defendant in response to that order delivered trees labeled "Carman." The court said:

> "It must then be determined whether, by the warranty here pleaded, which is that the trees sold were Carman peach trees, it was intended to warrant that if they should produce peaches they would be of that variety. The purpose of the purchaser, unquestionably, was to buy trees which would produce Carman peaches. A construction of the language to the effect that the trees were to be Carman, and yet that there was no warranty that, if they produced fruit, it would be of that particular variety, would be to magnify form and minimize substance. The modern trend of authority is to look to the substance rather than to the form. When this is done, it would seem plain that the purpose intended was that the peaches, if any, which grew upon the trees which were the subject of the sale, would be of the Carman variety. It must be admitted that this view is not in harmony with the case of Allen v. Todd, 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 222, and the conclusion reached by a majority of the court in Battley v. Faulkner, 3 B. & Ald. 288. We think, however, that, in so far as these cases are out of harmony with the views herein expressed, they are unsound, and we decline to adopt them."

It was therefore held that, since the warranty related to a future event by which its truth could be ascertained, the warranty was not broken until the happening of such future event. The California decisions in the cases to which we have referred lead us to the like conclusion here.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARE v. PARKER (HARVEY, Intervener). (Civ. 3650.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 19, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife 🔑264—Deed to husband and wife prima facie evidence that wife's interest is a separate property interest.

Where title to property is taken in the name of a husband and wife, the deed itself is prima facie evidence. under Civ. Code, § 164, that the wife's interest is a separate property interest, and that the property was not community property.

2. Husband and wife 🔑264—Presumption of wife's separate interest sufficiently rebutted.

The presumption, under Civ. Code, § 164, that a wife had a separate property interest in land, title to which was taken in the name of the husband and wife, was sufficiently rebutted by a showing that the property was purchased after marriage from accumulations of the community, and that the husband had had title taken in their joint name for his personal convenience and for the further purpose of pleasing her.

3. Stipulations 🔑17(3)—Inadvertent stipulation properly ignored.

There was no merit in complaint of counsel for intervener that the court ignored an oral stipulation of himself and counsel for plaintiff, and made a finding contrary thereto, where assent of plaintiff's counsel was doubtless unwittingly given to such stipulation, as it negatived plaintiff's case and would have stipulated him out of court; for a trial judge does not sit as a mere referee in a contest of wits, and it is not only within his province, but is his duty, to see that as nearly as possible the issues shall be disposed of on their merits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; H. A. Peairs, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Charles B. Bare against George B. Parker, as administrator of the estate of Jennie Bare, deceased, wherein Mary A. Harvey intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and intervener appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Allen and George Flournoy, both of Bakersfield (Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for appellant.

Boyce R. Fitzgerald, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. Charles B. Bare, plaintiff herein, and Jennie Bare, were married March 7, 1911. The latter died December 11, 1918, leaving surviving as her only heirs, a husband, plaintiff herein, and her mother, Mary A. Harvey, intervener. Defendant, George B. Parker, was duly appointed administrator of the estate of said Jennie Bare, deceased. At the time of the latter's death, the record title to certain real property stood in the joint names of Charles B. Bare and Jennie Bare, his wife. This property was purchased after marriage from the accumulations of the community.

It is the claim of intervener and also of the administrator of said estate that said Jennie Bare owned at the time of her death an undivided one-half interest in said property as her separate estate, and her said interest should be distributed according to the rules of descent to her heirs at law. This action was accordingly brought by the husband to quiet his title as against all adverse claimants. Judgment went in his favor, and intervener alone has appealed.

[1] The findings of that court that "plaintiff provided that the title to said property be taken in the name of himself and wife for his personal convenience and for the further purpose of pleasing her" (his wife) and "by virtue of said deeds the property so acquired was community property and the interest of Jennie Bare therein was only a community interest," are assailed as standing without evidentiary support. The deeds themselves were prima facie evidence that decedent's interest was a separate property interest. Section 164, Civ. Code. The question then is: What was the intention of the husband at the time he directed or consented that his wife be named jointly with him as a grantee?

[2] In affairs matrimonial, such as this, men are often moved to action by the prompting of emotion or sentiment, or even by considerations of domestic policy. To relate all the operating causes that influenced human conduct long after the passing of the occasion, with varying attending circumstances, is quite difficult for the average person. The rigid rules of logic, properly applied in an effort to explain conduct in ordinary business transactions, are often unsatisfactory aids in divining motives that may have influenced matrimonial conduct. For this reason, all other things being equal, careful consideration must be given to the testimony of the survivor of the marriage, who, perhaps, alone has knowledge of the secret understanding of marital purposes and intentions. The credibility of the witness, however, is subject to the test of the general rules of evidence. It has been held that title placed in the wife's name, with no intention of making a gift to her of the property, but merely for the purposes of pleasing her, is sufficient to rebut the presumption prescribed by section 164, Civil Code. Fulkerson v. Stiles, 156 Cal. 703, 105 Pac. 966, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 181.

[3] No question of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith is involved here. Counsel for intervener complains that the court ignored the oral stipulation of himself and counsel for plaintiff and made a finding contrary thereto. Nearing the close of trial, counsel for intervener proposed several stipulations that were assented to by counsel for plaintiff. One was that "the property which stood in the name of Charles B. Bare and Jennie Bare was, at the date of the deeds and thereafter, held by them as tenants in common." Undoubtedly assent was unwittingly given to this stipulation. It negatives the theory of plaintiff's case, and would have stipulated him out of court. The trial court appreciated the situation, and properly refused to permit an inadvertence or want of attention on the part of counsel to work what he conceived to be an injustice.

"A trial judge does not sit as a mere referee in a contest of wits between counsel in the case, but that it is not only within his province, but is his duty, to see that as nearly as possible the issues shall be disposed of on their merits. * * *" Farrar v. Farrar, 182 Pac. 989.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SINCLAIR v. PIONEER TRUCK CO. et al.

(Civ. 3621; L. A. 6193.)

1. Negligence 🔑141(8)—Instruction on contributory negligence held sufficient.

Where the court instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff was negligent and his negligence amounted to want of ordinary care and contributed proximately to the injury, he could not recover, the instruction was sufficient, although defendants requested the court to instruct to find for defendants, if plaintiff's negligence contributed "in any degree" to the injury sued for.

2. Trial 🔑296(12)—Instruction failing to define required amount of care not erroneous, in view of other instructions.

An instruction that "the contributory negligence which will bar recovery must be such as to establish that the plaintiff, by failure to exercise the required amount of care, proximately contributed to produce the injury complained of, so that but for his concurring and co-operative fault the injury would not have happened," was not erroneous, in that the court did not define the phrase "required amount of care," where the degree of care to be exercised by both parties was repeatedly stated to the jury.

3. Trial 🔑260(3) — Refusing requested instructions as to burden of proof on different issues not error, in view of instruction given.

Court did not err in refusing to give defendants' proposed instructions advising the jury as to where the burden lay as to each of the issues, enumerating them, where the jury was familiar with the only controverted issues in the case, namely, the negligence of the defendants and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and the court instructed generally to the effect that the duty was imposed upon the plaintiff to prove the allegations of his complaint by a preponderance of the evidence, and that matters of defense pleaded by the defendants could be established only by a preponderance of the evidence.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Part of instruction referring to duty of automobilist in business district not prejudicial, though not sustained by evidence.

In an action for damages resulting from automobile collision, there was no prejudicial error in reading from the statutes the provision which defines the term "business district" and duties of drivers of motor vehicles as to speed, etc., although there was no evidence that collision in question occurred in business district, where it was only part of an instruction covering a much wider scope and fixing the speed limits in various districts.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Evidence 🔑10(1)—Judicial notice of character of streets.

Courts may in a proper instance take judicial notice of the character in some respects of a street.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by O. A. Sinclair against the Pioneer Truck Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Warren E. Libby, of San Diego, for appellants.

Chester C. Kempley, of San Diego, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries sustained by reason of the alleged negligence of defendants, from which resulted a collision between an automobile operated by plaintiff and a truck driven by defendant Avery, an employee of his codefendants, at the intersection of Tenth and B streets in the city of San Diego.

[1] The sole point urged by the appellants relates to the giving or refusing of instructions to the jury. The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff by his own negligence directly contributed in any degree to the injury sued for, they will find for the defendants."

The court gave substantially this instruction and several others on the subject of contributory negligence, omitting from each of them, however, the words "in any degree" included in the proposed instruction. It is urged that the court's refusal to thus emphasize the measure of any contributory negligence chargeable to the plaintiff was error sufficiently prejudicial to entitle the defendants to a new trial. This contention is not maintainable. It is true that in some of the cases cited by the appellants this phrase is used in connection with the legal effect of contributory negligence, but it is nowhere held that it is an essential qualification of such negligence, but adds emphasis only. Where, as here, the court instructs the jury that if the plaintiff was negligent, and his negligence amounted to want of ordinary care, and contributed proximately to the injury, he cannot recover, such an instruction is sufficient.

[2] In another instruction the jury were advised that—

> "The contributory negligence which will bar recovery must be such as to establish that the plaintiff by failure to exercise the required amount of care proximately contributed to produce the injury complained of, so that but for his concurring and co-operative fault the injury would not have happened."

This instruction is claimed to be erroneous for the reason that no attempt was made by the court to define the phrase "required amount of care"; but the degree of care to be exercised by both parties was repeatedly stated to the jury, consequently the criticism of this instruction is wholly without merit.

[3] The court refused to give defendants' proposed instructions 1 and 22, advising the jury as to where the burden lay as to each of the issues, enumerating them. Instead of adopting the language proposed, the court instructed the jury generally to the effect that the duty was imposed upon the plaintiff to prove the allegations of his complaint by a preponderance of the evidence, and that any matter of defense pleaded by the defendants could be established only by a preponderance of the evidence. It appears that the jury was familiar with the only really controverted issues in the case, namely, the negligence of the defendants and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, so that the instructions given by the court on this subject were, we have no doubt, sufficient.

[4] In the course of the reading of the instructions to the jury the court read several of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, (Laws 1915, p. 397), including the provision designating the maximum speed at which motor or other vehicles may be driven in various districts, a portion of which is that it shall be unlawful to drive such vehicles on any public highway where the territory contiguous thereto is closely built up at a greater rate of speed than 20 miles an hour, or in a business district of an incorporated city or county or town at a greater rate than 15 miles an hour. The court also read the provision of said act which defines the term "business district" as that portion of a highway which is mainly built up with structures devoted to business. While the collision occurred at Tenth and B streets in said city of San Diego, there was no evidence in the case to indicate that this precise location is a business district, and, of course, courts do not take judicial notice of the character or condition of streets. The appellants contend that this instruction gave to the jury an opportunity which under the evidence they should not have had, namely, to find the defendants guilty of negligence if their automobile approached the point of collision at a rate of speed in excess of 15 miles an hour. We can conceive of cases where such an instruction would properly be regarded as prejudicial, but here the court was reading the law generally applicable to the operation of motor or other vehicles, defining the rights and duties of those operating such vehicles, and fixing the speed limit in various districts, and, while it cannot be said that there was any evidence in the case making specially applicable to it the portion of the instruction complained of, still as it was only part of an instruction covering a much wider scope the jury could not infer from its mere inclusion therein that the point of the collision was a business district, so that it cannot be fairly claimed that they were misled by it.

The appellants complain of the court's action with reference to another instruction—one regarding the duty of operators of vehicles approaching the intersections of streets, asserting that an instruction on this subject requested by them was refused by the court. The record, however, fails to show any such request, and, on the other hand, does show that with the exception of one word the instruction in question was included in one which the court gave. When the record is examined as to this point the claim of the appellants appears to us to be quite hypercritical. We may say as to this, as well as every other feature of the case, that the jury were fully and fairly instructed as to the law, and could not have been misled.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. BRADFORD, Dist. Atty., v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 2242.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 27, 1921.)

1. Nuisance ⟹84—Complaint under Red Light Abatement Act held sufficient.

In an action under the Red Light Abatement Act, a complaint alleging that the premises "are used for purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and upon said premises acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution were held and did occur, and said premises were and now are a nuisance," is sufficient as against the objection that it does not charge the commission of any specific acts.

2. Appeal and error ⟹994(3)—Credibility of testimony was for the trial court, not the appellate court.

It was the province of the trial court, and not of the appellate court, to weigh the credibility of the testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action under the Red Light Abatement Act by the People of the State of California, on the relation of Hugh B. Bradford, District Attorney, against Alice A. Miller and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellants.
Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. An action under the Red Light Abatement Act (St. 1913, p. 20). The plaintiff had judgment in the trial court and the defendants appeal.

[1] It is urged in support of a reversal that the complaint does not charge the commission of any specific acts constituting the alleged nuisance. The complaint alleges, however, that the premises "were and now are used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and upon said premises acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution were held and did occur, and said premises were and now are a nuisance." These allegations are sufficient within the purview of the act.

[2] The second point is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings and judgment in that it rests upon the "testimony of a hired, tricky reformer," etc. While the evidence presents the usual characteristics of this class of actions it cannot be said that the testimony of the chief witness for the prosecution is inherently or otherwise improbable. It presents a straightforward story, abundantly sufficient, if true, to justify a decree against the defendants. It was peculiarly the province of the trial court to weigh its credibility, and we are satisfied with the conclusions at which it arrived. There is no other point in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMELAND v. RENWICK et al. (Civ. 2197; Sac. 3056.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 23, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⟹319(6)—Complaint against officers held based on Code and not to state cause of action for fraud at common law.

Complaint, in action against a corporation's officers to recover damages for obtaining from plaintiff real property in consideration of mortgage bonds and stock of the corporation on false and fraudulent representations, held to be based entirely on Civ. Code, § 316, and not to state a cause of action for fraud and deceit at common law under section 1572, the charging words of the complaint being "that on and prior to the said 30th day of January, 1912, the said defendants, as such officers and directors of said corporation, willfully gave and published certificates and willfully made and published official printed reports, etc., which were false and untrue," etc.

2. Fraud ⟹41—Essential allegations.

To state a common-law action for fraud and deceit under Civ. Code, § 1572, there must be more in the complaint than the bare statement that defendants made certain false and fraudulent representations upon which, believing the same, plaintiff entered into the transaction from which he asks to be relieved, or as to which he seeks any appropriate legal or equitable relief, as it must also be charged, not only that the defendant knew that the alleged false representations were false and untrue at the time they were made, but that they were made with the intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff.

3. Corporations ⟹319(7)—Verbal fraud not admissible under complaint in action against corporate officers for fraudulent entries.

In an action against corporate officers to recover damages for fraudulent entries, etc., resting entirely on the liability fixed by Civ. Code, § 316, any evidence tending to establish a case of fraud and deceit under section 1572 would be wholly irrelevant, and the court properly excluded proof of oral representations as to the transactions of the corporations; that is to say, representations which in and of themselves independently of those referred to in section 316 would constitute a sufficient foundation for a cause of action against the defendants.

4. Evidence ⟹253(2)—Misrepresentations of one corporate officer inadmissible against other officers unless made during conspiracy or in furtherance thereof.

In an action against corporate officers by one defrauded into purchasing stock and bonds, any oral representations or statements made by one of the officers relative to the affairs of the corporation would not be binding on other officers unless it were first shown that all the officers had corruptly conspired together and so entered into a mutual understanding that the false representations should be made to the plaintiff with a view of inducing him to buy stock and bonds, in which case it would also be necessary to show as a prerequisite that the misrepresentations were made before the accomplishment of the object of the conspiracy or understanding, or in furtherance thereof.

5. Trial ⚷60(1)—Trial judge held not to abuse discretion in control of order of proof.

In an action against corporate officers to recover damages for fraud under Civ. Code, § 316, in a sale of stock and bonds, where plaintiff introduced certain papers as documents purporting to be statements showing the capitalization, estimated earnings, gross and net holdings, mortgage bonds sold, names of officers, correspondents, and references of the corporation, and prior to the introduction of these papers or documents plaintiff was attempting to show that many of the important representations implied from the papers or records of the corporation referred to therein were in fact not true and that the corporation was in a state of bankruptcy at the time he purchased the stock, the court/did not err in sustaining objection by defendant's counsel upon the ground that no proper foundation had been laid for such proof and requiring that the alleged report or notice, or certificate concerning the corporation or its officers, be first shown, followed by a showing that it was made by an officer of the corporation to plaintiff and that it was false, before proof of damage resulting to plaintiff by reason of the transaction would be permitted.

6. Appeal and error ⚷970(3)—Trial court may control order of proof.

Discretion of trial court as to order of proof cannot be interfered with by the reviewing courts unless it is plainly made to appear that it has been abused to the substantial detriment of the party complaining.

7. Corporations ⚷319(7)—Evidence held insufficient to show circulars were issued by or at instance of corporate officers.

In an action under Civ. Code, § 316, against corporate officers to obtain damages for false representations while selling stock, evidence held not to show that defendants were responsible for issuance or giving out of the circulars or papers referred to in the complaint, and the court did not err in striking out testimony of plaintiffs as to conversations with defendants.

8. Corporations ⚷317(4)—Officers not responsible for circulars issued by other officers in absence of preconcerted arrangement.

In an action for damages by purchaser of stock against corporate officers under Civ. Code, § 316, corporate officers were not liable and bound by circulars issued by other officers, unless it is shown that the issuance of the circulars and the presentation of such documents to plaintiff were the result of a preconcerted arrangement and design by and between all of the officers to cause the issuance of the circulars, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by H. G. Smeland against Harold S. Renwick and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Clary & Louttit, A. L. Levinsky, C. E. Fleming, Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, O. B. Parkinson, C. C. Case, and Scott Rex, all of Stockton, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered upon an order granting a nonsuit upon a motion made immediately upon the close of plaintiff's case.

The defendants, with the exception of defendant Frank V. Smith, were directors of a corporation designated and known as the "San Joaquin Valley Electric Railway," which was incorporated on October 3, 1908, under the laws of this state, and remained in existence as such until March 1, 1913, when, according to the complaint, its charter was duly declared forfeited because of its failure to pay its corporate license tax, as required by law, for the year 1912. The defendant Smith was secretary of said corporation.

The object of said corporation was, so the complaint states, to build and operate a railroad from the city of Stockton, in San Joaquin county, to the city of Modesto, in Stanislaus county.

The purpose of the action is to recover from said defendants damages in the aggregate sum of $13,400 for obtaining from the plaintiff certain real property of the alleged value of $11,400 in consideration of certain mortgage bonds and common and preferred stock of said corporation upon alleged false and fraudulent representations by said defendants with regard to conditions then existing as to said corporation and the progress it had made in the construction of the road, the securing of a franchise, the securing of a lease from another railroad company, and the sale of sufficient bonds of said corporation to enable it from the proceeds of such sale to fully furnish and equip its said railroad from Stockton to Modesto.

The defendants Salmon, Rothenbush, Latta, and McCormick filed answers to the complaint, putting in issue all the material allegations thereof. The defendant Renwick also filed an answer, but did not appear at the trial. Brackett, Covert, and Smith, the other defendants, were not served with process, and did not appear.

The trial court excluded on objection and struck out on motion certain testimony proposed and presented by the plaintiff, and the action of the court in doing so as well as its order granting the nonsuit constitute the bases of the complaint urged on this appeal against the legal stability of the judgment.

The solution of the question whether there is just legal ground for complaint against the rulings above referred to is contingent upon the determination of the nature, technically, of the action, as to which proposition the parties are in controversy and entertain and advance on this appeal variant views.

The defendants contend, and upon that theory the case was tried by the court below, that the action is based upon section 316 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "Any officer of a corporation who willfully gives a certificate, or willfully makes an official report, public notice, or entry in any of the records or books of the corporation, concerning the corporation or its business, which is false in any material representation, shall be liable for all the damages resulting therefrom to any person injured thereby, and if two or more officers unite or participate in the commission of any of the acts herein designated, they shall be jointly and severally liable."

The plaintiff vigorously urges here that the complaint states both a cause of action founded on the above statute and a cause of action for fraud and deceit. Civ. Code, § 1572.

[1] We doubt not that it must be held that the action is based entirely on the statute. The very language of the complaint, it seems to us, admits of no other conclusion. It is true that the complaint contains, as we shall presently see, a few statements which might be taken, as an attempt to state a common-law action to recover for fraud and deceit, but that pleading wholly fails to measure up to the requirements for the statement of such a cause of action.

The charging words of the complaint are as follows:

> "* * * That on and prior to the said 30th day of January, 1912, the said defendants, as such officers and directors of said corporation, willfully gave and published written certificates, and willfully made and published official printed reports and public printed notices concerning the aforesaid railway corporation, its business, financial standing, and assets, which were false and untrue in the following material respects, namely: That on and prior to the said 30th day of January, 1912, the said defendants, as such officers and directors of said corporation, falsely represented and stated to plaintiff verbally and by means of said printed certificates, officially printed reports and printed public notices, to which their names as such officers were appended, attached and printed, that the said railway corporation had sold mortgage bonds of said corporation to the amount of six hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and that the proceeds of such sale were sufficient to finish and fully equip its said railroad from Stockton to Modesto, which was then only partially graded, and put the same in operation and in a condition whereby it would, and could, earn dividends of 15 per cent. on its common stock; when in truth and in fact all said representations, both oral and in said certificates, official reports and public notices, made and issued by said defendants as such officers and directors, were then and there false and untrue."

[2] It seems to us that no more fitting language could be employed than the above to state a case of fraud under section 316 of the Civil Code. Indeed, it will be noted that the above language of the complaint is substantially the language of said section. It is, however, the words italicized in the above excerpt from the complaint, to wit, "falsely represented and stated to plaintiff verbally," etc., and "when in truth and in fact all said representations, both oral," etc., which the plaintiff assumes constitute a sufficient predicate for a just contention that he relied upon and pleaded in his complaint both the statutory and the common-law action for fraud, as the cause for the latter action is defined and embodied in section 1572 of the Civil Code. But, to state a common-law action for fraud and deceit, there must be more in the complaint than the bare statement that the defendants made certain false and fraudulent representations upon which, believing the same, the plaintiff entered into the transaction from which he thus asks to be relieved or as to which he seeks any appropriate legal or equitable relief. It must also be charged, not only that the defendant knew that the alleged false representations were false and untrue at the time that they were made, but that they were made with the intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff. This rule in such cases is so well and throughly settled that it is axiomatic in the law. Indeed, the rule must necessarily be so for it is not inconceivable—in fact, it has often been found to be true—that one may honestly and in good faith and with no intent to deceive or commit thereby a fraud upon another, make statements or representations in regard to a certain matter which are subsequently discovered to be untrue.

It would seem hardly to be necessary to cite authorities expounding a rule so well settled and understood, but we will nevertheless refer to a few cases directly in point.

In Hodgkins v. Dunham, 10 Cal. App. 690, 103 Pac. 351, the rule is thus stated, using the language of the syllabus:

> "The essence of a cause of action for deceit consists in the fact that the false representations were made with intent to deceive, such intent being a necessary element to constitute actual fraud."

And the complaint "must also allege that the representations were made with a fraudulent intent and for the purpose of inducing the other party to act on them." R. C. L. 167.

In Heller v. Dyerville Mfg. Co., 116 Cal. 127, 47 Pac. 1016, it is said:

> "It will be presumed, in the absence of an averment to the contrary, that the representation was without deceit, and with a belief in its truth."

See, also, Carlson v. Farm Land Co., 32 Cal. App. 538, 164 Pac. 344, 348; Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 23, 26, 18 Pac. 791; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 528, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 166 Pac. 808; Ayers v. S. P. R. Co., 173 Cal. 74, 159 Pac. 144, L. R. A. 1917F, 949; 20 Cyc. 100.

In Nash v. Rosesteel, 7 Cal. App. 504, 509, 94 Pac. 850, the action was for damages following from alleged false and fraudulent representations made by the defendant to the plaintiff, whereby the latter was induced to buy certain corporate stock. The court there said:

> "Appellant insists that this action is brought under the provisions of section 1572 of the Civil Code, which defines actual fraud to consist in: (1) The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true;' (2) 'the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract.' Admitting that the representations set forth in the complaint were false, it is not alleged that defendant did not believe them to be true; nor is there any allegation therein negativing the fact that, if untrue, defendant's information did not warrant him in making the representations. Upon the trial defendant objected to the reception of any evidence upon the ground that there were no actionable issues. We think that the objection should have been sustained."

See, also, Gratz v. Schuler, 25 Cal. App. 117, 142 Pac. 899; Kilpatrick v. Miller, 55 Colo. 419, 135 Pac. 780; Robertson v. Frey, 72 Or. 599, 144 Pac. 128; McNulty v. Durham, 63 Colo. 354, 167 Pac. 773.

Thus, beyond peradventure, it is established that the complaint signally falls far short of stating a common-law case of fraud and deceit as the same is adopted into and defined by section 1572 of our Civil Code. Indeed, the record here discloses that the learned counsel for the plaintiff, during the progress of the trial, repeatedly stated, upon offering certain testimony, to which objection by opposing counsel was made, that the complaint was founded upon section 316 of the Civil Code, and that the basis of the plaintiff's action was the liability fixed and arising out of said section, and, on one occasion, in the course of the trial, stated to the court that he desired and intended to ask leave to amend the complaint so that it would also state a cause of action against the defendant under section 1572 of the Code. But it appears that no such amendment was thereafter or at any time presented or proposed by counsel and the complaint remained in the form of its original draft. In this connection, and parenthetically, it is only fair to the attorney who conducted the trial in behalf of the plaintiff to say that it appears from the record that he did not himself prepare the complaint and was not present in court when the pleadings were settled.

[3] The case, then, stands before us as one which rests entirely on the liability fixed by section 316 of the Civil Code, from which proposition it of necessity follows that any evidence tending to establish in this case any other liability, or, concretely, a case of fraud and deceit under section 1572 of the Civil Code, would be wholly irrelevant to the issue made by the pleadings, and the rulings of the court excluding such evidence was eminently proper. In other words, the complaint is wholly insufficient to warrant proof of oral representations as to the transactions of the corporation of which the defendants were officers bearing with more or less directness upon the subject-matter of this action—that is to say (to be more explicit), representations of that character which in and of themselves, independently of those referred to in section 316, would constitute a sufficient foundation for a cause of action against the defendants.

Thus we are brought to the consideration of the assignments of error based upon the several rulings disallowing certain testimony and the order granting the nonsuit.

[4] Assignments of error Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 35 all involve attacks upon the rulings of the court disallowing testimony of oral representations which it is claimed were made by one of the representatives (Latta) and the defendants Brackett and Covert; the last two, as seen, not having been served with summons and made no appearance. Necessarily, if our construction of the complaint be correct—that is to say, if the cause of action stated in the complaint is, as we hold it to be, founded wholly upon section 316 of the Civil Code or the liability therein established in cases to which said section relates—it follows that any testimony which was offered or might have been offered in proof of oral representations made by the respondents or any of the defendants is and would be entirely incompetent as in proof of the allegations of the complaint. This being so, the result is that the rulings now referred to were eminently proper. Moreover, any oral representations or statements which might have been made by any one of the officers named in the complaint to the plaintiff relative to the affairs of the corporation would not be binding upon the others, unless it were first shown that all the parties, including the nonanswering defendants, Brackett and Covert, had corruptly conspired together and so entered into a mutual understanding that the alleged false representations should by all or any of them be made to the plaintiff with the view of inducing him to buy stock in the corporation, in which case, it may be added, it would also be necessary to show as a prerequisite to the proper introduction of such testimony, that such misrepresentations were made before the accomplishment of the object of the conspiracy or understanding and in furtherance thereof. Some of the testimony which was offered and received of oral representations, but subsequently stricken from the record, appears to have related to conversations the plaintiff had with Brackett and other officers of the corporation after the plaintiff had purchased the stock, and even if we may assume that it was within the issues to show oral misrepresentations by Brackett and Covert or the respondents, it is obviously true that any statements or representations made by any one of them in the absence of the other confederates (assuming that there was a confederation) after the stock had been purchased by the plaintiff would not be competent as proof against the other conspirators. The rules thus stated are elementary and require the citation of no authorities to confirm the statement hereof. But, as at first declared, there is no issue made by the pleadings as to oral representations or misrepresentations, and such testimony was not, under such circumstances, in any view competent.

The remaining assignments involve exceptions to the rulings disallowing certain testimony offered upon the theory that it tended to establish a case under section 316 of the Civil Code, upon which, as seen, the complaint is based. There are so many of these assignments that it would be impossible, without extending this opinion to an unreasonable length, to give to each of them herein special consideration. In fact, it is not necessary to do so, since all of said assignments involve questions of the same general character and what may be said of one will apply to all. Hence, a general consideration of the points thus urged is all that will be required for the purposes of this opinion.

A preliminary general outline of the situation as it arose at the trial with reference to the evidential features thereof will tend to clarify the discussion to follow.

It will be kept in mind that, as before stated, the defendants Brackett and Covert were not served with summons and made no appearance, and that Smith and Renwick, although filing answers, did not appear at the trial.

[5] The plaintiff introduced in evidence certain papers as documents purporting to be statements showing the capitalization, estimated earnings, gross and net, the holdings, mortgage bonds sold, names of officers, correspondents, and references of the corporation. Prior to the introduction of these papers or documents, the attorney for the plaintiff was attempting to show that many of the important representations implied from the papers or "records" of the corporation referred to therein were in fact not true, and that the corporation was in a state of bankruptcy at the time he purchased the stock of the corporation, and that his investment was, consequently, a financial failure. Objections were interposed by counsel representing the several respondents to that line of inquiry upon the ground that no proper foundation had been laid for such proof. The court sustained the objection, saying that the alleged report or notice or certificate concerning the corporation or its business would first have to be shown, followed by a showing that it was made by an officer of the corporation to the plaintiff and that it was false, before proof of the damage resulting to the plaintiff by reason of the transaction would be permitted. It was then that the papers or documents above referred to were offered and received in evidence.

[6] The order of proof suggested by the trial judge was the natural or logical one, and that it was within the discretion of the trial court to control the order of proof, is a proposiion too well settled to be for a moment questioned; and such discretion cannot be interfered with by the reviewing courts unless it is plainly made to appear that it has been abused to the substantial detriment of the party complaining. Gordon v. Searing, 8 Cal. 50; Hawkins v. Kingston, 1 Cal. Unrep. 413; Baird v. Duane, 1 Cal. Unrep. 492; Barkly v. Copeland, 74 Cal. 1, 15 Pac. 307, 5 Am. St. Rep. 413; First Nat. Bank v. Wolff, 79 Cal. 69, 21 Pac. 551, 748.

Typical of the rulings generally under the present head to which the appellant here objects is one which may thus be explained: By the witness Beard, who once held the position of superintendent of construction of the corporation, and called as a witness by the plaintiff, it was sought to show that the corporation, because of having no financial means with which to do so, failed to pay for certain work of construction of the roadbed of the corporation's railroad; that the fact of its failure to pay for said construction and of its financial embarrassment generally existed at the time the plaintiff was induced to purchase the stock of the corporation or to exchange certain of his real property for said stock.

Nothing more need be said than is above declared relative to the testimony thus attempted to be brought into the record.

While the proof offered of the inability of the corporation to meet its financial obligations might have tended to support the proposition that, at the time the plaintiff was given the documents in question, it was practically a bankrupt and as a consequence its stock and bonds of little, if any, value, there was not at this stage of the case, nor as we shall later see, at any stage of the case, any proof that the alleged printed reports of the corporation's financial condition and future prospects, upon the faith of which the plaintiff claims to have taken the stock and bonds of the corporation, were issued or authorized to be issued or given out by respondents or any one or more of them, particularly to the plaintiff, and, as already pointed out, it was within the discretion of the trial court to exclude all such testimony as the witness Beard was called upon to give until it was first shown that the respondents or some one or more of them had issued and given to plaintiff or had authorized the issuance or giving out generally of said reports, etc. It must be borne in mind that the action is not against the corporation but against its officers individually, although, of course, by virtue of their official connection with the company.

The foregoing observations are, of course, equally applicable to other rulings disallowing testimony tending to disclose the loss or damage sustained by the plaintiff from his unfortunate investment in the stock of the company. Indeed, what we here say answers all the objections which were made at the trial and are urged here to the action of the court refusing any testimony to be given relative to the transaction whereby plaintiff became the owner of stock of the corporation, all such testimony having been offered in the absence of proof that the respondents had anything to do with the issuance or publication, or the giving to plaintiff, the papers or records or reports purporting to represent the financial condition or the assets and liabilities and the probable prospects of the corporation for a prosperous and profitable business after the completion of the construction and equipment of its railroad.

Some of the other specifications of error involving the court's rulings will be disposed of in considering the order granting a nonsuit, to which proposition attention will now be directed.

The plaintiff was, after considerable discussion between court and counsel, permitted to testify about certain conversations he had with certain of the defendants relative to the business or the affairs of the corporation upon the express condition that such testimony would be stricken out if it did not connect with or tend to sustain the charge that some one or more of the answering defendants "willfully" gave or made, particularly to plaintiff, the alleged false printed official report or records concerning the corporation and its business. Accordingly, he was allowed to testify that early in January, 1912, having previously advertised that he had some country real property which he would exchange for city property, accompanied a Mr. Bennett to the office of the corporation in question and there made inquiry as to the financial status of the corporation and its business, with a view of exchanging his said property for the stock or bonds or both of said corporation. On that occasion the only officers of the corporation he met and talked with were Brackett and Smith. The former was then vice president and general manager of the company. Immediately negotiations were started between the plaintiff and Brackett for the exchange of the former's property for stock of the corporation. Brackett displayed before the plaintiff the documents or papers purporting to contain a statement or report of the affairs of the corporation, its assets, and probable prospects as a business enterprise. These documents or reports were on several loose pieces of paper, and they were attached together, by order of Brackett, by the secretary of the company, Smith (also, as seen, one of the defendants not answering or otherwise making an appearance in the action). The plaintiff testified that Brackett stated to him that the statements contained in the papers were true, and thereupon he (plaintiff) deposited all the papers in his pocket and later "looked and read them over carefully," and then called at the office of the defendant, Dr. Latta, in the city of Stockton, and exhibiting to the doctor the printed papers received from Brackett, asked him if they represented the truth concerning the affairs of the company at that time; that the doctor replied that they did; that $600,000 of the bonds of the company had been sold in France; that the company had obtained it rights of way; that the grading was done, etc. The plaintiff testified to other conversations with Latta, McCormick, and Renwick; the last named being treasurer of the company. These conversations were held with each of the parties named on different occasions and when no one was present but the plaintiff and the particular director of those last named so conversed with. Whether all these conversations occurred before or after the stock was taken by the plaintiff, it is difficult to determine from the record. It is plain enough, however, that some of them took place after the transfer of the stock to plaintiff was effected, particularly the conversation in which Latta declared to plaintiff that the failure of the enterprise was due entirely to the bad management or the insinuated malversation of Brackett as manager of the company. At any rate, the substance of the plaintiff's testimony as to these several conversations was that in the course thereof the directors named stated that the financial condition of the company was such as it was represented to be by the papers the plaintiff received from Brackett.

Plaintiff was further permitted to testify that, several days after his first interview with Brackett and after he had been given the alleged printed reports, etc., of the affairs of the company, Brackett and Smith called at his ranch and there attempted to persuade him to take the stock and bonds in exchange for the real property which he desired to dispose of in exchange for city property, and that subsequently, and after the above-mentioned conversations with Latta and other directors, he completed the transaction by taking stock and bonds of the company, giving in consideration therefor said real property.

Other testimony showing that the road was never completed, tending to show that $600,000 worth of the bonds of the company were not sold and that other statements contained in the circulars were not true, was admitted upon the condition that it would stand in the event only that it was "connected up," as above suggested.

Thus we have presented in rather a summary manner the testimony received, and we may add that that portion of the testimony to which we have not made special or particular reference herein is of the same general nature as that of which an outline is above given.

On the close of plaintiff's case, the court granted the motion of the defendants to strike all said testimony from the record on the ground that it related solely to conversations with individual defendants occurring severally and in the absence of the other defendants, and on the further ground that, in the main, its effect was merely to establish oral representations by the defendants between whom and the plaintiff the conversations to which it related occurred, and had no tendency to establish the charge laid in the complaint and based upon section 316 of the Civil Code. The granting of said motion was followed by a motion for a nonsuit, which, as seen, was also granted.

It is obviously true that if the order granting the motion eliminating from the record all the testimony of which we have above presented a brief conspectus was well grounded, it follows that the order allowing the nonsuit was proper, since there was left in the record, after the motion striking out was granted, no testimony whatever to support the averments of the complaint.

[7] It will be observed from the statement herein of the testimony that there is not a line or word of the evidence tending in the slightest degree to connect the answering defendants with the issuance or giving out of the circulars or papers referred to in the complaint. It is true that their names, with those of the other officers of the company, are printed in one of the printed documents given to the plaintiff by Brackett. If the action was one against the corporation or if the names of these respondents were subscribed to said documents in their own proper signatures, we can now think of no sound reason why, as to that particular document, it could not justly be held that thus there was made out a prima facie showing, sufficient at least to put them upon their defense, that they authorized the issuance and publication of the paper or report, assuming, of course, that proof of the falsity of the statements it contained were also made. But, for all that appears to the contrary from the document itself or any of the other testimony which was conditionally received, Brackett himself might alone have been responsible for the preparation, the printing, and the publication of the document. These respondents and not the corporation are, as before stated and as is obvious from the nature of the action, proceeded against as individuals, against whom it is sought by this action to secure an individual judgment, which, as the statute declares, may be either joint or several, and to establish a case against them under section 316, it is requisite that by competent testimony they should be shown actually to have been parties to the issuance and publication of the documents in question, and, to that end, that they actually subscribed their names to the document in which their printed names as officers of the corporation appear. There was no such testimony offered.

[8] The plaintiff stated that the only officers of the company that had anything to do with bringing to his attention the circulars were Brackett and Smith. Of course, as we have before shown, the other defendants could not be bound by what Brackett and Smith did, unless it were shown that their acts—that is, the issuance of the circulars and the presentation of those documents to plaintiff by them—were the result of a preconcerted arrangement and design by and between Brackett, Smith, and the other defendants to cause the issuance of said circulars, etc. There was no testimony tending to show any such confederation between Brackett, Smith, and the other defendants.

The testimony of conversations between the plaintiff and the defendant Latta does not show that the latter had anything to do with the issuance or publication of the circulars. It merely shows that the plaintiff himself first called Latta's attention to the circulars, the former, as seen, having the same in his possession on the several occasions he conversed with Latta. There being no showing that the defendants were in a prearranged league with each other to issue and publish the documents in question, the representations or statements or acts of Latta could in no event bind the other defendants; but the very most that can be said of the statements of Latta in said conversations is that they involved, if anything at all, oral representations of the business affairs and financial condition of the corporation, and, as we hold herein, such representations are wholly foreign to the issues made by the pleadings, and therefore testimony disclosing the statements and representations of Latta concerning the corporation and its financial condition is immaterial and out of place in this record. And what is here said applies with equal pertinency to the testimony given by plaintiff of conversations with Renwick of similar import to that of the conversations with Latta.

It thus appearing that the testimony given by the plaintiff failed to connect any of the answering defendants with the acts of Brackett and Smith in issuing and giving to plaintiff the circulars in question (assuming, but not deciding that said acts are within the ban of section 316 of the Civil Code), and it thus further being shown that said testimony related only to oral representations made by the directors with whom plaintiff had the conversations to which said testimony related, it follows that there was but one course left for the trial court to take on the motion to strike out the testimony, and that was to grant the motion.

It is very probable, if we may rely upon certain statements made by the defendant Latta concerning the defendant Brackett's management of the company's affairs, that the plaintiff was defrauded of his property through the transaction giving rise to this controversy, and, of course, it is a matter greatly to be deprecated that he has not thus far succeeded in having the wrong inflicted upon him, if any, redressed, but his attempt in this action to secure relief was due, not to his attorney, who, it clearly appears, employed every legitimate effort to support the action, but to the want of proof to establish a case under section 316 of the Civil Code upon which his action was founded.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. It should be said, in denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District, that respondents contend in their answer to the application that the District Court of Appeal opinion, in stating that there was evidence that appellant brought to defendant Latta's knowledge or observation any of the circulars or notices, is not sustained by the record, and our examination of the record satisfies us that this contention is well based. Were there such evidence there would be grave doubt of the correctness of the conclusion in so far as defendant Latta is concerned.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

All concur, except OLNEY and SLOANE, JJ.

TURNER v. FROST et al. (Civ. 2092.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 28, 1921.)

1. Judgment ⟾153(1)—Laches barred application to set aside default.

Where the defendant knew his default had been entered ten days before judgment was rendered against him, but thereafter waited until just before the expiration of the 6 months period within which he could move to have it set aside, he was guilty of laches, which was not excused by his claim he was misled by his attorney, where he procured another attorney in time to have made his motion two months before he did.

2. Judgment ⟾138(1)—Facts shown by plaintiff held to require refusal to set aside default against defendant.

The showing by plaintiff in opposition to a motion to set aside a default that the action was based on an agreement by defendant to pay certain sums made by him to procure his discharge from contempt proceedings in a prior action brought against him by plaintiff, as a result of which defendant was enabled to secure release from a cash bail of $1,000, deposited by him, and that, as soon as defendant recovered the deposit of bail, he repudiated his agreement, shows that defendant was not entitled to have the default entered against him set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Sallie C. Turner against Herman Frost and another. From an order refusing to set aside default of the defendant Herman Frost, that defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush and William Sea, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dodge & Barry, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The appellant brings this appeal from an order of the lower court refusing to set aside a default and judgment taken against him after failure to answer. The motion for the order was based upon the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure and was supported by affidavits. The judgment was entered on March 13, 1919, and this motion was noticed on August 26, 1919, and was so noticed to be heard on September 10, 1919, or about three days before the expiration of the statutory limit of six months. The appellant had notice as early as March 4, 1919, that his default had been entered. This was nine days before the entry of the default judgment. About two days before the entry of the default, the attorney for the appellant telegraphed to the judge of the trial court asking for an order granting additional time

---

⟾For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes within which to answer, though he made no showing whatever in support of such request. The request was denied, though a longer period than the ten days sought actually elapsed before the judgment was entered.

[1] Upon the showing thus far, there is no question that the appellant waived, by his laches, all right that he had ever possessed, to move to open the default. He claims, however, that he was misled by his own attorney. But on July 26th he retained another attorney, who, on July 28th, gave notice of his appearance in behalf of the appellant and substitution was on that day made. The appellant still continued inactive for about one month, when at the last moment he gave notice of his intention to move for an order relieving him from the default. But whatever may be said of the showing made by the appellant—and even if it had been uncontradicted it would have been insufficient—it was entirely overcome by the countershowing of the respondent. In fact, the showing is so strong and so clear that the appeal of the appellant must be regarded as frivolous.

[2] On June 17th the respondent levied upon a large quantity of property, sufficient, according to the affidavits, to satisfy the judgment of $8,393. On or about April 18, 1919, the appellant was served with a citation to appear and answer as to his property. Failing to obey this citation proceedings in contempt was taken against him and on June 17th, he applied to this court for his discharge on habeas corpus. His application being denied, he was released on $1,000 cash bail. On or about June 17th the appellant and the respondent entered into a written agreement reciting the entry of said judgment. The agreement further provided that said appellant should pay $750 in cash on the judgment and should liquidate the entire balance thereof before August 16, 1919. At the same time he pledged various collateral securities as security for the agreed payment. The agreement contained a provision that if the appellant should fail to make the payment as agreed, then the respondent could sell the securities and apply the proceeds toward the satisfaction of said judgment. The appellant then and there paid the initial payment of $750. About one week later said appellant and his attorney appeared in the lower court, and stated to the court that the action had been satisfactorily settled, and asked that he be purged of contempt and be permitted to withdraw his $1,000 cash bail. His requests were granted, and appellant departed with the $1,000 bail money in his pocket. He never at any time expressed any dissatisfaction with the agreed settlement until about the 13th or 14th day of August, when he notified the attorney for the respondent that he did not intend to make the balance of the payment. Upon the entry into the agreement, the property that had been levied upon was released. Under this state of facts the appellant gravely asks this court to set aside his default. A mere recital of the facts is itself an answer to his appeal.

The order denying the motion of appellant to open his default is affirmed.

ARNETT v. NALL et al. (Civ. 2231.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 28, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1032(1) — Appellant must show injury from ruling complained of.

Unless the facts themselves are such that injury follows as a necessary result, the aggrieved party must show affirmatively that the obnoxious ruling of the trial court assigned as error has injured him.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1043(6)—Exclusion of plaintiff's deposition not shown prejudicial.

In an action on a promissory note, exclusion of plaintiff's deposition offered at the opening of his case held not prejudicial to plaintiff, where he could have been present but chose not to do so and plaintiff's attorney knew the facts and could have testified thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Lee Arnett against Ira Nall and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Waldo S. Johnson, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. After trial in the court below, findings and judgment against the plaintiff were made and filed. The plaintiff, at the opening of his case, offered to read his own deposition taken in another state. Upon objection that the commission issued upon insufficient notice, that the commissioner did not purport to be acting under the commission, and that the interrogatories that accompanied the commission had not been settled by the court, the court excluded the deposition. This is assigned as error. The plaintiff thereupon moved, without any showing, that the court grant a continuance. This motion was denied. It is claimed that this was an abuse of discretion. The plaintiff then rested his case without introducing any evidence. After judgment the plaintiff moved on affidavit that the court grant him a new trial. The plaintiff himself filed no affidavit on this motion.

The only ground urged in support of the motion was that of surprise at the ruling of the court in excluding the deposition and denying a continuance. The motion for a new trial was denied and plaintiff appeals.

[1] Some of the objections to the deposition appear to be grave, yet it is perhaps unnecessary for the court to determine whether or not they are fatal, since the judgment must be affirmed for other reasons. Conceding that the objections were not well founded and that the deposition should have been admitted, it becomes necessary to inquire whether or not injury was done to the plaintiff. Under the wise constitutional and other provisions that have been injected into our jurisprudence within the last few years, injury is no longer presumed. Unless the facts themselves are such that injury follows as a necessary result, the aggrieved party must show affirmatively that the obnoxious ruling has injured him. In this case there is no attempt at such a showing. The court excluded certain offered evidence. The plaintiff may or may not have been injured thereby. We do not know what this evidence was nor is there any method whereby we can conjecture it. The plaintiff did not care to be present in person at the trial. This we know from the fact that he attempted to send his deposition. The point often arising that a litigant desired to be present to oversee his own case or defense does not arise in this case. The matter stands before us in all respects as though the deponent had no interest in the case. In other words, it is a mere case of alleged error in the exclusion of evidence.

[2] From no point of view can it be insisted that any injury has been affirmatively shown. On the contrary, it seems that the plaintiff suffered no injury. The promissory note was present in court. The attorney for the plaintiff knew of a positive fact that there was a good consideration for the note and that the assignment was made for a valuable consideration and without notice. This is fully shown by his affidavit on motion for a new trial. He could have testified to these matters on the trial of the action. He chose not to do so.

If we may conjecture that the deposition dealt with the same matters, then the deposition would have done no more than corroborate the attorney. It should be noted that the affidavit on motion for a new trial in no place sets out the contents of the deposition, though there is a general recital that the attorney relied upon it to prove the facts stated in the complaint. The defense is fraud and failure of consideration, breach of warranty, and assignment with notice. It is somewhat significant that this plaintiff, in the face of this defense and especially of the assignment to him with notice, should have chosen, though only a few hours' distant from the place of trial, to absent himself from the trial. That he was not ill or necessarily detained is shown by the offer of his counsel to produce him in court at a later date if a continuance was granted. It is clear that no injury is affirmatively shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

51 Cal. App. 92

NELSON v. ANDERSON-COTTONWOOD IRR. DIST. et al. (Civ. 2185.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 17, 1921.)

1. Evidence 🔑83(1) — Mandamus 🔑90 — Mandate requiring irrigation district to construct laterals not granted where no money is available; action of irrigation directors presumed proper.

Where an irrigation district had previously expended moneys raised by bond issue for improvements in the construction of the laterals and there was no money available under St. 1919, p. 472, authorizing assessment, a writ of mandate requiring the district to construct a lateral for the benefit of a landowner cannot be issued, for it will be presumed that directors expended the proceeds of bond issue for the purpose raised and were not able to complete the construction of the lateral out of such proceeds.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑249—Supply for irrigation limited to beneficial use.

While Wright Irrigation Law, § 18, as amended by St. 1897, p. 259, provides that water shall be apportioned to a landowner upon the ratio which the last assessment upon his land bore to the whole sum assessed upon the district, a landowner is not entitled to his proportionate share of water unless he can make a beneficial use thereof, although he may assign his right to a person prepared to make such use.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑249—Supply for irrigation limited to use under regulations.

Where an irrigation district under Wright Irrigation Law, § 15c, added by St. 1917, p. 758, adopted a rule requiring landowners to keep their ditches and facilities for distributing water in good condition so that it could be used without undue loss or waste, a landowner is not entitled to a writ of mandate to compel an irrigation district to furnish him the pro rata share to which he is entitled under section 18, without showing that he is prepared to use the same.

4. Mandamus 🔑14(1)—Before writ can issue, specific demand must be made.

Before writ of mandate should issue, it must appear that a specific demand has been made by the petitioner for that to which he is entitled in order that the one on whom the demand is made may have opportunity to comply.

5. Mandamus ⚷14(2)—Demand that irrigation district furnish water not sufficiently specific.

An application to an irrigation district for water describing the crops as alfalfa, blank acres, orchard, blank acres, etc., rice 1,100 acres, all to be applied to 300 more or less, signed by the landowner, is not a specific and direct demand for any particular number of second feet so as to entitle the landowner to a writ of mandate against irrigation district to compel the furnishing of water.

Original application by L. W. Nelson for a writ of mandate to be directed against the Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District, Walter Brown and others, as directors of such District and individually. Writ denied.

Roscoe J. Anderson, of Redding, and Cornish & Moore, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an original application for writ of mandate wherein the petitioner seeks an order of this court directing such writ to issue, commanding the respondents forthwith to proceed with the construction of, and speedily complete, a certain canal lateral known as No. 3—1—2; and also to deliver to the petitioner, upon lands belonging to him, 11 second feet of water. The petitioner is the owner of land situate in the Anderson-Cottonwood irrigation district, an irrigation district formed for irrigating lands lying along the banks of the Sacramento river, principally in the county of Shasta. The lands belonging to the petitioner comprise about 1050 acres, divided into two tracts, designated as "tract A" and "tract B," tract B being served by a ditch or canal, designated as lateral 3—1. Tract A is not susceptible of irrigation from this lateral; and before said tract can be irrigated with any degree of success, lateral 3—1—2 must be completed. Upon the hearing hereof, the whole matter was referred to the Hon. James W. Bartlett, as sole referee, to take testimony and submit findings. Upon the return of the findings of the referee, it being made to appear to the court that some additional testimony should be taken and findings made thereon, a second reference was ordered. In accordance with the orders of this court, such testimony was taken and findings made and returned, and the matter is now before the court upon the motion of the respondents for judgment upon the findings, and upon the motion of the petitioner to set aside the findings of the referee, and that findings be made by the court upon the testimony.

The testimony taken before the referee covered a wide range of inquiry, including the capacity of the ditches belonging to the district, the character of the soil composing the lands belonging to the petitioner, its adaptability to the growing of different crops, the uses of water, and the quantity supplied during the years 1918 and 1919 and a portion of the year 1920. While the testimony taken and returned by the referce covers a wide range of inquiry, the questions tendered for decision by this court involve only the issue as to whether this court should make any order directing the construction of lateral 3—1—2; the amount of water to which the petitioner is entitled, and whether sufficient grounds have been laid to authorize the issuance of a writ of mandate herein directing that such quantity be furnished to the petitioner. As to these matters we have carefully examined the testimony and the findings of the referee, and are of the opinion that the findings of the referee touching these matters are amply supported by the evidence.

It appears from finding 10 of the referee that the construction of lateral designated as 3—1—2 has always been included as a part of the plan for the construction of laterals within the defendant irrigation district; that funds have twice been provided by bond issues for the construction of necessary irrigation canals, the acquiring of water rights, and the building of reservoirs, but that the funds so provided were exhausted in the construction of the proposed works of the district before reaching said lateral; that the expenses of constructing the works exceeded the estimates, and that the proposed works of the district were not completed according to the plans and specifications by reason of the lack of funds available for such purposes. It also further appears from the findings that during the month of May, 1920, an additional bond issue was authorized by the voters of the district in the sum of $200,000; that the works included in the plans and specifications for which such bond issue has been authorized include lateral 3—1—2. It does not appear that any of these bonds have been issued or sold, or that any money is immediately available for the present construction of said lateral; but it does appear from the finding referred to that the trustees of the defendant district are taking the necessary legal steps for the purpose of obtaining money that can be used in its construction.

[1] By finding 16 it appears that there is no money available, and cannot be made available, for the immediate construction of lateral 3—1—2, under the law authorizing an assessment of 2 per cent. of the aggregate value of the lands within the district, as provided by chapter 291 of the statutes of the state of California enacted in 1919; and that the amount of money in said fund so created does not exceed the aggregate of the duly authorized and issued warrants of said irrigation district. As to when any of the funds of the district can be used for construction purposes, and what steps must be taken to authorize such use, have been discussed by this court in Buschman et al. v. Turlock Irrigation District, 190 Pac. 491, and need not here be repeated. And until these funds are available for the construction of the canals, ditches, and laterals authorized by the voters of the district, it is evident that this court can issue no mandate requiring the immediate undertaking of such work. It will be presumed that the directors of the district will expend the money for the purposes for which it has been raised, and the fact that the directors of the district were not able to complete the construction of the lateral referred to out of the moneys raised as the proceeds of prior bond issues does not authorize the issuance of the writ of mandate. It must be first shown that the money is available before its application can be directed. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities upon this point.

[2] By the petition for writ of mandate herein, it is insisted that the petitioner is entitled to eleven second feet of water. The testimony taken before the referee, and the findings made thereon by him, as amended by the additional testimony and additional findings, show that the district has an inchoate right to 400 second feet of the waters of the Sacramento river for irrigation purposes; that the capacity of the main canal through which water is taken from the Sacramento river, as now constructed, is limited to about 278 second feet of water. It further appears from the testimony and the findings that the last assessment assessed upon the lands of said Anderson-Cottonwood irrigation district amounted to the sum of $1,561,803.22, and that the amount of the assessment upon the lands belonging to the petitioner situate within said district was the sum of $43,500. Under the provisions of section 18 of the Wright Irrigation Law, as amended St. 1897, p. 259, each landowner is entitled to have apportioned to him water upon the ratio which the last assessment upon the land of such owner bears to the whole sum assessed upon the district. At the time the petition was filed herein, the capacity of the canal referred to was limited to 230.94 second feet, which gave the petitioner at that time a right to 6.43 second feet. Upon the same calculation, according to the provisions of said section, the capacity of the canal, as improved during the pendency of these proceedings to carry 278 second feet, would entitle the petitioner herein to 7.738 second feet.

The right of the landowner to any quantity of water, however, under the irrigation laws pertaining to a district, is limited always to its beneficial use. In other words, under section 18, a landowner has a right to the beneficial use of that portion of the water available for use in the district calculated according to the ratio provided by section 18, or, if not prepared to use that water himself, he may assign his right to any one who is so prepared. It does not mean, as we construe the section, that any landowner is entitled to have so much water delivered to him and then permit the same to run to waste. Considerable testimony was introduced touching the fitness of the land belonging to the plaintiff for profitable rice culture. We do not deem it necessary to go into this question further than to state that beneficial use of water upon lands, and the possibility of the landowner making a profit upon the crops raised by means of irrigation upon his lands, are not one and the same thing. In other words, the fact that a landowner may not be able to make a profit off of any particular crop does not limit his right to use his proportionate share of the water of the district, to pay for which he has been assessed in making the effort.

[3] Section 15c of the Wright Irrigation Law added by St. 1917, p. 758, authorized the directors of an irrigation district to adopt rules and regulations governing the distribution of water. In accordance with this section, the directors of the respondent district have adopted a set of rules, and by section 8 of the rules so adopted it is provided, among other things, that landowners must keep their ditches and facilities for conveying and distributing water in good condition, so that the water may be used without undue loss or waste of time; that the land must be leveled and prepared so that water can be distributed without waste.

The evidence shows and finding 21 of the referee, among other things, sets forth the fact that tract A of the land belonging to the petitioner was not in a condition for irrigation; that it had not been leveled or prepared for irrigation purposes; that at the time of the institution of these proceedings, about 40 acres of tract B had been planted to rice by the petitioner's tenants, and about 140 acres more of said lands were partially prepared for the planting of rice; and that all of the lands situate in tract B which were prepared for the planting of rice for the season of 1920 lie under, and are susceptible of irrigation from, lateral 3—1 as already constructed; that the amount of water required to economically irrigate the lands planted to rice in tract B would not exceed one miner's inch per acre for each acre of land so planted; that the respondents were ready, able, and willing to supply petitioner such an amount of water for irrigation of lands in tract B as could be distributed without waste as provided by rule 8 regulating the distribution of water in said district.

There is no finding as to the exact quantity of water delivered by the district to the petitioner, nor can it be satisfactorily ascertained from the testimony just exactly what quantity of water was delivered; but it does appear that considerably less than 6.43 second feet of water were being delivered at the time of the institution of this action, and it would also seem that less than 7.738 second feet were being delivered at any time during the course of these proceedings. This, however, does not alter the situation by reason of the findings to which we have referred, which appear to be supported by the testimony that the respondents were able and willing to deliver at all times the quantity of water of which the petitioner and his tenants were prepared to make beneficial use.

Assuming that the petitioner, by reason of the capacity of the ditches already constructed belonging to the district, and the proportion which the last assessment upon his lands bears to the whole amount of the last assessment levied upon the district, is entitled to 7.738 second feet of water when prepared to use the same, or if prepared to use the same, it does not follow that the writ should issue herein by reason of another matter now to be considered.

[4, 5] The law seems to be well settled that before a writ of mandate should issue, it must appear that a specific demand has been made by the petitioner to that to which he is entitled, in order that the one upon whom the demand is made may have opportunity to comply. The only demand made by the petitioner herein, so far as disclosed by the testimony and the findings, is as follows:

> "Anderson Cottonwood Irrigation District. Application for water. Season of 1920. Crops as follows: Alfalfa, blank acres; orchard, blank acres; corn, blank acres; beans, blank acres; garden, blank acres; rice, 1,100 acres. All to be applied to 300 more or less. Remarks: Section 3, township 30, N. R. 4 W., and Sec. 34, T. 31 N. R. 4 W. Plains East of Sac. River. L. W. Nelson."

This application is in no sense of the word a specific and direct demand for any particular number of second feet of water, nor does it constitute any showing on the part of petitioner that he is ready and able to make a beneficial use of any particular quantity.

In Price v. Riverside Land & Irrigation Co., 56 Cal. 431, the court had before it this identical question, and it there held:

> "It is, however, an imperative rule, that before making an application for a writ of mandamus, an express demand or request must be made on the defendant to perform the act sought to be enforced by the writ; and the demand should be definite and specific."

In that case it was held that the petitioner had not demanded any specific quantity of water before filing his application for a writ of mandate. Hence, admitting that the petitioner, under the conditions as they now exist in the Anderson-Cottonwood irrigation district, would be entitled, if prepared to make beneficial use thereof, to 7.738 second feet of water before a writ of mandate could properly issue from this court, it must be first made to appear that the petitioner is prepared to use the same, that demand has been made therefor, that the water is available, and that compliance with such demand or request has been refused. We do not find anything in the testimony showing this state of facts, nor are there any findings by the referee establishing the same.

It necessarily follows that whether all of the findings of the referee are or are not supported by the testimony, the petitioner is not entitled to the issuance of a writ of mandate herein.

It is therefore ordered that the petition for a writ of mandate herein be, and the same is hereby, denied, and that the respondents have and recover their costs incurred in this proceeding.

WRENNE v. HUCHTING. (Civ. 3746.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 29, 1921.)

Venue ⚿61—Motion to change filed one day late, but before default, should be granted.

That the motion for change of venue was filed one day after the last day for defendant to appear, but before any default had been entered, does not authorize denial of the motion, since the failure of plaintiff to have defendant's default entered was in effect a grant of extension of time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Camille Wrenne against A. H. Huchting. From an order denying defendant's motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Benjamin W. Shipman and Henry O. Wackerbarth, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant appeals from an order denying his motion to change the place of trial of the action from Los Angeles to San Diego county. Respondent has made no appearance in this court.

Defendant served on plaintiff, and, at the time he appeared and filed his demurrer, filed a sufficient affidavit of merits, a proper demand for change of place of trial and a notice of motion for change of venue. In due time he brought the motion on for hearing and it was denied. On the moving papers the defendant was clearly entitled to have the trial of the action changed from the county of Los Angeles, wherein it was brought, to the county of San Diego, in which he resided. No counter affidavits were filed and no showing was made in opposition to the motion. The record is silent as to the ground upon which the motion was denied. If, as suggested by the appellant in his brief, it was because the demurrer and the moving papers on motion for change of place of trial were filed one day after the expiration of the time limited for the defendant to appear, there was no justification for the court's action, and we are at a loss to understand its ruling in face of the well-considered decisions of the courts of this state.

It appears that the defendant was served with a summons and a copy of the complaint in San Diego county. Consequently, he had 30 days in which to appear in the action. He served and filed his demurrer and the moving papers on the motion for change of place of trial on the thirty-first day. His default for failing to appear had not been entered and the plaintiff had not made any move to have such steps taken. By such conduct the plaintiff, in effect, granted additional time in which the defendant might appear, and he was not strictly in default when he filed the moving papers. Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 528, 137 Pac. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Bank of Haywards v. Kenyon, 32 Cal. App. 635, 636, 163 Pac. 869. It was an abuse of discretion, therefore, on the part of the trial court, to deny the motion for a change of place of trial upon the ground that the moving papers were served and filed too late. As no other reason appears, the order must be reversed.

This court has had cause to complain during the calling of the present calendar, at the action of certain respondents in failing to file their reply briefs. In the instant case, however, we can well understand why the respondent did not have the temerity to attempt to defend the erroneous order of the lower court. The defendant should not have been forced to resort to an appeal to secure his rights in the matter. He has been put to unnecessary expense, trouble, and delay, the labors of the appellate court have been increased, and its calendar burdened with a case to the exclusion of others which present meritorious controversies for consideration. We cannot but view with disfavor the apparent equanimity with which the respondent has sat idly by in enjoyment of an order to which she was not entitled.

The order denying defendant's motion for change of place of trial is reversed.

DAVEY v. GRIGSBY et al. (Civ. 3610.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑179(4)—Evidence held not to show acquisition of prescriptive right to divert waters.

In action to enjoin interference with a dam and ditch for diverting water, evidence held not to establish prescriptive right of plaintiff's predecessor to divert the water by such dam and ditch.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑164 — Prescriptive right to divert water must rest upon notorious claim.

In order to establish a prescriptive right to divert creek waters by a dam and ditch, appropriation of the water by such means must be shown to have been open and notorious, and asserted adversely, with the knowledge of the owners of the servient tenement, for the necessary period of time.

3. Evidence 🔑231(2)—Admission against interest of former owner held admissible.

In action to enjoin interference with a dam and ditch for diverting water, plaintiff claiming under a prescriptive right to such diversion acquired by his predecessor, evidence that defendants, purchasers of the land lower down the stream, inquired of such predecessor before purchasing, and that he disclaimed any right to such diversion, was not inadmissible as a mere admission against interest of a former owner of the tract benefited by the use of the waters.

4. Evidence 🔑219(1)—Judgment roll in former action between parties held admissible to show plaintiff made no similar claim.

In action to enjoin interference with a dam and ditch for diverting water, judgment roll in a former case bteween the same parties, in relation to claims as to the waters in suit, held admissible, although not concerning the land involved in the instant suit, as it showed plaintiff made no claim of any such right to the waters as asserted by him in the instant suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by H. C. Davey against Burt Grigsby and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, and Herbert V. Keeling and C. M. Crawford, both of Lakeport, for appellant.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the defendants' favor upon their answer and cross-complaint in an action brought by the plaintiff to enjoin the defendants from demolishing or otherwise interfering with a certain dam and ditches, which the plaintiff claimed the right to maintain as a means for the diversion of the waters of a stream for use upon his own land. The defendants in their answer denied the plaintiff's alleged right to maintain said dam and ditches, and to the use of any waters diverted thereby from the stream in question, and in their cross-complaint asserted the sole right in themselves to the ownership and use of said waters, and the plaintiff's threatened or attempted interference with said rights through the diversion thereof by means of said dam and ditches they sought to have the court enjoin.

The stream in question was a small perennial rivulet, known as Houten creek, situated near Cobb, in Lake county. It had its source on land which prior to the year 1913 was owned by the Farmers' Savings Bank of Lakeport, which conveyed the same in that year to H. C. Davey, the plaintiff, and to W. R. Prather and H. L. Boggs. In the year 1915 said Davey, Prather, and Boggs sold the southerly 20 acres of this tract to Mrs. Grigsby, one of the defendants herein, and a Mrs. Fields, who later partitioned it between themselves; Mrs. Fields receiving the southerly half thereof, which later she conveyed to W. C. Crittenden, another of the defendants herein. On the southerly side of the tract formerly owned by the Farmers' Savings Bank lay a fractional quarter section of land, which had for many years been owned and occupied by a family named Smith. In the year 1893 J. A. Smith, one of the members of said family, had gone upon the lands of the Farmers' Savings Bank, and at a point on Houten creek thereon, somewhat to the northerly of the lands later transferred to the defendants Grigsby and Crittenden, had built a small dam of rocks and dirt, and constructed therefrom a ditch across said tract to his own land, through which, during the summer months, he diverted the waters of said Houten creek for use in the irrigation of a small portion of his said land lying adjacent to the bank tract. The dam thus constructed was temporary in character, and was washed out by the winter freshets, and was replaced from time to time as Smith desired during the summer months to use the waters of said creek for the irrigation of said small piece of land.

In 1913, when Davey and his associates acquired the said tract of land from the Farmers' Savings Bank, it was found by a survey thereof that Smith's northerly fence line was about 100 feet northward from his true line upon the lands so purchased by Davey and his associates. Smith's attention was called to this fact, and he thereupon moved his fence said distance to the southward, which had the result of placing practically all of the land which he had been wont to irrigate from the use of said dam and ditch within the boundary lines of the lands now owned by Davey, Prather, and Boggs. Thereupon Smith ceased further to use any of said waters for purposes of irrigation upon his remaining land, and also ceased to rebuild and maintain said dam and ditch. When in the year 1915 Mrs. Grigsby and Mrs. Fields were about to purchase the southerly 20 acres of the land then owned by Davey, Prather, and Boggs, Mrs. Grigsby made certain inquiries from the member of the Smith family who at that time was the owner of the Smith tract as to whether he had or claimed any right to the diversion and use of the waters of Houten creek, which throughout almost its entire course lay upon the lands about to be purchased by Mrs. Grigsby and Mrs. Fields. Smith, in response to this inquiry, disclaimed any right to the use of said waters. Upon one or two occasions thereafter he did, however, use the same; but the evidence sufficiently shows that, when he did so, it was upon permission so to do received from the Grigsbys. In the year 1918 the plaintiff herein acquired the Smith tract of land, and shortly thereafter undertook to re-establish and maintain the dam upon Houten creek and the ditch leading therefrom across the property of the defendants Grigsby and Crittenden to the lands he had recently acquired from the Smiths. The said defendants refused to permit this use, and destroyed the ditch upon their premises, whereupon the plaintiff instituted this action to enjoin them from so doing, with the result above set forth.

[1-3] It will be seen from the foregoing statement of facts that the appellant herein rests his claim of right to the use of the waters of Houten creek through said dam and ditch solely upon prescription. In order to maintain this claim he must have been able to establish by his proof at the trial of this action that his predecessor in interest, Smith, had acquired such right by prescription prior to the transfer by Smith to the plaintiff of the tract of land upon which he claims the right to use said waters. The trial court concluded from the evidence educed in the case that such prescriptive right in said Smith had not been established. From a careful review of the evidence in the case we are satisfied that the trial court was correct in this conclusion. The lands lying along and in the vicinity of Houten creek are wooded and brushy. The point where said dam was located was in the small canyon occupied by said creek, and the ditch therefrom ran along the side of a brushy hill; neither said dam nor said ditch being visible from the roadway crossing the tract on which said ditch and dam were located. There was not a particle of evidence in the case going to show that the original owner of said tract, the Farmers' Savings Bank, ever knew that Smith had constructed said dam or ditch across its land. Both dam and ditch were in fact small and temporary in character; the former existing only during the summer months, and the latter only being used during that period of the year.

In order to have established a prescriptive right in Smith to the continued use of the waters of Houten creek through said dam and ditch, it was essential for the plaintiff, as his successor in interest, to show that the latter's appropriation of the waters of Houten creek through said dam and ditch was open and notorious, and was asserted adversely, and with the knowledge of the owners of the servient tenement, for the period of time necessary to give rise to a prescriptive right. Paige v. Rocky Ford Canal & Irr. Co., 83 Cal. 84, 21 Pac. 1102, 23 Pac. 875; Alta L. & W. Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219; Fogarty v. Fogarty, 129 Cal. 46, 61 Pac. 570; Bree v. Wheeler, 129 Cal. 145, 61 Pac. 782; Churchill v. Louie, 135 Cal. 608, 67 Pac. 1052; Strong v. Baldwin, 137 Cal. 432, 70 Pac. 288. It is very doubtful whether the evidence in the case upon this subject, considered entirely apart from the admissions of Smith himself, would have sufficed to sustain the plaintiff's claim as to Smith's acquisition of a prescriptive right to the use of the waters of Houten creek. The defendants, however, on their own behalf, presented the evidence of Mrs. Grigsby, who testified that, prior to the purchase by herself and Mrs. Fields of the tract of land which they came to own, she had held a conversation with Smith, during which he had asserted that while the Smith family had theretofore used the water of Houten creek, he did not know that they had any right so to do, and who further testified that subsequent to the purchase of said land by herself and Mrs. Fields they had taken possession of said ditch, and had used it to bring the waters down to the place where their house was located, and that subsequently, when Smith desired to use said waters, he had requested and obtained their permission so to do.

To the introduction of this evidence the plaintiff objected. Upon this appeal, however, he does not venture to contend that said evidence was not admissible, but insists that as a mere admission against interest of a former owner of the tract benefited by the use of said waters said evidence is of insufficient weight and force to have justified the trial court in finding against the prescriptive right of Smith to the use of said waters, which, he claims, had fully ripened prior to the making of said admission. We are of the opinion, however, that the evidence was not only admissible, but that it shed a strong light upon the extent and quality of Smith's prior use of the waters in question, and, taken with the other evidence to which we have referred, was amply sufficient, we think, to show that the maintenance and use by Smith of said dam and ditch were never of that open, continuous, notorious, and adverse character essential to the establishment of a prescriptive right thereto.

[4] The only other contention of the appellant requiring notice is his contention that the court erred in the admission in evidence of a judgment roll in a case entitled "H. C. Davey et al. v. Isidore F. Grigsby et al.," which had been tried and determined in the superior court of Lake county prior to the institution of the present action. That was an action instituted by Davey, Prather, and Boggs against the Grigsbys, who are defendants herein, and also against Mrs. Fields, the predecessor of their codefendant Crittenden, wherein said plaintiffs asserted that they were the owners of all of the waters of Houten creek by virtue of their ownership of the tract of land lying next northerly to the lands which they had sold to Mrs. Grigsby and Mrs. Fields, and wherein they demanded a reformation of the conveyance which they had made to Mrs. Grigsby and Mrs. Fields, so as to have inserted therein a reservation in their favor of the whole of the waters of said creek. While it is true that the Smith tract of land or any right appurtenant thereto was not directly concerned in that litigation, still the whole question as to the respective rights and claims of the parties in and to all of the waters of Houten creek was presented or presentable by the issues tendered in that action, and this being so, we are of the opinion that the judgment roll in that case was properly admissible in evidence as tending to show that at the time of the institution and trial of that action the plaintiff herein made no claim nor proof of any such right in and to the waters of Houten creek as that which he is now attempting to assert in the instant case. We find no error, therefore, in the introduction of said judgment roll in evidence.

No other errors being urged by the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

GOOD v. BROWN et ux. (Civ. 2125.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 28, 1921.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⚷291—First mortgage held merged in title secured on foreclosure of second mortgage.

Where plaintiff held a first and a second mortgage on live stock, and foreclosed the second, obtaining title to the stock, the lien of the first was merged in the higher title, and ceased to exist.

2. Homestead ⚷115(3)—On foreclosure of mortgage defendants held to have received full credit from other security.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage on a homestead, the defendant's husband and wife may not complain where they received full credit upon the lien against the homestead for the entire sum properly represented by the lien of a first chattel mortgage given by the husband alone on live stock, both defendants having subsequently given the homestead mortgage as security for the payment of the note secured also by such chattel mortgage.

3. Witnesses ⚷276—Cross-examination of a defendant held not too broad.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, permitting a litigant to call his adversary and subject him to cross-examination as to any relevant matter without waiting for a foundation to be laid by previous direct examination, examination of one of defendants in proceedings for foreclosure mortgage against homestead held not erroneous as being too broad a cross-examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by R. E. L. Good against George E. Brown and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest Klette, of Fresno, for appellants.
Kitt Gould, of Clovis, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action to foreclose a mortgage on a homestead. The plaintiff had judgment in the court below, and the defendants appeal on the ground that other property should have been exhausted before resorting to the homestead. The defendants are husband and wife. This is the second appeal in this case. See 40 Cal. App. 753, 181 Pac. 802. On the former appeal it was distinctly held, in conformity with the general equity principle in marshaling assets, that the wife could require the plaintiff to exhaust other securities before resorting to the homestead. After remittitur a second trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, but in this new judgment the court credited the defendants with the value of the outside securities. The events material to the disposition of this appeal took place in the following order:

(a) On June 12, 1912, the husband alone executed his promissory note, in the sum of $1,000 and interest, payable to the plaintiff, and at the same time, as security for its payment, executed a chattel mortgage on certain live stock;

(b) On October 8, 1912, the real property was properly dedicated as a homestead;

(c) On February 27, 1914, for a valuable consideration, both husband and wife joined in the execution to the plaintiff of the mortgage in suit. This mortgage conveys the homestead premises as security for the payment of the aforesaid $1,000 note of June 12, 1912. It makes no reference to the chattel mortgage;

(d) On March 14, 1915, the husband alone executed an additional promissory note in the sum of $750, payable to the plaintiff, and at the same time and as security for its payment gave the plaintiff a second chattel mortgage on the live stock;

(e) On December 2, 1916, the plaintiff obtained a decree against the husband alone, foreclosing the second chattel mortgage and making no reference in the action to the first chattel mortgage;

(f) On March 8, 1916, this action was commenced, and the former appeal was determined on April 22, 1919;

(g) On March 21, 1917, the live stock were sold by the sheriff to the plaintiff on said foreclosure for the sum of $455.

This sum is conceded to have represented the fair market value of the property at that time.

[1] The first chattel mortgage was never foreclosed. When the title to the live stock vested in the plaintiff in virtue of the sale to him by the sheriff, thus vesting in him both the lien of the first mortgage and the title to the live stock, the lien was merged in the higher title and ceased to exist. It is nevertheless quite true that equity could regard the lien as still subsisting so far as might be found necessary in order to protect the rights of the wife. The court, in protection of the rights of the homestead claimants, conceded to them a credit of $455 and interest to be applied as a credit on the mortgage debt against the homestead. It may be remarked that the husband testified that the title to the live stock vested in the plaintiff by virtue of an agreement between himself and the plaintiff whereby the title was transferred to the plaintiff for the sum of $455.

It is perhaps unnecessary to determine just how it vested, since it is conceded that it did in fact vest, and that the sum of $455 represents a fair appraisal of the market value of the property.

[2] The important fact, and upon this appeal the conclusive fact, is that the appellants received full credit upon the lien against the homestead for the entire sum properly representing the lien of the first chattel mortgage. This is all they had any right to ask, and this they received in full measure. The appellants insist that the plaintiff should go through the form of some sort of an anomalous foreclosure against himself, but if such a foreclosure were a possibility it could result in no more than that appellants would receive credit for the value of the chattels, and that, as above pointed out, they have received already.

[3] The appellants insist that the court erred in permitting too wide a cross-examination of one of them. This matter as presented in the record would scarcely justify a reversal, even if it were well founded. We are of the opinion that the examination was permissible. Moreover, a recent amendment to Code of Civil Procedure, § 2055 (added by St. 1917, p. 58), permits a litigant to call his adversary and subject him to cross-examination as to any relevant matter, without waiting for a foundation to be laid by previous direct examination. We find no error in the record.

LAPIQUE v. PLUMMER et al. (Civ. 3739.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 28, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 28, 1921.)

1. Evidence 🔑43(3)—Appellate court cannot be required to take judicial notice of pleadings, etc., in other causes in which plaintiff engaged.

The appellate court cannot be required to take judicial notice of pleadings, claims, proceedings, etc., in other causes in which plaintiff appellant has been engaged in the various courts of California during the past eight or nine years.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑31—Neither lessee nor successor in interest, who have entered, can question validity of lease.

Having entered into possession of premises under a lease, neither the lessee nor his successor in interest can question the validity of the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against E. A. Plummer and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Lapique, of Orange, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action upon claim and delivery of certain personal property, namely, 1,321 sacks of barley and certain other crops grown upon lot B of the rancho Los Vergines in Los Angeles county, or the value of said property in case delivery thereof cannot be made, alleged in the complaint to be the sum of $1,849, with $500 damages for the alleged wrongful detention of said property.

The plaintiff claims the right to recover this property by virtue of the assignment to him by one Pierre Agoure of all the latter's right, title, and interest in a certain lease of said portion of said rancho, alleged to have been executed to said Agoure by certain persons on August 31, 1907. The defendants in their answer deny any ownership or right of said plaintiff in said personal property, and for want of information and belief deny that said Pierre Agoure ever conveyed or assigned to said plaintiff the aforesaid lease, and further allege that, if such assignment was made, it was colorable and fictitious, and was made by said Agoure for the purpose of enabling him to evade and avoid the obligations of said lease, and was not intended to divest him of his title to or interest in the same. The plaintiff demurred to this answer upon several grounds, and also moved the court to strike out that portion thereof which undertook to allege the colorable and fictitious quality of the transfer of said lease to the plaintiff. The plaintiff also moved for a judgment on the pleadings. The said demurrer was apparently overruled, and these other several motions denied by the trial court at some time during the year 1913, though from the state of the record before us we are unable to ascertain just what the action of the trial court was in these several regards.

In the year 1917 the plaintiff moved the court for leave to file a voluminous amended complaint setting up a large amount of matter, probative in character and materially varying from the plaintiff's original allegations as to the foundations and nature of his claim of right to said property. His motion for leave to file said amended complaint came on for hearing before said court and was denied on January 5, 1918, but again we are left entirely in the dark as to the grounds of said denial. The cause came on for hearing upon said last-named day, and upon its submission the trial court made its findings in the defendants' favor, and judgment was accordingly entered, requiring the return of the property which the plaintiff had taken upon claim and delivery, or the value thereof, fixed at the sum of $1,500, together with damages equivalent to the interest upon said sum from the date of the plaintiff's taking of said property, together with their costs. The plaintiff thereupon moved for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds, which motion being upon the hearing thereof denied, the plaintiff has taken and prosecuted this appeal.

The appellant in support of his appeal has presented a typewritten transcript, embracing the record of the clerk and reporter of the proceedings in this cause. He has also filed two supplements and two supplementary supplements purporting to refer to matters embraced in these original transcripts. In attempting to examine these we have found ourselves plunged into the midst of a dense wilderness of entangled and intermingled pleadings, claims, proceedings, and references to other causes and litigations in which the plaintiff herein has apparently been engaged for the past eight or nine years in the superior courts and District Court of Appeal of Southern California and in the Supreme Court.

[1] Many of the appellant's references to these various causes are by numbers merely, and we are asked to take judicial notice of the proceedings therein, which, of course, we can neither be required nor expected to do. In the attempt to perform our duty of finding a way through this labyrinth with a view to determining the merits of this appeal we have been afforded no aid whatever by the respondents herein, whose brief, had any such been filed, might, like the silken thread of Ariadne, have assisted in resolving its mysteries. In so far as we, thus unaided, are able to do so we find that the first and main contention of the appellant is that the lease, which on August 31, 1907, was made by certain lessors to Pierre Agoure and for the violation of the terms of which said Agoure was by the defendants herein dispossessed of the premises upon which the crops were being grown which the plaintiff herein now claims, was void for the reason that one of the persons named in said lease as a maker thereof did not in fact sign or execute the same.

[2] We are totally unable to understand upon what theory the plaintiff and appellant herein can be heard to urge this claim, since his own complaint in this action shows that his sole right or claim of right to the crops which he seeks to recover rests upon an assignment by said Agoure of his interest as lessee under said lease. Having entered into the possession of the premises upon which said crops were grown under said lease neither said Agoure nor the plaintiff as his successor in interest thereunder can question the validity of said lease. It would further seem, however, from the appellant's reference to the case of Plummer v. Agoure, 20 Cal. App. 319, 128 Pac. 1014, that said Agoure never did in fact question the validity of said lease nor the rights of the plaintiffs in that action (who are the defendants in this action) to recover the possession of the premises covered by its terms, but permitted said action to go by default. The appeal in that action was apparently taken by the appellant, Lapique, in the instant case after he had vainly sought to be substituted as a party defendant therein in the place and stead of Agoure by virtue of his alleged assignment from the latter of said lease, and the District Court of Appeal, in that case in adverting to this situation, said:

> "Certainly no argument is required in support of the proposition that one unlawfully withholding the possession of land and in default for the rent thereof cannot escape his obligation by assigning the liability to another."

We think the decision in the case of Plummer v. Agoure, supra, is res adjudicata as to Agoure and also as to this appellant as his successor to said interest in said lease.

The appellant makes other contentions herein based, as we have seen, upon the bewildering state of the record which he has presented. For example, the appellant asserts that the trial court was in error in whatever orders it may have made overruling his demurrer to the defendants' answer, and also refusing to strike out portions of the same and to award his judgment upon the pleadings, but we are unable to find these several orders in the record, and hence, of course, cannot determine anything respecting them.

Again, the appellant claims that the trial court was in error in refusing to permit him to file his amended complaint proffered for filing more than five years after the date of filing his original complaint, and apparently on the eve of the trial of the action upon the original pleadings. We have only the bald statement in the record that appellant's motion in that behalf was denied, but have not the order made and entered denying the same, and hence cannot know on what said order was based or whether or not it was properly made.

In so far as the appellant bases his claim of right to file his said amended complaint upon the alleged fact that he is the successor in interest of one Maria Espritu Chijulla De Leonis or of her son, Juan Menendes, in the premises upon which the crops involved in this action were grown, by virtue of the transfer to him of a certain judgment in the case of De Leonis v. Walsh, affirmed in the Supreme Court in 140 Cal. 176, 73 Pac. 813, we think the appellant's said claim of any right or interest in said premises arising out of said judgment has been finally set at rest by the decision of the District Court of Appeal for the Second District in the case of Lapique v. Plummer, 195 Pac. 293, in which case the Supreme Court, in denying a petition for rehearing, expressly, and we trust finally, stated that said judgment upon which the appellant relies had been vacated by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of De Leonis v. Walsh, 145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637. This final order of the Supreme Court also sets at rest whatever right the appellant claims to take or prosecute the appeal in this case as the successor in interest in said De Leonis or Menendes or both.

We cannot refer in further detail to the appellant's other numerous contentions, nor attempt to unravel their labyrinthine involutions. They all appear to bear upon the plaintiff's claim of an interest in the property in litigation arising out of his assignment of the lease from Agoure, or as successor in interest to said judgment. If, as we have already determined, these claims are invalid, he had no right to maintain this action, and this being so, his other contentions are as to mere errors in procedure which, in the involved and incomplete state of the record, we cannot determine to have been prejudicial, even if it were conceded that they had in fact any merit.

In conclusion, we would again refer to the censurable conduct of the respondents herein and of their counsel in willfully failing to afford this court the assistance to which it was peculiarly entitled in the instant case.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

(185 Cal. 262)

LANTZ v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.
(L. A. 6092.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 5, 1921.)

1. Highways 🔑1—Not created by mere user.

Under Pol. Code, § 2621, as amended in 1883, mere user will not constitute land a highway; but it must be declared such by the proper county or city authorities, or must have become such by dedication.

2. Dedication 🔑44—Use as highway some evidence of dedication.

Though under Pol. Code, § 2621, as amended in 1883, a highway cannot be created by mere user, the user may constitute some evidence of dedication.

3. Dedication 🔑41—Facts held sufficient to raise presumption of implied dedication for highway.

Where according to a map a strip dedicated for a street was not between lots, but on one lot, leaving a strip of that lot 10 feet side between the street and the other lot, but for 14 years it was used as part of the street without objection, and the owner permitted it to be sold for taxes, and claim was thereafter made to it only by the tax title purchaser, these facts are sufficient to give rise to the presumption of an implied dedication.

4. Dedication 🔑20(1)—Death of owner after use of land as street began held not to interfere with implication of dedication.

Death of the owner of a strip of land after its use as part of a street began, and failure for many years to appoint an administrator, will not interfere with the implication of a dedication as a result of a long period of permissive use.

5. Estoppel 🔑62(4)—City held not estopped to claim easement by commencing action to condemn.

A city's mere commencement of action to condemn a strip for use as a part of a street, after its right to the use thereof for such purpose through an implied dedication of an easement had ripened, does not estop it, in an action thereafter brought against it to quiet title thereto, to claim such dedication.

6. Estoppel 🔑62(4)—City held not estopped to claim easement by collecting taxes on land.

A city is not estopped to claim an implied dedication of an easement in land for purposes of a street by reason of taxes being levied and collected thereon during the time that its right to the easement was ripening, much less by such a levy and collection after such right had fully ripened.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1176(5)—Lower court may be directed to enter judgment in conformity to findings.

The judgment of the trial court not being in accordance with its findings of fact and conclusions of law therein, the appellate court may direct the lower court to enter the proper judgment.

8. Quieting title 🔑50—Proper judgment stated where plaintiff is owner in fee and defendant owner of an easement.

Plaintiff in action to quiet title being the owner of the land, and defendant owner of an easement therein for street purposes, judgment should not be that plaintiff take nothing, but it should decree him owner in fee, subject to such easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Charles Lantz, substituted in place of T. A. Davis, against the City of Los Angeles. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Charles Lantz, Howard F. Shepherd, Samuel M. Garroway, and Winslow P. Hyatt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles S. Burnell, Jesse E. Stephens, J. H. O'Connor, and Albert Lee Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The District Court of Appeal rendered an opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice Richards, affirming the judgment in this case. It is as follows:

"This action was originally commenced by one T. A. Davis against the city of Los Angeles to quiet title to a strip of land described as 'the westerly 400 feet of lot A of the Euclid Heights tract, as per map thereof recorded,' etc., of which the plaintiff claimed to be the owner and entitled to the possession. The answer of the defendant denied that the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to the possession of said tract or any portion thereof, and alleged that said defendant was the owner of an easement over the said property for its entire width and length for street purposes. The defendant further alleged that for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action it had been in quiet and peaceable possession of said strip of land, holding and claiming the same for street purposes adversely to the plaintiff and all other persons, and that plaintiff's alleged cause of action was barred by section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"Subsequent to the commencement of the action the present plaintiff was substituted in the place and stead of T. A. Davis as the plaintiff in said action by the order of the court.

"Upon the trial and submission of the cause the findings of fact and conclusions of law were to the effect that the said substituted plaintiff was the owner of the strip of land in question, but that for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action the city of Los Angeles had been the owner of an easement over the entire strip for street purposes, holding and using the same in quiet and peaceable possession for such purposes adversely to plaintiff and his predecessors in interest and all other persons. The decree followed the findings and conclusions of law in respect of the ownership of the tract by the plaintiff, subject to the easement of the city of Los Angeles thereon and thereover for street purposes. The plaintiff appeals from such judgment.

"The facts of the case as disclosed by the record, without serious conflict, are these:

In the year 1883 a subdivision was made of certain lands in blocks 72 and 73 of what was known as the Hancock survey, and a map of such subdivision was made and recorded by Workman & Hellman, who had made said subdivision. Certain main and cross streets were delineated upon said map intersecting said tract. One of these was Stevenson avenue, at right angles to which ran Euclid street. These two streets bounded on the south and west block 7 of said tract, which was in turn subdivided into lots 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32, which lay in their order along Euclid street from the point of its intersection with Stevenson avenue northerly. In the year 1887 lot 26 of this tract was subdivided by the then owner thereof into a number of smaller lots under the name of the Alta Vista tract and a map of such subdivision was made and recorded on November 22d of that year. This map purported to show the lots of the subdivision as fronting on a 60-foot street, which was given the name of Adelaide street on said map. It appeared, however, that only 10 feet of said Adelaide street was taken from said lot 26; the other 50 feet thereof being within the original boundaries of lot 27 of said larger tract. Shortly thereafter a similar subdivision was made of lots 27 and 28 of said larger tract under the name of Euclid Heights tract, and a map of such subdivision was made and recorded on December 16, 1887. By this map also Adelaide street was laid out and defined as being 40 feet in width; said 40 feet running the entire length of said lot 27, and being the inner 40 feet of the southerly 50 feet in width of said lot. It thus appeared upon the face of said map of the Euclid Heights tract that there was a strip of land 10 feet in width lying along the southerly side of Adelaide street as laid out thereon, which strip was designated as lot A, which lot, running the entire length of said street, lay between the 40-foot street laid out along the southerly portion thereof as designated upon said map and the northerly line of lot 26 of said larger tract. Upon the filing for record of these two maps Adelaide street appeared by the first of them to be a street 60 feet in width, to which there had been contributed, by lot 26, 10 feet in width along the entire northerly line of said lot; while by the other map of the Euclid Heights tract Adelaide street appeared to be a street 40 feet in width running the entire length of lot 27, but 10 feet within the exterior boundaries thereof, leaving a rectangular strip of land 10 feet in width, which was designated as lot A, and which strip of land, if held in private possession, would have cut off the lot owners of the subdivision of lot 26, known as the Alta Vista tract, from access to the 40-foot street laid out upon the map of the Euclid Heights tract.

"Such was the state of things as shown upon these two maps at the close of the year 1887. Thereafter, at some time, the name of Adelaide street was changed to Oregon street, and the public began traveling said Oregon street in going to and from the subdivisions of these two tracts and in gaining access to other connecting streets. In so doing the entire 60 feet in width of Adelaide street came to be increasingly used by the traveling public, regardless of the fact that said lot A, which stood of record in private ownership, lay along near the middle of said street for the entire length thereof. The record herein does not seem to disclose the name of the owner of record of said lot A prior to the year 1891; but it was stipulated during the trial that on January 26, 1891, the record title to said lot A was vested in one R. B. Anderson. Said Anderson died in the year 1895, but upon what date is not shown. An administrator of his estate was not appointed until the year 1909. In the meantime there had been a sale of said lot A for city taxes in the year 1896 to one Sanders, and a sale for state and county taxes for the same year to the state. In the latter part of the year 1910 said Sanders brought an action and obtained a decree quieting his title against the administrator of the estate of R. B. Anderson, deceased. In the meantime lot A had been again sold for taxes in the year 1905 to one Barlow, who shortly thereafter deeded whatever rights he had acquired by said tax sale to one Brown, who in his turn December 14, 1910, made a deed of said strip to Sanders and Lantz, who in turn deeded the strip to T. A. Davis in the year 1916. Davis reconveyed the strip to Lantz on June 23, 1917, after the commencement of this action.

"During the period between 1891 and 1910 Adelaide, or, as later known, Oregon, street, for its entire width of 60 feet, including said lot A, was being used by the traveling public, apparently without any hindrance, interference, or objection by the owner or owners of the record title thereto; the only indication of any private ownership in or claim to lot A consisting in the fact that said R. B. Anderson, during the first few years of said period, had paid the taxes which were levied and assessed thereon, but that finally said strip had been sold for unpaid state, county, and city taxes, the title thereto finally thereby passing in about the year 1908 to said Sanders, and through him by mesne conveyances into the name of T. A. Davis in the year 1916. The first connection of the present plaintiff and appellant with said strip began in the year 1910, when he acquired another tax title thereto through a tax sale thereof to one Barlow in 1905. In the year 1909 the city of Los Angeles commenced an action to condemn said lot A for street purposes, making R. B. Anderson, B. F. Sanders, Avery M. Brown, and several other real and fictitious persons parties defendant to said action, who were alleged to have or claim some interest in said strip of land. This action was apparently inspired by the fact that said city of Los Angeles had adopted an ordinance in the year 1909 providing for the improvement of said Adelaide or Oregon street, and in the course of said proceeding had been given to understand that there were certain persons who claimed to be the owners of the strip known as lot A lying along the middle of said street. The defendant A. M. Brown, and B. F. Sanders appeared and answered in said action, each alleging himself to be the owner of said lot A, and praying for considerable sums in damages in the event of condemnation thereof. This action was never brought to trial, but remained pending until some time after the present action was begun, and was dismissed by the plaintiff during the trial of this case. During all of the time between the date of the commencement of said condemnation suit in the year 1909 and the dismissal thereof in the year 1917 the general public continued to travel and use said Adelaide or Oregon street and said strip of land as a portion thereof without objection or interference on the part of any person claiming to be the owners of the same.

"The appellant herein makes several contentions upon this appeal. The first of these is that the evidence is entirely insufficient to show that the city of Los Angeles had acquired through user an easement for street purposes on or over the premises in question. This contention is based upon the construction which the appellant places upon section 2621 of the Political Code, which section, as amended in the year 1883, reads as follows:

"'A road laid out and worked, and used as provided in this chapter, shall not be vacated or cease to be a highway until so ordered by the board of supervisors of the county in which said road may be located; and no route of travel used by one or more persons over another's land shall hereafter become a public road or byway by use, or until so declared by the board of supervisors or by dedication by the owner of the land affected.'

[1, 2] "There can be no question but that since the enactment of said section of the Political Code in its present form the mere user of a route of travel by the public for a period of five years or more did not, of itself, suffice to constitute the strip of land used by said route of travel a public highway. It was essential, in order to do so under said section of the Code, that such strip of land must have either been so declared to be by the board of supervisors of the county [or by the proper city authorities of the city of Los Angeles] in which the same was located, or must have become so by dedication by the owner of the tract; but it does not follow from this that the user of such strip of land by the public may not constitute some evidence of its dedication, which, taken with other evidence showing expressly or by implication an intent on the part of the owner of the land to dedicate the same to public uses, may amount to sufficient proof of such dedication thereof as would satisfy the provisions of the foregoing section of the Political Code.

[3] "There is in the instant case sufficient evidence, we think, to establish the fact that the use which the general public made of Adelaide or Oregon street during the years 1895 and 1909 was a sufficiently continuous use of every portion of the 60-foot width of said street, and hence of that portion of the lands embraced within the exterior boundaries of said street and known as lot A, to have put the owners or claimants of said lot A upon notice that the same was being used as a portion of said street. When to this proof is added the further proof that said portion of said street was used as such without objection and with the permission, or at least without any objection on the part of said owners or claimants of said tract for a period of time sufficient to justify the finding of an implied dedication thereof; and when to these proofs there was also added certain other facts shown in the evidence herein which would aid in deducing this inference, such as the showing as to the shape of said strip and its location with respect to said street, and its severance from the other lots of the Euclid Heights tract, taken with the fact that it remained uninclosed and unimproved, and in fact not susceptible of any particular use for building purposes, and that during all those years its owners allowed it to present the appearance of being a portion of said street, and thus in a sense invited the general public to make the same use of it that was being made of the rest of said street—these facts, and the further fact that R. B. Anderson, who was the admitted record owner of said lot A in 1895, permitted it to be sold for taxes, and that neither he nor his heirs thereafter ever asserted any claim to said strip, and that the claim now asserted thereto by the plaintiff herein is one having its sole foundation in tax titles, and that even this plaintiff or his immediate predecessor never in any way interfered with the use by the public of said strip as a public street—these facts, in our opinion, amply suffice to give rise to the presumption of an implied dedication of said strip of land to public uses as a portion of said Adelaide or Oregon street. Leverone v. Weakley, 155 Cal. 395, 101 Pac. 304; Hartley v. Vermillion, 141 Cal. 339, 74 Pac. 987; Sherwood v. Ahart, 35 Cal. App. 84, 169 Pac. 240.

[4] "It is, however, urged by the appellant that the fact that R. B. Anderson died in the year 1895, and that no administrator of his estate was appointed until 1909, would interfere with the operation of the rule above stated with respect to an implied dedication of said strip of land. It was, however, early held in this state that where the statute of limitations had commenced to run, its operation would not be suspended by the death of the person affected by its operation (Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 634, 95 Am. Dec. 152); and this principle has been given recent application in the case of Cortelyou v. Imperial Land Co., 166 Cal. 24, 134 Pac. 981, and Sullivan v. Gillon, 26 Cal. App. 421, 147 Pac. 215. While the doctrine of these cases was given specific application therein to the running of the statute of limitations, we are satisfied that the same principle is properly applicable to cases like the one at bar, where the adverse use on the part of the public has begun, and where consequently it was the duty of the owner or claimant of the premises to take such action in the way of asserting his claim as would interfere with the implication of dedication as a result of a long period of permissive use.

[5] "The appellant further contends that the fact that the city of Los Angeles in the year 1910 commenced an action against the predecessors of the present plaintiff to condemn said strip of land for public uses as a portion of said street, which action, while pending between the time of the institution thereof and the commencement of the present action, was never brought to trial, is sufficient to operate as an estoppel against the defendant's plea as an implied dedication in the instant case. Probably this would be true if the present claim of said defendant to an easement in said strip for public uses had not fully ripened long prior to the commencement of said condemnation suit; but that such was the fact we think is sufficiently established in the present case, and hence the principle of estoppel upon which the appellant thus relies cannot be given application to defeat the right of the public in and to said strip as a portion of said street which was fully acquired before the institution of said condemnation suit.

[6] "Neither do we think that any estoppel arose from the fact that during a period of several years between 1895 and 1909 taxes were levied and collected upon said strip of land. In the case of Burk v. City of Santa Cruz, 163 Cal. 807, 127 Pac. 154, the Supreme Court, in dealing with a similar question says: 'In truth it is too preposterous to merit serious consideration that a ministerial officer like the assessor, charged only with the duty of assessing property which should be assessed, can by his mistaken act of omission or commission raise an estoppel for or against the city as to a matter in which he has absolutely no authority' See, also, City of Seattle v. Hinckley, 67 Wash. 273, 121 Pac. 444, in which the Supreme Court of Washington says: 'The right of the public to use the land as a street established by a continuous and uninterrupted use cannot be admitted away by the taxing officers. The rights of the public in a highway are not affected by the listing of the premises for taxes, or the payment of taxes when assessed.'

"The reasoning of the foregoing cases has also application to the final contention of the appellant, which is that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to his offer to prove the payment of taxes for the years 1910, 1911 and 1912. These offers on his part related to taxes levied and assessed long after the defendant's right to its easement in said strip of land had fully ripened through its adverse user thereof as a portion of the public street, and through the implied dedication thereof to such uses by the predecessors of said plaintiff prior to his acquisition of any interest or ownership in the same."

[7, 8] This opinion is adopted as the opinion of this court. The judgment below is not in accordance with this opinion. It merely declares that the plaintiff take nothing and that defendant recover costs. This was not in conformity with the findings, nor with the conclusions of law therein declaring the relief to be given to the parties, as it should have been, and it is not just to the plaintiff. The court, on appeal, has the power to direct the court below to enter the proper judgment in such cases, and it should do so.

The judgment is reversed, neither party to recover any costs of appeal; and it is ordered that on the going down of the remittitur the court below enter judgment as follows:

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple of the tract of land described in the findings, subject, however, to an easement therein for the use of said parcel of land as a public street, which easement is hereby adjudged to belong to the city of Los Angeles. It is further adjudged that the defendant recover of plaintiff its costs herein laid out and expended, taxed at $———.

MANN v. TRACY et al., Civil Service Commission. (S. F. 9721.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 10, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑217(3) — Civil service rule terminating eligibility after three years is reasonable.

An order of the civil service commission that the determination as to eligibility resulting from the proposed examination should cease to be in force after three years was not unreasonable, since the examination might not be a reliable test after the expiration of that time.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑216(2)—Provision in examination resolution as to duration of eligibility held a valid rule.

An order of the civil service commission contained in the notice of an examination stating that the eligibility thereby determined should continue only three years is in substance and effect a rule within the commission's power to make rules.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑216(2) — Civil service rules not invalid because not printed.

The requirement that the civil service rules shall be printed does not prevent their taking effect before printing.

4. Mandamus 🔑72—Courts should interfere as little as possible with administrative boards.

Administrative boards are vested with a high discretion, and its abuse must appear very clearly before the courts will interfere, since they should let such boards work out their problems with as little interference as possible.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑217(3) — Civil Service Commission can expunge names solely on expiration of charter period.

Under San Francisco Charter, art. 13, § 7, authorizing the civil service commissioners to strike off names of candidates after they had remained on the register more than two years, the commission may expunge a name from such register for no other reason than that it has been thereon for two years.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑217(3) — Civil Service Commission by rule can fix duration of eligibility.

The civil service commission need not adopt a separate resolution striking each name from the eligible list after the expiration of the two years, but may by general resolution order all names remaining thereon for such time to be stricken.

7. Evidence 🔑83(2)—Civil service rule presumed to have been printed.

It is presumed that the civil service commissioners performed the duty imposed on them by the charter of printing their rules for distribution.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑216(2)—Publication of examination notice held publication of civil service rule stated therein.

The publication for two weeks in the official newspaper of a notice for civil service examination which contained a rule of the commission that the eligibility thereby determined would continue only for three years was a publication of the rule establishing the duration of eligibility.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑217(3) — Names held to have been stricken after expiration of eligibility period.

In mandamus to compel the civil service commission to certify the petitioner's name for promotion where it appeared that more than the time fixed by the commissioner's order for the duration of the eligibility had expired, it was immaterial that the commission had not actually stricken the names from the list, nor that its action ordering them stricken was taken before the three years expired.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco: Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action for mandamus by James Mann against George A. Tracy and others, as Civil Service Commissioners to require respondents to certify petitioner for promotion as sergeant of police. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1-4] The order of the civil service commission under review in this case, contained in the notice of examination, stated that the determination as to eligible persons resulting from the proposed examination and the entry thereof in the register of eligible persons should cease to be in force after three years from the date of the determination and adoption of the eligible list. This order was not unreasonable. It is to be assumed that the commission was of the opinion that after the lapse of three years the examination would not be a reliable test of the continued fitness of the persons on the register. It must be obvious that in the majority of the instances this might be true. The commission has power to make rules, and the order was, in substance and effect, nothing less than a rule. The requirement that the rules shall be printed does not prevent them from taking effect before printing. With respect to the general policy of the courts toward such commissions, it was said in Maxwell v. Civil Service Commission, 169 Cal. 339, 146 Pac. 871:

> "Courts should let administrative boards and officers work out their problems with as little judicial interference as possible. They may decide a particular question wrong—but it is their question. Such boards are vested with a high discretion, and its abuse must appear very clearly before the courts will interfere."

See, also, Pratt v. Rosenthal, 183 Pac. 544.

We adopt as the opinion of this court the following portions of the opinion of Mr. Justice Brittain, filed as a dissenting opinion in the District Court of Appeal upon the hearing of the cause in that court. It follows that the judgment should be reversed. The portions of the opinion are as follows:

"The defendants, members of the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco, appeal from a judgment against them, entered on their refusal to amend their answer, after demurrer sustained, in an action for mandamus to require them to certify the name of the respondent as eligible for promotion from corporal to sergeant in the police department of the municipality.

"The case depends upon a single matter of law regarding the power of the civil service commission prior to examination to limit the maximum period during which the eligible list procured by an examination shall remain effective. In the particular case the notice of examination contained the following: 'The eligible list secured as a result of this examination shall expire at the close of three years from the date of the adoption of the list, and the names thereon shall then be automatically removed therefrom.' The notice of examination was signed by the civil service commissioners in their official capacity, and was attested by the chief examiner. The plaintiff took his examination when it was held in accordance with the notice and his name was entered on the list adopted in pursuance of the notice. The list was adopted on May 22, 1916. More than three years thereafter the board of police commissioners requested the civil service commission to certify the name of the person standing highest upon the register of eligibles for appointment as sergeant. The only question is the legal effect of the notice of limitation of the maximum period of the life of the list.

"Article XIII of the charter deals with the civil service. The only provisions bearing on the present subject are the following: 'The commissioners shall make rules to carry out the purposes of this article, and for examinations, appointments, promotions and removals and in accordance with its provisions may from time to time make changes in the existing rules. All rules and all changes therein shall be forthwith printed for distribution by the commissioners.' Section 3. 'The commissioners may from time to time provide by rule for the manner in which * * * positions shall be filled, * * * and no appointment to any such place shall be made except in accordance with the provisions of this article and the rules adopted thereunder by the civil service commission.' Section 2. 'The commissioners shall control all examinations. * * *' Section 5. 'Notice of the time, place and general scope of every examination shall be given by the commissioners by publication for two weeks preceding such examination in the official newspaper, and such notice shall also be posted by the commissioners in a conspicuous place in their office for two weeks before such examination. Such further notice of examination shall be given as they may prescribe.' Section 6. 'From the returns of the examiners * * * the commissioners shall prepare a register * * * of the persons whose general average standing * * * is not less than the minimum fixed by the rules of the commissioners, and who are otherwise eligible. Such persons shall take rank upon the register as candidates in the order of their relative excellence, as determined by examination without reference to priority of time of examination.' Section 7. 'The commissioners may strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years.' Section 10. It is made obligatory on the commissioners not to certify and to strike from the register the name of any one not of good moral character or who had secured a place on the list by fraud or in violation of the rules of the commission. Section 9.

"These provisions have not been construed by the courts in relation to the exact question now under consideration. Both parties cite and rely upon a dictum in the only decision referred to in the briefs. Cook v. Civil Service Commission, 160 Cal. 598, 600, 117 Pac. 662. In that case the Supreme Court denied a motion to dismiss an appeal. The motion was made upon the ground that pending appeal the commission had itself annulled and set aside an examination the validity of which was attacked in the court proceeding. The action of the commission apparently was within the two years' minimum fixed by the charter during which certified lists must remain in force. After referring to the provision permitting names to be stricken from the list after two years, the learned justice who wrote the opinion said: 'True, the superior court had declared the examination void and had ordered the list annulled, but, an appeal having been taken from that judgment, it was of no binding, mandatory effect until made final by the action of a court of competent appellate jurisdiction. If the commission could have set aside the eligible list while the matter of the validity of the examination was sub judice, it could have done the same thing in absence of any proceeding, and without any order of court. The very purpose of holding examinations by the civil service commission was to create a permanent eligible list not subject to expunction upon the caprice of any board or officer of the municipal government. There was no grant of power directly given by the charter, or necessarily implied from the prerogatives conferred, which enabled the commission properly to set aside its own action after it had declared a list of eligibles, except in the single instance cited above.'

"It is conceded by the respondent that in the present matter the appellant by adopting a formal resolution at any time after the expiration of two years after the list was made up might have stricken his name or all the names from the list, under the admitted power granted by section 10, article XIII, of the charter. In other words, the very evil pointed out in the Cook Case might have been brought about lawfully under the charter. If the commission had learned that the respondent or any other person on the list was about to receive promotion, as a mere matter of caprice, after the expiration of two years, the name or the list might have been expunged, and the beneficent purpose of the civil service provisions of the charter set at naught. This was not done. There is no suggestion that the commission has not acted with entire good faith and fairness to all who took particular examination, upon public notice given before the examination that the list secured should continue in force but three years.

[5, 6] "It is argued that the power vested in the commissioners to expunge the names after they have remained on the list for two years contemplates the exercise of an intelligent and quasi judicial discretion upon the facts appearing when the order of expunction is made. This argument disregards the fact that the commission, at the end of two years after each list has been prepared, may, upon no other consideration than that it has been in force for two years, pass a resolution expunging it. The law does not require idle acts, and, since the commission might by repeatedly passing, mutatis mutandis, the same resolution at the expiration of two or three years after successive lists were made, under its power to make rules, it might have adopted a general rule that successive lists should expire at the ends of such periods. The determination of facts and the propriety of action of administrative boards is not a judicial function. Quinchard v. Board of Trustees, 113 Cal. 664, 45 Pac. 856; People v. Supervisors, 122 Cal. 421, 55 Pac. 131.

[7-9] "The same requirements and limitations do not apply to all classes of the civil service, nor to original appointments and promotions. The notice of examination for promotion from corporal to sergeant in this case required the applicants, among other things, to satisfy the examiners of their general knowledge of the duties to be performed, for which 50 per cent. of the total rating was credited. Under the head of general knowledge the applicants were examined upon their acquaintance with police duties, including the contents of the police manual, the transportation ordinances, and military tactics. These were matters subject to change, and the condition warranted a rule different from that applying to the appointment of clerks or laborers. Such a rule was made. The charter requires that rules shall be printed for distribution. It is presumed that the commissioners performed the duty of printing, and it is certain that the particular rule was published. Under the charter the notice of examination was given by publication for two weeks in the official newspaper and posted in the office of the commission. The respondent took the examination, and must therefore have been fully advised of the manner in which the appointments would be filled under the rule. There is but one limitation in the charter, namely, that the list shall remain in force for two years. The contention that by the rule the commission sought to bind itself or its successors to keep the list operative for three years disregards both the law and the wording of the rule. Under the law the commission could not either diminish or extend the two years' limit during which the charter provided the list should remain in force, but it could and in plain and unmistakable language it did provide that in no event should it remain in force for more than three years. The commission still retained its charter power to expunge the list at any time after the expiration of the two years limited by the charter. The suggestion that some action was necessary after the expiration of the two-years period is met by the action in striking out the names after that time. It is immaterial that they were not actually stricken out with red ink; they were automatically expunged. Neither is it material when the rule, or order, or resolution ordering the names expunged was adopted. The power granted by the charter was to strike off the names, regardless of when the determination to strike out was made."

The judgment is reversed.

RANSOME-CRUMMEY CO. v. BEGGS et al.

(S. F. 9738.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 10, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 7, 1921.)

Appeal and error 🔑345(1)—New trial to extend time for appeal must be moved for within 60 days after entry of judgment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 939, extending the time for appeal from judgment beyond the 60-day limit "if proceedings on motion for new trial are pending," does not permit an appeal within 30 days after the entry of an order denying motion for new trial, where such motion was made more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment.

R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal on ground that same was not taken within the time allowed by law. Judgment was entered November 22, 1915, an order denying a motion for new trial was entered April 14, 1916, and the appeal was taken April 24, 1916; i. e., within 30 days after the entry of such order. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc. The notice of intention to move for a new trial, however, was not served and filed until February 23, 1916, which was more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment, with the result that no proceeding on motion for new trial had been inaugurated or was pending at the expiration of the 60 days after entry of judgment within which an appeal may be taken from a judgment in the absence of any pending proceeding for new trial. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc. It is claimed by respondent that the provision of section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, extending the time for appeal from the judgment "if proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending" has no application unless such proceeding is instituted within the 60 days after entry of judgment within which an appeal may be taken from the judgment in the absence of any new trial proceeding; and that if within such 60 days no such proceeding be instituted and no appeal from the judgment is taken, the right of appeal from the judgment is forever lost. This very question was decided in accord with the respondents' claim by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, in the case of Pacific Light, etc., Corp. v. Kauffman, 39 Cal. App. 499, 179 Pac. 452, and an application for a hearing in this court was denied by us. CHAMBERS v. SECURITY COMMERCIAL & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. No. 3616.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑101—Bank's acceptance of lease held valid though its use of the property was ultra vires.

In lessor's action to recover premises leased to defendant's predecessor, held, that defendant bank could not, in view of Civ. Code, § 354, subd. 4, and the banking law, plead ultra vires as a defense against the recovery of rent on the ground that the bank did not have the right to operate a moving picture show, inasmuch as it could lawfully assume a lease, even though its use of the property might be ultra vires.

2. Banks and banking 🔑101—Banking corporation, having received the benefits of a lease, may not plead ultra vires.

In an action to recover leased premises and for rents due, if the acceptance of the lease by the defendant bank had been ultra vires where it received the full benefit of such act, it could not plead ultra vires as a defense; the remedy for such act being a proceeding by the state by quo warranto.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by George J. Chambers against the Security Commercial & Savings Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 188 Pac. 818.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for appellant.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, and Crouch & Chambers, of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action instituted by him against the defendant for the recovery of certain premises leased by him to the defendant's predecessor, and which the said defendant was alleged to be unlawfully holding over after default in the payment of the rent due and payable under the terms of said lease, and also for the recovery of the amount of rent due.

The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a general verdict in the plaintiff's favor and also a special verdict upon certain issues in the case.

The facts of the case upon which the questions presented on this appeal arise are practically undisputed, and are briefly as follows: The plaintiff on the 12th day of March, 1912, was the owner of the real estate in question which was at that time unimproved. On said date he executed a written lease of said real estate to three certain individuals, Fabre, Richardson, and Kerns, for the term of five years, commencing on April 1, 1912. In May, 1913, said lessees, with the lessor's consent, assigned and transferred their said lease to the Blochman Banking Company, a copartnership composed of two members, L. A. Blochman and J. A. Heap, who expressly agreed to pay all rent due under said lease after the date of said assignment. In August, 1913, the said partnership became incorporated under the name of Blochman Commercial & Savings Bank, to which said corporation the partnership transferred all of its assets, and the said copartners became, as the incorporators of said corporation, the owners of practically its entire issue of capital stock. The lessor also consented to the transfer of said lease to said banking corporation. In July, 1914, the name of said

Blochman Commercial & Savings Bank was changed to "Security Commercial & Savings Bank," and the latter thereafter continued to hold said real estate under said lease and to transact business as a banking corporation under said name. During the time that the said original lessees held said real estate under their lease they had erected certain structures and had engaged in conducting a moving picture business upon the said premises, which was continued to be conducted after the organization of said banking corporation and the transfer to it of said lease. During the period from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1915, while the defendant as such corporation was operating and conducting said moving picture business upon said premises, they failed to pay the rent due and payable under the terms of said lease to said plaintiff, who at the expiration of said period and after giving the proper notices commenced this action in unlawful detainer.

In its answer filed herein the defendant undertook to deny that it was the transferee of said lease or that it was unlawfully holding said premises thereunder, predicating its said denial apparently upon the proposition that as a banking corporation of limited powers under its charter and also under the banking act it had no authority to conduct or operate a moving picture business, and hence that the action of its officials in taking over said premises while the same was devoted to the conduct of said business was an act ultra vires, and hence that it was not liable for the rent due to plaintiff under said lease. The possession of the premises was apparently surrendered to the plaintiff before the case came to trial, and the cause was submitted to the jury upon the issue of the amount of rent due and also upon the questions involved in the particular issues upon which a special verdict was requested.

There were three of these, the first being as to whether the assignment of the lease in question to the Blochman Banking Company was an actual sale and transfer thereof or only as security for a loan; second, whether at the time of the plaintiff's consent to said assignment he believed that said banking company was the real owner of said lease, and also whether he acquiesced in the possession of the premises by said Blochman Banking Company under such belief; third, whether the defendant during the period from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1915, was operating and conducting said moving picture business on said premises on its own behalf.

The jury returned a general verdict in the plaintiff's favor in the sum of $6,000, the total amount of the unpaid rent due under the lease, and as to the aforesaid special issues answered each of them affirmatively. Upon the coming in of this verdict the defendant moved the court for a judgment in its favor based upon the findings of the jury upon these special issues, which motion was denied by the court. The judgment followed, from which this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first, and in fact the controlling, contention of the appellant herein is its claim foreshadowed by its answer herein, that the act of its officials in taking over said lease while the said premises were being used for the operation and conduct of a moving picture business was an act ultra vires, and that the occupation and conduct of said premises by said defendant thereunder for such purposes was also ultra vires, and hence that no obligation or liability arose or attached to said defendant under said lease. This contention on the part of the appellant is sought to be supported by the citation of numerous authorities, setting forth the limited powers of banking corporations under their charters and under the terms of the banking act under which this particular institution was organized. It is not necessary herein, in our opinion, to in any wise disagree with this line of authorities or to otherwise comment thereon for the reason, which seems to us obvious, that the appellant's asserted position in respect to this contention, and its citation of and dependence upon these authorities spring from a complete misconception of the application of the doctrine of ultra vires to the facts of the case at bar in this, that the appellant entirely overlooks the distinction between the lease of the premises in question and the purposes to which the premises are devoted by the lessees or their successors in occupancy under such lease. It is this precise distinction which differentiates all the cases cited by the appellant in its effort to apply the doctrine of ultra vires from the case at bar and from the cases cited by the respondent to which we shall hereafter refer. It could not for a moment be contended that this banking corporation is not empowered under its charter and under the provisions of the banking act in this state to take and hold leases of real property. Stats. 1913, p. 158; Civ. Code, § 354. This being so, the act of the defendant in taking over this lease would not have been ultra vires, since it might upon acquiring the same have proceeded to devote the premises described to uses to which it would have been entitled to put the same under the provisions of its charter and of the banking act. That it did not do this did not render its act in acquiring its leasehold interest in said premises ultra vires. Bissell v. Michigan Southern R. R. Co., 22 N. Y. 262. In the instant case the lease in question was made to the original lessees, who unquestionably were entitled to establish and conduct any lawful business which they saw fit upon the premises. These original lessees transferred this lease to the Blochman Banking Company, a copartnership, which also had the undoubted right to continue to use the premises for the conduct of the business to which it was then being devoted. This copartnership resolved itself into a banking corporation, of which its two members became the owners of practically all the capital stock, and under the name of said corporation took over all of the assets of the copartnership, including this lease. That this leasehold interest in these premises so acquired by this corporation—which after all is said was merely the former ownership thereof under a corporate name—was taken over in the ordinary course of business seems too plain for argument, and it would seem to be equally clear that this plaintiff, by the mere formal act of consenting to this formal transfer of his perfectly good and valid lease while in the hands of the copartnership, could not be held to have consented away his right to enforce the same because the officials and controlling forces of such corporation continued to put the real estate described in said lease to uses which under the name and form of a copartnership they were entitled to do, but which under the name and form of a banking corporation might be beyond the limited scope of the corporate powers of such corporation. To hold otherwise would put the lessor of real estate at the mercy of their lessees, who by the simple process of casting themselves into the form of a banking corporation, and using the lease for some purpose outside of the scope of the powers of that sort of corporation, could thus avoid their obligation to pay the rent due according to the obligations of their lease. Under section 354, subd. 4, of the Civil Code, as well as under the banking act above cited, this defendant had the power to take and hold this lease for some uses and purposes at least, and this plaintiff, as lessor, had the right to presume that the defendant in taking over said lease was acquiring the same for purposes authorized by its charter and by said banking act, and that whatever proper uses the property was being put to under the former ownership of said lease would, if improper or ultra vires under the corporate organization, be presently discontinued. 1 Morse on Banks and Banking (5th Ed.) § 56. In the early case of Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, 99 Am. Dec. 30, the court, quoting from the decision of Bissell v. Michigan, etc., R. R. Co., supra, says:

> "An incorporated bank may purchase land, having power to do so for a banking house, but actually intending to speculate in the transaction. This is also ultra vires, but can the want of authority be interposed in repudiation of a just obligation to pay for the same land, the vendor not being in pari delicto? Such a doctrine is not only shocking to the reason and conscience of mankind, but it goes far beyond the law in regard to illegal contracts of private individuals."

In the recent case of James Eva Estate v. Mecca Co., 40 Cal. App. 515, 181 Pac. 415, it was held that, where a corporation had power to do an act for some purposes, and had received and enjoyed the benefit derived from doing the act, it would be estopped to present the plea of ultra vires against the enforcement of the obligation it assumed in the performance of the act.

For the foregoing reasons and upon the authorities cited in support thereof, we conclude that there is no merit in the appellant's contention that it was entitled to plead that the lease upon which the plaintiff sought to recover herein was void because the defendant, in taking over the same, was acting beyond the scope of its powers as a banking corporation. Many more authorities might be cited in support of this conclusion, but we do not deem it necessary to burden the record with further citations to support a proposition which seems so thoroughly in accord with justice.

[2] There is, however, another answer to the appellant's contention which would seem to be complete. It bears upon the action of the defendant in putting the premises in question to uses which were, according to its claim, beyond its charter or statutory powers. Assuming this claim to be correct, it does not follow that it lies within the power of the defendant to complain of its own usurpation of power in a case wherein it has received the full benefit of its unauthorized act. It is for the state of California to restrain the defendant's unauthorized extension of corporate powers in a quo warranto proceeding instituted for that purpose. Natoma W. & M. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544; Becket v. City of Petaluma, 171 Cal. 309, 153 Pac. 20; McCann v. Children's Home Society, 176 Cal. 359, 168 Pac. 355.

The foregoing answers to the main contention of the appellant in this case also answer the appellant's several other contentions as to alleged errors of the trial court in its instructions to the jury, since all of these are predicated upon the appellant's assumption that its act in taking and holding said lease, as well as in operating under the same, was ultra vires, and that it was entitled to urge this plea against the plaintiff and in the instant case. It is not necessary therefore to advert to these alleged errors in further detail.

Judgment affirmed.

Trusts ⚿44(2)—Evidence held insufficient to establish oral agreement to convey.

In action by certain children of a decedent against a daughter of decedent and other children to establish a trust, evidence held to support finding against the oral promise alleged to have been made by defendant daughter to make conveyances of property conveyed to her by decedent to all the children of decedent immediately upon his death.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Suit by Thomas B. Sullivan and others against Emma Gertrude Sullivan and others to establish a trust. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Sullivan, Sullivan & Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. All of the parties to this action are children of John J. Sullivan, Sr., deceased, except James A. MacMonnies, who is the husband of defendant Grace E. MacMonnies, and for that reason is made a party. Defendants John J. Sullivan and Grace MacMonnies were made parties because of their refusal to join plaintiffs in the action. James Sullivan, whose name frequently appears in the proceedings, was also a child of said John J. Sullivan, deceased, but died unmarried, without issue and intestate. The parties to the action, including James, deceased, comprised the entire family of children of said John J. Sullivan and Elizabeth M. Sullivan, his wife. The latter died on the 10th day of April, 1904, and her husband remained a widower thereafter.

The record title of the property in suit was conveyed to Emma Gertrude Sullivan by her father, John J. Sullivan, by deeds of conveyance, as will hereafter appear. The deed upon which plaintiffs rely to establish a trust relation, with Emma as trustee for the other children, is dated June 20, 1904. It conveys, upon its face, the title to her absolute.

The purpose of plaintiffs by this action, first, was to establish a trusteeship in Emma, and, next, to compel her to convey to each of said brothers and sisters, six in number, their respective equitable interests in said property. The trust sought to be established rests in parol and consists in an alleged oral promise made by Emma to her father at the time he executed and placed in escrow said deed dated June 20, 1904, that she would hold it as a trustee for the benefit of all of his children and upon his death convey to each child then living an equal interest in and to said property. The appointment of a receiver, an accounting for rents, issues, and profits, and the usual relief incidental to a trusteeship is demanded.

The facts practically conceded or incontestably established are these: The property in litigation constituted the family residence of the elder Sullivan for many years and is generally described as a portion of vara lot number 122, situated on Sacramento street, near Hyde, in the city and county of San Francisco. It has a frontage of 34 feet on Sacramento street and a depth of 137 feet. Mrs. Elizabeth M. Sullivan filed a homestead on said real property in 1887. By proceedings taken in April, 1904, after her death, the homestead was declared vested in the husband, John J. Sullivan. The father's petition to vest the homestead in himself did not receive the approval of John, James, and Harry and perhaps one daughter, who was suspected of being in sympathy with the opposition offered by said three sons. Their antagonism, in fact open hostility, to this proceeding was bitterly resented by the father. The father, however, maintained the old homestead as a family residence to the time of his death, to wit, March 18, 1915. Prior to his death four of the children had married and established homes of their own, while others, especially the three younger male members of the family above named, being given to excesses and dissipations, came and went as their vagarious tendencies inclined them or as necessity impelled them. Emma, however, remained constantly the companion of her father to the end.

On June 20, 1904, John J. Sullivan was the admitted owner of said property in fee simple. On that day he executed a deed of gift absolute in form conveying said property to his daughter, Emma, and delivered the deed to Judge A. F. St. Sure, then a practicing attorney and the drawer thereof. John J. Sullivan and the attorney, Hon. A. F. St. Sure, were brought together by the former's son Thomas B. Sullivan. The considerations recited in the deed are the love and affection that the father bore for his said daughter and "also for the better maintenance, support, protection, and livelihood" of said daughter. With the deed there was also delivered a letter of instructions directing said attorney to deliver said deed to his daughter Emma upon his death. By the letter of instructions he declared that delivery was made "without any reservation of right to recall the same" before death, "and with the absolute and final determination that it shall take effect when the contingency of my death happens." Contemporaneous with these instruments he executed and delivered to said attorney his olographic will by which he gave all the property of which he might die seized or possessed to his said daughter. He mentioned all of his children living by name and stated that he purposely omitted to make any provision for them. By said will full power was given to his daughter Emma, who was made executrix without bonds, to dispose of all or any part of his estate without order of court.

The former family residence occupied the same lot, but was destroyed by the fire of April 18–19, 1906. In 1907 the property was improved by the erection of a building containing six flats. The estimated cost of the improvements was $7,000, and that amount was borrowed from the Humboldt Savings Bank. John J. Sullivan, as owner, gave as security therefor a mortgage on the property. He made the affidavit frequently required of borrowers as to ownership, in which he averred that he was the owner and "had never deeded or transferred said property or any part thereof since affiant acquired it." The officers of the bank, before accepting the property as security, required further of him, that he obtain a deed from his children conveying to him any and all right, title, or interest they might have in said property. Accordingly on May 2, 1907, such a deed was executed, in which all the plaintiffs, except William B. Sullivan, then a minor, and all named defendants except John J. Sullivan, Jr., who did not appear at the trial of the cause and whose presence was and has been unknown the greater portion of time for some years past, joined. James, the other child not joining, is dead.

On October 7, 1907, finding that he had underestimated the cost of said improvements, he obtained an additional loan of $3,000 from said Humboldt Savings Bank. A deed of trust was executed securing said bank for the whole amount of the loan, to wit, $10,000. Again an affidavit was made by him, as owner, similar in all respects to the affidavit made upon obtaining said first loan of $7,000. The building was completed October 24, 1907, and on that day, in a sworn notice of completion, John J. Sullivan again described himself as owner.

On December 31, 1910, acting upon the advice of his attorney, Thomas B. Sullivan, his son, and one of the plaintiffs herein, John J. Sullivan commenced an action under the provisions of the McEnerney Act (Stats. 1906, Extra Session, p. 78), subscribed to and filed the required affidavit in which he averred that he was the owner in fee absolute of said property, and that no conveyance of said property or any part thereof nor any interest therein had been made by him except the deed of trust executed and delivered to the Humboldt Savings Bank to secure said loan of $10,000. The affidavit concludes in the following language:

> "That there are no subsisting mortgages, deeds of trust, or other liens against said property except as hereinbefore described; that affiant does not know and has never been informed of any other person who claims or may claim any interest in or lien upon the said property or any part thereof adversely to plaintiff except as hereinbefore described."

The only deeds of trust, mortgage claims, lien, or incumbrance of any description mentioned in said affidavit is the Humboldt Savings Bank's deed of trust. On January 6, 1913, judgment was entered establishing and quieting plaintiff's title to said property in fee simple absolute except as to the deed of trust held by said bank. The court found that all parties to this action had notice of said proceeding before the entry of judgment.

The improvements thereon were insured in the name of John J. Sullivan as owner. The deed of trust and note securing the bank for said loan were renewed, and an affidavit was again made in which he declared himself the sole owner, etc. He dealt with the property in every respect and at all times as an owner deals with his own. No act showing or tending to show a want of authority over or loss of ownership of said property appears.

On July 11, 1912, said John J. Sullivan executed and delivered his last will and testament, olographic, to his said daughter. In substance and effect it is identical with the will dated June 20, 1904. This will was subsequently admitted to probate.

On May 19, 1913, John J. Sullivan executed and delivered to his daughter, Emma, a deed by which he conveyed to her the property in dispute, reserving to himself a life estate. This deed was recorded March 13, 1915. On the same day and as a consideration therefor Emma bound herself in writing, upon her father's death and thenceforth so long as she should live, to pay to her brother William B. Sullivan for his support not less than $20 nor more than $50 per month, as may be determined by said Emma Gertrude Sullivan. It was further provided that, if the said William should bring any action against said sister then the obligation to pay any sums to said William should immediately cease.

The foregoing recital includes practically all of the material record evidence touching the history of the realty and its disposition or attempted disposal. The amended complaint contains four causes of action. The first count charges the existence of confidential relations between father and daughter; alleges an oral promise made by the daughter to the father on and prior to the execution of the deed of date June 20, 1904, that she would convey to the other children living at the time of his death an equal interest in said property; asserts that said John J. Sullivan upon the alleged delivery of said deed in escrow parted with all dominion over the same, and that the only interest he thereafter held in said property was "the use thereof until his death." The monthly rental value of the property was admitted to be $150. All facts necessary to establish a trust in conformity with plaintiff's theory are pleaded.

The second cause of action alleges that no money or other thing of value was given by John J. Sullivan to his children as a consideration for them to convey to him by said deed dated May 1, 1907, said property, but that said deed was executed because of the demand of said bank made upon their father that they must do so if the loan was to be obtained, and that they executed said instrument for the sole purpose of enabling said John J. Sullivan to obtain said loan of $10,000. It is further alleged that said grantor and grantee fully understood that the trust with which said property had been theretofore impressed would not be affected thereby.

The third cause of action is addressed to the proceedings commenced December 31, 1907, under the provisions of "An act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of loss or destruction of public records," approved June 16, 1906 (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), by John J. Sullivan against all persons, etc. It is admitted by affirmative allegations that by said proceedings John J. Sullivan was decreed to be the owner in fee simple of said real property and his title thereto established. It is further admitted that the affidavit, as prescribed by section 5 of said act, was made as described in the statement of facts therein. It is alleged that the omission of said father to name his children as having an interest in said real property adversely to himself was not designedly fraudulent, or with a purpose of repudiating the trust arising from the execution and delivery of said deed dated June 20, 1904, but, on the contrary, "such omission was innocently made, and was made with the knowledge and belief on his part that the equitable interest of his children in said real property would not and could not be affected by the judgment in said action so made in furtherance of said trust"; that he was advised by his son Thomas B. Sullivan, attorney at law, who acted for him in said action, that the judgment in said action would not affect or prejudice the rights of said children in the trust arising from the execution and delivery of said deed of June 20, 1904, but would in fact establish their legal title to said real property.

By the fourth cause of action or count it is claimed that the deed dated March 19, 1913, was the product of undue influence exercised by Emma upon her father. The trial court having found the issue of undue influence adversely to plaintiffs, under the admission that a conflict of evidence existed as to said issue, it is not further pressed. Under plaintiffs' present theory it is regarded as an immaterial issue.

Defendant Emma Gertrude Sullivan by her answer denied on information and belief that at any time before March 19, 1915, John J. Sullivan made or executed, or delivered a deed of the real property described in the action to any one; admitted that on June 20, 1904, the document in the form of a deed of gift was handed to said A. F. St. Sure with the written instructions heretofore referred to; alleged, however, that it was the intention of John J. Sullivan that said deed should take effect at the time of his death, and not before. Defendant denied that any other instructions, oral or otherwise, than those contained in said writings, were given to said A. F. St. Sure. On information and belief it is denied that John J. Sullivan by the delivery of said document parted with dominion over the same or placed it beyond his recall.

The theory and claim of defendant is that the deed and letter of instructions of June 20, 1904, were intended to make a testamentary disposition of said property; in other words, there was no intention in the mind of said John J. Sullivan to immediately part with title, but that said deed should become effective at the time of his death. This theory is fortified with such denials, admissions, and affirmative matters as are essential to sustain it. That an oral promise or any promise or agreement or understanding was made to or had with any one at any time to the effect that Emma should hold said real property in trust for the benefit of the children of John J. Sullivan is specifically denied. Said deed of June 20, 1904, is alleged by the answer to have been executed because of the love and affection which the said John J. Sullivan bore for defendant Emma, and for the purpose of vesting in her at the time of the father's death absolute title to said real property, free and clear of any trust whatsoever.

Denial is made that the deed of May 1, 1907, was executed and delivered by said children to their father for any purpose other than to confirm the title of said John J. Sullivan to said property in fee simple, and that it was intended in particular to convey to him any interest which the grantors therein might have had as heirs of their mother, Elizabeth M. Sullivan.

As special defenses to the second count or cause of action the bar of subdivision 4, § 338, and section 243, of the Code of Civil Procedure are pleaded.

In answering the third cause of action it is admitted that in bringing said action to establish and quiet his title the omission by said John J. Sullivan to name his children as having an interest adverse to himself was innocently made and without the purpose of repudiating any trust, but it is denied that such an omission was made with the knowledge or belief that the equitable interest of his children could not be affected by the judgment in said action or was made in furtherance of any trust whatever. The belief of said John J. Sullivan is alleged to have been that said judgment would establish his title to said property against all the world, including his children. That said John J. Sullivan was advised by Thomas B. Sullivan to the contrary, or at all, is denied on information and belief. It is alleged that none of his children have ever acquired any right, title, or interest in or to said real property, except defendant Emma, who became the owner by virtue of said deed from her father, executed and delivered to her March 19, 1913. Subdivision 3, § 328, Code of Civil Procedure, is also pleaded in bar to said third cause of action.

It rested upon plaintiffs to establish primarily two essentials, to wit: First, the execution and delivery of the deed dated June 20, 1904, as a valid escrow; second, that an oral promise or agreement was made on the part of the grantee, Emma, at the time of its execution and delivery that she would convey to each of the children living upon the death of the grantor an equal share or interest in said property; in short, that she held it as a trustee for the purposes alleged in the complaint. If they have failed to establish both or either of said requirements, then their cause must fall.

It is the claim of plaintiffs that the escrow instructions which accomplished the delivery of the deed to A. F. St. Sure in themselves close the door to all attack against the validity of the deed as an escrow. The further claim is made that the weight of the evidence confirms the trust contention. Further, the findings are attacked as being inconsistent in material respects and wholly irreconcilable except on the theory that a valid delivery in escrow was made and a trust relation between father and daughter had been established.

The attack upon the findings, especially II, V, and VII presents the most troublesome question, as an affirmance or reversal of the cause depends upon the sufficiency and consistency of said findings to withstand the assault made upon them. By this we do not mean to say that other findings may not be considered or resorted to to clarify the situation so far as they touch upon the subject-matter contained in said assailed findings. Perhaps time will be gained by reproducing said findings as they appear of record:

Finding II:

"On the 20th day of June, 1904, J. J. Sullivan, the father of the plaintiffs, made and signed an instrument in writing, in form of a deed of gift purporting to convey to defendant Emma Gertrude Sullivan the real property described in plaintiffs' amended complaint. At the time that said J. J. Sullivan signed said instrument he made, signed, and handed to A. F. St. Sure, an attorney at law, an instrument in writing, in the words and figures following, to wit:

"'San Francisco, Cal., June 20, 1904.

"'A. F. St. Sure, Call Building, San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Sir: I herewith deliver to you a deed of gift to my daughter, Emma Gertrude Sullivan, conveying to my said daughter the realty described in said deed, being a portion of 50-vara lot No. 1222, situate, lying and being in the city and county of San Francisco. Said deed was executed by me this 20th day of June, 1904. I hereby deliver said deed to you, to be delivered by you to my said daughter, Emma Gertrude Sullivan, upon my death. This deed is delivered to you to be delivered by you as aforesaid without any reservation of right to recall the same before my death and with the absolute and final determination that it shall take effect when the contingency of my death happens,

"'Yours truly, J. J. Sullivan.'

"At the time said J. J. Sullivan handed to A. F. St. Sure said instrument, a copy of which is above set forth he also handed to said St. Sure said instrument in form of deed of gift signed by him and duly acknowledged by him before a notary public in and for the city and county of San Francisco, purporting to convey to said defendant, Emma Gertrude Sullivan, all the real property described in paragraph I of plaintiffs' amended complaint. At the time said J. J. Sullivan handed said instrument in form of deed to St. Sure he intended said instrument to take effect as a conveyance upon his death, and not before, and no instructions were given by said J. J. Sullivan in respect to said instrument in form of deed or in respect to the real property therein described other than the instructions contained in said instrument, a copy of which is herein set forth, and verbal instructions to have said instrument in form of deed recorded after his, J. J. Sullivan's, death.

"That at the time when the said document, in the form of a deed, dated the 20th day of June, 1904, was handed to the said A. F. St. Sure, the said J. J. Sullivan did not part with all dominion or any dominion over the same, and did not give up all right or any right to recall the same or to alter its provisions or to have or enjoy any other or further interest in the premises in said document described, but, on the contrary, intended that the said document should not take effect until the time of the death of the said J. J. Sullivan."

Finding V:

This finding, after reciting a relation of confidence existing between father and daughter, proceeds:

"On said 20th day of June, 1904, said J. J. Sullivan, being desirous of making a disposition of the real property described in plaintiffs' amended complaint and hereinbefore referred to, and by reason of the great faith and confidence then reposed by him in said defendant Emma Gertrude Sullivan, and believing that said Emma Gertrude Sullivan would faithfully carry out any wishes that might be expressed to her by him, orally proposed to said Emma Gertrude Sullivan that he would make and execute to her a deed of the real property hereinbefore referred to, and deliver the same to said A. F. St. Sure with instructions that he hold the same until the death of said J. J. Sullivan and then deliver the same to said Emma Gertrude Sullivan upon the express oral understanding and agreement that the said Emma Gertrude Sullivan would accept said deed and hold said property and maintain the family home or make other use or disposition of the property for the benefit of herself and the other children of said J. J. Sullivan who might survive him. Said Emma Gertrude Sullivan expressly and orally agreed to this, and in reliance upon her said agreement, and upon the faith and confidence which said J. J. Sullivan had and reposed in said Emma Gertrude Sullivan, and because of the relations of trust and confidence existing between them, and, excepting a desire to avoid the breaking up of the home by a partition of the property in the event of the necessity of probate proceedings, for no other reason said J. J. Sullivan signed and acknowledged said instrument in form of deed and handed the same to said A. F. St. Sure with said written and verbal instructions herein mentioned. At the time said instrument in form of deed was handed to said A. F. St. Sure said Emma Gertrude Sullivan orally agreed to accept said instrument upon the death of J. J. Sullivan as a conveyance to her of the real property therein described upon the understanding and for the purposes above set forth. Said J. J. Sullivan would not have signed said instrument in form of deed or handed the same to A. F. St. Sure unless said Emma Gertrude Sullivan had agreed to the confidence reposed in her substantially as hereinbefore set forth. That there never was any promise by the said Emma Gertrude Sullivan or understanding between her and the said J. J. Sullivan in reference to the said property or in reference to the said instrument in the form of deed, except as hereinbefore set forth."

Finding VII:

"Said instrument in form of deed of gift made and signed by said J. J. Sullivan and handed to said A. F. St. Sure, as aforesaid, was not in fact delivered to A. F. St. Sure, and did not in fact create a trust in favor of the children of said J. J. Sullivan or any of them. The last-mentioned instrument was not intended by said J. J. Sullivan, to be a deed creating a trust for the benefit of any of his children or any one."

Finding II is a direct and positive finding against both the validity of the escrow and the alleged oral promise, upon which plaintiffs rely to establish a trust. It unequivocally holds that the instrument in form a deed absolute was intended to take effect as a conveyance upon the grantor's death, and not before, and was in effect testamentary; further, that the oral promise sought to be established was not made.

Finding V is somewhat confusing. The main thought running through it would seem to be that the father's faith in the daughter's devotion to the best interest of the family persuaded him that she would carry out any wish he might express and sacredly comply with any request he might make. As admittedly she had been the "homemaker" in the past, he believed that she would continue to stand in loco parentis. The finding seems to be constructed on the theory that it was the father's desire that the home should be maintained under proper supervision, and that his daughter Emma was a proper member of the family to intrust with this duty. The statement of fact that the father delivered the deed to A. F. St. Sure upon the understanding and agreement that the daughter would "hold said property and maintain the family home or make other use or disposition of the property for the benefit of herself and the other children" is far from a direction or request that one or all of said children might compel her to make a conveyance to them or compel a sale or partition of the property. If it be conceded that a trust was created by the recitals of finding V, it undoubtedly carried with it the duty of providing a home for herself and the other children. It must be remembered that the time the deed of 1904 was executed there was a minor son, William, under 14 years of age, and a minor daughter, Grace. It was doubtless the anxiety of the father that his minor children at least should not become homeless, and in the event, perhaps, that the stern hand of adversity should lay hold on any one of his children there still would be a shelter for even the wayward, presided over by one who had earned the right to stand in his place. No one can carefully read the record of this case without feeling such a thought pressing upon him. It is not unlikely that such a conviction, produced from a consideration of the entire family history, developed into a concrete fact in the court's mind as firmly fixed as though witnesses had given testimony to the oral agreements found to have been made, but to which in reality no witness directly testified. But, whatever may be said of the finding, it does not conflict with either II or VII in the respect that no oral promise such as is claimed and such as was necessary to create a trust was made. If from the words of said finding a trust could be evolved, it would not be the trust which plaintiffs seek here to establish. The facts found or recitals made are too vague to support any kind of a trust. But as a matter of fact the court did not intimate that a trust has been created by the acts therein related.

Ambiguity, uncertainty, and inaccuracies must be expected to occur in findings as well as in pleadings, and if by the application of the rules of construction they are cured by other findings or rendered immaterial for any reason, the court is not at liberty, for academic reasons merely, to set aside a judgment supported in other respects by the record.

Finding VII, like finding II, is specific and clear on the issue of a trust and again finds the facts to be against it. It also adheres to finding II on the issue that no valid escrow was made. The latter portion of finding V, it will be noted, uses the word "handed" instead of the word "delivery." The distinction, if any, is not important here.

We think that the court's finding against the trust is amply supported by the record. Because of the accusatory nature of the action, the domestic relations of the family are laid bare. It is regrettable that the entire subject may not be dismissed with the above summary statement. It is impossible to state the facts without entering the domestic circle.

Thomas B. Sullivan was the first child and Emma Gertrude the second of the marriage of John J. and Elizabeth M. Sullivan. In 1904 Thomas was 37 and Emma 34 years of age. Thomas received a collegiate education and later became a licensed attorney, but was then engaged as a journalist at a very remunerative salary. His duties called him from the family domicile, and he called at home every evening except on one or two evenings at the close of each week. He was married December 19, 1905. Emma was a graduate of a state normal school and had been engaged in teaching in the city schools of San Francisco for a number of years. Elizabeth F. later became a teacher. William was a youth and Grace E. a young lady of tender years. The others were as already described. John J. Sullivan, the father, was then about 60 years of age. He had been an active man in business affairs. He was evidently a man of positive and determined character and was deeply interested in the education and welfare of his children and took commendable pride in their success.

Thomas B. Sullivan, upon whose advice this action was doubtless commenced, related at great length the family history from a time prior to April, 1904, to the date of his father's death. He went minutely and with much elaboration into family discord. Only a few important features will be adverted to. It appears from his testimony that shortly after the mother's death and the action to vest title to the homestead in the father, which was met with opposition on the part of certain of the children, the father stated to him his desire to dispose of his property at that time so "that none of his children would be in a position to rob any of the others upon his death." In so speaking he made reference to said sons. His desire was to retain possession of the property during his lifetime and to have it distributed to all of his children upon his death. Thomas B. Sullivan urged his father not to leave any of his property to said three sons John, James, and Harry, as they had been wayward and that he considered them to be unworthy sons. The father remarked, according to the testimony of plaintiff Thomas B. Sullivan, that these sons would develop into decent men, and he wished upon his going "to have them all receive share and share alike as his children." Just prior to this incident, however, said three sons had conspired to defeat the father's action to divest the homestead, and were then outcasts from the home and forbidden to return. The father had bitterly denounced their plot as an attempt to "put him out in the street," "to take the roof from over his head," etc. He had expelled them from the home as being practically beyond reformation, and both Thomas and himself had caused their arrest upon numerous occasions. From a period of several years prior to 1904 their conduct had been such as to cause the father much annoyance and trouble. One of them at least had been involved in very serious trouble. After the homestead incident none of these sons seemed to have been received at home by the father except, perhaps, James in his last illness. One never again returned.

At the meeting arranged by Thomas at A. F. St. Sure's office the father suggested that the deed be made in Thomas' name. Thomas declined to accept it and suggested Emma as the proper person. The father rather insisted that Thomas accept it, as did also A. F. St. Sure, the attorney who prepared the instruments. The latter had never met Emma in the transactions and had no personal acquaintance with her. A. F. St. Sure, so Thomas testified, "begged me to trust myself rather than my sister." Thomas stated that Emma was a deeply religious woman; had been the "mainstay" of the household; the "woman of the family" after the mother's death, and did not, so far as he knew from her, intend to marry, and as a matter of sentiment he preferred to have the deed made in her name for the use and benefit of all of the children, etc. This arrangement, it is claimed, was agreed to between the father and Thomas at the law offices of A. F. St. Sure. Emma, it is claimed, was consulted and consented to hold it in trust for all of said children. This is positively denied by her. That she was not present is admitted. The deed, written instructions, and will were accordingly prepared and delivered to A. F. St. Sure.

Thomas' version of the execution of the will is that it was brought about by a discussion of a possible effort on the part of said three sons to disturb the disposition thus made of the property. Judge St. Sure remarked: "This [speaking of the will] will be a double security and will be for the same purpose." Judge St. Sure had no definite recollection as to why the will was made. He surmised that it was to carry the household effects. Thomas stated that the father said in the discussion touching the will he had just executed and by which he gave everything he possessed to Emma that "he would not cut them (the three sons) off from whatever he possessed because of their waywardness"; that "they were entitled to and should receive their share alike with the others, as they would grow into good men and reform."

Thomas and Emma were friendly until October 24, 1908. Both had contributed liberally to the support and education of the younger children. At one time Thomas had given each of his sisters $1,000, which they invested to their profit. Emma, of rather delicate health, was always at home. She was the "mainstay" of the family, and had Thomas' full co-operation until a quarrel occurred which involved the entire family. On this day Thomas, as he contends, in the presence of the father and other members of the family, charged Emma with having set into action a system of "persecution" and "oppression" against all the members of the family. He claims to have protested to the father that she was insidiously poisoning his mind against the rest of his children, and that she had become the bearer of false and evil tales to him against the other members of the family. This is denied by Emma, who asserts that the trouble arose over the fact that she was detained at the schoolroom until quite late one afternoon without knowledge that Thomas and his wife were to be at the father's home for dinner. Thomas became highly offended at her tardiness and claimed that it was intentional and was meant as an affront to his wife. From this event dates the development of Thomas' open hostility to his sister Emma. He did not again speak to her until she visited him six years thereafter at his office in reference to an important family matter. They were never again friendly. Thomas held several meetings with his brother William and two sisters present following October 24, 1908, none of whom had definite prior knowledge of the making of the deed of 1904, and informed them that Emma did not intend to keep a promise she had made to convey to each of them a share of said property upon their father's death. He was absolutely convinced, and so were all the others, from thence on and without any definite statement from Emma on the subject, that she did not intend to comply with her promise. With this conviction in his mind, he failed to mention to the father his distrust of Emma or that she had ever made a promise of any kind to be kept. None of the other children spoke to the father on this important subject.

The testimony of Emma is that she had no knowledge of the execution of the deed dated June 20, 1904, until two days thereafter. She was not present when it was made. The father informed her of it when the two were together in the library. He also reminded her that she could well remember the date, as it was executed on his birthday. Being so advised by the father, she consulted with Thomas about the deed at his office. No mention was made to her of a promise of any kind by either the father or Thomas or any one else.

The father gave to Emma his reasons for giving her the property. Her health was a matter of concern to him and her Christian character deeply impressed him. The record contains evidence showing that she had been dutiful, constant, and affectionate. He had never once lost faith in her. While others had been estranged more or less from him and did not always speak with him because of some administered rebuke or disagreement, Emma was always kind and considerate. If away from home on a short vacation she corresponded with him and expressed great concern for his comfort. A number of her letters appear in the record. A deed of the family domicile cannot, under the circumstances of the family conditions, as related by Emma and her sister Grace, be said to be unreasonable or unnatural. Incidentally it may be related that on the day of the trial the mortgage debt on said property amounted to $7,190. The father unquestionably had abiding confidence in the ability and inclination of the daughter to assume the place of mother. It was the belief of the father, and also of Thomas, that Emma would remain single. Those of the family not married would, as existing conditions indicated, be most likely to marry. The one daughter made the sacrifice and the father gratefully referred to her many sacrifices in a conversation with Grace. The boys, ordinarily, should be able to care for themselves.

Disagreements are most likely to arise in enforcing family discipline. It is a duty, however, that must fall upon some one when the mother is removed. Here it fell upon the eldest daughter.

If it was the intention of John J. Sullivan that title in said property should become vested in all of his children upon his death, his method in devising a plan is not easy to understand. According to Thomas B. Sullivan, the father was anxious that great care be exercised to the end that no child could be robbed by another, and yet the very thing that would have made each child secure in his or her rights was the act that was omitted. Why a trust in parol should have been decided on, if upon the grantor's death the property described in the deed was to be immediately conveyed by the grantee named therein as a trustee, is not altogether understandable. It was the selection of a circuitous and uncertain course as against a direct and certain course. There was no right the trustee could have preserved; no purpose he could have served. The sure, simple method by which fraud or imposition could have been avoided would have been to execute a deed making all the children grantees. Such a deed, delivered as an escrow, would have met the situation perfectly. This, however, would have permitted a sale and the breaking up of the home with two minor children to care for. The very thing certain members of the family had attempted in the lifetime of John J. Sullivan would have been accomplished upon his death with necessities just as pressing. If a trust, why a will? These were some of the questions that doubtless addressed themselves to the consideration of the trial court. The efforts made by John J.

Sullivan to recover the possession of the deed from St. Sure, the will of 1912, the subsequent deed, and, in short, all acts and declarations affecting the property, its management and control by John J. Sullivan, and his statements, made in the presence of third persons, concerning it, were pertinent to the issue of trust relations and were properly before the trial court.

Judge A. F. St. Sure, at whose office the instruments of 1904 were drawn and with whom they were deposited, was called as a witness. A short quotation from his testimony on cross-examination will serve to illustrate the danger of relying upon memory after the passing of many years to establish a trust which must stand or fall accordingly, as meaning, shadings, and qualifications are given to words, phrases, and expressions:

"Q. It was not definitely stated what disposition he was to make? A. Well, not that I remember, not that I remember.

"Q. At the second meeting the father came, did he? A. Yes.

"Q. Did the father suggest to you that he wanted to make a deed? A. That I don't remember.

"Q. Did you suggest to him that he should make a deed? A. I don't remember now. My recollection is I did not. I was opposed to make any such disposition of the property.

"Q. Your recollection is that you disapproved of this method of disposing of the property? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you remember what you said when you said you were opposed to this method of disposing of the property? A. No; I do not.

"Q. But you do remember that you were opposed to this method of disposing of the property? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you remember whether Tom or his father said to you that they wanted to make a deed to Emma in trust to convey to the children? A. I could not remember whether those words were used. I could not.

"Q. But you know now that in 1904 a trust to convey was void? A. If that is the law, I had nothing of that kind in my mind at that time.

"Q. You don't remember whether word 'trust' was used, do you? A. I don't.

"Q. Do you remember whether the father stated at that time that whoever was the grantee of this deed should take it upon a promise to do something with it? A. I don't.

"Q. Do you remember the word 'promise'? A. I do not.

"Q. Do you remember any more than that it was for the benefit of the whole family? A. For the benefit of all of the children, that she was the homemaker and would see that all of them got their share of it—words to that effect. That was the general thought.

"Q. That she was the homemaker? A. That she was the homemaker and they could trust her; that he could trust her; that he wanted all his children to share in this property, and if he deeded it to her that she would see that they all had their share of the property.

"Q. Do you remember that he said he could trust her to do the right thing? A. Oh, he may have said that.

"Q. Well, don't you remember he said that? A. He may have. I don't remember."

The testimony of plaintiffs William B. Sullivan and Mrs. Elizabeth Kelly is also weakened by the same infirmities of uncertainty and indefiniteness as to what was really said in important conversations attempted by them to be reproduced. Thomas and Emma were the principal witnesses in the case. Both testified at great length. Mrs. Grace E. MacMonnies stands with Emma and corroborates her in all material respects as to the relations that existed between Emma and the father and also Emma's relations to other members of the family. James, the youngest child, and Mrs. Kelly, plaintiffs, gave testimony in support of their cause. The situation of the family, the aim and purpose of the father as far as disclosed by the evidence, his relations with other members of the family, as shown by the record evidence and many other matters came to the attention of the trial court for its consideration. It was its duty to weigh the evidence and pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, accepting a part of the testimony of a witness and rejecting other parts as he might be convinced of their truth or falsity. After so doing he found for defendant.

We have made a careful examination of the voluminous record and are fully convinced that the finding against the oral promise alleged to have been made by Emma Gertrude Sullivan to make conveyances of the property in dispute to all the children of John J. Sullivan immediately upon his death finds substantial support in the record. This determination controls the judgment and findings, and all other issues become immaterial. Plaintiffs concede that the deed dated June 20, 1904, constitutes a valid escrow. If, therefore, the trust is not established, it matters not to plaintiffs whether they are concluded by said deed or by the deeds dated May 2, 1907, or by the "all persons" action, or by either of said wills or by the deed executed and delivered May 19, 1913.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte BRAUN. (Cr. 749.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 28, 1921.)

1. Chattel mortgages 🔑283—Plaintiff in foreclosure held estopped to claim right to further foreclosure.

Plaintiff in action to foreclose a chattel mortgage is estopped to claim the right to a further foreclosure sale, while a deficiency judgment remains a subsisting adjudication of the rights of the parties.

2. Judgment 🔑470—All intendments indulged, in support of judgments of superior courts.

It is an elementary rule that all intendments are indulged in support of judgments of courts of superior jurisdiction, such judgments importing absolute verity.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑283, 287—No deficiency judgment while property partly unsold; deficiency judgment conclusive that mortgage security exhausted.

Property subject to chattel mortgage is the primary fund out of which the debt is to be paid, and so long as any part of the property remains unsold there can be no deficiency judgment, so that a deficiency judgment is an adjudication that prior to its entry the mortgage security had been wholly exhausted.

Application by J. N. Braun for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the superior court of San Diego county to secure release of petitioner from custody on an order to show cause for contempt. Petitioner discharged.

Frank C. Dunham, of Pasadena, for petitioner.

E. M. Parker, of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The material facts in this proceeding are as follows: An action was begun in the superior court of San Diego county entitled The First National Bank of San Diego, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. J. N. Braun and Mrs. M. E. Braun, Defendants, to foreclose a certain chattel mortgage. After the necessary steps had been taken, a decree of foreclosure and order of sale were duly made and entered. A commissioner was appointed to make the sale, which was regularly held, and the commissioner made his report showing that the amount realized therefrom was $325. A deficiency judgment was then entered in the ordinary form for $492.79, the amount remaining due under the decree. Thereafter plaintiff made affidavit that the defendant, J. N. Braun, had certain of the articles covered by the chattel mortgage in his possession, and that he refused to deliver them to the commissioner, and asked that an order to show cause be made directing the defendant, J. N. Braun, to produce said articles before the superior court of the county of San Diego. The order was issued as prayed for, the hearing of which, after continuances from time to time, was finally set for the 11th day of October, 1920. Defendant did not appear; whereupon, on application of the plaintiff, an order was made by the said superior court requiring the defendant, J. N. Braun, to appear in said court and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for failure to respond to the citation. J. N. Braun is a resident of Los Angeles county, and was arrested in Los Angeles county under a bench warrant in said contempt proceeding.

As authority to sustain the jurisdiction of the superior court of San Diego county to take petitioner from the county in which he resides to another county, under the citation as herein recited, section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure is relied upon, which reads:

> "When jurisdiction is, by the Constitution or this Code, * * * conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given; and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or the statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of this Code."

By its own terms section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure negatives the proposition that it can be made to apply in this case. A course of proceeding is specifically pointed out by the Code. Our Codes afford ample remedy for the creditor who holds a mortgage upon personal property as security for his debt. After default he may foreclose the mortgagor's equity of redemption by sale of the property as of a pledge (Civ. Code, § 2967), or he may foreclose the mortgage under section 726, Code of Civil Procedure. If the property is in the possession of the mortgagor, it may be recovered by the mortgagee for the purposes of foreclosure and sale through a suit in replevin. In this case the mortgagee began foreclosure of the contract under section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A judgment fixing the amount of the debt, with interest and costs, and directing that the same be paid by the mortgagor, and that he make good any deficiency which might be found to exist after the sale, was rendered. Such a judgment is final and complete, because it leaves nothing to be adjudicated. Only ministerial acts remain to be done. Morris v. Morange, 38 N. Y. 172; Baker v. Lehman, Wright (Ohio) 522. A sale took place, the commissioner made his report, and a deficiency judgment was entered, which has not been vacated and precludes the claim now that the mortgaged property was not sold. The judgment being final, the defendant in the action became a judgment debtor. The jurisdiction of the court to enter a judgment in personam in the foreclosure of a mortgage is statutory, and no authority is given by the statute for the holding a sale by the commissioner after the entry of a deficiency judgment. Upon its entry the mortgagee acquired a right to proceed against the mortgagor personally. Again, the Code is definite as to the remedy, and allows execution to issue against the property, generally, of the judgment debtor. It further provides a means, through supplemental proceedings, of discovering property whose location may be unknown. No opportunity is afforded to invoke the aid of section 187, Code of Civil Procedure.

It is contended that proceedings supplemental to execution could not be resorted to until the resources of the mortgage are first exhausted. This is a mistake. Immediately upon the entry of the deficiency judgment a right accrued to have execution issued, and upon this being returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, to proceed under section 714 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, this section expressly provides:

> "But no judgment debtor must be required to attend before a judge or referee out of the county in which he resides, or in which he has a place of business."

The petitioner is therefore entitled to be discharged, and it is so ordered.

FINLAYSON, P. J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice CRAIG, but desire to state somewhat more fully the reason why, in my opinion, the court was without jurisdiction in the proceeding wherein it was sought to bring petitioner from Los Angeles county, the county of his residence and place of business, to submit himself for examination before the superior court of San Diego county.

Respondent expressly disclaims the idea that the proceeding in question is that which is provided by section 714 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Indeed, if the proceeding wherein petitioner was cited to appear before the superior court for San Diego county were a supplementary proceeding for the examination of a judgment debtor under section 714 et seq., there could be no question as to the invalidity of the order requiring his appearance in San Diego. Section 714 expressly provides that—

> "No judgment debtor must be required to attend before a judge or referee out of the county in which he resides, or in which he has a place of business."

Respondent's contention, as I understand it, is substantially this: After the entry of the deficiency judgment against petitioner, who was one of the two judgment debtors under the foreclosure decree in the suit to foreclose the chattel mortgage, the commissioner appointed by that decree to sell the mortgaged property discovered that certain of the properties covered by the chattel mortgage, and which had not been sold by him at the foreclosure sale, were in petitioner's possession or under his control. It was proper, therefore, so it is argued, to compel petitioner to disclose the whereabouts of those properties; and, since no course of procedure is specifically pointed out by the Code or by statute whereby the judgment debtor in a decree foreclosing a chattel mortgage can be compelled to disclose the whereabouts of the mortgaged property in order that it might be sold at foreclosure sale, the court, under section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was free to adopt any suitable mode of proceeding, such, for example, as that which was adopted by it in the present instance. This argument to support the proceeding in question rests upon the assumption that, notwithstanding the entry of the deficiency judgment, the plaintiff in the foreclosure action had the right, nevertheless, to a further foreclosure sale; that is, the right to a foreclosure sale of such of the mortgaged property as had not previously been sold by the commissioner at the foreclosure sale conducted by him, because it had not been discovered by him in time for that sale.

[1] In my opinion, the plaintiff in that action is estopped to claim the right to such further foreclosure sale while the deficiency judgment remains a subsisting adjudication of the rights of the respective parties.

[2] The rule is elementary that all intendments are indulged in support of judgments of courts of superior jurisdiction. Their judgments import absolute verity.

[3] It also is the settled law of this state that the mortgaged property is the primary fund out of which the debt is to be paid, and that so long as any part of that property remains unsold there can be no deficiency judgment. Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 293, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108. In effect, therefore, the deficiency judgment is a solemn adjudication that, prior to its entry, the mortgage security had been wholly exhausted. To hold otherwise would countenance a collateral attack upon a judgment that, until set aside, is a final and conclusive determination of all the questions that its entry necessarily implies. For these reasons I am of the opinion that, until the deficiency judgment shall have been vacated (if it may be), the parties to the action are estopped to claim that there is any mortgaged property that was not sold at the foreclosure sale, and that therefore the commissioner appointed by the court in the foreclosure decree, for want of any subject-matter of a further foreclosure sale, is without authority to make such sale, and the superior court is without jurisdiction to aid him in any such attempt.

I concur: WORKS, J.

BRUNO v. SEVERINI et al. (Civ. 2239.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 26, 1921.)

1. Trial 🔑395(1)—Findings held sufficiently responsive to defendants' cross-demand.

Findings that defendants were indebted to plaintiff in specified amounts, and that "as an offset to the above items of indebtedness this court further finds that the plaintiff above named is indebted to the defendants above named in the sum of," specifying items of indebtedness, held responsive to defendants' cross-demand, as against contention that the court failed to find thereon.

2. Appeal and error 🔑931(4) — Board and lodging presumed, in absence of finding, included in compensation for services rendered by plaintiff.

In action for services rendered by plaintiff and his wife to defendants, in which defendants cross-complained for board and lodging furnished to plaintiff and wife, it will be assumed on appeal, in the absence of a finding as to plaintiff's liability for board and lodging, that the compensation which the court found plaintiff and wife were entitled to for the services performed by them included their board and lodging.

3. Animals 🔑27 — Evidence of counterclaim for feed furnished hired horses held insufficient.

In an action for use of team, in which defendant counterclaimed for feed furnished team, testimony that he fed team "while it was and was not working," and that the reasonable value of the feed furnished while horses were not working was a specified amount per day, without specifying the number of days the team was not working, held insufficient on which to base finding as to amount due for feed.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6) — Failure to find on cross-demand held not ground for reversal.

Appellate court will not reverse judgment for plaintiff for lower court's failure to find on some of the claims involved in defendants' cross-demand, where the evidence was such that no definite amount could have been found in favor of defendants on such claims, where there was ample evidence to support finding as to defendants' indebtedness to plaintiff.

5. Master and servant 🔑80(10)—Evidence of service insufficient.

In action for services rendered, evidence held insufficient to support the finding as to the number of days worked by the plaintiff.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1171(2) — Court will not affirm $516 judgment, $78 too high, on theory of de minimis non curat lex.

In action for services, where the evidence as to the number of days of work and the rate of compensation was insufficient to sustain findings, on which court rendered judgment for $516, and showed that such amount was $78 more than plaintiff was entitled to, appellate court will not affirm the judgment under the doctrine of de minimis non curat lex.

7. Evidence 🔑383(7)—Record evidence as to number of days worked governs over testimony from memory.

Where plaintiff testified from memory as to number of days that he worked for defendants, but stated on cross-examination that the only way in which he could tell how many days he worked was by a record kept by his wife, the wife's testimony as to the number of days based on such record governs over plaintiff's testimony.

8. Appeal and error 🔑995 — Court will not consider weight of testimony.

The appellate court will not consider the weight to be accorded the testimony of a witness; such question being exclusively for the court or for the jury, according to the mode of the trial.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1140(4) — Defendants given benefit of doubt as to amount that should be remitted by plaintiff.

In an action for services, where the proof showed that judgment had been based on plaintiff working 24 more days than he had in fact worked, without showing whether during such 24 days he was to have been compensated according to one rate of compensation or according to another rate of compensation, the appellate court in affirming judgment on plaintiff's filing of remittitur will compute the excess amount at the highest rate of compensation, giving defendants the benefit of the doubt as to the rate of compensation in effect during such time.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1140(4) — Court should affirm judgment, subject to remittitur for amount in excess of sum shown by evidence to be due.

Appellate courts cannot make findings, but where there is absolutely no evidence to support a judgment in the full amount found, court of review, being satisfied that the judgment is supported by a sufficiently buttressed finding for a sum less than amount awarded by the judgment, should order judgment affirmed, on condition that the party in whose favor judgment has passed remit so much of the judgment in excess as shown by the evidence to be due.

11. Assignments 🔑137 — Testimony held to show assignment of wages.

In husband's action for services performed by wife of plaintiff for defendants, wife's testimony that "I authorized my husband to bring suit for the collection of the wages due me" held sufficient to show assignment to husband, entitling him to bring action therefor.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1078(4) — Questions not referred to in briefs presumed to have been abandoned.

Objections to rulings upon questions of evidence, not referred to in briefs, presumed to have been abandoned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Francesco Bruno against Simone Fratelli Severini and others, individually and as copartners. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed, on condition of filing of remittitur; otherwise reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. E. Ebert, of Marysville (W. E. Davies, of Marysville, of counsel), for appellants.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The action is to recover the sum of $985.75, alleged in the complaint to be due plaintiff for labor performed, for the hire of a team of horses, and for a certain sum of money paid out by plaintiff for defendants for certain merchandise at the latter's instance and request, and for services as a cook performed for defendants by plaintiff's wife; the latter having for the purposes of collection assigned her claim for said services against defendants to plaintiff. The complaint is in three counts, and further pleads the several claims referred to as upon an express contract, and also for the alleged services performed in the form of a common count, upon a quantum meruit.

The answer specifically denies all the averments of the complaint, and, by way of a "counterclaim and cross-complaint," sets up a demand against plaintiff for the sum of $615.55, "for the balance of a book account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by defendants to plaintiff, for board and feed furnished to horses of plaintiff, and for board and lodging furnished by defendants to and for the use and benefit of plaintiff, and for moneys paid out by defendants for plaintiff, at the special instance and request of plaintiff, between the ——— day of ———, 1916, and about the 1st day of February, 1919; that the last item in said account was incurred during the month of January, 1919."

The court found: (1) That plaintiff was employed by defendants for a period of 32 days at the rate of $2.50 per day; (2) that plaintiff was likewise employed for the period of 150 days at the rate of $3.25; (3) that defendants were indebted to plaintiff for use of "teams and horses" for 100 days at the rate of $1.25 per day, aggregating the sum of $125; (4) that defendants became indebted to plaintiff for goods, wares, and merchandise, bought by plaintiff for said defendants, in the sum of $23.50; (5) that defendants were indebted to the wife of plaintiff for services rendered and performed as a cook for a period of 6 months, at the rate of $50 per month, aggregating the sum of $300; (6) that said Adelaide Bruno, said wife of plaintiff, had assigned "all her right, title, and interest in and to said claim to the plaintiff above named and the plaintiff is now the owner and holder thereof"; (7) that "as an offset to the above items of indebtedness this court further finds that the plaintiff above named is indebted to the defendants above named in the sum of $75 for three tons of grapes, $3 for boxes, $1.75 for freight, $420 moneys received," totaling the sum of $499.75, which sum, the court further finds, should be and is "deducted from the amount due from the defendants to this plaintiff." Judgment was, as before stated, rendered and entered accordingly for the plaintiff in the sum of $516.25, from which judgment the defendants prosecute this appeal.

It will be noted that the court found that the total number of days on which the plaintiff rendered services for the defendants was 182, and it is contended that there is no evidence to support that finding. It is further claimed that there is no evidence which supports the finding that the plaintiff's wife assigned to him her claim against the defendants for services rendered by her as a cook. A third point is that the court failed to find on the cross-demand set up in the so-called cross-complaint. These three constitute all the points pressed in the briefs for a reversal.

[1-3] The point last stated may first be disposed of, and as to it we express the opinion that the findings whereby the court allowed a total deduction of $499.75 from the total amount found in a preceding finding to be due the plaintiff is responsive to the pleaded cross-demand. It will be noted that the court found that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendants for grapes, boxes, and freight in the total sum of $79.75, the balance of the $499.75 found to be due from plaintiff to defendants being for moneys paid by the latter to the former. The "cross-complaint," it will be observed, is in general language, so far as the claim thus made involves goods, wares, and merchandise furnished by defendants to plaintiff, and as to that general item of the cross-demand, the finding is sufficient, and, indeed, is more specific than is the purported cross-complaint itself. It is true that the cross-demand also includes "feed for horses and board and lodging furnished by defendants to and for the use and benefit of plaintiff"; but, in support of the judgment, it is to be assumed, as the findings naturally imply, that the compensation which the court found that plaintiff and his wife were entitled to for the services performed by them included their board and lodging. With respect to the feed with which defendants claim to have provided plaintiff's horses, it is to be observed that the testimony upon that proposition is so unsatisfactory that a definite finding could hardly be founded thereon. The only testimony directed to that question was that of Simone Severini, one of the defendants, and this is the testimony:

> "I fed Mr. Bruno's team all the time they were on my ranch, whether they worked or not, and on the 1st of November, 1919, he sold the team. The reasonable value of the feed furnished to the team while they were not working is from 75 cents to $1 a day. Feed was very high."

[4] It is plainly manifest that the court could not have made a just or satisfactory finding on such testimony. It does not appear therefrom how much of the time or how many days the team "were not working," whether one or two days only or for a much longer period; but, without further considering in detail the point now under review, we state it to be our conclusion that, while the findings should have been more direct and specific upon some of the claims involved in the cross-demand, the evidence is such that no definite amount could have been found in favor of defendants for the feed alleged to have been furnished by them for plaintiff's horses, and therefore, since there is ample support for a finding that defendants are indebted to plaintiff in some amount, we do not feel that we would be justified in reversing the judgment for the reason now being considered.

[5] The point first stated above, viz. that there is no evidence to sustain the finding of the number of days during which the plaintiff rendered services for the defendants, is well taken. It will be noted that the court found that plaintiff "was employed by the above-named defendants for a period of 32 days at the rate of $2.50 per day, and for the period of 150 days at $3.25 per day." Thus the court, as pointed out above, found that the aggregate number of days during which the plaintiff performed labor for the defendants was 182. That there is ample evidence that the plaintiff rendered services for the defendants, for which the latter have not recompensed him, is a fact as to which the record furnishes no ground for controversy; but we have searched and researched the record in vain for any evidence, even the slightest, to support the finding that he so performed labor for the period of 182 days.

The plaintiff testified that he worked for the defendants 112 days with his team and 60 days without the team, which, it will be noted, total 172 days only; that he was to receive $6 per day when he worked with the team; and that, without the team, they would pay him for his labor the sum of $3 per day, the wage they were paying other employees for like services. At no time, in his testimony, did plaintiff say that he worked for defendants a greater number of days than the number last above mentioned. On cross-examination, however, he admitted that he could not from memory state how many days he worked for the defendants; that "the only way in which I can tell how many days I worked is through the book, in which my wife marked down one line when I worked with the team and a cross when I worked without the team." He could not remember how many days he worked in any one of the several months during which he was employed by the defendants.

The wife of plaintiff, called by the latter as a witness, testifying from the book to which the plaintiff referred in his testimony, stated that the latter worked a certain specified number of days in certain named months of the year 1918; said book having been admitted in evidence and marked as "Plaintiff's Exhibit A." The witness testified that all she knew as to the number of days plaintiff worked was from information given her by the latter; that when he told her from time to time of the days he worked she would note the fact in the book by marking opposite the respective months specified in the book a cross to indicate the days he worked with the team and a vertical line to indicate the days he worked without the team. The book shows that there were 100 days indicated by a cross and 58 days by a vertical line.

[6] Thus it will be observed that, if we accept the testimony of the plaintiff, given on his direct examination, that he worked 112 days with the team and 60 days without the team, we have 172 days only that he rendered services for the defendants, or 10 days less than the court found that he had so performed work; but, if the testimony of his wife is to be taken, then he worked 24 days less than as found by the court. In either case, obviously, the court's finding as to the number of days the plaintiff worked for the defendants is, as counsel for the latter maintain, without evidential support; and in either case the difference between the amount awarded and that to which the plaintiff is entitled, viewed in the light of the amount of the judgment, which includes the item of $300 for services as a cook performed by the plaintiff's wife, is substantial, and, therefore, the situation so presented is not one to which the doctrine de minimis non curat lex, may justly be applied. And this is so whether the number of days improperly included in the findings is to be reckoned among those days for which the court found that he was entitled to $2.50 per day only or those for which he was to be paid at the rate of $3.25. If the basis of the calculation is to be 10 days at $2.50 per day, then, obviously, the court awarded him $25 more than he was justly entitled to, and if on the basis of $3.25 per day, then he would receive by the judgment the sum of $32.50 more than he should have been awarded. If the testimony of the wife is to be accepted as to the number of days he worked, then, figuring his compensation at $2.50 per day he received $50 more than should have been awarded him, and at $3.25 per day, he was given by the judgment $78 in excess of the amount to which he was entitled. But, after a critical examination of the case as it is disclosed to us by the record, we have concluded that (as above stated), inasmuch as it appears very clear that both the plaintiff and his wife rendered for the defendants services for which they received no compensation, the cause should not, because of the excessiveness of the amount awarded by the judgment, be remanded for a new trial, whereby the parties would be put to the expense necessarily incident thereto. We think, therefore, that a just disposition of this appeal may be made as follows: That, upon a remission by the plaintiff of the amount of the judgment, to be hereinafter specified, within 30 days after the filing of this opinion, the judgment, with the said amount deducted therefrom, will stand affirmed, but that, if plaintiff fails within the time above designated to remit the portion of the judgment so to be stated, the judgment will stand as reversed.

The only question now to be determined is how much of the amount awarded by the judgment ought, under the evidence, to be remitted by plaintiff and deducted therefrom. In determining this question it will be necessary to make a careful survey and analysis of the testimony. In the first place, we are constrained to observe that we have found no direct evidentiary reason for the distinction made in the findings for the wage rates for different days during which the plaintiff performed work for defendants—that is, that the plaintiff was entitled to $2.50 per day only for his services on certain days and $3.25 per day for certain other days. In other words, we are in the dark for a reason, if there was a substantial or any reason therefor, why the court should have found that the plaintiff's services were worth but $2.50 for a given number of days, while for another number of days his services were of the value of $3.25 per day. Neither in the evidence nor in the findings have we been able to find a ground or reason for the difference. It is shown by neither that there was any difference in the nature or character of the services rendered or any difference in the number of the hours of the working days. The difference was evidently not based upon the fact of the use and employment of plaintiff's team on the days for which he was allowed a wage rate of $3.25 per day, for the court, as seen, made specific allowance for the employment and use of the team in another finding, separate and distinct from the finding covering his own services and the compensation therefor; the allowance for the team being for 100 days at the rate of $1.25 per day. There is, however, some testimony from which the court could find that the reasonable value of the plaintiff's services was from $2.50 to $3 per day, the testimony being that the defendants paid some men $2.50 and others $3 per day for services rendered on their ranch, and it may be that, in view of this testimony, the finding of the court, upon the aggregate wage rate allowed the plaintiff, is not beyond what a straight allowance of $3 per day would have amounted to; but this proposition is not of such importance in the decision of this case as to require us to stop and throw ourselves into what might prove to be a maze of arithmetical figuring to clear it up. The question now is, as stated, upon what basis should there justly be a deduction from the judgment.

[7, 8] It will be noted that the plaintiff, on his direct examination, stated that he worked for the defendants 172 days, on 112 of which he also worked his team. In so testifying he made no attempt from his own memory to specify the days or even the month during which he so worked. On cross-examination, it is further to be noted, he stated that the "only way" in which he could tell how many days he worked was by means of the book kept by his wife for the purpose of preserving a record of the days he worked. It is evident from this admission that, when he stated on his direct examination that he worked 172 days, he was not relying upon his own independent and unaided memory as to the number of days he was employed, but upon his memory of what the said book showed was the number of days. His testimony upon this matter is obviously unsatisfactory, and, indeed, so indefinite as to render it a very frail foundation for a satisfactory finding in accordance with his general statement on direct as to how many days he worked for the defendants.

It is plain that, in considering plaintiff's testimony we are not dealing with the question of the weight to be accorded a witness' testimony, which is the exclusive function of the court or the jury, according to the mode of the trial, but a case where the face value of the testimony constitutes the full measure of its evidentiary force. In other words, the frank admission of the plaintiff that there was one way only in which he would be able to give the correct number of days he performed services for the defendants shows that upon its face his testimony, when given its full credit and weight, can go no further than to corroborate the testimony of his wife as to the number of days he actively rendered services for the defendants, and his wife's testimony was, as seen, based solely on the book in which she noted the number of days the plaintiff worked as the latter, from time to time, reported the number of days to her. Thus it is to be seen that, in the last analysis, we find that the only reliable testimony presented by the plaintiff as to the number of days the latter performed labor for the defendants was in the book referred to. This being so, the record of the extent of plaintiff's services as preserved in said book should have been taken by the trial court as the basis of its finding as to the number of days he performed labor for the defendants and so have found that the former rendered services for the latter for the period of 158 days.

It follows from this view and conclusion that the court by its findings allowed plaintiff credit for 24 days in excess of the number of days on which he was by the evidence shown to have actually worked for defendants. These findings, in their entirety, cannot, of course, be upheld.

[9] But there is still another proposition in connection with this matter which must be determined, to wit: Whether the excess number of days allowed the plaintiff by the judgment should be reckoned as among those days for which the court allowed plaintiff $2.50, or those days for which it was found that he was entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $3.25 per day. As stated, neither the evidence nor the findings reflect any light upon the question whether there was at times a difference in the character of the work or in the number of hours in the days put in performing the services. Thus necessarily, from such a situation, we are left in doubt upon the question of the wage rate which should be the basis of reckoning the amount that should be remitted by the plaintiff from the judgment for the 24 days during which the court erroneously found that plaintiff had performed labor for the defendants; but we think that the very fact that we are so in doubt should inure to the benefit of the defendants. In other words, we think the defendants should be given the benefit of the doubt thus arising, and that therefore the 24 days in excess of the number upon which the evidence shows that the plaintiff worked should be reckoned among those for which the court allowed plaintiff a wage rate of $3.25 per day, which would amount, in the aggregate, to the sum of $78. And this sum, we conclude, should be remitted by the plaintiff.

[10] It is to be understood, of course, that we are not here attempting to make a finding. This appellate courts cannot do. But, where it is made conclusively to appear that there is absolutely no evidence whatever in the record supporting a finding in the full amount found in a case in which a money judgment is entered, then such finding, to the extent that it authorizes judgment for a sum in excess of that which the evidence shows is actually due, is a nullity, and is to be treated as such and in such case a court of review, being satisfied that the judgment is supported by a sufficiently buttressed finding for a sum less than the amount awarded by the judgment, may and should, in the interest of justice, order the judgment affirmed on the condition that the party in whose favor such judgment has passed remit so much of the judgment debt as may be in excess of the sum which is actually shown by the evidence to be due. Such is the case here. If the court had found, as only the evidence warrants, that plaintiff was entitled to be credited for services for 158 days, we should affirm the judgment. Indeed, it would in that case be our duty to do so. Then why reverse the cause for a new trial when, without that expense, both the plaintiff and the defendants may receive their just rights, respectively, by the course which we here adopt? We can see no just reason for the adoption of any other course by this court.

[11] The third point made by the appellants that there is no evidence that the plaintiff's wife assigned to him her claim against the defendants for services as a cook is devoid of substantial merit. The only testimony as to the execution of the assignment was by the plaintiff's wife, and is as follows: "I authorized my husband to bring suit for the collection of the wages due me." This testimony was sufficient, we think, to justify the inference that she intended to and did assign her claim to the plaintiff for the purposes of collection. It has been held that a mere verbal or oral request by one party to his debtor that the latter shall pay money due the former to a third party is sufficient to constitute an equitable assignment of the debt, and that to constitute such an assignment no express words are necessary, if from the entire transaction it clearly appears that it was the intention of the parties to pass the title. Puterbaugh v. McCray, 25 Cal. App. 469, 471, 144 Pac. 149, and cases therein cited. "Assignments for such purposes (of collection) are of frequent occurrence, and the defendant in an action by an assignee of a claim against him is only concerned to know that the assignment is of such a character as to bind the assignor." Leitch v. Marx, 21 Cal. App. 208, 213, 131 Pac. 328, 330. That the assignor in this case will be bound by the assignment, and by the judgment establishing its validity, is a proposition clearly maintainable by the testimony that she turned the claim over to the plaintiff to sue in his own name for its enforcement.

[12] Some assignments as to certain rulings upon questions of evidence are set forth in the transcript, but the absence of reference thereto in the briefs raises the presumption that they have been abandoned.

In accordance with the views herein set forth, the following order or judgment is hereby rendered: That if the plaintiff, within 30 days from the filing of this opinion, remits in due and proper form the sum of $78 of the amount awarded him by the judgment, the said judgment shall stand as affirmed, but that, if the plaintiff fails or refuses within said time to remit said sum ($78) from said judgment, then the judgment appealed from will stand as reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. DAD. (Cr. 537.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 26, 1921.)

1. Witnesses 🔑246(1) — Court's examination of witness held not improper.

Court's examination of witness in murder prosecution, in effort to elicit material facts affecting the credibility of the leading witness for the people, held not improper.

2. Criminal law 🔑1144(10)—Trial court's attitude in examining witness presumed to have been not offensive.

It will be assumed on appeal that there was nothing offensive in the manner of the lower court in examining one of the witnesses, and that his attitude was such as to inspire the belief that he simply sought the truth.

3. Criminal law 🔑656(3) — Court's remark while trying to confine witness to question held not error.

Trial court's statement to witness while trying to confine witness to questions propounded to him, "Well, cut that out," held not error, since the remark could not have been understood to mean anything except "Strike that out."

4. Criminal law 🔑696(2)—Court may strike irresponsive answers without waiting for motion of prosecuting attorney.

The trial judge has a right to try to confine a witness to the questions propounded to him, and is not required to await the motion of the district attorney to have the irresponsive answers stricken out.

5. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12) — Court's remark to defendant's counsel held not ground for reversal.

Court's remark to defendant's attorney after ruling on objection to evidence, "Please don't make any remarks afterwards. Let the court's ruling stand. Of course, you are an old practitioner, and it is second nature, perhaps. However, please leave out the after remarks"—held not ground for reversal, being a comparatively trifling circumstance.

6. Criminal law 🔑656(9)—Judge should not throw weight of judicial position either for or against defendant.

A judge should never throw the weight of his judicial position into a case, either for or against the defendant, unless satisfied that the evidence is insufficient to justify any conviction, in which case it is his duty so to advise the jury.

7. Criminal law 🔑1170(4)—Exclusion of answer harmless in view of other answers of witness as to same facts.

The exclusion of answer to question, if error, was harmless, where the answer was fully covered by other answers of the witness which were not stricken out.

8. Criminal law 🔑364(6)—Declarations of defendant admissible as res gestæ must be so related to main event as to appear spontaneous.

Declarations of the defendant, to be shown as part of the res gestæ, must have been so closely connected with the main event as to appear wholly unpremeditated and spontaneous.

9. Criminal law 🔑364(6)—Declaration of defendant held not admissible as part of res gestæ.

In a homicide prosecution, testimony as to defendant's statement after the killing that he had sought to protect himself held not admissible as part of the res gestæ, where he had had ample time in which to contemplate a possible defense after the killing.

10. Criminal law 🔑1170(2)—Exclusion of answer held harmless in view of other answers as to same facts.

Exclusion of answer to question, if error, was harmless, where the ground embraced in question was sufficiently covered in other answers.

11. Homicide 🔑339—Exclusion of testimony as to unimportant matter held harmless.

In homicide prosecution, court's refusal to permit witness, who had testified that he was about to drink a cup of coffee and was in the act of stirring it when the first shot was fired, to answer question as to "how long did that continue while the shooting was going on," held harmless; the matter being insufficient to justify serious consideration.

12. Homicide 🔑191—Testimony that deceased had robbed and violently assaulted defendant admissible on issue of self-defense.

In homicide prosecution, defended on the ground of self-defense, defendant's testimony that the deceased had on a prior occasion violently assaulted him and robbed him of a large sum of money held admissible as a circumstance tending to justify a belief that his life was in danger at the time of the homicide.

13. Witnesses 🔑277(2) — Cross-examination of defendant as to whether deceased had been convicted of robbery of defendant held improper.

In homicide prosecution, where defendant had testified that deceased had on a prior occasion violently assaulted and had robbed him, cross-examination as to whether the deceased was ever convicted on the charge of robbing or attempting to rob defendant held improper.

14. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—Cross-examination of defendant held harmless in view of other testimony.

In homicide prosecution, where defendant had testified that deceased had assaulted and robbed him, the admission of testimony that deceased had never been convicted on the charge of robbery held harmless, in view of testimony by defendant's witnesses that there had been a mistrial and that the parties had been present to attend the second trial of the case.

15. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—Cross-examination as to how many times defendant's witness had visited defendant's attorney held not prejudicial.

Cross-examination of a witness for the defense as to the number of times he had visited the office of one of defendant's lawyers held not prejudicial to defendant.

16. Criminal law 🔑1171(1)—Prosecuting attorney's argument as to counsel's participation in other prosecution held harmless.

Prosecuting attorney's reference in argument to jury as to defendant's counsel's participation in the prosecution of another trial held harmless.

17. Criminal law 🔑824(3)—Homicide 🔑309 (5)—Failure to instruct on manslaughter held not error.

In homicide prosecution, failure to instruct on the subject of manslaughter held not error, where there was no request for such instruction, and where the killing, under the evidence, was either murder or justifiable homicide.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm E. Glenn, Judge.

Jim Dad, true name Jam Dad, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from judgment of conviction and from an order denying new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Will J. Carraghar, of Sacramento, F. J. Burke, of Petaluma, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. From the judgment following the verdict of conviction of murder in the first degree, with penalty fixed at life imprisonment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant brings this appeal. It is not disputed that at the time and place alleged in the indictment defendant shot to death two of his countrymen, including one Said Achmed, whose murder was charged in the present proceeding. There can be no doubt that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, and that the finding of the jury represents a fair and reasonable inference from the facts and circumstances that are disclosed by the record. Indeed, with commendable frankness counsel for appellant admit that—

> "The evidence upon the vital points involved was necessarily conflicting, and there isn't a particle of use of arguing the question as to whether or not the verdict is sustained by the evidence."

Whether the evidence "was necessarily conflicting" we are not prepared to say, but we agree with the statement that it was and is sufficient to sustain the verdict, and since that admission has been made, we are relieved from the duty or necessity of reciting the details of the gruesome affair as it was portrayed by the various witnesses. We proceed, therefore, immediately to the consideration of the alleged errors committed by the trial court.

The first of these in the order of their presentation relates to the conduct of the trial judge in questioning certain witnesses and making certain remarks during the progress of the trial. The general criticism is made that he interrogated the witnesses "from the standpoint of the prosecution," and as to that appellant complains "that at no time did the learned judge of the court take a witness from us and carry on a cross-examination or any examination." However, this may be regarded as a just compliment to the leading counsel of appellant for the thoroughness with which he conducted the defense. As we might suspect from his well-known ability and long and successful experience at the bar, he seems to have needed no aid in the examination of the witnesses, and his sufficiency for the task was no doubt recognized by the trial judge.

[1] The attitude that should be maintained throughout the trial by the presiding judge does not admit of doubt, and it has been so frequently the subject of comment by our appellate courts that further suggestion is not called for. In the light of the established principles by which he should be guided, we cannot say, after a careful examination of the record, that appellant has any just ground for complaint in consequence of the questions addressed to the witnesses by the trial judge. We cannot hold that he had any other purpose than to elicit a statement of material facts, or that he thereby invaded any right of the defendant or prejudiced him in the eyes of the jury. Special objection is made to the following questions and answers:

> "The Court: Well, let me ask you: What he is asking you is whether she went through the door into the kitchen, or just went to the door. A. Your honor, she's going over there for the door, and I can't say whether she's gone inside or—
> "The Court: Well, what did you see her do? A. Well, she's going over there for the door.
> "The Court: Well, where was the last point you saw her? A. In door. She's open door.
> "Q. You saw her open the door? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Then, you didn't see her going inside? A. Yes, sir, your honor, she's going in.
> "Q. I am not asking what she is doing; did you see her go in? A. When she's going in, I can't see; she's back there.
> "Q. Well, where is the last point you saw her? A. Open door; she's going this way (indicating).
> "Q. Did you see her go into the kitchen? A. Yes, sir; I see she's going in kitchen.
> "Q. Well, did you see her go into the kitchen? A. Yes; she's walking.
> "Q. Where was the last point; did she open the door? A. She opened door, yes, sir; she never come back.
> "Q. Well did you see her go beyond that, yourself? A. Your honor, when door shut, I can't see.
> "Q. Well, she went in and closed the door? A. Yes, sir; that's right, what I think.
> "Q. Well, what you saw; you saw her open the door? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Go into the kitchen? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And close the door behind her? A. Well, I never notice whether door close or not, but, at same time, the trouble start.

"Q. Well, how much did you see? A. Well, I see she's going in kitchen.

"Q. You saw her go in the kitchen? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Open the door? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Well, then, did you see the door slam back of her? A. Well, I can't see. When she's going in, the trouble start.

"Q. Well, how much did you see? A. I see her open door, and she's walking this way, and I can't see anything else. She never stop though.

"Q. Well, how do you know she didn't stop? A. Well, when she's open the door, she can't stop. When she open door, she's walking in, I think.

"Q. Well, then, I gather from your testimony that she walked down, opened the door, and that is as far as you saw her? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You never saw her after that? A. No, sir.

"Q. You didn't see her after? A. I didn't see her after; no, sir."

[2] The point to which the questions of the trial judge were addressed was important, since it affected the credibility of Mrs. Mohamed, the leading witness for the people, who had testified that she was in the dining room while the shooting was going on. It was entirely proper to search the knowledge and recollection of this witness as to the movements of said Mrs. Mohamed, and we can see nothing objectionable in the efforts to have the witness state clearly what he saw. We must assume that there was nothing offensive in the manner of the judge, and that his attitude was such as to inspire the belief that he simply sought the truth.

[3, 4] While another witness was on the stand and had made certain statements the following occurred:

"The Court: Well, never mind all this. A. All right. I go and I know I am more stronger than R. Dad—

"The Court: Well, cut that out. A. And I go up to him and get knife from him—

"The Court: Strike that out. You had better ask him some questions."

The trial judge was apparently trying to confine the witness to the questions propounded to him. This he had a right to do, nor was he required to await the motion of the district attorney to have the irresponsive answers stricken out. It must be remembered that the counsel are officers of the court to assist the trial judge in conducting the proceedings regularly and expeditiously, but the responsibility of so conducting the trial rests ultimately upon the judge. There was nothing herein objectionable, unless possibly in the use of the expression "Cut that out." That, however, involved a question of taste rather than of error. Indeed, the expression is so common that it might be regarded as in accordance with reputable usage. At any rate, it could have been understood to mean nothing else than "Strike that out."

[5] The leading counsel for appellant has apparently some excuse for a personal grievance that he was unjustifiably rebuked by the trial judge. He had asked a question of one of the witnesses to which an objection had been sustained; then the following appears:

"Mr. Carlin: Well—

"The Court: Mr. Carlin, please don't make any remarks afterwards. Let the court's ruling stand. Of course, you are an old practitioner, and it is second nature, perhaps. However, please leave out the after remarks."

The record does not justify said statement of the court, but, of course, it could not have prejudiced the defendant in the mind of any fair juror. The trial judge probably misunderstood counsel, but, at any rate, a judgment should not be reversed for such a comparatively trifling circumstance.

[6] It cannot be too earnestly asserted that a judge "should never throw the weight of his judicial position into a case either for or against the defendant, unless satisfied that the evidence is insufficient to justify any conviction, in which case it is his duty so to advise the jury" (People v. Conboy, 15 Cal. App. 97, 113 Pac. 703), but it cannot be said that herein was there any violation of this just and wholesome rule.

[7] Appellant in his cross-examination of Mrs. Mohamed asked this question: "What were they doing when they were not sitting at the table?" This referred to the movements of said Achmed and Gool after they had come into the restaurant. An objection to the question was overruled, and the witness answered: "Why, first they came in, they goes into the kitchen. They were talking to my husband." A motion was made to strike out the answer on the ground it was not responsive and not cross-examination, which was granted. Appellant claims that he had the right to go fully into the conduct of these two men to show that they were lying in wait for the defendant. But, conceding that the answer may have had such tendency, it is sufficient to say that it was fully covered by other answers of the witness which were not stricken out. It may be added that the witness testified that she saw no weapon in the hands of either of said men, and that the conversation she heard between them and her husband was in the Afghan language, which she did not understand. In connection with this it may be said that the husband testified that said conversation was in relation to the weather and to the fact that the men desired to warm themselves by the kitchen fire.

[8, 9] The witness Mrs. Mohamed on cross-examination was asked this question, "What did he [defendant] say when he passed out?" and she answered: "Well, he just told me about the shooting; he says, 'You see, they started to shoot first;' so he says, 'I protect myself.'" On motion of the district attorney this answer was stricken out "as self-serving." It is claimed by appellant that it was a part of the res gestæ and was therefore proper evidence. The rule is familiar and permits the declarations of the defendant to be shown where they are so closely connected with the main event as to appear wholly unpremeditated and spontaneous. Manifestly, it is often difficult to determine whether the situation meets the requirement of the rule. But a reading of the previous testimony of the witness shows that some little time must have elapsed after the killing, and we think it cannot be said that the ruling was erroneous. It may be true that "the smoke of the battle was still in the restaurant," but the defendant had ample time to contemplate a possible defense.

[10] The proprietor of the restaurant on cross-examination was asked this question: "You and Said Achmed and John Gool belonged to the same crowd, to the same people, or used to take up money together, didn't you?" An objection to the form of the question was sustained. It is quite apparent that the ruling was correct. The question involved several different matters, and it may be added that in response to other questions the witness fully covered the ground embraced in said interrogatory. So that the ruling, if erroneous, was manifestly without prejudice.

[11] One Pedro Lara, a witness for the people, claimed to have been at the lunch counter in said restaurant at the time of the shooting. He testified that he was about to drink a cup of coffee and was in the act of stirring it when the first shot was fired. On the ground that it was immaterial, an objection was sustained to this question: "How long did that continue while the shooting was going on?" The court might well have permitted the answer, but appellant frankly admits that it is "a small matter." We are satisfied that it is too small to justify serious consideration. We may add that the witness had substantially answered the question by stating that it continued during the entire period of the firing of the shots.

[12-14] Appellant calls attention to the fact that he testified that deceased Gool on a prior occasion had violently assaulted him and taken from his person a large sum of money. He claims—and justly so—that this was admissible as a circumstance tending to justify a belief that his life was in danger at the time of the said homicide. However, he complains that on cross-examination his objection was overruled to the following question: "By the way, Mr. Gool never was convicted on a charge of robbing you, or attempting to rob you?" The witness could not be impeached by the failure of a jury to convict his supposed assailant, and the question was improper. But it was without prejudice, as a witness for the defendant testified without objection that there was a mistrial of the charge, and it fully appears otherwise in the record that the parties were present in Sacramento to attend the second trial of the case to begin the next day.

[15] One of the witnesses for the defendant was interrogated by the prosecution as to the number of times he had visited the office of one of the counsel for the defense. The inquiry might well have been omitted, but the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the question and answer.

[16] Fault is found with the conduct of the special counsel for the people while delivering the closing argument to the jury in referring to the fact that Mr. Carlin had assisted the district attorney of Yuba county in the prosecution of a certain criminal charge against one Wilson. This was said apparently in response to a criticism of Mr. Howe for appearing in the prosecution of this case. The argument at best might be characterized as ad captandum vulgus. Neither attorney was to be censured for his said appearance, as we must assume that he believed his cause to be just. It should not have been made the subject of animadversion, but no intelligent person would be misled by such reference to a not unusual practice. In fact, appellant admits that it probably did him no particular harm. We think it should be said that it is quite improbable that it resulted in his injury.

[17] As to the instructions, appellant complains that the court failed to give one upon the subject of manslaughter. But appellant did not request such instruction, and, besides, there was nothing in the evidence to warrant it. The case was either murder or justifiable homicide. An instruction as to manslaughter could have afforded only a pretense for a compromise verdict.

In reference to the instructions requested by the defendant and refused by the court, we have carefully examined the record and find that they were fully covered by the fair and comprehensive instructions which were given.

We find no error in the record to justify an interference with the verdict, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DODINI. (Cr. 547.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 26, 1921.)

1. Assault and battery 🔑56, 84—Facts showing assault with a deadly weapon; reason for defendants desisting after pointing gun material only as to intent.

Where the defendant angrily pointed a gun at another, conceding that it was loaded, there existed every element of assault with a deadly weapon, and whether defendant's desisting was caused by the screams of a woman or some obstruction intervening between him and his intended victim, or because he believed the distance too great, or was seized with remorse, is material only to throw light on his original intent.

2. Assault and battery 🔑92—In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, evidence held sufficient to show felonious intent.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, evidence held sufficient to show that, when the defendant pointed a gun at the complaining witness, his intent was felonious.

3. Assault and battery 🔑92—In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, evidence held to show that the gun was loaded.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, evidence held sufficient to show that the gun which defendant pointed at another was loaded.

4. Criminal law 🔑1037(2)—Objection to remarks of prosecutor, without asking instruction that the jury disregard them, is insufficient.

If remarks of the prosecuting attorney were objectionable, where defendant merely objected to the remarks, but did not ask to have the jury instructed to disregard them, he cannot avail himself of the point on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Frank Dodini was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Braynard, of Redding, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. [1, 2] The defendant was convicted of the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon, and he brings this appeal upon the grounds of misconduct of the district attorney and insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. At the time of the assault the defendant and the complaining witness were neighbors, living about half a mile apart. At the time in question certain cattle, the property of the defendant, strayed into and upon the premises of the complaining witness. The latter, assisted by several other persons, was making an effort to drive the cattle away, when the defendant, armed with a rifle, appeared on the scene, and commenced vigorously to abuse the members of the party. He was very angry. When about 100 yards distant, he raised his gun as though to shoot. At that moment the wife of the complainant screamed, and he lowered the gun. He thereupon ran toward the party, and when within seven or eight feet from the complainant he pointed the gun at the latter's stomach. In arriving at a conclusion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, this court will accord full value, reasonably considered, to the evidence against the defendant. Primarily, it is the function of the jury to weigh the evidence and determine its credibility, and this court will interpose its corrective powers only when it affirmatively appears that the jury has committed an error. It is true that the defendant did not shoot, but his failure to do so is only one circumstance in a chain necessary to establish the conclusion that he did not intend to do so. In the instant case the defendant angrily presented the gun in a threatening attitude. The wife of the complainant says:

> "I heard the click and saw him give the side movement and then raise the gun like that, and then point it right at Mr. McMartin's back. * * * He didn't have it clear to his shoulder—he didn't raise it clear to his shoulder, but just like he was going to take aim, and I hollered."

Conceding that the gun was loaded, there is no room for controversy that his acts, up to this point, furnish every element of an assault with a deadly weapon. Whether his motive in desisting arose from the screams of the woman, or some obstruction intervening between him and his intended victim, or because he believed the distance too great, or because he was seized with remorse or fear, is material only in so far as it may throw light on his original intent. But the jury upon sufficient evidence has found that his intent was felonious.

[3] The defendant insists that the evidence does not show that the gun was loaded. The testimony above quoted is quite sufficient, even if standing alone, to show that it was loaded. Another witness says:

> "He throwed the lever down and brought it up as though he had loaded a gun; and I am very familiar with the various rifles, the carbine rifles, and I am almost positive a cartridge went in it, but I couldn't see the cartridge go in the gun."

[4] The remaining point made by the appellant is such misconduct on the part of the district attorney as prevented the appellant from having a fair and impartial trial. The district attorney in the course of his argument to the jury said:

"Another thing. They say this gun was unloaded, and there wasn't any shells on the place. Who owned this gun? Jack Mardley owned the gun, a man who worked for Dodini. Why haven't they brought him here to testify in this case? Why haven't they brought him here? Because he would have told you, if he had been brought here by them, that there was loads in the gun. It was loaded on that day. * * *"

These remarks were objected to by the attorney for the appellant, but he did not in any way nor to any extent invoke the aid of the court to have the jury instructed to disregard them. Conceding, without deciding, that the remarks were objectionable, the appellant is not in a position to avail himself of the point. In People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal. App. 743, 89 Pac. 454, a case strikingly like this, the court says:

"The record merely shows that the language of the district attorney 'is excepted to as unsupported by any evidence, and as prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant.' The court was not asked to strike out the objectionable remark, nor does it appear that the court ruled upon the exception. It is but fair to require defendant's attorney, in case of objectionable remarks by the district attorney, to call the court's attention to them then and there, and invoke the aid of the court to prevent the remarks from injuring the defendant, before he will be allowed to urge the matter as error in this court."

Upon the whole case we are constrained to hold that the appellant had a fair trial, that he was properly convicted, and that he should suffer the penalty imposed.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A finding based on the conflicting testimony of plaintiff and defendant alone will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Clarence W. Wallerich against Emil Block. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush and William Sea, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Greeley & Greeley and Hugh F. Keon, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff seeks to recover certain commissions which he alleges he earned by assisting the defendant in selling merchandise in Vladivostok, Siberia. Plaintiff had judgment. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he now appeals. In support of his motion for a new trial, defendant urged, as one ground, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision of the court and that it is against law.

The cause of action is based upon a letter written by the appellant to the respondent while both of them were at Kobe, Japan, which, in part, is as follows:

"Confirming your letter of January 17th, 1919, relative to taking a trip with me to Vladivostok and Harbin for the purpose of assisting in selling such commodities as piece goods, dry goods and shoes, it is understood and agreed that the two per cent. (2%) commission for such services is payable only on such orders which may be accepted by the firms in America and shipped by them and paid for by the buyers. Commissions are to be paid you as soon as I receive my commissions from the shippers.

"Any other transactions during the above trip, that is, outside of the dry goods and shoe lines, which may be put through in connection with Messrs. Sterling, Foster Co., San Francisco, it is understood that the profits derived thereof will be divided a third each, viz., one-third to yourself, one-third to Messrs. Sterling, Foster Co., San Francisco, and one-third to myself."

As was well said by the trial judge:

"The contract is not explicit in setting forth the work which the plaintiff was to do in connection with the selling of merchandise described in the contract. * * * When such a condition arises as a result of ambiguity in the language of a contract, you can't better resolve the matter than by applying to the case the practical constructions which the parties themselves would seem to have given to the contract."

After entering into their arrangenemt, the parties went to Vladivostok and remained there 17 days. They secured a place in which to exhibit defendant's samples. Plaintiff testified that he had charge at the sample room, remaining there until 10 or 11, and, upon one occasion, until 1 o'clock at night. He wrote out the orders received by the defendant, sorting out, and marking down the numbers of the samples, and attended to the correspondence. He solicited business for the defendant, during the noon hour, and when he was at lunch. He knew various people in Vladivostok whom he told what the defendant and he were doing there, and endeavored to arrange meetings with the defendant and prospective purchasers, but the defendant was too busy to see them, and left the place after securing a few orders.

[1] Defendant testified that plaintiff told him that he had been in Siberia before; that he knew the customs of the Russian people and how to handle them, and that if any sales could be made he was the one to do it, but that plaintiff did nothing beyond copying some orders on his typewriter; that he did nothing at all to assist him, and that he saw him on only a few occasions. No other witnesses testified as to those matters. On such testimony we will not disturb the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff assisted the defendant in accordance with the terms of his contract.

[2] The trial court admitted testimony of negotiations between the parties, to the effect that they attempted to reach a settlement of their differences, and that an effort of compromise was made by the appellant before this suit was brought. Appellant assigns the admission of this evidence as error, claiming that the testimony may have influenced the court in reaching its decision. We are unable to say that it did or did not. The testimony was received without objection and the appellant cannot now urge that it should have been rejected.

LAPIQUE v. WALSH. (Civ. 3748.)

Appeal and error ⚷1180(2)—Supreme Court order for new trial vacates judgment.

Where a judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court on defendant's appeal, but plaintiff's motion for a new trial, denied by trial court, was granted by the Supreme Court in proceedings prior to the amendment (St. 1915, p. 201) of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, so that they were entirely independent of the entry of the judgment, and a new trial could have been granted even by the lower court after the judgment was affirmed on appeal, the new trial vacated the judgment, so that it cannot thereafter be enforced by an assignee of the judgment creditor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by John Lapique, as successor in interest of Maria Espiritu Chijulla de Leonis, deceased, against Frank E. Walsh, administrator of the estate of Laurent Etchepare, deceased. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to enforce a judgment in favor of his assignor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

H. L. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Alleging himself to be the successor in interest of Maria Espiritu Chijulla de Leonis in a certain judgment rendered in the superior court of Los Angeles county June 3, 1901, against Frank E. Walsh, administrator of the estate of Laurent Etchepare, deceased, appellant sought to enforce the judgment and to have it carried into execution, under the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure. His motion was denied, and he has appealed from the order denying him the relief sought.

Appellant's presentation of his case on appeal in propria persona has been vague and ambiguous and the record unsatisfactory. We have not had the assistance of any respondent's brief in the case. Neither parties nor counsel protecting their interests appear here to support the action of the lower court. Counsel for the respondent, by reason of their great familiarity with this matter, could have saved the court much of the work imposed by this appeal had they filed here a short, concise statement of the case with a brief citation of authorities. Their neglect and failure to do so is inexcusable. Enough appears, however, from the record of the proceedings, and from the briefs of appellant, to enable us to reach the conclusion that the ruling of the lower court was correct. We are also enabled, by reference to the reports of the Supreme Court of this state, to more clearly understand the present angle of this ancient litigation.

Appellant's alleged predecessor in interest brought an action against Laurent Etchepare to recover certain money alleged to have been received by him as her agent, and to obtain a decree requiring him to convey to her certain real property alleged to have been conveyed by her to Etchepare, upon his false representations that she was indebted to him for money advanced, and for the purpose of securing the repayment of the same. She obtained judgment decreeing a reconveyance upon the payment by her to Etchepare of a specified sum of money with interest. On appeal, taken by Walsh, as Etchepare's administrator, the judgment was affirmed. De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 73 Pac. 813. The plaintiff in the action, Mrs. de Leonis, not being satisfied with the extent of her recovery, moved for a new trial, which being denied, she also appealed. The order was reversed, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. De Leonis v. Walsh, 145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637. The action was thereupon retried. The parties stipulated that the first judgment—the one affirmed on the appeal of the defendant in the action—be vacated and set aside and another judgment be entered. The deed executed by Mrs. de Leonis was again ordered set aside, and she was awarded a greater sum of money than was included in the first recovery. No appeal was taken from this judgment.

Some years later, Mrs. de Leonis having died, her son, the executor of her last will and testament, Juan J. Mendendez, was substituted as plaintiff in the action. He almost immediately sold and transferred to this appellant all the rights that he might have in the first decree and judgment, docketed in 1901. It is under this assignment that the appellant is here seeking to carry that judgment into execution.

There is no merit in his contentions. The fact that on the appeal of the original defendant the judgment against him was affirmed did not serve to alter the situation of the parties, which at once arose upon a new trial being ordered by the Supreme Court on the appeal of the plaintiff. The proceedings for a new trial were taken prior to the amendment (St. 1915, p. 201) of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They were therefore entirely independent of the entry of the judgment, and were properly instituted while the appeal from the judgment was pending. A new trial could have been granted by the lower court, even after the judgment was affirmed on appeal. The decision of the court would then have been vacated, and the judgment dependent upon it would have fallen with it. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 327, 27 Pac. 186; Houser & Haines Mfg. Co. v. Hargrove, 129 Cal. 90, 91, 61 Pac. 660; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 677, 69 Pac. 497. We see no reason for holding that the same result did not follow upon a new trial being granted by the Supreme Court. Consequently appellant's claim, under his purported assignment, gives him neither right, nor color of right, to revive a judgment which is legally dead.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BEEMAN v. RICHARDSON et al.

(L. A. 4858.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1921.)

1. Fraud 🔑49—Finding of fraudulent representations sustained by evidence as to one.

If a finding of fraudulent representations is sustained by evidence as to one material fraudulent representation, it is sufficient.

2. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Representations to buyer of corporate stock held actionable.

A representation that a corporation was prosperous, with a surplus of $40,000, when it was hard pushed for money and had a book surplus of but $6,000, was not a mere statement of opinion, on which a buyer of stock had no right to rely, but was a false representation of fact, and therefore actionable.

3. Conspiracy 🔑19—Evidence held to sustain a finding of conspiracy to defraud purchaser of corporate stock.

Evidence showing that the sale to plaintiff of corporate stock was pursuant to an agreement among the defendants, making it a joint undertaking, and justifying the inference that the defendants, other than the one making the representations, either knew of them or that some kind of imposition was being practiced without informing themselves, is sufficient to sustain a finding of conspiracy without direct evidence that the other parties knew of the representations made.

4. Fraud 🔑58(1) — Evidence held to prove damages to buyer of corporate stock.

Evidence that plaintiff was induced by fraudulent representations to buy corporate stock, in the belief that the company was a prosperous concern, with a substantial surplus, when in fact it was on the verge of bankruptcy, is sufficient to prove damages.

Action by George H. Beeman against J. C. Richardson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed. Superseding opinion 189 Pac. 790.

Oliver O. Clark and George M. Pierson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Moote & Patterson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The plaintiff brought suit to recover from the defendants the sum of $5,500, which he had paid a corporation known as the Richardson, Holmes & Lamb Company for 50 shares of its capital stock. The cause of action as set out in the complaint was that the defendants were the stockholders and officers of the corporation; that the plaintiff had been induced to purchase the stock by their fraudulent representations made to him, pursuant to a conspiracy between them to defraud him; and that the stock had proven worthless. After trial the lower court made findings in substantial accord with the averments of the complaint, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appeal, and the sole grounds urged for reversal are that there is no evidence to sustain the findings as to (1) fraudulent representations; (2) conspiracy; and (3) damage to the plaintiff.

[1] As to the finding of fraudulent representations, it is not necessary to detail all the representations which are alleged and found to have been made, and the evidence concerning each. If the finding is sustained as to one material fraudulent representation, it is enough. That there was evidence of one representation of this character is certain. The complaint alleged, the plaintiff testified, and the court found that, to induce the plaintiff to make the purchase, it was represented to him that the company was a prosperous one, with a surplus of $40,000 and a rapidly growing business, which required more capital, and that the stock was being sold for the purpose of obtaining it. The facts of the matter, practically uncontroverted, were that the corporation was in straitened circumstances, so straitened that it failed five months later and paid its creditors but 70 cents on the dollar and its stockholders nothing; that, instead of a surplus of $40,000, it had, according to its own books, a surplus of only a little over $6,000; that the stock was sold the plaintiff, not solely for the purpose of securing more capital for the company, but also for the purpose of securing funds to meet pressing personal obligations of the defendants, and that the plaintiff's money was in part so used.

[2] With this contrast between the representation and the facts, it would seem well nigh beyond argument that the representation was false, fraudulent, and material. The representation that the company was prosperous and had a surplus of $40,000, when the fact was that it was hard pushed for money and had a book surplus of but $6,000, was more than a mere statement of opinion, upon which the buyer had no right to rely. The statement that the sale was to secure more capital for the company was made when it was the intention that some, at least, of the plaintiff's money, in case he purchased, should not be so used. The plaintiff conceived, and it was in effect represented to him, that he was buying treasury stock, the purchase price of which would go to strengthen the company, when it was the intention to sell him, and there was sold him in fact, stock already issued, so that a part of his purchase price was diverted from the company to the defendants.

[3] The point in connection with the finding as to a conspiracy is that the representations were made by the defendant Richardson alone, and that there is no direct evidence that the other defendants agreed that they should be made, or knew at the time that they were being made. But direct evidence of that character could hardly be had in the very nature of things, unless one of the defendants should confess, and the fact must be determined by the inference naturally and properly to be drawn from those matters which can be and are directly proven. The inference of a joint fraud is, of course, not one to be lightly drawn, and can only be drawn in case the facts in evidence are sufficient to overcome the presumption against wrongdoing. But in this case the evidence showed directly that the sale to the plaintiff was made pursuant to an agreement among the defendants in advance, that is, that the making of the sale was a joint undertaking, and also showed a situation such as to justify the inference that the defendants other than Richardson either knew of the representations which the latter was employing to effectuate their common purpose, or, what is the same thing in legal effect, knew that some kind of imposition was being practiced by him for that purpose without informing themselves as to exactly what it was.

The arrangement for the purchase by the plaintiff was made in March, 1914, and finally consummated a month or so later. At the first of that year the company's business had not been going any too well, and the defendants agreed that it was advisable to sell some stock to raise further capital. Nothing was actually done in that behalf, apparently, until February, when business conditions were worse rather than better, and a bank holding the defendants' personal obligations began to press for their payment. It was then agreed to employ a broker, one Dowell, to secure a purchaser, if possible, for some stock. It is a fair inference that at this time a sale was desired for the purpose of using a part of the proceeds, at least, to reduce the defendants' personal obligations to the bank. Nevertheless, in the advertisement for a purchaser which he caused to be made, Dowell represented that the object of the sale was to obtain capital for an expanding business. This advertisement was itself a fraud if known to the defendants. They deny knowing of it, but the court was at liberty to disbelieve them. The plaintiff responded to this advertisement, and was put in touch with Richardson, who, after some negotiations, succeeded in making the sale. The other defendants knew of these negotiations and also knew immediately of their final success. In the meantime, the affairs of the company and the defendants had continued to grow worse. It was a situation in which no one of ordinary intelligence who was aware of the real condition of the company and of those interested in it would purchase stock for par plus 10 per cent., as the plaintiff did, particularly if he knew that some part of his money would not go to strengthen the company but to certain stockholders individually. Furthermore, it was a case in which any one contemplating a purchase would almost certainly make inquiry as to the condition of the company, and would not purchase unless satisfied in regard to it. In brief, the situation was such that the defendants other than Richardson must have known that the latter could hardly by any possibility make a sale on the terms of that to the plaintiff without the practice of imposition upon the purchaser. When, knowing this, they permitted Richardson to go ahead and negotiate and make a sale in their common interest and pursuant to their common arrangement, they made themselves joint parties with Richardson to whatever imposition he might choose to practice.

[4] As to the finding of damage, the point which appellants make would not seem to be concerned with the amount of the damage proven; that is, with the measure of damages, and there is no occasion for discussing that matter. The point advanced is that there is no proof that the plaintiff was damaged at all by the fraudulent representations. The only statements by appellants' counsel of the point which they desire to make are "that there is no evidence to support the finding that plaintiff has been damaged in any sum whatsoever by any representations made to him in connection with this purchase of this stock," and again that "the record wholly fails to prove any relation of cause and effect between the representations made and the loss by plaintiff of his $5,500." Upon these assertions, without any reference to the testimony or discussion, the point is permitted to rest. It is rather difficult to reply to such bald assertions otherwise than by saying that as a matter of logic it seems fairly clear to us that when the plaintiff was induced by fraudulent representations to buy stock in a company in the belief that it was a prosperous concern with a substantial surplus, when in fact it was on the verge of bankruptcy and actually went into bankruptcy a few months later, the plaintiff was damaged, and damaged by means of the fraudulent representations.

There are no other points advanced for reversal. Judgment affirmed.

Where there are specific findings, Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Consolidated actions by George E. Mills and by one Bergman against Emily E. Brady and others. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, and Davis, Kemp & Post and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Heney & Carr, George E. Mills, Frank F. Oster, George J. Stoneman, and Alfred H. McAdoo, all of Los Angeles (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for respondents.

OLNEY, J. Two actions were brought, one by a plaintiff named Mills and the other by a plaintiff named Bergman, against a number of persons as defendants. The two actions were consolidated and tried together, and judgment was given in favor of each plaintiff. The defendants appeal. The two actions are identical as to all matters pertinent to our discussion, and we may treat them as a single action.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a judgment creditor of the El Dorado Oil Company, a corporation, and has been unable to collect his judgment on execution; that the defendants respectively were the subscribers, owners, and holders of shares in the company in certain specified amounts; that there had been paid in on the shares of the defendants only 15 per cent. of their par value, and the defendants had agreed with the corporation when they acquired their stock to pay the balance of its par value when legally called on so to do. Upon these facts the complaint asks judgment against each defendant for enough of the amount unpaid upon his stock to satisfy the plaintiff's judgment against the company.

The answer of the defendants admits the existence of the plaintiff's judgment, and that the defendants were subscribers, owners, and holders of stock, as alleged in the complaint, but denies that their stock was but partially paid stock, or that they had agreed to pay in anything more upon it. It also sets up as a separate defense that their stock was issued in consideration for property transferred to the corporation, which was believed to be of a value equal to the par value of the stock, and that the plaintiff, or rather his assignor, for the plaintiff held his judgment by assignment, had been aware of the fact just mentioned when he became a creditor of the company. It will be noted, however, that this so-called separate defense is but the affirmative averment of facts showing the defendants' stock to be fully paid stock, so that it is really but a denial, in another form, of the averment of the complaint that the stock was but partially paid.

Upon the issues so made the parties went to trial and, except for immaterial variances, the court found in substance that the averments of the complaint were true and the denials and averments of the answer were not, and, as we have said, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

[1] Now, it is evident that the complaint states a good cause of action. It avers, in substance, that the plaintiff is a creditor of the company and has been unable to collect his judgment against it, and that the defendants are subscribers to and holders of stock in the company which is but partially paid-up stock. That the holders of stock of this character are responsible to the corporation upon call, and to creditors of the corporation, for the unpaid balance of the par value of their stock, is not open to question. Geary, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, etc., Co., 179 Cal. 46, 175 Pac. 457; Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 194 Pac. 11. It is likewise evident that, since the findings conform to the averments of the complaint, the judgment against the defendants is supported by both the pleadings and the findings. That this is true is in fact not controverted. The attack made upon the judgment is that it was not justified upon the evidence in the case. It is said that there is no conflict in the evidence and that upon the facts, as shown by it, judgment should have gone for the defendants. This may or may not be true, but it is a question which is not open to us for examination upon the record before us.

[2, 3] The judgment is based on the findings and not on the evidence, and the contention that the judgment is not supported by the evidence is at best nothing else than a contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence. But in the present case the record of the proceedings at the trial and upon motion for a new trial is presented in the form of a bill of exceptions, and it is the rule of the Code (section 648, Code Civ. Proc.), enforced by numerous decisions, that where the record is presented on appeal in this form, and it is sought to review the sufficiency of the evidence, the bill must specify the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient. This was not done. The only pertinent specifications are the general ones that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment and the judgment is contrary to it, and that it "is insufficient to justify the findings" and "the findings of the court are contrary to the evidence." Where, as here, there are specific findings, the Code has been construed to require no more than a specification of the particular finding or findings which it is claimed are not supported, but this at least must be done, and a general specification that the evidence does not support "the findings" is not a compliance with the Code requirement that the particulars wherein it does not support them must be stated, and is wholly insufficient. Swift v. Occidental Mining Co., 141 Cal. 161, 74 Pac. 700; Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186, 74 Pac. 774; Harris v. Duarte, 141 Cal. 497, 70 Pac.

[4] The reply of the appellants to the point so made against them is that a specification of particulars was not necessary, since a motion for new trial was made and denied, the order denying it, as well as the judgment itself, is under review on the appeal from the judgment, and the motion for a new trial was made upon the minutes of the court, as must now be done, and not upon a bill of exceptions, as might have been done previous to the amendment in 1915 of the Code provisions governing proceedings for a new trial. But, even though a motion for a new trial must now be made upon the minutes of the court, and no bill of exceptions is necessary or can be used for the purposes of the motion in the lower court, yet where the motion is denied, and it is sought to review the order denying it on appeal, and the record is not brought up in the manner prescribed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, the so-called new method, it can only be brought up by a bill of exceptions prepared and settled after the order denying the motion is made in conformity with the practice which has always prevailed in connection with motions for a new trial made upon the minutes. Such a bill of exceptions we have before us, and to it section 648, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a specification of the particulars in which the findings are not supported by the judgment, applies. Hawley v. Harrington, 152 Cal. 188, 92 Pac. 177; Carter v. Canty, 186 Pac. 346; Martin v. Hildebrand, 191 Pac. 676.

The respondent makes and insists upon the point that because of the lack of the bill of exceptions in this respect it is not open to us to examine the merits of the appellants' contentions, and we can but concede the point. It is determinative of the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

POLAKOFF v. POLAKOFF. (Civ. 3675.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 11, 1921.)

1. Divorce 🔑150(2)—Findings as to cruelty sufficient.

Where the court found that the husband rudely and violently entered the wife's home and without cause called her abusive names, struck her several times, and dragged her out of the house down the steps, inflicting great mental anguish and suffering, the contentions were without merit that the finding did not show mental cruelty for want of a finding that plaintiff was a refined and sensitive woman, or physical cruelty because showing a single act of cruelty.

2. Divorce 🔑150(2)—Finding held to warrant no other inference, but that wife was caused mental suffering by husband's acts.

In a wife's divorce suit, where the court found that in a former suit by the husband he falsely accused the wife of wrongful conduct, and that he had attempted to kidnap their child, the only inference to be drawn therefrom was that such facts caused the wife mental suffering.

3. Divorce 🔑184(5)—Court has discretion as to what constitutes cruelty and finding will stand unless discretion abused.

The trial court has some discretion in a divorce suit in determining what constitutes extreme cruelty, and in the absence of an abuse of discretion its finding will stand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Clara Polakoff against Max Polakoff. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silverton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. F. Gerech and W. S. Baird, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Plaintiff obtained a decree of divorce from defendant on the ground of extreme cruelty, and was awarded the custody of their minor daughter, together with an allowance of $5 a week for her maintenance and support.

Defendant appeals from the judgment and assigns as grounds therefor that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings and judgment.

The appeal is without merit.

[1, 2] The evidence reveals a somewhat sordid tale, and no useful purpose would be subserved by a general review thereof. The trial court found, among other facts that on a certain day defendant entered the home of plaintiff in a rude and violent manner, and without any cause or reason therefor called plaintiff abusive names and struck her violently several times in the face and other parts of her body, and dragged her out of the house down the steps, thereby inflicting upon her great pain and mental anguish and suffering. Appellant attacks this finding as being insufficient to support the judgment for two reasons: It is first contended that, as the term "extreme cruelty" is a relative one, the absence of any finding that plaintiff was a refined and sensitive woman makes the finding insufficient to establish mental cruelty; and, second, that it is insufficient to establish physical cruelty for the reason that evidence of a single act of cruelty does not constitute this offense—citing Hockerston v. Hockerston, 182 Pac. 325.

There is no merit in either contention, but a discussion thereof becomes unnecessary, for the court further found that the defendant had in a former action brought by him for divorce against the plaintiff herein falsely accused her of wrongful conduct, and also had attempted to kidnap their child, and, while these particular findings do not directly recite that such facts caused plaintiff mental suffering, the only inference to be drawn threfrom is that they did. MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 672, 102 Pac. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45. The findings are fully supported by the evidence.

[3] Some latitude for the exercise of discretion is permitted to the trial court in determining what constitutes extreme cruelty, and in the absence of abuse of discretion a finding will stand. Hockerston v. Hockerston, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOFF v. LODI CANNING CO. (Civ. 2175.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 5, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚿1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

A finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence is binding on the appellate court.

2. Contracts ⚿155 — Ambiguity resolvable against party using words.

Where any ambiguity exists in a contract, it should be resolved against the party preparing the same.

3. Sales ⚿77(1)—Contract held to require purchaser to pay price paid for tomatoes by canneries in named cities.

Where a contract for the sale and purchase of tomatoes at $12 a ton concluded with a clause that, if the Sacramento or Stockton price was more, the buyer agreed to pay same advance, and the seller testified that officers of the buyer told him that, if other canneries paid $20, they would pay him the same, the contract should be construed as requiring the buyer to pay the same price as paid by canneries in the designated cities.

4. Sales ⚿87(3)—Evidence held to warrant finding that market price in other cities which buyer agreed to meet was $20.

In an action by seller of tomatoes under a contract providing that, if the price in designated cities advanced, the buyer would pay the same, evidence held to warrant finding that the market price of tomatoes in the designated cities was $20; it appearing that canneries in such cities voluntarily advanced contracts at a lower price to $20.

5. Sales ⚿365—In action by seller who claimed additional sum, finding as to "market price" governing not open to attack; "going price;" "current price."

Where the court found that the price to be paid for merchantable tomatoes was a sum equal to the going price that should be paid at Sacramento and Stockton, and that the price and value of merchantable tomatoes in those cities was $20 a ton, and that defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $20 a ton, the finding is not open to attack on the theory that the market value was not declared, for "market price," "current price," and "going price" imply the same thing and mean the market value.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Fred Hoff against the Lodi Canning Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, for appellant.

Miller & Channell, of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] The action was to recover $2,704.73, the balance claimed to be due for a quantity of tomatoes sold by plaintiff to defendant. On February 11, 1918, the parties entered into a written contract providing for the sale and purchase of all the tomatoes to be grown that year by plaintiff and fixing the price at $12 per ton, but the concluding clause of said agreement was: "If Stockton or Sacramento price is more than $12 buyer agrees to pay same advance." Defendant in its answer claimed that prior to any delivery an oral agreement was entered into under the terms of which the purchase price was changed from $12 to $15 per ton. This was disputed by plaintiff, and it is admitted by appellant that, as to this issue, the evidence was conflicting, and, since the court found in favor of respondent, the finding is binding upon this court. Appellant declares that "this leaves only one question to be determined, which is a construction of the last paragraph in the contract" quoted above, and that the appeal is based upon three propositions:

"First, that the price referred to in the contract meant 'market price,' and it was so understood by the parties to the agreement.

"Second, that the court should have found as a fact what the 'market price' of tomatoes was in Sacramento or Stockton in the season of 1918.

"Third, that no 'market price' in either of said cities was proven by plaintiff."

[2, 3] It is apparent that the said contract was somewhat uncertain in the reference to

"Stockton or Sacramento price." As the sale of a large quantity of tomatoes was contemplated and as the canneries were the only purchasers under such circumstances, it is quite probable, though, that the parties referred to the price that canneries in said cities would pay for tomatoes at any time within the season of 1918. There is no evidence of any parol agreement or understanding at the time of the execution of this contract as to the meaning of said expression, although subsequently, according to plaintiff's testimony, the officers of the company told him "that if any of the other canneries pays $20 they will pay me $20." Other witnesses testified to the same effect. This may be regarded as some evidence, in addition to the language of the written instrument, that the parties contemplated the highest price that might be paid by the canneries in said cities. We may add that, if any ambiguity exists in the use of said expression, it should be resolved in favor of respondent, since the contract was prepared by appellant.

That $20 a ton were paid by canneries in Stockton and Sacramento in the course of the season cannot be, and in fact is not, disputed. But, granting that the parties contemplated the highest market price in said cities, then that situation is met by the evidence.

[4] A. E. Davis, buyer for the California Packing Company, testified:

> That he bought tomatoes in the market in Stockton. "All that I bought in the open market, or contracted, were paid for at the same price; but it may be possible I have been— I have been informed since there was one person that sold some to the cannery here at a less price, but I don't believe they were growers. Now, I don't know anything about that, I didn't buy them; all I bought was to be $20. I am the buyer and usually buy all those things."

Mr. C. E. Gibbs, Jr., buyer for the same corporation, at Sacramento, testified that $20 a ton was the price they were paying in Sacramento during the season of 1918.

Mr. Kay Bellew, buyer for Libby, McNeil & Libby, testified that said firm also paid $20 at Sacramento.

It is true that these corporations had contracts at a lower price, but they voluntarily advanced them to $20. Assuredly the payment of that price by these large dealers was evidence of the market value and was sufficient to justify the court's conclusion:

> "That the price to be paid for merchantable tomatoes as provided by said contract and intended by the parties thereto was a sum equal to the going price that should be paid at Sacramento and Stockton canning companies engaged in the same general business of canning tomatoes in said places, it being the practice of companies engaged in the business of canning tomatoes in said places to contract for tomatoes in a similar manner, and that the price and value of merchantable tomatoes in the cities of Sacramento and Stockton * * * on and after the 3d day of September, 1918, up to and including the 9th day of November, 1918, was $20 per ton of 2,000 pounds, and that defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff for said tomatoes the sum of $20 per ton."

[5] The form of this finding is criticized by appellant in that it is claimed the "market value" is not declared. As to this, the "price and value" would imply the value in the market. Moreover, the finding must be construed as a whole, and by reference to an earlier clause we observe that the price had in view by the court is the going price. This is the same as the market price. The terms "market price," "current price," and "going price" mean substantially the same thing. It is simply a question of the choice of expressions by various authorities. Kelsea v. Haines, 41 N. H. 246; Sloan v. Baird, 162 N. Y. 327, 56 N. E. 752; Barrett v. Schooner Wacousta, 1 Flip. [U. S.] 517, Fed. Cas. No. 1050.

The whole contest herein is really reducible to a question simply involving a conflict of evidence, and there is no warrant for us to interfere with the conclusion of the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LINGREN et ux. v. NICHOLAS. (Civ. 3718.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 4, 1921.)

Appeal and error 🔑932(1)—Presumed to uphold amount of recovery that court found no injury to foot as alleged.

In an action for damages caused by an alleged malicious unlawful assault, where plaintiff appealed under provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, being dissatisfied with amount of judgment, the trial court had power to determine that condition of foot was not caused by any injury received in the assault, and where, in support of the judgment, assuming that the trial court did so determine, there is nothing tending to show abuse of discretion, the judgment will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Konsta Lingren and wife against D. M. Nicholas. From a judgment in their favor, with which they were dissatisfied, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy, of San Francisco, for appellants.

D. M. Nicholas, in pro. per.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendant for damages caused by an alleged malicious unlawful assault and recovered a judgment for $250. Being dissatisfied with the amount thereof, the plaintiffs appealed, under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. In their brief the appellants make only one point—the award was insufficient. In making this point they claim they should have been awarded exemplary damages. We think it may be said that the judgment of the trial court included exemplary damages and that the contention of the appellants is not well founded.

The appellants, in their complaint, pleaded an unlawful assault by the respondent upon Mrs. Lingren, and they pleaded that such assault was oppressive and malicious. The trial court found on all of the issues in favor of the appellants and fixed the damages in the sum of $250. The evidence was quite evenly balanced on the questions: (1) As to whether the assault was made by Mr. Nicholas or Mrs. Lingren; (2) as to the injury, if any, caused to Mrs. Lingren; and (3) as to her expenses incurred by reason of such injuries. It is clear that after the assault Mrs. Lingren became sick and disabled; but it is not at all clear that such sickness or disability was caused by, or resulted from, the alleged assault. The principal disability from which she subsequently suffered was an infected sore on one of her feet. The assault occurred July 14, 1917. She consulted her physician July 17, 1917. It was not until July 28, 1917, that she complained to him, according to his testimony, of any soreness on the foot. He further testified that the condition of the foot could or could not be the result of an injury to the foot received at the time of the assault. As to whether the injury was so caused was a question for the determination of the trial court. That court had the power under the facts to determine that the condition of the foot was not caused by any injury received in the assault July 14, 1917. In support of the judgment, assuming that the trial court did so determine, there is nothing in the record tending in the least to show that that court abused its discretion.

The judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

KIMBALL v. SWENSON et al. (Civ. 3446.)

1. Pleading ⟹237(1)—Request to amend at trial held not supported by proof.

In an action for the conversion of corn purchased by plaintiff from defendant partnership and thereafter delivered by the partnership to the defendant creditor of the partnership under a bill of sale reciting consideration, and sold by the creditor, it was not error to refuse leave to amend the answer at trial to allege that the creditor took possession for the benefit of the partnership creditors, where that was contrary to the testimony introduced as to the nature of the transaction.

2. Sales ⟹226(10)—Buyer held to have better title than sellers' agent for the sale of corn delivered to him.

One who purchased a portion of a crop of corn while it was growing, completed the payment therefor, and demanded possession of the corn both from the sellers and from one to whom they had delivered it for sale for them, has a better title to the corn, regardless of when the transfer of title occurred, than the one to whom it was delivered, who was merely the agent of the partnership and therefore chargeable with notice of the sale.

3. Judgment ⟹253(1) — Judgment for damages for conversion allowed though exceeding amount claimed.

In an action for conversion of corn, it was not error to give judgment for the highest market value of the property between the date of the conversion and of the verdict under Civ. Code, § 3336, though that amount exceeded the amount claimed, where the answer joined issue on the amount of damages and the case was tried on the theory that the Code measure of damages should apply, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that, except in case where there is no answer, the court may grant plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by E. B. Kimball against Lyda N. Swenson and others for damages for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Peck, Bunker & Cole and C. D. Dethlefsen, all of Oakland, for appellants.

Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from judgment after verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,677.50 as damages for the conversion of 25 tons of corn. The facts material to the opinion are that for some time prior to May 23, 1918, Henry F. Pierce, Lyda N. Swenson, and N. L. Pierce were partners for the purpose of raising a crop of corn planted by them on the Bradley ranch in Contra Costa county. On the said day while the corn was planted, but not yet harvested, one of the partners, Henry F. Pierce, entered into an agreement in writing to sell to the plaintiff 25 tons of the corn from said crop for $1,000. This agreement was made with the knowledge and consent of the two other partners, and payments were made in accordance with its terms to the said Henry F. Pierce. The final payment was made by check mailed by the plaintiff from some place in Texas. A few weeks after the payment was made, plaintiff met Henry F. Pierce and asked him if the check had been received. Pierce replied in the affirmative and told plaintiff then that "the corn was his." Thereafter and in the month of January, 1919, plaintiff asked the said Pierce about the corn he had purchased, and Pierce replied that it would not be advisable to shell it at that time, as there was a good deal of wet corn in the market and it would be better to let this corn stand awhile. Again, in March of the same year, similar inquiry was made. During this time the corn was in the cribs on the ranch but had not yet been shelled nor had plaintiff's portion been segregated. On December 26, 1918, the defendant Swenson, desiring to raise additional funds for the harvesting of the corn, entered into an agreement with Henry F. Pierce whereby the said Pierce sold to the defendant Swenson all his interest in the corn crop remaining over and above the 25 tons of corn belonging to E. B. Kimball. In this agreement the defendant Swenson expressly agreed that the plaintiff was the owner of the 25 tons of corn and that he was entitled to have the same delivered to him in the manner provided in the written agreement made between him and Henry F. Pierce on the 23d day of May, 1918. The corn was shelled in the latter part of May, 1919, and on the 6th of June of the same year the defendants Swenson and N. L. Pierce delivered the entire crop, consisting of 70½ tons, and including that belonging to plaintiff, to the defendant C. S. Webber. This delivery was accompanied by a bill of sale in which a consideration of $4,200 was recited. It was, however, admitted by the parties concerned that no consideration passed for the transfer, but that the defendant Webber took possession of the corn at the instance and request of Mrs. Swenson and with the consent of the remaining partner N. L. Pierce for the purpose of disposing of the entire crop and paying off certain creditors. At the time the transfer was made it is claimed that a list of these creditors was presented to the defendant Webber by Mrs. Swenson. It is admitted, however, that in any list so presented the claim of plaintiff was not included. Soon after the transfer to Webber was made, he shipped the entire crop to a warehouse in the city of Stockton, where he caused it to be sold for $68.50 a ton, which was $28.50 a ton in excess of the price paid by Kimball for the 25 tons purchased by him. At the time of the trial he still retained the proceeds of this sale. Prior to the trial and prior to the time of the sale, demand was made upon both the defendants Swenson and Webber for the delivery of the 25 tons belonging to plaintiff. In answer to the demand made upon him the defendant Webber replied that he could not make delivery without the consent of Mrs. Swenson, and in answer to the demand made upon her Mrs. Swenson replied that she would not make delivery because the corn crop had been much smaller than they had anticipated. Neither of the defendants at the time demand was made upon them denied plaintiff's title. Upon the stand the defendant Webber disclaimed any interest as to any portion of the corn except as to his claim as one of the creditors of the partnership, while the defendant Swenson not only expressly confirmed plaintiff's title by the paper dated December 26, 1918, but admitted his ownership while on the stand.

Briefly the record discloses an executory contract to sell a growing crop, a subsequent payment in full of the purchase price, an indefinite attempt to transfer title followed by a definite confirmation of title in writing, accepted by all parties concerned as meeting all the requirements for a complete vesting of title in the plaintiff. Thereafter it appears that the crop did not come up to expectations, but that the market price of the corn had greatly increased over that paid by plaintiff. These conditions, unforeseen at the time of the sale, brought about an attempted repudiation and are no doubt the cause of the entire controversy.

[1] Appellant has presented a number of highly technical objections all of which avoid the real issue of the case as disclosed by the foregoing statement of facts. An effort is made to present the issue of the trusteeship of the defendant Webber for the benefit of certain creditors; but the issue, if triable in a case of this nature, was not properly raised in defendant's answer. The allegation therein was made upon information and belief to the effect that the copartnership "is indebted" for debts incurred in said copartnership to certain parties named. There was no allegation or proof that any of the parties named as creditors were such at the time any of the transactions between plaintiff and defendants were had. An attempt was made to amend the answer for the purpose of alleging that the defendant Webber took possession of the entire crop at the instance and for the benefit of the creditors of the copartnership. The request for this amendment was made upon the ground that it was to conform to the proof made at the trial. The request for leave to amend in this partiuclar was properly denied by the court because the evidence was directly contrary to the allegations of the proposed amendment.

There are but two other points raised by appellants which require consideration: (1) The question of title, and (2) the amount of recovery. As to the question of title, it is significant that Mrs. Swenson did not in her answer or at any stage of the proceedings assert title in herself to the 25 tons of corn in question. On the other hand, she had knowledge of the agreement to sell to Kimball either before or immediately after the written agreement of May 23, 1918, was executed. Thereafter and on December 26, 1918, she expressly consented to the sale, confirmed the transaction, acknowledged Kimball's ownership, and consented to make delivery according to the terms of the agreement of May 23d. The issue presented by her answer is that on June 6, 1919, she executed and delivered to the Webbers a bill of sale to enable them "to care for and hold the property and its proceeds for those entitled thereto against the said copartnership and as between said copartners and their successors." It is then expressly alleged that the Webbers "make no claim whatever, except as herein stated, to the ownership of said corn as against the said creditors of said copartnership, nor as to 25 tons of said corn as against E. B. Kimball." The claim of Kimball is then alleged to rest upon a transfer to him by Henry F. Pierce "of all of said Henry F. Pierce's interest in said 25 tons of corn, which said transfer by said Henry F. Pierce to E. B. Kimball was made in the spring of 1918." An identical answer was filed by the appellant Webber, wherein he also waived all claim to the ownership of 25 tons of corn except as to his claim as a creditor of the copartnership and for costs of transportation, storage, and insurance upon the corn after it had been taken into his possession. As to the issue raised in the answers relating to the effect of the "transfer" by Pierce to Kimball made in the spring of 1918, it was wholly unsupported by any evidence and directly contradicted by the agreement of December 26, 1918, signed by Mrs. Swenson and made a part of her answer by reference.

[2] It is immaterial to determine when title to the corn passed to Kimball—whether upon payment in full of the purchase price or through the oral statement of Pierce made prior to the written agreement of December 26th, by the demands for delivery made in January and March of 1919, which would constitute an acceptance by the purchaser, or by the demand made by Pierce as agent for Kimball, or by the demand made by Crofton before the corn was sold by Webber, or by the combination of all these acts with the written acknowledgment of ownership made by Mrs. Swenson. Manifestly, as between Kimball and Mrs. Swenson the former had the better title, and as to Webber, he could not obtain from Mrs. Swenson any better title than she had to convey. He was not an innocent purchaser for value; in fact, he was not a purchaser at all. Holding the corn solely as Mrs. Swenson's agent, and at her instance and request, he was charged with the knowledge of his principal. Demand for delivery was made upon him while the corn was still in his possession, and, by the terms of the agreement of May 23d, which was expressly agreed to by Mrs. Swenson, delivery should have been made within one week thereafter.

[3] As to the matter of damages, the complaint, which was filed on June 30, 1919, alleged that the corn was of the value of $1,500 and prayed for damages in that amount. The jury rendered a verdict in the sum of $1,677.50, which was the stipulated market price of 25 tons on the basis of $67.10 per ton at the ranch. The measure of damages for the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest, or the highest market value of the property at any time between conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party. Section 3336, Civ. Code. The defendants answered denying the conversion. They thus put in issue the question of damages, not merely as alleged in the complaint, but according to the measure specified in the Code. The case was tried upon the theory that respondent was entitled to recover upon whichever basis the jury should determine, and at one stage of the proceedings counsel agreed that the measure fixed by the Code applied to the case at issue. This is such a case as that contemplated by section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

> "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

The relief "embraced within the issue" was the damage for defendants' conversion. The answer having joined issue on this point, the judgment properly followed the measure of damages prescribed by the Code for such cases. O'Donnell v. Kramer, 65 Cal. 353, 4 Pac. 204; Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 244, 33 Pac. 908; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 480, 111 Pac. 360.

The judgment is affirmed.

MALVICH v. MALVICH. (Civ. 3727.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 7, 1921.)

Divorce 🔑309—Though final decree made no provision for support of children, court could modify it.

Though final decree for divorce made no provision for the support of the children of the marriage, the court which rendered it was empowered to modify it six years later by placing such burden on defendant husband by providing he should pay plaintiff wife $20 a month for each of the two minor children.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action for divorce by Josephine Malvich against James Malvich. From an order modifying final decree of divorce, defendant appeals on the judgment roll alone. Order affirmed.

W. Ernest Dickson and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order modifying the final decree in an action for divorce, and is taken on the judgment roll alone.

Both the interlocutory and final decrees awarded all the community property of the parties to the plaintiff, and made no provision or reservation for the support of the two minor children of the marriage. Six years after the entry of the final decree the court modified it by providing that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the sum of $20 per month for the maintenance and support of each of said children during minority.

Defendant, in support of his appeal from such order, contends that, the final decree having made no provision for the support of the children of the marriage, the court was without power to so modify it by placing this burden upon the defendant. We are unable to uphold this contention. In thus modifying the decree the court was acting within its power, according to the settled law in this state. There was formerly some conflict in the decisions upon this point, but in the case of Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 Pac. 32, the cases were reviewed, and the question put at rest in an able opinion. Since that decision "there can be no doubt of the power of the court which has granted a divorce to modify its judgment, at any time during the minority of children of the marriage, by providing for the custody, education, and support of such children, even though the judgment may have contained no provision on the subject. No reservation in the decree itself is necessary to the exercise of this power. The authority of the court rests upon the express provisions of section 138 of the Civil Code, and was ample even before the amendment of 1905 to that section." Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 Pac. 42. See, also, Davies v. Fisher, 34 Cal. App. 137, 166 Pac. 833.

The order is affirmed.

RIVER FARMS CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. BORGES et al. (Civ. 2265.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. April 7, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Presumptions in favor of judgment.

Where defendant appellant averred that a prior action had been commenced on a certain date, but the court failed to find on the point the appellate court would assume in support of the judgment that appellant submitted no proofs in support of the allegation.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑95(1)—Suing for installment less than whole price not election to affirm contract.

The vendor's bringing of an action for an installment less than the whole price does not operate as an election to affirm the contract precluding him from claiming the property.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(1)—In vendor's ejectment suit, defense of contract to purchase not available without offer to perform.

In ejectment by grantee of vendors, against alleged purchasers in possession, defendants cannot set up the equitable defense of their outstanding contract to purchase, where they do not offer to perform the contract by paying the amount due upon such contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by the River Farms Company of California against John Borges and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. R. Cunnyingham and McPike & Murray, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, and Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action in ejectment. Judgment in favor of plaintiff and respondent. The defendants appeal. The plaintiff claims title as grantee of the Yolo Land Company. The appellants claim right of possession by virtue of a certain contract of purchase entered into between said Yolo Land Company and appellant John Borges on October 1, 1913, whereby the latter was to pay $24,000 for the property in dispute. The sum of $4,800 was then and there paid in money and no other or further payment, except a little interest, has ever been made by Borges or in his behalf. The balance of the purchase price was agreed to be paid as follows: The sum of $3,840 on the 1st day of October in each of the years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, together with interest. In order to understand the point of this appeal it is necessary to quote a number of provisions of the contract under which the property was purchased. The provisions in question follow:

> 01. "If any of said installments are not so paid, then at the option of the owner, the whole of said principal sum and interest shall become immediately due and payable or all rights of the purchaser under this contract be deemed terminated as mentioned hereinafter."
> 5. "It is also, expressly understood and agreed between the parties hereto that in all matters and things hereunder to be done, and all payments hereunder to be made, time is and shall be of the very essence of this agreement."
> 6. "The waiver by the owner, of any breach of covenant or agreement on the part of the said purchaser shall not be deemed or held a waiver of the terms of this contract making time of the essence thereof as to other payments thereafter falling due."
> 7. "In the event that any payment remains unpaid for thirty days after the same becomes due according to the terms of this agreement, the owner shall be released from all liability hereunder at law or in equity either to convey the above-described real estate or to repay all or any part of the payments made by the purchaser; but in that event all payments made shall be deemed and considered as rent paid for the period before such default and shall be retained by the owner, and all further rights of purchaser under this contract to the payments made or to a conveyance or possession of the real estate shall thereupon terminate and cease; * * * provided, however, that the owner on purchaser's default, may at his option bring an action to foreclose the rights of the purchaser or to recover installments due, according to this clause, either for installments delinquent or for the whole balance of the contract price unpaid."
> 8. "That each and all of the terms hereof shall inure to the benefit of and be binding upon, the heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns of both parties to this contract."

The defense to the action is not based upon any claim that the defendant Borges has complied with the terms of his contract, for it is admitted that he has never paid a cent upon the principal of said purchase price except the $4,800, paid at the date of the contract or a few days thereafter.

The defense is that the Yolo Land Company, by an election of inconsistent remedies, has estopped itself to claim a recovery of the land, and is relegated to other remedies. The outstanding fact in the case then is that the defendant Borges is claiming the land and withholding the money. It would be a woeful injustice if he could do this, and we are not prepared to say that the law either sanctions or permits such a result. To appreciate fully this defense of election of remedies, it is necessary that we examine in detail the several acts relied upon to establish the election and the several alternatives reserved to the seller in the contract of sale.

The installment of October 1, 1914, remaining unpaid, the Yolo Land Company, on August 24, 1915, commenced an action against defendant Borges to recover the same, but the action was dismissed without trial. If, however, the commencement of this action constituted an election, then the subsequent dismissal thereof did not operate as a revocation of the election.

Another installment ripened on October 1, 1915, and on November 9, 1915—more than 30 days after it became due—the Yolo Land Company, in an action brought against it by said Borges, filed an answer and cross-demand, setting up said contract and the default as to said two payments that became due, respectively, on October 1, 1914, and October 1, 1915, and praying judgment in said sums. Thereafter certain persons purporting to be trustees of the creditors and stockholders of said Yolo Land Company filed amended answers, setting up the default of defendant Borges as to said two payments, and praying judgment accordingly.

On or about the 23d day of February, 1918, said trustees filed in said last-mentioned action their amended answer to supplemental complaint therein, alleging, among other things, that said Yolo Land Company, on or about November 6, 1916, conveyed the premises in question to the plaintiff herein, and praying for judgment in the sum of $14,360, but without any statement as to what that sum represented. Said answers and amended answers averred that said Yolo Land Company was dissolved on May 1, 1917, by a decree of court.

It will be noted that the fact and date of the dissolution and the fact and date of the conveyance to the plaintiff are not found by the court and they get into the record only by way of recital in an answer filed in another action. We have no proof that they took place. This appeal is based wholly upon the judgment roll, and we look to that alone for our facts.

It is found by the court that "prior to the commencement of the above-entitled action the said John Borges refused, upon tender of a good and sufficient deed to said premises, to pay the balance of said purchase price or to deliver up and surrender the possession of said premises, and has never at any time offered to complete said contract"; and it is, of course, presumed in aid of the unwritten defense to the allegations of the answer that such finding is properly supported by an implied allegation to like effect. This action was commenced on January 13, 1919, or more than three months after the maturity of the last of the deferred payments. In other words, at the time of the commencement of this action, the defendant Borges was completely in default on all his payments and interest save the initial payment and a small sum by way of interest.

[1] At no time was there ever a suit brought for the whole of the purchase price, nor for any part of it except for the first two installments. Much stress is placed by appellant upon the fact that the Yolo Land Company, on November 9, 1915, filed an answer in a suit brought against it by said defendant Borges, wherein it set up the default as to the installment that became due on October 1, 1914, and also the installment that became due on October 1, 1915, claiming that the action itself has been commenced some months earlier and before the maturity of said last-mentioned installment. However, the installment was more than 30 days overdue at the time the answer was filed, and this is sufficient But if it were otherwise, we are without light as to the date of the commencement of the suit. It is true that the defendant Borges, in the third paragraph of his third defense, avers that it was commenced on August 31, 1915, but the court failed to find on the point. We must assume in support of the judgment that the appellant submitted no proofs in support of this allegation. Mohr v. North Rawhide Mining Co., 177 Cal. 264, 170 Pac. 600. The position of the appellants is that the inclusion of an installment not then due could be done only under the forfeiture clauses of the contract permitting the owner to bring an action for the entire purchase price in case any installment was overdue. In view of the state of the record as above outlined, it becomes unnecessary to examine their contention that such inclusion constituted an election of inconsistent remedies.

We have stated that there exists in the record no proof that the Yolo Land Company was ever dissolved. In making this statement we are not unmindful of the fact that the court found, in finding 14, as follows:

> "That on or about the 25th day of February 1918, H. C. Morris, Charles Sutro, E. L. Dow, J. F. Humburg, and H. A. Kunz, as trustees of the creditors and stockholders of the Yolo Land Company, filed," etc.

But this finding falls far short of a finding that the Yolo Land Company was dissolved. In support of the judgment we may assume that it is yet a subsisting corporation, if such an assumption is necessary.

The court found that defendant Borges had refused upon tender of a deed to pay the balance of the purchase price. In support of the judgment the court will presume that this deed was executed by the proper parties; that the demand was made by the proper parties and in the proper sum, and that these facts were established by competent evidence. Upon this state of the record the judgment must be affirmed, unless the acts of the Yolo Land Company in bringing the first mentioned action and in filing the answers in the second mentioned action constituted such an election as estops it and its vendees from claiming the property.

[2] But bringing an action for an installment less than the whole purchase price cannot operate as such an election. The installments were due, and the payee had a right to proceed to collect them. This has been held even in an action to recover an installment on the purchase price of personal property. In Silverstin v. Kohler & Chase, 183 Pac. 451, 9 A. L. R. 1177, the court, speaking through Wilbur, Justice, says:

> "There is no difference in principle, in favor of the purchaser, between such recovery of the installments due and the payment of those installments by the purchaser without suit. The seller was not therefore put to his election between two inconsistent remedies."

We are not called upon to determine what would have been the effect had the vendor obtained a judgment for the entire purchase price, for no such judgment was either given or sought.

[3] But even if the findings as to various allegations contained in answers in other actions could be regarded as findings that the matters so alleged are facts, still the appellants would not be entitled to prevail. The defense of the appellants is an alleged equity arising out of the contract in question. In no event can they be heard to assert this defense until they, or at least until Borges, shall have offered to perform. Not only has he not offered to perform; he even affects to show that circumstances have relieved him from the obligation to perform, thus placing himself in the grossly inequitable position of claiming both the land and the price. But, as above shown, these alleged circumstances are supported only by his allegations that the pleadings in another action aver them to be true.

Courts will not tolerate a principle at once so gross and so at variance with fair dealing. If any authority in support of so obvious a principle were needed, it is found in the case of Connolly v. Hingley, 82 Cal. 642, 23 Pac. 273, where the court, in an action in ejectment against a vendee in possession, says:

> "The burden was clearly upon the defendant to sustain the allegations of his equitable defense, and, having failed to do so, the finding was properly against him. * * * The plaintiff claims under a deed from Chapman. * * * It is apparent that the defendant can have no greater right against the plaintiff than he had against Chapman. And so far as the possession is concerned, he has no equity against Chapman, because he was in default > under his contract, without excuse. As was said in Hannan v. McNickle, ante, p. 122, which is similar in principle: 'The performance of his contract is an essential feature of any equitable defense on his part.' * * * The conveyance to the plaintiff did not relieve [him] from his obligation to comply with his contract. * * * He was bound to pay some one, and he has not paid any one, or offered to do so. This prevents him from having any right to equitable relief."

A demand upon Borges was found by the trial court, but, since the answer shows that a demand would have been unavailing, it was not necessary to perform the vain act of making one. The claim of appellants that the alleged dissolution of the Yolo Land Company relieved Borges of the duty of performing his contract is scarcely specious. Even if the dissolution had been found by the court, such dissolution would not have worked an extinguishment of the obligation. He would still have owed some one and he made no offer to pay any one.

The point urged by the appellants that there is no finding as to the value of the use and occupation of the premises arises through inadvertence. The court in finding 4 expressly covers this point.

It does not appear to be necessary for this court to speculate as to the method whereby the plaintiff acquired the title. The court, in finding No. 6, determines that at the date of the contract the Yolo Land Company was the owner of the property. In finding 2 it is shown that the plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of this action, was and ever since has been the owner thereof. There is no inconsistency in these findings. The evidence in the case is not before us, and we are required to assume such a state of the evidence as would justify the findings of the court. Whether the plaintiff acquired the property by mortgage sale, tax title, direct conveyance from the Yolo Land Company or otherwise cannot affect the result.

The appellants plead the statute of limitations, but they have affirmatively shown that they never claimed by an independent and hostile title, but only as vendees under a contract of purchase which they have not performed nor offered to perform.

That the Yolo Land Company or its assignee of its rights under the contract could, if vested with the legal title, eject the appellants, would seem to be too plain for discussion, and its grantee stands in at least as good a position. It has been noted, however, that the court has not found that the Yolo Land Company ever conveyed the property to the plaintiff. But it has found, in support of the allegations of the complaint, that the plaintiff was, at the commencement of this action, the owner and entitled to the possession thereof and this, as we have shown above, is sufficient, and the court will presume such conveyance as may be necessary to support the finding.

The court was under no duty to fix a period within which appellant Borges might perform his contract. He asked no such relief, and he did not offer to perform. We find no error that would justify a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

BANK OF CORONADO v. SHREVE.
(Civ. 3672.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 10, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 7, 1921.)

1. Arbitration and award 🔑50—Construction by parties held to show award was filed in time.

Defendant, who signed an arbitration agreement requiring the award to be made within 30 days from the date of submission, and who participated at hearings before the arbitrators held more than 30 days after the date of the agreement, and signed two stipulations empowering the arbitrators to perform certain duties after that period, is precluded by the construction placed on the agreement by the parties themselves from contending that the agreement required the arbitrators to make their award within 30 days after the agreement was signed.

2. Arbitration and award 🔑50—Court can direct clerk to change entry to conform to parties' construction of agreement.

Where the parties to an arbitration agreement by their acts construed the agreement as not requiring the arbitrators to make their award within 30 days from the date of the agreement, it was not error for the trial court to order its clerk to amend the entry in the register, made under Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, so as to conform with the terms of the agreement of submission as construed by the parties.

3. Arbitration and award 🔑57—Agreement held not to require findings on each item.

Arbitration agreement and subsequent stipulations of the parties, requiring arbitrators to determine all matters in controversy submitted to them, does not require the arbitrators to make specific findings upon each item claimed by a party.

4. Arbitration and award 🔑76—Assignor of interest in award cannot request vacation of it.

Where plaintiff, who had agreed with defendant to submit their controversy to arbitrators, assigned his interest in the award to a bank which notified defendant of the assignment, and was substituted for plaintiff as the party of record, and thereafter gave orders to the bank, which the latter accepted, for the disposition of part of the proceeds of the award, the original plaintiff could not, after the award, make settlement with defendant and entitle the latter to a vacation of the award at the request of the original plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Proceedings for the arbitration of differences between William Hoyte Colgate and J. H. Shreve, in which the Bank of Coronado, as assignee, was substituted for Colgate. From an order denying the motion of defendant Shreve to vacate the award of the arbitrators, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Reed, of Calexico, George H. Shreve, of Los Angeles (Jerome H. Kann, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Horton L. Titus and Frank J. Macomber, both of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of San Diego denying the appellant's motion to vacate an award made and filed therein in the course of an arbitration proceeding had between certain parties under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to such proceedings.

The facts of the case are these: On April 21, 1919, J. H. Shreve, the appellant herein, and one William Hoyte Colgate entered into an agreement in writing to submit certain matters in controversy between them to arbitration. Three arbitrators were named in said agreement, and it was further therein provided that the award of said arbitrators "be made in writing by said arbitrators or any two of them and be delivered to the said parties or their attorneys within thirty days from the date within which said submission is made to said arbitrators." The arbitrators so chosen qualified on the 10th day of May, 1919, and thereupon and on May 11, 1919, filed with the clerk of the superior court, pursuant to the provisions of section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the agreement of arbitration, with their qualification attached thereto, and thereupon proceeded to hear the allegations and take the evidence of the parties, and for that purpose met and adjourned from time to time until the 14th day of June, 1919, when they made and filed their award, wherein, after a detailed report of the proceedings before said arbitrators, it was found and adjudged by them that J. H. Shreve was indebted to the said William Hoyte Colgate in the sum of $16,307.02. On July 15, 1919, the said J. H. Shreve filed a motion in writing in said court to vacate and set aside said award upon a number of designated grounds. Said motion came on for hearing, and was heard on July 3, 1919, whereupon the court denied said motion, and from the order of the court denying the same this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first contention urged by the appellant is that the award of said arbitrators was void because the same was not made or filed by said arbitrators within 30 days from the date of submission to them. This contention is based upon the language of the agreement of arbitration above set forth, and which, according to the construction which the appellant insists should be placed upon its terms, required the making of said award within 30 days from the date of the agreement itself. From an inspection of the record herein we are satisfied that the appellant was not entitled to urge this contention before the trial court, nor to make the same upon this appeal. The record herein discloses that the arbitrators selected by the parties qualified as such on May 10, 1919, and thereafter up to June 14, 1919, held their several hearings in pursuance of their functions as such arbitrators, at all of which the appellant herein appeared without any objection to the prolongation of such hearing beyond the period of 30 days after the date of the agreement in question. It further appears that on the 14th day of June, 1919, that being the last day of the sessions of said arbitrators, and being also Saturday, the afternoon of which was a half holiday, the parties entered into a stipulation in writing to the effect that the arbitrators might continue to act as such during the afternoon of said day with the same effect as though it were a judicial day, and in addition the parties further stipulated in writing—

> "That the original award of the board of arbitrators herein shall be retained by a member of said board for the period prescribed in the agreement submitting the matter to arbitration, at the expiration of which time the said original award shall be filed by said members of said board in the above-entitled matter. * * * That all exhibits introduced in evidence in this matter shall be retained by a member of the board of arbitrators during a period of thirty days from and after giving said award, and at the time of filing the original award in the above-entitled court said exhibits shall be delivered to the clerk of said court."

We are clearly of the opinion that the appellant by his acts and conduct in consenting to and participating in the sessions of said board of arbitrators, which were being held after the date when, as he now claims, they had no further jurisdiction to act, has concluded himself from claiming that the provision of the arbitration agreement above quoted is to be given a different interpretation than that which the parties themselves gave it while the matter was pending before the board of arbitration, and that the appellant is particularly so concluded by the two stipulations which he entered into on June 14, 1919, granting said board express authority to act as such after the period which, as he now claims, marked the limit of the jurisdiction of said board had expired. We find no merit, therefore, in the appellant's contention in this regard.

[2] And this disposes, also, of his next contention that the action of the trial court in ordering its clerk to insert in the register of actions a memorandum as to the time within which the award should be made was void. The court had jurisdiction to direct its clerk to amend the entry in the register made under section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to conform to the requirements of that section and with the terms of the agreement of submission (Cal. Academy of Sciences v. Fletcher, 99 Cal. 207, 33 Pac. 855), and the amendment to the register entry, which the clerk so made pursuant to such direction, caused it to conform to the terms of the agreement of arbitration as the same had been interpreted by the parties themselves.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the arbitrators failed to determine all of the matters submitted to them, and that their award was in that respect defective, and hence in violation of the agreement for arbitration and of the later stipulation of the parties made while the matter in controversy was in the hands of the arbitrators. We do not think this contention is maintainable upon the record before us, nor that it can be fairly predicated upon the language of the written agreement or later stipulation of the parties. The appellant fails, we think, to show that the arbitrators did not consider all of the controverted matters, and that they did not include them all in their final determination of the balance due between Shreve and Colgate. The gravamen of the appellant's complaint is that the board of arbitrators did not make specific findings upon each item of the disbursements of Shreve, and which he claimed were chargeable against Colgate, but we do not find that either the original agreement of arbitration nor the later stipulations of the parties requires such itemization. They merely require a "determination" by the board of the matters in controversy, and we are satisfied that the board's determination, as embraced in its conclusions, include them all.

The next point urged by the appellant is that the trial court erred in refusing to permit him to introduce in evidence upon his motion to vacate the award a copy of certain reporter's notes of the proceedings before the board of arbitration. We are satisfied that no proper foundation was laid for the introduction of these notes, and that the objection to their introduction was properly sustained.

[4] The final contention of the appellant is that the trial court was in error in refusing to vacate the award in question upon the affidavit and showing of William Hoyte Colgate that he had settled all matters in dispute between himself and the appellant, and upon his request contained in said affidavit that said award should be vacated. The facts germane to this particular inquiry, as shown by the record, are these: On the 12th day of June, 1919, William Hoyte Colgate made, executed, and delivered to the Bank of Coronado an assignment in writing of the judgment or award to be given, rendered, or entered in the matter under submission to arbitration, and in and to all moneys due or to become due thereunder. Notice of this assignment was immediately given by the Bank of Coronado to this appellant, and thereafter and on July 31, 1919, the said Bank of Coronado was, upon its motion, substituted in the matter then pending in the superior court in the place and stead of William Hoyte Colgate as the party in interest of record therein. The assignment above referred to was general in its terms, but there was also executed on even date therewith an agreement between said William Hoyte Colgate and the two gentlemen who had been acting as his attorneys in the matter of the arbitration, by the terms of which they became entitled to receive in payment for their services performed and to be performed in said matter a certain percentage of the amount recovered by said Colgate by virtue of said impending award. This agreement was transmitted to the Bank of Coronado, which admitted receipt of the same, and agreed on its part to disburse whatever funds it should receive by virtue of said award and its assignment, in accordance with said agreement. It further appears that about June 20, 1919, said Colgate gave a written order to said Bank of Coronado to pay to one Gertrude M. Colgate the sum of $2,800 out of any moneys received by it from said award. After these several transactions it appeared that Colgate and the appellant herein got together, and, regardless of these assignments and orders, undertook to make a settlement of the matters theretofore in controversy between them, and in pursuance thereof to bring about the vacation of the award. It was this attempted settlement which formed the subject and substance of the affidavit of Colgate which was presented upon the appellant's motion to vacate the award, and which the trial court is charged with having disregarded. Clearly, the trial court was not in error in disregarding this portion of the settlement between the appellant and said Colgate, and also was not in error in refusing to vacate said award upon Colgate's request. Colgate has ceased to be a party to the proceeding before the court. By his assignment he had conveyed the whole legal title in and to said award and to all moneys receivable thereunder to the Bank of Coronado, and had further transferred by his agreements and orders, above referred to, definite interests to his said attorneys and to Gertrude M. Colgate in the subject-matter of said award. His subsequent attempted settlement with the appellant was sought to be made without the presence, knowledge, or consent of these several parties to whom he had thus transferred definite and valuable interests in said award, and his attempted action in seeking and requesting the vacation of said award would, if permitted to succeed, have the effect of destroying, or at least seriously imperiling, these interests and rights. This being so, the trial court very properly exercised its discretion in disregarding the affidavit of Colgate and in refusing to accede to his request for the vacation of said award after the transfer by him, both in fact and of record, of a considerable part of his interest therein.

Finding no error in this record, the order is affirmed.

In re KAFITZ'S ESTATE. (Civ. 3421.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators ⚷122(2), 500—Special administrator chargeable with personalty and not entitled to compensation until return.

A special administrator, who without authority and without right parted with personal property belonging to the estate, should be charged therewith, and his estate should not be permitted to retain as compensation for his services any part of the funds of the estate administered upon until the property is returned to the executors, or, in lieu of such return, until the value of the property has been paid the estate administered upon.

2. Executors and administrators ⚷500—Special administrator not to be deprived of compensation for aid to claimant of interest in estate.

A special administrator who cared for and accounted for substantially all of a large and valuable estate held not to be deprived of compensation for his services because at the same time, with a strong partisan bias, and by all means in his power he was aiding one of the claimants to an interest in the estate in her efforts to establish the claim; the representative's compensation should not be reduced for any cause other than misconduct directly affecting the care of the property in his charge.

3. Attorney and client ⚷130—Attorney for special administrator not to be deprived of fees because also acting for claimant in will contest.

An attorney need not be totally deprived of fees for services rendered a special administrator because he was at the same time acting as attorney for one of the claimants in a contest over the will of the deceased person whose property was in possession of the special administrator.

4. Executors and administrators ⚷216(2)—Fee of attorney for administrator may be allowed to him directly.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, an attorney's fee for services rendered special administrator may be allowed directly to the attorney, and need not be allowed to the special administrator as an expense incurred by him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William Kafitz, deceased. From an order settling the first and final account of Charles H. McGwire as special administrator, certain parties who appeared as persons interested in the estate as heirs at law and residuary legatees, appeal. Order reversed, with directions.

J. L. Murphy and Oscar Lawler, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph Scott and Willedd Andrews, both of Los Angeles (A. G. Ritter, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from an order settling the first and final account of Charles H. McGwire as special administrator. Appellants appeared as persons interested in the estate as heirs at law and residuary legatees, and also as executors of the last will and testament of decedent, and filed their exceptions in writing to the account. They personally have taken this appeal.

On November 27, 1918, special letters of administration were issued to McGwire. On November 29th appellants filed their petition for probate of the will of decedent. The will was contested by Maud M. Kafitz, surviving wife of the decedent. In an action for divorce, wherein William Kafitz was plaintiff and Maud M. Kafitz defendant, an interlocutory decree had been entered less than one year before the death of William Kafitz, and, therefore, a final decree of divorce had not been entered. After trial the will was admitted to probate in May, 1919, and appellants were appointed executors thereof. On December 2, 1918, appellants filed a petition for removal of the special administrator, which petition, after hearing, was, on the 27th day of December, 1918, denied. On April 25, 1919, petitioners filed a second petition for removal of the special administrator. This was set down for hearing on July 16th and thereafter continued until September 11, 1919. Prior to September 11th and while under arrest and charged with the commission of a crime, McGwire came to his death by suicide. His estate was represented at the hearing on said account and on the exceptions thereto, and the order of settlement of the account was made December 12, 1919. The value of the property accounted for by the special administrator was about $88,000.

The exceptions to the account were based upon the stated ground that the special administrator failed to account for all of the property received by him, and in particular that he allowed Mrs. Kafitz to take and appropriate to her own use certain items of said property. It was further objected that the claim of the special administrator for an allowance of $1,000 for his services and for an allowance of $1,000 as fees for his attorney were exorbitant, and that no allowances for those purposes should be made. The court, in its order, decided that the special administrator has turned over to the executors all of the property of the estate except the sum of $2,500; that it was necessary for the special administrator to seek frequent advice of his attorney in connection with his administration; that the sum of $750 each is a reasonable fee for the special administrator and his attorney. Thereupon the court provided that out of the moneys remaining in the hands of the special administrator, or his successors, "$750 shall be allowed as attorney's fees to Joseph Scott, and said special administrator shall retain as his commission allowed by law for his services $750" and directed the distribution of the remaining $1,000 to the executors.

Appellants claim that the evidence was insufficient to support the court's decision that the special administrator has turned over to the executors all of the property except $2,500 in this, that the evidence showed, without substantial conflict, that the special administrator had in his possession, belonging to the estate, certain personal property of the proved value of $113.50, for which he has failed and refused to account. It is also contended that the court erred in making any allowance for compensation for services of the special administrator or his attorney.

Counsel for appellants say:

> "Our contention is that the special administration was conceived and carried on, not in the interest of the estate and whoever might be ultimately adjudged entitled thereto, but as a means whereby a part of the property of the estate might be, and was, unlawfully passed to Maud M. Kafitz, as an instrumentality for assisting the latter and the special administrator in attempts to intimidate and corrupt prospective witnesses in the contest between said Maud M. Kafitz and the executors and the beneficiaries under the will which she was contesting."

Then follows a résumé of the facts, which they claim appear by the record herein affecting the conduct of the special administrator.

[1] Concerning the amount of property not accounted for, appellants contend that the undisputed facts show willful and wrongful disposition thereof. The evidence does show, without conflict, that this property belonged to the estate of William Kafitz, deceased, and not to his wife. But assuming this to be the fact, and further assuming that Mrs. Kafitz's conduct and the conduct of McGwire in his methods of assisting her in her contest against the will of decedent deserves the most severe criticism, this is not alone sufficient to have compelled the court to find bad faith on the part of the special administrator in allowing her to take possession of these small items of personal property which were claimed by her. Nevertheless, having, without authority and without right, parted with personal property belonging to the estate, the special administrator should be charged therewith, and his estate should not be permitted to retain as compensation for his services any part of the funds of the estate until said property is returned to the executors; or, in lieu of such return, the allowed compensation should not be permitted to be paid until the estate has received the value of said property. We do not overlook the fact that appellants claim that there was other property of the estate not accounted for by the special administrator. As to such other property, however, the evidence was not conclusive, and this court must therefore assume that said items, amounting to $113.50, constituted all of the property not accounted for.

Referring now to the more general charge that throughout his administration the special administrator acted in fraud of the law, in antagonism to the beneficiaries of the trust, and for the advantage of himself and Maud M. Kafitz, it appears from the evidence that in the contest which ended in the admission of the will to probate, Joseph Scott appeared and acted as attorney for the contestant, and at the same time he appeared and acted as attorney for the special administrator throughout the proceedings relating to the special administration. It further appears that McGwire, while acting as special administrator, was also actively aiding Mrs. Kafitz in her contest of the will. While many of the facts charged against McGwire and against Mrs. Kafitz in the affidavits in this proceeding are disputed, enough appears to show beyond controversy that McGwire was a strong partisan of Mrs. Kafitz in the will contest, and the evidence strongly tends to show the use by him of unjustifiable and wicked methods in his actions concerning said contest. From these facts two questions of law arise: First, may a special administrator who has cared for and accounts for substantially all of a large and valuable estate be totally deprived of compensation for the services thus rendered because he was at the same time, with strong partisan bias and by the use of all means in his power, aiding one of the claimants to an interest in the estate in her efforts to maintain and establish that claim? Second, must an attorney be totally deprived of fees for services rendered to a special administrator when and because he also and at the same time was acting as attorney for one of the claimants in a contest over the will of the deceased person whose property was then in possession of the special administrator? A third and minor question incidentally arises.

May an attorney's fee for services rendered to a special administrator be allowed directly to the attorney, or must such allowance be made to the special administrator as an expense incurred by him, on showing that it was necessary for him to employ an attorney to assist him in the performance of his official duties?

[2] On the first question it is our opinion that under the circumstances stated the special administrator remains entitled to just compensation for the services rendered by him. It is to be presumed that in fixing the amount of such compensation the court confined itself to the value of the services of the special administrator in his official capacity, and did not allow him for other services rendered to a party to the will contest. Since, in fact, the administrator was not removed by the court, the amount of his compensation should not be reduced for any cause other than misconduct directly affecting his care of the property in his charge.

[3, 4] The second question is answered by the decision of the Supreme Court in Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 478, 70 Pac. 455, 456:

> "In a controversy between the heirs of a decedent upon a matter in which the administrator has no interest, and which does not affect his relation to the estate in his hands, the attorney for the administrator violates no obligation to his client by acting as attorney for one of the heirs as against the others. See Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 499. Correlatively, and for the same reason, the administrator violates no obligation to his trust by continuing to retain such attorney in his service."

Formerly it was the rule in this state that whatever allowance is to be made from the estate for the services of the attorney of an executor or administrator must be made to the executor or administrator, and cannot be made to the attorney. Estate of Kruger, 143 Cal. 141, 76 Pac. 891. Since that decision, and others there cited, statutory amendments have been made which indicate a change in the policy of the law. Section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure now provides that an attorney who has rendered services to an executor or administrator may, upon notice and during the administration, apply for, and upon appropriate showing obtain, an order requiring the executor or administrator to pay to him, out of the estate, compensation on account of services rendered by him. Section 1619, Code of Civil Procedure, provides for payment to be made directly out of the estate to attorneys for executors and administrators. Since the law concerning the payment of fees of attorneys for executors and administrators has thus been changed, we perceive no reason why allowance to attorneys for special administrators should not now be made in the same manner.

Applying to this case the law as hereinbefore stated, we are unable to sustain the contention of appellants that the court below erred in allowing compensation to the special administrator and to his attorney, or that the amounts fixed by the court are exorbitant. The determination of the sums thus to be allowed is vested in the superior court, and should not be interfered with on appeal unless there appears to have been a manifest abuse of discretion.

Solely upon the ground that the evidence proved, without contradiction, that personal property of the estate to the value of $113.50 has not been accounted for by the special administrator, the order is reversed, with directions that the superior court proceed to settle the account in accordance with this decision.

We concur: SHAW, J.; JAMES, J.

HOLOHAN et al. v. McADAM et al.

(Civ. 3763.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 7, 1921.)

1. Wills 🔑386—Verdict on conflicting testimony as to unsoundness of mind not disturbed.

Judgment refusing to admit a will to probate, based on a jury's verdict on sharply conflicting testimony that at time of execution of the purported will testatrix was of unsound mind, will not be reversed.

2. Wills 🔑53(2)—Evidence as to condition of testatrix's mind before and after testamentary act relevant.

In proceedings to probate a will contested for testamentary incapacity of testatrix, evidence to show the condition of testatrix's mind before and after the date of her testamentary act was relevant and important for its bearing on the condition of her mind when the will was executed.

3. Wills 🔑55(1)—Evidence on issue of mental unsoundness sufficient to sustain verdict adverse to will.

In proceedings to probate a will contested for testatrix's incapacity and mental unsoundness, conflicting testimony on the issue held sufficient to justify verdict adverse to the will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Application of Maud McAdam and others for the probate of the alleged will of Annie O'Connor, contested by James B. Holohan and others. From judgment refusing to admit the will to probate, proponents appeal. Affirmed.

Rea, Cassin & Caldwell, of San Jose, for appellants.

John W. Preston, of Ukiah, Chas. B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, and Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the proponents from a judgment of the lower court refusing to admit to probate a document dated April 25, 1919, purporting to be the last will and testament of Annie O'Connor, deceased. The contest was tried before a jury, which found that while the purported will was not procured through the undue influence of certain of the proponents, as charged by the contestants, Annie O'Connor was not of sound and disposing mind at the time the document was signed by her. This appeal presents the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of unsoundness of mind.

In the lower court, the contestants, who are the respondents here, offered evidence tending to support their contention that Annie O'Connor, by reason of an advanced state of arteriosclerosis, produced by various causes, had been for several months prior to April 21, 1919, seriously impaired mentally. On that day she suffered a severe stroke of paralysis, producing a state of coma, which, the respondents contend, lasted until Mrs. O'Connor's death, and resulted in a condition of complete incompetency, which prevented any normal action on the part of the testatrix during that entire period. The proceedings had and the testimony taken at the trial are presented in a voluminous record. It will be impossible for us to do more than briefly summarize portions of the evidence relied upon by the respective parties to sustain their opposing contentions, and which, in our opinion, not only presents a conflict of testimony, but strongly preponderates in favor of the contestants.

The document which was refused probate was dated the 25th day of April, 1919, four days after Annie O'Connor suffered a cerebral hemorrhage, from which she died at her home in Watsonville, Santa Cruz county, on the 2d day of July, following. She was then in her sixty-eighth year. Some four years before the testatrix had executed a will, by the terms of which she devised to James B. Holohan $14,000; to Alice Holohan Kelly the sum of $5,000; to Mrs. Mary Jackson, an elderly lady who lived with her, $800; to Margaret Nash $800; to Frances and Gertrude Zills her house and lot in Watsonville; to her cousins, sons and daughters of her uncle, Thomas Pearson, of East Twenty-Seventh street, New York City, $10,000; to the Pajaro Valley Orphan Asylum $500; and to the superior of the Valley Church, Watsonville, $500 for masses for herself and family. She named H. S. Fletcher as executor of this will. These provisions appear to have been dictated by the mandates of affection and justice. The relations between the testatrix and the legatees named in the will of 1915 appear to have continued after its execution, just as in the past. In the document of April 1919, offered for probate by the proponents, a number of changes were made. Some of the former legacies were omitted entirely. Others were enlarged or decreased. New devises and bequests were inserted. We do not think it material to our consideration of the appeal to dwell at length on the situation in which Mrs. O'Connor was placed in the last months of her life, or the circumstances under which the purported will was executed. The issues of unsoundness of mind, and of undue influence, were submitted to the jury with an offer on the part of the contestants that if the jury reached a verdict of unsoundness of mind, the second issue could be answered in the negative. That was done. As we think the evidence amply supports the finding of the jury that Mrs. O'Connor was of unsound mind at the time of the making of the second will, any reference to changes in the terms of the two wills, or the circumstances of the execution of the questioned instrument, will be only incidental to our consideration of the question presented by this appeal.

Dr. Koepke, who had been Mrs. O'Connor's personal physician for several years preceding her death, testified that during that time she was variously afflicted, having, as the doctor described it, "a complication of troubles which continued all the time." When her physician first treated her in 1912, she complained of a heart lesion or "leaky heart" resulting from an insufficiency of the mitral valve. There was a perceptible arteriosclerosis or hardening of the arteries, which progressed to the time of Mrs. O'Connor's death. The doctor discovered that she was permanently subject to Bright's disease, and suffered from an incontinence of urine. Feeling unable to relieve his patient, Dr. Koepke ceased visiting her in February, 1919. On April 21st, following, Mrs. O'Connor suffered a cerebral hemorrhage caused by the bursting of a blood vessel in the brain. Dr. Koepke was at once called, and for the next two months saw her almost daily. She was unable during that time to use her left arm and limb, and there was a marked drawing of one side of her face. After the stroke the patient had no power of control of her bowels and bladder, and their natural functions. From that time also, so far as the doctor observed, she did not initiate conversation on any subject. She paid little, or no attention to anything, merely lying quietly and answering "Yes" to any questions asked her. The doctor testified that from the 21st of April, 1919, the day on which Mrs. O'Connor was stricken by the cerebral hemorrhage, until the time he ceased to treat her, on June 25th following, her condition did not vary, and he gave as his opinion that Mrs. O'Connor was not of sound mind during that time, He was very firm also in his opinion that she could not have appreciated, known, or understood the contents, or the full import and meaning, of the document she signed.

There is other testimony that, following the stroke of paralysis, Mrs. O'Connor's condition remained almost unchanged; that from that time until her death, two months later, she was irrational, took no interest in any affairs, did not talk. and did not recognize friends whom she had known for many years. This condition, the witness testified, gradually grew worse. Mrs. Kate West, the nurse who took care of the old lady during a part of this period, testified, by deposition, that the patient's mouth was drawn to one side. Sometimes Mrs. O'Connor did not know where she was. She talked very thick, did not articulate well, and could not carry on a connected conversation. Frequently the nurse had to stop the patient from tearing the quilts to pieces. At times also, Mrs. O'Connor seemed to be trying to sew without a needle. Mrs. Margaret Fahey, an entirely disinterested witness, was called on behalf of the proponents. She had known the deceased for 15 years. She testified that upon the occasion of a visit she made to Mrs. O'Connor after the stroke, the old lady did not know her, and the witness had to tell her her name. She appeared dazed and "stared off into space" when the witness attempted to engage her in conversation. In her opinion, Mrs. O'Connor was not of sound mind at that time. Mr. F. A. Kilburn was one of the subscribing witnesses to the will. He was called by the proponents. He testified that Mrs. O'Connor did not initiate any conversation while he was in the house, and answered all questions by "Yes" or "No." He made no test of her mentality. He went there to see her sign her name, which she did "rationally." After having testified that, in his opinion, Mrs. O'Connor was "capable" at the time she signed her name to the document, on cross-examination he "was not prepared to say that she was of sound mind at that time."

Mrs. Mary Atteridge, who had known Annie O'Connor for about 40 years, visited her on the day, and just prior to the time, the purported will was signed. At that time the old lady was tearing at the quilts on the bed; she did not speak to the witness, and made no reply to the questions she asked. In Mrs. Atteridge's opinion, the old lady was not of sound mind at that time, and was in the same mental condition when next visited by her, in May, following. Mary Jackson, a friend of the deceased for 37 years, lived in the same house with, and assisted, Mrs. O'Connor for the 8 or 9 years preceding the latter's death. Even prior to the stroke, according to this witness, Mrs. O'Connor's mind was failing continually. By the terms of the first will she was left $800. In the document of 1919 she was given $1000, but she was greatly incensed at the circumstances attending the execution of the latter document at a time when, as she testified, "Mrs. O'Connor could do no business at all," and "when she wasn't of sound mind." She at once reported the occurrence to Mrs. O'Connor's confidential agent and adviser, Mr. Fletcher. Mrs. Momand, next door neighbor and old friend, testified that Mrs. O'Connor was acting irrationally before the final stroke. Two days after the hemorrhage she visited the sickroom. In her opinion, at that time, the deceased was of unsound mind. She did not recognize the witness, and did not remember the visit of friends who had been with her the night before. The symptoms described by this witness continued until Mrs. O'Connor's death. Rev. Wm. J. Clancy, the assistant pastor of the church in which the deceased had her membership, saw her a number of times before and after the stroke. He anointed her according to the rites of the church, in preparation for death, a ceremony which the decedent did not, in his opinion, appreciate. Before the hemorrhage, according to Father Clancy, the decedent's memory had almost completely gone, and she was not normal mentally. She remained passively in this condition until she died.

There is much more evidence to the same effect. Edward E. Kelly, husband of one of the contestants, an old acquaintance, attended to the payment of Mrs. O'Connor's monthly bills for her for several years prior to her death. He testified that during the latter months of her life her mind was failing. About two weeks before the stroke he found her on the street in a dazed condition and unable to recognize him or to appreciate what he said to her. He found her in a stupor on the morning of the stroke and visited her some 15 times before she died. In his opinion she was "out of her mind" during the time. Elizabeth Holohan, George W. Holohan, Stasia Speckens, Louise Schroeder, and Carrie Burke, testified, the effect of their evidence being that before the stroke Mrs. O'Connor's mind was failing and she was at times irrational, a condition which was aggravated by and gradually grew worse after that occurrence.

The contestants who testified in their own behalf were: James B. Holohan, who seems to have stood in almost the relationship of a son to Mrs. O'Connor, and who was one of the principal legatees under the will of 1915, but who was omitted entirely from the 1919 instrument; H. S. Fletcher, for many years the confidential business agent of Mrs. O'Connor; Alice Holohan Kelly; Frances Zills; and Gertrude Zills—all close and intimate friends of Mrs. O'Connor, and for whom she entertained the warmest personal regard. All of these witnesses testified to facts tending to show that Mrs. O'Connor was irrational, and of lapsing memory prior to the stroke, and of unsound mind thereafter. In their opinion, after April 21, 1919, her mental condition was such that she was incapable of doing any business.

The force and effect of the foregoing testimony is assailed by the appellants. They depend upon an analysis of portions of the evidence favorable to themselves, and the assertion that upon cross-examination statements were elicited from some of the witnesses at variance with their more direct testimony. But the fact remains that the witnesses testified as we have briefly narrated. On the other hand, there is evidence on the part of the proponents, the effect of which is directly to the contrary from that adduced by the contestants. It would serve no useful purpose to present as long a résumé of this testimony as we have done in discussing the case of the contestants, for the result would be merely to emphasize the direct conflict, the burden of resolving which in favor of one side or the other rested upon the jury. There is evidence, which, if it had been accepted by the jury, would be sufficient to support a verdict upholding the validity of the will. For instance, the attorney who drew the will testified that when he visited Mrs. O'Connor on the morning of April 21st, she was weaker than normal and spoke in a rather low voice, but expressed herself plainly on what she wanted. She gave him instructions relative to making a will, which he jotted down and took to his office, where he prepared the document in question. He then took it back to Mrs. O'Connor's home, where she signed it in the presence of himself, Dr. Koepke, and Mr. Kilburn. She was, in his judgment, at that time of sound mind. When Miss Helen Phelan, an old friend of Mrs. O'Connor, called on the 7th or 8th day of May, she had a conversation with the deceased, at which time she appeared rational. Rev. Florian Zettel, the Catholic priest who received $1,000 under the will of April 25th, Caroline McAdam, Maud McAdam, each a legatee under the will, and Ida McAdam, testified to conversations and actions of the decedent, before and after the final stroke, to show her competency. The weight to be given to their testimony, and whether or not its effect had been destroyed on cross-examination, or overcome by the evidence on the other side, were all matters for the jury, as in the case of the witnesses for the contestants. The testimony of Dr. Koepke, and Mr. Kilburn, the other subscribing witness to the will, has already been alluded to. The effect of the direct examination of Mrs. West and Mrs. Gay, nurses who cared for Mrs. O'Connor after April 21st, to the effect that the deceased at times possessed sufficient mentality to execute a will, was somewhat destroyed by the evidence of Laura Falkenberg, another nurse, who was also a witness for the proponents. She testified that during the time she was with the patient, she was "absolutely without mentality."

[1-3] From the foregoing it is at once apparent that the jury reached its verdict that, at the time of the execution of the purported will, on April 25, 1919, Mrs. O'Connor was of unsound mind, on sharply conflicting testimony. In the absence of substantial error of law occurring at the trial, and none is claimed here by the appellants, a judgment based upon such a verdict will not be reversed. Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 630, 632, 178 Pac. 510. Appellants attempted to discredit the evidence of Dr. Koepke, who testified that when Mrs. O'Connor signed the purported will, on April 25th, she was not mentally able to comprehend or understand its contents, and thus claim that Mr. Wyckoff's positive testimony, and the less satisfactory evidence of Mr. Kilburn, stand uncontradicted. But the jury, apparently, did not think Dr. Koepke discredited, or his testimony unworthy of credence. Even had it done so, we would still be unable to set aside their verdict on the grounds advanced by appellants. Much evidence was admitted on both sides to show the condition of Mrs. O'Connor's mind before and after the date of her testamentary act. Such evidence was relevant and important for its bearing upon the condition of her mind when the will was executed. In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 Pac. 172, 711; In re Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932. This evidence was entitled to such weight and consideration as the jury thought it deserved. Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 385, 119 Pac. 512, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1230. It tended on the part of the contestants, to show that Mrs. O'Connor was afflicted with a gradually increasing unsoundness of mind, which became complete after the cerebral stroke, and which was always manifest and ever present, affecting her mental capacity, particularly in the months preceding and during her last illness, when she made the questioned will. Other evidence, mostly that in behalf of the proponents, tended to show that her incompetency was of a form that manifested itself by frequent attacks, with lucid intervals in between. With the testimony of Dr. Koepke disposed of, as appellants would have us hold, they insist that the only evidence relating to Mrs. O'Connor's condition when she was actually signing her will was to the effect that she was then in a lucid interval. But from this entire evidence the jury could have concluded, either that Mrs. O'Connor had no testamentary capacity during her last illness, or that the will was not executed during a lucid interval of her mind. In this condition of the case upon the testimony the decision of the jury cannot be disturbed upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence. Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 110, 135 Pac. 288; Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 663, 151 Pac. 138.

The judgment is affirmed.

EASTON v. BOSTON INV. CO. et al.
(Civ. 3667.)

1. Principal and surety 🔑180—Deed of trust for protection of surety can be foreclosed before payment of claim.

Where deed of trust was executed as counter security to protect the surety on a bond not only against loss and damage, but also against liability, it was not necessary for the surety to pay a claim against it before it could maintain an action to foreclose the deed of trust.

2. Principal and surety 🔑123(3), 149—Conditions as to notice and commencement of action must be complied with.

Conditions in a bond requiring written notice of the default and limiting the time within which an action may be brought thereon are material, and compliance therewith is a condition precedent to the right of recovery thereon.

3. Principal and surety 🔑86 — Filing claim against bankrupt surety is "commencement of action."

Where bankruptcy proceedings were pending against the surety, the filing of the claim on the bond, and the allowance and confirmation thereof as a claim against the surety by the master in chancery within the time specified for commencement of action on bond within provision of bond requiring commencement of action within such time as a condition precedent to recovery thereon, held a sufficient compliance with such condition, since the institution of an action would have been an idle and useless act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Commencement of Action.]

4. Principal and surety 🔑180—Surety's waiver of condition precedent precludes recovery against counter surety.

Surety could not waive compliance with conditions precedent to the right to recover on the bond and thereafter recover against counter surety by foreclosure of a deed of trust executed to protect the surety from liability on the bond.

5. Principal and surety 🔑190(7)—Surety's assignee must show that surety urged defenses available to it.

Surety's assignee suing to foreclose deed of trust executed to protect surety from liability on bond had burden of showing that surety availed itself of defense which had been available to defeat recovery on bond.

6. Judgment 🔑707 — Conclusive only as to parties or their privies.

Generally judgments are conclusive and binding on parties and their privies, but are not either prima facie or conclusively binding as to others.

7. Indemnity 🔑14 — Allowance of claim in bankruptcy against surety not conclusive of right to enforce indemnity.

Where deed of trust was executed to indemnify surety against loss or liability arising under the bond, order in bankruptcy proceedings against surety allowing claim on the bond held not conclusive against grantor of deed of trust, in action to foreclose deed of trust by surety's assignee.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ansel M. Easton against the Boston Investment Company and others. Judgment against plaintiff in favor of named defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This was an action to foreclose a deed of trust given by the respondent, Boston Investment Company, as counter security to protect the Pacific Coast Casualty Company on a bond issued by it. Plaintiff is the assignee of the obligee in the bond. Judgment went in favor of the defendant, Boston Investment Company, denied to plaintiff the relief sought, and decreed that he had no right, title or interest, lien or claim in the subject of his attempted foreclosure. He appeals from this judgment.

The case was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, which showed that on December 2, 1912, one J. D. Gibbs was about to enter into a lease with Hale Bros., Incorporated, affecting certain premises in San Francisco, in order to obtain which lease he was required to give to the lessor a bond in the sum of $5,000. To consummate the transaction four instruments were executed, all bearing the same date.

The first was an agreement between the investment company and Gibbs, wherein it was recited that Gibbs was about to enter into the lease, and in order to secure the performance thereof the casualty company was about to execute its bond to the lessor; that it was agreed that the investment company should execute a deed of trust of the real property involved in this action to a trustee to indemnify the casualty company against loss or liability on its said bond.

Second. Thereupon the lease was executed.

Third. Immediately thereafter the casualty company executed its bond, whereon Gibbs, the lessee, was principal, the casualty company was surety, and the lessor was the obligee. This instrument recited the execution of the lease and the amount of the rent to be paid, and also provided that, if the lessee should perform the covenants of the lease and pay the rent, the obligation thereof should be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect.

Fourth. Thereupon the investment company executed the deed of trust mentioned in said agreement to a trustee for the casualty company, reciting therein that it was executed for the purpose of indemnifying the casualty company against "loss, liability, or damage" which it might sustain by reason of the bond.

After the execution of these instruments, and on June 3, 1915, the plaintiff became the owner of the premises leased to J. D. Gibbs and the assignee of the bonds of the casualty company; and at that time by mesne conveyances one F. M. Gibbs had become the tenant of the premises. On June 1, 1917, default was made in the payment of rent, and said tenant was progressively in default from that time until the end of the lease, December 31, 1917.

On November 17, 1916, the casualty company was insolvent, and upon that day suit was commenced in the United States District Court for the purpose of marshaling its assets. In due time a receiver was appointed, notice to creditors was published, and in August, 1917, plaintiff filed his claim in the sum of $5,000, which, upon reference to the master in chancery, was allowed for the sum of $2,925, appellant being ordered to elect either: First, to take as a general creditor of the insolvent casualty company, or, second, to dismiss his claim without prejudice and be allowed to join the receiver and the respondent in a proper proceeding to realize upon the deed of trust by foreclosure. This report was thereafter confirmed by the court.

On August 11, 1919, the court in which the bankruptcy proceedings were pending directed the receiver to execute to the plaintiff an assignment transferring to him all the rights of the casualty company under the deed of trust and against the respondent in relation to the lease. These assignments were delivered to plaintiff on August 20, 1919, and he is now the owner and holder of all rights of the casualty company in relation to the lease.

[1] The contention of the appellant that, as the deed of trust for the benefit of the casualty company protected it not only against loss and damage, but also against liability, it was not necessary to pay appellant's claim before it could maintain an action to foreclose the deed of trust executed by the investment company, we think must be sustained.

In McBeth v. McIntyre, 57 Cal. 49, an indemnity bond to a constable, protecting him "against all damage, expense, cost, and charges, and against all loss and liability," was held to be an indemnity bond not only as against actual damage, etc., "but also against all liability therefor." So in Showers v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 270, 22 Pac. 663, it was said:

> "The indemnity was against liability, and hence there was a right of recovery upon the contract as soon as the liability was incurred."

[2] That this is the law is not disputed, but the respondent contends: (1) That no notice was given to the casualty company or its receiver of default in payment of the rent; and (2) that no action on the bond of the casualty company was commenced against the surety on or prior to March 31, 1918, and therefore the appellant may not recover in this action. It is true that conditions in a bond requiring written notice of default, and limiting the time within which an action may be brought thereon, are material, and compliance therewith is a condition precedent to the right of recovery thereon. Cal. Sav. Bank of San Diego v. Am. Surety Co. (C. C.) 87 Fed. 118. See, also, Riddlesbarger v. Insurance Co., 7 Wall. 386, 19 L. Ed. 257; Nat. Surety Co. v. Long, 125 Fed. 887, 60 C. C. A. 623.

[3] No separate or independent action on the bond was in fact commenced against the casualty company prior to March 31, 1918, or at any time; but it appears from the statement of facts that prior to that time all the necessary steps had been taken to have the claim of the casualty company allowed, and that it was allowed and confirmed as a claim against the bankrupt by the master in chancery of the United States District Court. No action against the casualty company upon the bond could have been commenced without the permission of the court in which the bankrupty proceedings were pending, and, as such action would have availed the plaintiff no further or better relief than was obtainable in the bankruptcy proceeding, its institution would have been an idle and useless act, which the law never requires. We think the filing of the claim and the proceedings thereon in the bankrupt's estate constituted all that was contemplated or could be reasonably required by the provision of the bond under discussion.

The other point made by the respondent in this behalf, namely, that the record fails to show that the casualty company was served with written notice of default in the payment of rent, and hence was not liable on its bond, for which reason the plaintiff may not prevail in this action, raises a more serious question.

[4, 5] The condition reads:

> "Provided, however, and upon the following express conditions: First, * * * that in the event of any failure upon the part of the lessee to pay any installment of the rent provided for in said lease, written notice thereof shall within five days after such monthly installment of rent becomes payable, be delivered to the said surety (the casualty company) at its office in the city of San Francisco, state of California."

Compliance with this condition of the bond constituted a condition essential to recovery thereunder (Cal. Sav. Bank of San Diego v. Am. Surety Co., supra; Riddlesbarger v. Insurance Co., supra; National Surety Co. v. Long, 125 Fed. 887, 60 C. C. A. 623); and it is a provision which could not be waived by the casualty company so far as the contingent liability of this respondent to the casualty company is concerned. The respondent undertook to indemnify the casualty company against loss or liability suffered by it under the terms and conditions of its contract of suretyship; and if the casualty company failed to avail itself of a complete defense to the proceeding against it, certainly neither it nor its assignee may recover over against the counter surety. And in order to recover in this action the burden was on the plaintiff to show that the casualty company availed itself of this defense. The plaintiff, as assignee of the casualty company, seeking to recover against the Boston Investment Company on the contract with the casualty company, must show performance by the casualty company of all the conditions on its part to be performed.

Neither can it be successfully said that the claim filed in August, 1917, with the receiver in the bankruptcy proceeding amounted to the notice of default contemplated by the bond. It was not notice of such default in the payment of rent due in the previous months of June and July, nor even for the month of August, since, from the record, it cannot be said when in that month the claim was filed, nor whether within five days from the occurrence of the default. And it certainly could not be regarded as a five-day monthly notice for each month thereafter until the termination of the lease in December.

[6, 7] Coming now to the last point we shall consider, it may be conceded that the order in bankruptcy allowing the claim of appellant is in effect a judgment; still we find ourselves unable to agree with the appellant that the respondent is concluded by the judgment. How far a judgment or decree against one party is evidence against another standing in the relation of the parties here is a question involved in much confusion; but the general rule appears to be that judgments are conclusive and binding on parties and their privies, but as to all others that they are neither prima facie nor conclusively binding, for the reason that it would be unjust to bind a person by any proceeding in which he had no opportunity to make a defense, of offering evidence, of cross-examining witnesses, or of appealing if he were dissatisfied with the judgment. It seems to be generally conceded, however, that wherever a surety has contracted with reference to one of the parties in some suit or proceeding in the courts, he is concluded by the judgment. Thus a judgment against a defendant is conclusive upon his bail. The sureties upon an injunction bond assume such a connection with the suit that they are concluded by a judgment in a suit upon the bond. The same will apply against sureties who have become parties to a bond for the redelivery of property, or the release of attached property; to the sureties upon the bond of an executor or administrator or guardian. Likewise, if a surety has undertaken to perform a decree or judgment, or to pay any balance which shall be found to be due by the principal to the obligee, he is bound by the judgment or decree rendered. In all such cases the judgment is binding upon the surety unless he can show that it was obtained by fraud or collusion. Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214, 223, 85 Am. Dec. 125; Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 180; 32 Cyc. 136. Those cases are sometimes said to constitute an exception to the rule that only parties to an action are bound thereby; while again it is said that they do not in fact constitute an exception to the general rule at all, but are based upon a fair and reasonable interpretation of the contract. However that may be, here the undertaking, it is clear, is general, indemnifying merely against loss or liability arising under the bond, and it does not come within the terms of the cases just noticed. The respondent therefore is not affected by the judgment in the bankruptcy proceeding.

In Irwin v. Backus, supra, it is stated that as a general rule sureties upon official bonds are not concluded by a decree or judgment against their principal, but administration bonds form an exception to this general rule.

> "There can be no doubt that, where a surety undertakes for the principal that the principal shall do a specific act, to be ascertained in a given way, as that he will pay a judgment, that the judgment is conclusive against the surety; for the obligation is express that the principal will do this thing, and the judgment is conclusive of the fact and extent of the obligation. As the surety in such cases stipulates without regard to notice to him of the proceedings to obtain the judgment, his liability is, of course, independent of any such fact. * * * But this rule rests upon the terms of the contract. In the case of official bonds, the sureties undertake, in general terms, that the principal will perform his official duties. They do not agree to be absolutely bound by any judgment obtained against him for official misconduct, nor to pay every such judgment. They are only held for a breach of their own obligations. It is a general principle that no party can be so held without an opportunity to be heard in defense. This right is not divested by the fact that another party has defended on the same cause of action and been unsuccessful. As the sureties did not stipulate that they would abide by the judgment against the principal, or permit him to conduct the defense, and be themselves responsible for the result of it, the fact that the principal has unsuccessfully defended has no effect on their rights. They have a right to contest with the plaintiff the question of their liability; for to hold that they are concluded from this contestation by the suit against the sheriff is to hold that they undertook for him that they would be responsible for any judgment against him which might be rendered by accident, negligence, or error, instead of merely stipulating that they would be responsible for his official conduct." Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 203, 73 Am. Dec. 647.

Accordingly the court in that case held that the judgment against the principal was inadmissible in an action against his sureties. See, also, Ballantine & Sons v. Fenn, 84 Vt. 117, 78 Atl. 713, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 698, and notes; 32 Cyc. 136.

The judgment is affirmed.

SANGUINETTI v. SANGUINETTI.

(Civ. 2181.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 10, 1921.)

1. Homestead 🔑175 — Husband entitled to cancellation of declaration of homestead filed by wife contrary to contract releasing rights.

Where a wife, for a valuable consideration, released to the husband any possible interest she might have in his property or that of the community, and thereafter, while the contract was in full force and effect, filed a declaration of homestead in the husband's property, without any rescission of the contract or offer to restore the consideration, the husband was entitled to have the declaration of homestead canceled and title to the land decreed to be in him.

2. Husband and wife 🔑51, 266— Wife's release of interest in property of husband or community valid without separation.

Under Civ. Code, § 158, authorizing husband and wife to enter into any engagement with each other respecting property which either might if unmarried, and the following section, providing that husband and wife cannot by contract alter their legal relations except as to property, and except that they may agree to an immediate separation, a wife may release to her husband her interest in his property or that of the community, though there is no agreement of separation and they continue to live together.

3. Husband and wife 🔑51, 266—Waiver of support, though invalid, held not to affect release of property rights.

The validity of a wife's release for a valuable consideration of her interests in the property of her husband or that of the community was not affected by a further provision of the agreement whereby she waived support by him, even though such waiver was invalid under Civ. Code, §§ 174, 175.

4. Husband and wife 🔑51, 266—Falsity of recital that matrimonial relations were not pleasant held not to affect release of property rights.

The validity of a wife's release for a valuable consideration of her interests in her husband's separate property and the property of the community was not affected by a recital in the agreement that the matrimonial relations had not been pleasant and agreeable, though the court found the contrary.

5. Appeal and error 🔑882(17)—Party may not complain of finding in accordance with her own testimony.

In a suit involving the validity of a wife's release of her interests in her husband's property and that of the community, where the wife testified that the relations of the parties were pleasant and satisfactory, she may not complain that the court so found, though the agreement recited that their relations had not been pleasant and agreeable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Luke Sanguinetti against Martha Sanguinetti. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, for appellant.

Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to have it decreed that plaintiff is the owner of a certain described tract of land; that defendant has no right, title, or estate therein; that a certain declaration of homestead placed thereon by defendant is void and that the same be canceled and annulled. Relief was granted as prayed for, and defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The basis of the action is found in this written agreement executed by the parties on June 6, 1916:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 6th day of June, 1916, by and between Luke Sanguinetti of Vallecito, Calaveras county, California, the party of the first part, and Martha Sanguinetti his wife, of the same place, the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas the parties hereto are husband and wife and have been such for several years past and have been residents of Vallecito, Calaveras county, California, to this date, but their matrimonial relations have not been pleasant or agreeable and either is entitled to a divorce from the other and for the purpose of settling and adjusting their property rights, this agreement is made as follows:

"That the said Luke Sanguinetti as party of the first part, will on the execution of this agreement pay over to Martha Sanguinetti, the party of the second part, the sum of $5,000.00 of which sum $500.00 has been paid leaving a balance of $4,500.00 which will be paid upon the signing of this agreement and it is understood and agreed that the said Martha Sanguinetti takes and accepts said sum of $5,000.00. of, and in lieu of and as the full relinquishment and conveyance and settlement of her community interest in all the property owned by both parties hereto whether situated in Calaveras county or elsewhere, and for the said $5,000 the said Martha Sanguinetti remises, releases and quitclaims unto said Luke Sanguinetti all her right, title and interest existing at present or that she may be entitled to in the future of, in and to all real and personal property of every kind and nature owned by the parties hereto and in which the said Martha Sanguinetti has a community interest or would be entitled to have and she here expressly waives any and all claims to any future support, maintenance, care or liability of any kind from the party of the first part to her, and that she will contract no indebtedness or incur no bills of any kind or nature henceforth and in which the party of the first part will be liable, and in case he becomes liable for any other sum other than that herein mentioned, he shall have recourse to collect the same from the party of the second part in the manner provided by law for the collection of debts, and the said party of the second part takes and receives said sum in full settlement, of all property rights as between the parties hereto.

"Each party to this agreement hereby waives and relinquishes unto the other any and all right of inheritance or succession of, in and to the property that either might have or enjoy at the time of the death of either as this agreement fully settles all property rights now existing or that could hereafter inure to either party to the agreement.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hand and seal the day and year first above written."

[1] It is not disputed that said contract was the deliberate and voluntary act of the parties and that plaintiff paid to defendant the said sum of five thousand dollars. It appears, also, that the parties were at the time and ever since have been living together as husband and wife. It is true that defendant was absent from home for nearly a year, but it was the occasion merely of a visit to a relative in the state of Washington and it was by consent of the plaintiff. In fact, appellant testified that respondent was always generous in his treatment of her and never objected to her visits away from home. The case, therefore, does not involve any separation of the parties agreed or otherwise, any desertion or kindred subject, but the situation is that the defendant for a valuable consideration waived and released to the plaintiff any possible interest she might have in his property or that of the community, and thereafter, while said contract was in full force and effect, she sought to impose upon a part of said property the charge or burden of a homestead, and this without any rescission of said contract or offer to restore the consideration which she had received.

The foregoing facts would seem to leave no doubt as to the legal soundness of the trial court's conclusion, but the learned counsel for appellant, who prepared said agreement of June 6, believing, no doubt, in the right of married persons to execute such a contract, vigorously assails the judgment herein as opposed to the authorities and the principles of public policy.

[2] The attack, however, is based upon an utterly untenable hypothesis. It assumes that the agreement of the parties was for a separation and that it was canceled by a reconciliation and resumption of the marital rights and privileges. In support of the claim appellant cites such cases as Wells v. Stout, 9 Cal. 479; Sargent v. Sargent, 106 Cal. 541, 39 Pac. 931; Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 499, 50 Pac. 766, 62 Am. St. Rep. 251; Estate of Martin, 166 Cal. 399, 137 Pac. 2; Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 Pac. 1168.

In the first of these, the contract was admittedly a "deed of separation." It was claimed that such contracts were invalid. The authorities were reviewed, with his usual care and learning, by Judge Field, and he concluded, that, under the settled law of the United States, such agreements were not invalid. It was stated, however, that "if parties after separation become reconciled and live together, that fact will avoid the deed." But even that was unnecessary to the decision, since the Supreme Court held that the evidence was insufficient to show reconciliation.

The Sargent Case also involved admittedly a separation agreement, and it was expressly provided therein that a reconciliation would render the contract void. The point in the case was, however, whether the contract "was revocable at the option of either of the parties thereto." This question the Supreme Court answered in the negative, and through Judge Van Fleet made this significant declaration:

> "To hold that one competent to contract, who, upon a subject-matter good in law, and for a sufficient consideration, enters into written stipulations and covenants of the most solemn character with another, should, the next moment, without pretense of fraud, mistake, or undue influence, or other cause than a mere change of mind, be permitted to absolutely withdraw from, and set at naught, such obligations, without regard to the desire of the other contracting party, would, to say the least, be a strong departure in the law of contracts."

In Jones v. Lamont the agreement was also for separation, and the question decided was that the contract did not include a waiver or release of the right to succeed to all or any portion of the other's estate. The statement in the opinion, "The utmost that the law permits is that they may agree to live apart. and may make a valid contract as to their property, but this may be terminated at any moment by reconciliation which 'would avoid the contract—as to all features, at least, remaining executory' (Sargent v. Sargent, 106 Cal. 541)," must be regarded in connection with the preceding discussion in reference to the "divorce suit." Of course, it was not intended as an affirmation that there could be no division or settlement of the property rights of the parties independent of an agreement of separation.

In the Brown Case, likewise, there was a written agreement of separation. It was quite properly held that the finding of the lower court to the effect that for some four months after the execution of said agreement "the parties agreed to become and were reconciled, that they thenceforth for several months lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, and that in pursuance of the agreement to so live they further orally agreed to and did set aside and annul said agreement," was sufficient to support the conclusion that said oral agreement was executed and that it resulted in the cancellation of the previous written agreement. As to this, indeed, there is hardly room for a difference of opinion.

Some other cases from different jurisdictions are cited, but they need not be specifically mentioned. In fact, the matter is regulated and determined by the statutory provisions of the various states. What may be the rule elsewhere or what the common or civil law teaches on the subject might be interesting, but the controlling thing here is what is found in our statute and its interpretation by the courts. In fact, it would seem hardly necessary to go beyond the language of section 158 of the Civil Code, as follows:

> "Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried; subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts."

As there is no claim of any advantage being taken by the husband in securing said contract, we may ignore the latter portion of said section. That unmarried persons could lawfully enter into such a contract cannot, of course, be disputed. It simply involves, as we have seen, the conveyance of all interest in real property, a frequent and familiar proceeding.

But it seems to be thought that this conclusion, as far as the community property is concerned, is affected and limited by the next section, as follows:

> "A husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property, and except that they may agree, in writing, to an immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them and of their children during such separation."

It is to be observed, however, that the clause permitting them to alter their "legal relations" in reference to property is not connected with or modified by the provision relating to an agreement for a separation. It might be a fair construction to hold that a contract for the support of either or of the children, in order to be valid, must be coupled with an agreement of separation, but to make this latter contingency a precedent condition for the validity of a contract for the disposition of the community property is to do violence to the language of the section. The law prescribes no such limitation. The plain terms of the statute authorize the husband or the wife to convey to the other all title and interest in either separate or community property.

If any confirmation were needed for a construction that seems unavoidable we may find it in such cases as Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358; Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 276, 34 Pac. 775, 38 Am. St. Rep. 287; Hoeck v. Greif, 142 Cal. 119, 75 Pac. 670; Estate of Martin, supra.

We may add that while not authoritative the decision of Judge Coffey, together with the note attached thereto in the Estate of Menihan, reported in volume 6, page 535, of Coffey's Probate Decisions, is interesting and instructive.

Moreover, the whole argument of appellant is based upon the assumption that community property is involved in the controversy; but the court found that it was the separate estate of the husband. It is not disputed that this finding is supported by the evidence, and, assuredly, it would not be contended that the wife is not authorized by said section 158 to release to her husband whatever title or interest she might have in his separate property.

[3] As before indicated, in view of the duty imposed upon the husband by sections 174 and 175 of the Civil Code, there may be some doubt whether the waiver of support would be binding while the parties are living together; but that part of the agreement is not involved in this controversy, and it manifestly does not affect the legal integrity of the provisions in reference to the property.

[4, 5] Some contention is made that the parties were bound by the recital in their agreement that "their matrimonial relations have not been pleasant and agreeable" and that the finding of the court to the contrary constitutes serious error. It is apparent, however, that this is a matter of no moment. The consideration for the wife's agreement was the payment to her of the sum of $5,000 and the statement as to their relations may be entirely ignored. Moreover, notwithstanding said recital, the defendant testified that their relations were pleasant and satisfactory, and she is hardly in a position to complain if the court accepted her statement in that particular.

We have read with care the interesting briefs of appellant, but we think they have entirely missed the mark.

The judgment is affirmed.

(51 Cal. App. 277)

HEENAN et al. v. BEVANS. (Civ. 2229.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 4, 1921.)

1. Easements 🔑36(1)—When presumption of grant prevails.

The presumption of the grant of an easement in lands or over the lands of another is sometimes indulged upon the ground that the owner of the land has submitted to the use without objection for such length of time that his conduct cannot be accounted for on any other hypothesis, but the acts done by the party claiming the benefit of the presumption, and his predecessors in estate, must, however, have been in themselves such as the other party, having the right to object, submitted to them without objection, and the law will not allow the land of one person to be taken by another, without any conveyance or consideration, upon slight presumptions or probabilities.

2. Easements 🔑36(1)—Burden of proof upon parties claiming easement by prescription.

The burden is upon a party who claims an easement by prescription to clearly prove by competent evidence all the elements essential to his title, and the user must have been adverse to the true owner and hostile to his title, and it must have been actual, continued, open, and under a claim of right, and must have all the elements necessary to acquire title by adverse possession.

3. Easements 🔑37—Whether use of right of way was under claim of right or merely neighborly accommodation a question of fact.

Question as to whether or not the use of a way over the land of another was under a claim of right or a mere matter of neighborly accommodation is a question of fact to be determined by the court in the light of the relations of the parties, their conduct, the situation of the property, and all the surrounding circumstances.

4. Easements 🔑36(1)—Presumed that use of premises is by permission.

The law will presume that land belongs to the owner of the paper title, and that the use of a way was by permission or silent acquiescence, and presumption of a grant does not arise until this presumption is overcome by evidence showing the use to have been hostile, and that the owner knew of such hostile claim and took no steps to protect his property.

5. Easements 🔑36(3)—Proof must be clear that the adverse claim to right of way was of character to give owner notice.

The presumption that the title to land is in the owner of the paper title thereto, and that the use of a roadway was by permission or silent acquiescence, must be overcome by clear proof that the claim of the right of way not alone existed in the minds of those claiming such right, but that such claim was asserted in such manner that the owner of the land might or ought to know of it.

6. Easements 🔑36(3)—Adverse possession of right of way held not shown.

In an action to establish an easement or right of way over land of defendants, evidence held not to show that plaintiffs had gained title to the right to use the roadway by prescription; there being an uninterrupted permissive use for some 30 years.

7. Easements 🔑36(3)—Maintenance of gates and payment of taxes strong evidence in support of mere license to use way.

The fact that at each end of a roadway a gate had been maintained and owner had paid taxes on his full acreage is strong evidence in support of a mere license to pass over the roadway.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Francis M. Heenan and another against James Bevans. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellants.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment rendered by the court without a jury in favor of defendant. The controversy arises over a purported easement or right of way claimed by plaintiffs over the land of the defendant.

The only question to be decided in the case is: Have the plaintiffs acquired an easement across the land of defendant for a road by prescription? It is the claim of appellants that the findings of the trial court are against the evidence.

The facts may be summarized as follows: On the 11th day of February, 1919, plaintiffs filed in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Yuba their complaint, from which we quote the essential paragraphs 1 and 2, as follows:

"I. That plaintiff Francis M. Heenan now is, and for more than ten years last past he has been the owner in fee of that certain tract or parcel of land situate and being in the county of Yuba, state of California, described as follows: The west one-half and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 23, township 15 north, range 4 east, M. D. M., containing approximately 160 acres—and plaintiff James P. Heenan during a period of approximately 11 years prior and up to the date of the commencement of this action has been, and now is, in the possession, use, and enjoyment of said lands and premises under and by virtue of a lease from said Francis M. Heenan, the period of which will not expire until on or about the 1st day of October, 1920; that said lands are agricultural lands, and for more than 20 years last past have been and now are being used for the purpose of growing thereon wheat, barley, and similar grain.

"II. For more than 20 years prior and up to the date of the commencement of this action there has been and now is, constructed, maintained, and prior and up to the wrongful acts of defendant hereinafter referred to used by plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest in and to said lands and premises hereinbefore referred to, upon and along the north 16 feet of the southeast quarter of said section 23 a road over which during all of said times plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest in and to said lands and any and all persons and the public generally traveled from a county road extending along the east line of said section 23 over, to, and upon plaintiffs' said lands in the southwest quarter of said section 23, and thence southerly to another county road running along the south line of said quarter section openly, publicly, notoriously and adversely without let or hindrance and under claim of right so to do; that said road during all of said times herein mentioned was, and now is, of great value to plaintiff's said lands as furnishing a ready, convenient, and useful means of communication between plaintiffs' said lands and said county road running along the said easterly line of said section 23; that said road has been heretofore used as aforesaid with gates at each end thereof, namely, one at the east line of said section 23, and the other at the southerly line of said section; that is, at each point where said road enters said county road as aforesaid. And on or about the 1st day of December, 1918, defendant did willfully and wrongfully enter upon said road where it passes along the northerly portion of said southeast quarter of said section 23 and did plow up the same, and he did also remove the said gates theretofore maintained at the said east line of said section 23 and substituted in place thereof four barb wires, thereby rendering the said road impassable and preventing entry thereupon from said county road to the east of said section. And defendant threatens to, and, plaintiffs are informed, believe, and therefore allege, that unless restrained by this court he will continue to keep plowed up said road at said place aforesaid and keep said entrance thereto barred and wired and prevent plaintiffs and all other persons from using the same."

It will thus be observed that the action involves section 23, township 15 north, range 4 east, M. D. M., Yuba county, Cal. It may be explained that the defendant had been for about five years the owner of the northeast quarter of the section, and that in October, 1918, he purchased the southeast quarter of the section. The road in question commences at the east line of the section, is 16 feet in width; its north boundary being the line dividing the section into north and south halves. It extends over the southeast quarter owned by defendant, also across the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter owned by plaintiffs, thence turns southerly and is bounded on the east by the line dividing the southwest quarter into east and west halves and extends to the south line of the section. A county road extends along both the east and south lines of this section 23. This county road leads to Marysville. This road furnished access to the county road at two points on the section, and the judgment prevents the use of that portion of the road only which leads to the highway on the east line of the section.

Defendant filed an answer to the complaint, in which, inter alia, he sets up:

> "That for a number of years plaintiffs, * * * by permission of defendant and his predecessors in interest, have occasionally traveled across the north 16 feet of said quarter section."

The trial court found the ownership of plaintiffs' and defendant's several tracts of land to be as alleged in the complaint, found the existence of the road as therein set forth, but found that the use of said road on the part of plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had been a permissive one, and not adverse, and judgment followed accordingly. Paragraph 5 of the conclusions of law, found in the transcript, contains the essence of the court's findings and reads as follows:

> "That the use of plaintiffs and other persons during the last 20 years of the said north 16 feet of the southeast quarter of said section 23 has been an uninterrupted permissive use, resting for its enjoyment upon the neighborly spirit of kindness and accommodation existing between plaintiffs' and defendant's predecessors in interest, and that said use has not been adverse or hostile to defendant or his predecessors in interest in said lands, either openly or notoriously to their said title, nor has said use been under any claim of right by said plaintiffs, or either of them, or any other person."

It is, of course, manifest from the allegations of the complaint above reproduced that the plaintiffs claim an easement in the form of a right of way over defendant's land by prescription, and it is their contention here that the evidence without conflict shows a prescriptive title in them to such easement. The latter proposition involves, obviously, an attack upon the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff has no title by prescription or otherwise to the alleged easement over the strip of land in dispute.

[1, 2] We may first with propriety state the principles of law by which the courts are required to be guided in determining whether the elements of prescription are shown by the evidence to be present in a given case, and this can be the more conveniently done by reproducing herein a few excerpts from the well-considered case of Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10 et seq. In that case the defendant, in an action by the plaintiff to quiet title to a strip of land there in dispute, set up the defense of title to a right of way over said strip of land by adverse user and alleged in his answer:

> "That he, and those claiming under him, have for more than eight years last past traveled with vehicles and on foot over a certain right of way across the lot, claiming the right to travel the same, adversely to plaintiff; that he has never, during said time, been interrupted in the use of said right of way; and that plaintiff, during all of said time, had full knowledge of the said travel."

The Supreme Court, in sustaining the decree quieting plaintiff's title to the lot over which the right of way was claimed, thus stated the law applicable to claims of title to land by adverse user or prescription:

> "Prescription, at common law, was a mode of acquiring title to incorporeal hereditaments by immemorial or long-continued enjoyment. It had its origin in a grant evidenced by usage, and was allowed on account of its loss, either actual or supposed, and for this reason only those things could be prescribed for which could be created by grant. The presumption of the grant of an easement in the lands or over the lands of another is sometimes indulged. When so, it is upon the ground that the owner of the land has submitted to the use without objection for such length of time that his conduct cannot be accounted for upon any other hypothesis. The acts done by the party claiming the benefit of the presumption, and his predecessors in estate, must, however, have been, in themselves, such as the other party, having the right to object to or complain of, did neither, but submitted to them without objection or challenge. Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303. The law will not allow the land of one person to be taken by another, without any conveyance or consideration, upon slight presumptions or probabilities. Niles v. Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 576. The burden is upon the party who claims title by prescription to clearly prove by competent evidence all the elements essential to such title. The user must have been adverse to the true owner and hostile to his title. It must have been actual, continued, open, and under a claim of right. It must have all the elements necessary to acquire title by adverse possession. Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 459."

[3, 4] Again, in the same case, the court further said:

> "The defendant and his tenants were in the habit of passing over the uninclosed strip of land when going to or from their business. The question as to whether or not the use was under a claim of right, or a mere matter of neighborly accommodation, was a question of fact to be determined by the court in the light of the relations of the parties, their conduct, the situation of the property, and all the surrounding circumstances. The court below saw the witnesses, heard them testify, and found the facts against defendant. Defendant testified that he used the way and claimed the right to use it, but it does not appear that any such claim was ever made to plaintiff or to his grantor. It is not sufficient that the claim of right exist only in the mind of the person claiming it. It must in some way be asserted in such manner that the owner may know of the claim. The fact that the owner knew of the travel and occasional use of the property does not even raise a presumption that such use was hostile or under claim of right. If any party who is allowed by silent permission to pass over the lands of another, nothing being said as to any right being claimed, after five years, without showing that he ever communicated such claim in any way to the owner, can thus gain title by prescription, it would be a blot upon the law. An owner could not allow his neighbor to pass and repass over a trail upon his open, uninclosed land without danger of having an adverse title successfully set up against him. If he had several neighbors who so used the land, several separate titles to rights of way might thus be acquired. The law will presume that the land belongs to the owner of the paper title, and that the use was by permission or silent acquiescence. If this presumption is overcome by evidence showing the use to have been hostile, and that the owner knew of such hostile claim, and took no steps to protect his property, for a period of five years, then the presumption changes."

See, also, Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 393, 398, 76 Pac. 60.

Adverting now to the proofs as they are disclosed by the record, we may, in limine, remark that our examination of the testimony has convinced us that therein there is not only a pronounced conflict upon the question whether the plaintiffs have acquired a prescriptive right to the alleged easement over the defendant's land, but also there is ample justification from the evidence for the finding against the existence of such right in the plaintiffs.

The plaintiff Francis M. Heenan gave some testimony which was in a measure corroborated by other witnesses testifying for the plaintiffs, from which, taken alone, the conclusion that the road in question had been used by himself and neighbors openly and notoriously, under a claim of right for a period of approximately 30 years, might be warranted, depending, of course, upon whether the trial court should have regarded it of a character in probative value justly to compel such a conclusion. He testified that he had resided in the neighborhood in which the way is located for 43 years; that, from his earliest memory as a boy, he could say that there had been a road running over and across the strip in question, and that it had been habitually used by his predecessors in interest in his land and by other people residing near his ranch and by the school children attending the district school in that vicinity for at least 30 years; that he and others had during all those years claimed the right to use the road and had used it with the knowledge of the defendant and his predecessors in interest; that on one occasion he did a little work on the road; that at each end of the road there had always been maintained a gate, but he could not say who placed the gates there. He, however, admitted on cross-examination that there was another road about a half a mile in length, leading from his place to the county road, and over and by means of which he and his neighbors could reach the county road. He declared, though, that it was more convenient for him and his neighbors to go to and from their respective ranches to the county road by the way in question. He also admitted that about three years prior to the trial of this action (the action was tried in the year 1918) he called on Mrs. Divver, the grantor and predecessor in interest of defendant in the land over which the alleged right of way is claimed and before Mrs. Divver conveyed the land to defendant, and asked her for a deed conveying to him the right of way over the strip of land in dispute, but that Mrs. Divver refused to give him the deed.

As against the testimony presented in behalf of the plaintiffs, and of which the above is a brief statement in substance, the defendant, testifying for himself, said that he purchased the 160 acres of land across which the alleged right of way extends from Mrs. Mary J. Divver in the year 1918 and immediately thereupon took possession of the property; that he had never seen what might properly be called a road running along and over the strip of land in question, but that he did observe a "kind of trail" or track there; that there was a gate at each end of said trail or track, but neither was a substantial structure; that he had resided in the vicinity of the land he bought from Mrs. Divver for "the last five years," but that he never knew nor had he ever heard that there was a right of way across said land, nor did he know or ever hear that any one ever claimed such a right of way. He stated that he never saw any persons but the Heenans use the road. He further testified that he bought the Divver quarter section for the reason that the natural drainage of his other land (the quarter section north of the Divver land) runs south, and that to drain the north section it is necessary for him to run the drain towards the county road and consequently towards the alleged right of way. He testified that he would not have bought the Divver place but for the fact that he desired the drainage for the north section. (This testimony is important only in that it tends to show that, although he had resided in the immediate neighborhood of the Divver quarter section for five years or more, he had not known of the existence of a right of way over the latter land or never had heard that any one claimed such a right of way.)

In connection with the defendant's testimony the deed from Mrs. Divver conveying to the defendant the southeast quarter section was offered and received in evidence. The deed makes no reservation of the right of way over the strip of land in controversy.

Mrs. Mary Divver, who sold the land directly involved herein to defendant, testified in part as follows:

> "Q. During the time you had possession of that property, was there ever a roadway constructed across the north 16 feet of your property running from east to west? A. Well, about three years ago Mr. Heenan asked permission to go through there as a short cut to his place. Q. Of whom did he ask permission? A. Asked me. Q. Did you give him permission? A. Yes; I gave him permission providing the people who had it leased at that time, Mr. George Carr, did not object. Q. Now, do you know of any claim that was made by any person to a right of way across your property located in southeast quarter of section 23, township 15, north, range 4 east? A. Any claim? Q. Yes. A. No. Q. Did anybody at any time claim to own the right of way on that property? A. No."

The witness further testified:

> That no person except Francis Heenan ever sought to obtain permission from her to cross the said property; that no other person ever spoke to her about crossing the property; "if so, it is so far back I don't remember;" that she was positive that it was "three years ago" that the plaintiff Francis Heenan asked her permission to cross on the north 16 feet of said property; that during the time she owned the property she paid the taxes on the 160 acres. "Q. Do you know if the general public has ever used that road, if there is such a road, across your property? A. Well, I know that on different occasions my husband and I have gone out there and found the fences down; that was before I was asked permission; he always put the fence up; no one had asked us. Q. You have always repaired and maintained the fence across and around your property? A. Well, as a rule, the people who rent have. Q. That is what I mean? A. Yes. Q. But, with the exception of the permission that you state you gave to Francis Heenan three years ago you have not given anybody this permission to cross that property? A. No. Q. And you have not permitted anybody to your knowledge to use it as a public highway? A. No. Q. Now, on the 21st day of October, 1918, you conveyed this property to Mr. James Bevans, did you not, that is, the southeast quarter of section 23, township 15 north, range 4 east? A. Yes. Q. Did you at that time reserve any right of way on the property? A. No. Q. Then you conveyed the whole 160 acres without any reservation whatever? A. Yes."

On cross-examination the witness stated that the permission given to Francis Heenan to use the roadway was not in writing, but merely verbal; that Heenan wrote "to us once and asked us to sell him the road, but we said 'No;'" that no other person had ever asked permission to use the road or for a deed to the strip over and across which it passed; that she and her husband used to visit the part of the section where the road is located about three times a year; that, while there was some evidence of its having been used by somebody, it did not "show very much evidence of traffic, that is having been traveled over."

[5] There is absolutely no evidence, and, indeed, no claim made by the appellants, that a grant of a right of way across the land in question was ever given to any person. And there is no evidence or a well-founded pretense that the owners of the property, either the defendant or his predecessors, ever dedicated the strip of land in dispute to the public as a highway. It follows, then, that, as stated above, the sole issue here is whether the alleged easement exists by virtue of adverse user. As to this proposition, we have already declared that the finding of the trial court that no such right existed or was shown derives support from the evidence. Indeed, we do not hesitate to say that, although a finding, had the court so found, of adverse user upon the evidence presented by plaintiffs, might be secure against successful challenge, yet upon that evidence alone, or in the absence of the adversary showing by the defendant, the court could justly or reasonably have found against the claim of a prescriptive title to the land in dispute, since, as the above cases show, title by prescription or adverse user necessarily rests in presumption, which is the basic foundation of such a title to land, and, in establishing such a title, the presumption that the title to the land is in the owner of the paper title thereto and that the use of the roadway was by permission or silent acquiescence must be overcome by clear proof that the claim of the right of way not alone existed in the minds of those claiming such right, but that such claim was asserted in such manner as that the owner of the land might or ought to know of it. Clarke v. Clarke, supra. It is not clear from the evidence produced by the plaintiffs that the predecessors in interest of the defendant or the latter ever knew or supposed that the use of the strip of land in dispute was being used under a claim of right or in hostility to their title. This proposition is supported by the admission of one of the plaintiffs that, on an occasion about three years anterior to the date of the trial, he undertook to secure from Mr. Divver a deed of conveyance to the strip embracing the roadway.

[6] But, even if it be conceded that upon the testimony presented by the plaintiffs, considered alone or without reference to any impeachment thereof by an adversary showing, a judgment in their favor could well be sustained, it is still justly to be observed that upon no rational theory can there reasonably arise in the mind of any person any doubt about the testimony presented on behalf of the defendant, of which we have above given an epitomized statement, showing that the use of the road in question was entirely under a license from the owners of the land over which it passes. At any rate, such must be the view of this court, since the trial court so declared in its decision, thereby accepting as verity said testimony.

Recapitulating, briefly, that testimony, we find this to be the situation: That the road was not used by the general public; that it was fenced in; that at either end thereof was a gate placed there by the predecessors in interest of the defendant; that the owners of the property—the former as well as the present—had always paid taxes on the full quarter section or 160 acres. But beyond all these considerations is even the more significant testimony of Mrs. Divver (corroborated in a measure by that of one of the plaintiffs) showing, or, at least strongly tending to show, that the plaintiffs themselves never actually supposed that a right of way had ever been established over the property by prescription or otherwise, for one of the plaintiffs, about three years prior to the date of the trial of this action, asked, and was given by Mrs. Divver, permission to use the roadway, and later undertook to secure a conveyance from her of so much of the land in the quarter section involved herein as was necessary for the purposes of the roadway.

[7] The fact that at each end of the roadway a gate had been maintained by the predecessors in interest of the defendant for all the years that the road had been used is of no inconsiderable significance as confirming the proposition that the owners of the property never understood or knew that the use of the road was hostile to their title or under a claim of right. Indeed, such fact "has always been considered as strong evidence in support of a mere license to the public to pass over the designated area, and in rebuttal of a dedication to public use." Quinn v. Anderson, 70 Cal. 454, 11 Pac. 746; Huffman v. Hall, 102 Cal. 27, 30, 36 Pac. 417; Hope v. Barnett, 78 Cal. 14, 20 Pac. 245; De La Guerra v. Striedeal, 159 Cal. 85, 112 Pac. 856; note to 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 941.

Another fact of more or less significance in support of the mere permissive use of the road is the payment of the taxes by the predecessors in interest of the defendant on the full quarter section. This testimony goes solely to the question whether an easement was for years exercised or enjoyed on the quarter section involved herein in hostility to the title of the owners of the property, under a claim of right, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the latter; for it is not probable that, if one had knowledge of such an easement, the existence and enjoyment of which would deprive him of the actual enjoyment of a considerable part of his land, he would pay taxes on the whole tract, including the strip the entire title to which was not in him.

But, without any further attempt at analyzing the testimony, it is sufficient to repeat that the testimony presented by the defendant, accepted, as it was, by the court as revealing the truth of the issue before it, was obviously sufficient to justify the finding that the use by the plaintiffs and other persons of the roadway in question during the last 20 years "has been an uninterrupted permissive use, resting for its enjoyment upon the neighborly spirit of kindness and accommodation existing between the plaintiffs and the defendant's predecessors in interest, and that said use has not been adverse or hostile to defendant," etc. Tarpey v. Veith, 22 Cal. App. 289, 292, 134 Pac. 367; Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 208, 209, 63 Pac. 361; Schulenbarger v. Johnstone, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 941, 955.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re TURNER'S ESTATE.

HERRICK v. HARMES.

(Civ. 3730.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1921. Rehearing Denied March 10, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 7, 1921.)

1. Judgment 🔑735—Order denying right to be appointed administrator held not determination of right of applicant to participate in distribution of estate.

An order dismissing a petition for appointment of an administrator on the ground that petitioner was a nonresident was not a determination of the right of such petitioner as a nonresident alien to receive by devise any portion of the estate under the will; it not appearing from such order that the question of petitioner's right as a nonresident alien to take by devise under the will was before the court or was decided by it at the time of making the order, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1369.

2. Aliens 🔑7—Entitled to real estate under will under United States treaty regardless of state law.

A nonresident alien, a subject of Italy, was entitled to receive real estate by devise under a treaty between the United States and Italy in which what is known as the "most-favored nation" clause appears, the treaty overriding Const. art. 1, § 17, amended in 1894, if in conflict, or any state statute.

3. Aliens 🔑7—Not prohibited from acquiring real estate by devise.

Const. art. 1, § 17, as amended in 1894, does not prohibit nonresident aliens eligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws thereof from acquiring real estate by inheritance or devise, apparently leaving it to the Legislature to determine the extent and condition under which such aliens may hold and dispose of such real estate as shall be thus acquired by them, and hence the Legislature was authorized to pass St. 1913, p. 206, § 1, providing that aliens eligible to citizenship may acquire, possess, enjoy, transmit, and inherit real property, etc.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑315(5)—Two decrees distributing property to be construed together.

Two decrees of distribution of real estate, each giving certain person an undivided half of the same real estate, should have been construed together, and the second decree should not be held erroneous as an attempt to dispose of more than the whole of the property in question, in view of the fact that the complaining party who had received the other undivided half had not complied with the requirement of the first decree in the matter of filing a bond and failed to refer to the fact in the second proceeding.

H. S. Herrick, of Bakersfield, in pro. per.

Charles A. Christin and Hutchinson, Van Fleet & Christin, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution made and entered in the matter of the estate of Mary E. Turner, deceased. The appellant is the brother and heir of said decedent and is also one of the distributees under the decree of partial distribution from which this appeal has been taken. The respondent is the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of said decedent. By the terms of said will certain real property in San Francisco was devised in equal undivided shares to her said brother and to one A. Basletta. There was also devised to Basletta the whole of certain real estate in the county of Fresno. The record shows that a petition for letters of administration with the will annexed was made on behalf of said Basletta, but that upon a hearing thereon said petition was dismissed by the court. Thereafter the respondent Harmes applied for and received letters of administration with the will annexed in said estate. Thereafter, and on January 8, 1920, the court having jurisdiction of said estate made and entered a decree of partial distribution upon the application of said Herrick, wherein it was ordered that there be distributed to said Herrick an undivided one-half of certain real estate in San Francisco devised to him by the terms of said will. It was further provided in said decree that before said Herrick should receive said property he should execute and deliver to the administrator with the will annexed a bond in the sum of $2,000 with proper sureties to be approved by a judge of said court, conditioned for the payment when required of his proportion of the debts due from said estate. Thereafter, and on February 4, 1920, another petition for partial distribution was presented by the said administrator wherein no reference was made to the prior petition for and decree of partial distribution, but wherein, after reciting at considerable length the previous proceedings in said estate, and setting forth in full the terms of the will of said decedent, and of the several contests and controversies which had occurred as between said Herrick and said administrator and other persons, involving the right to administer said estate, and also apparently involving the question as to the right of said Basletta to have and receive any portion of said estate as one of the devisees of said decedent, the administrator prayed for a decree of partial distribution awarding an undivided one-half interest in the real estate of said decedent, situate in San Francisco, to said Herrick, and an undivided one-half interest in the same property to A. Basletta, and also praying that the whole of the lot lying in Fresno be distributed to said Basletta. This petition came regularly on for hearing, whereupon said Herrick presented his opposition to the same in so far as it prayed for the distribution of any portion to said Basletta, upon the ground that as a nonresident alien and a subject of Italy he was not entitled to take by devise any portion of said estate. In his said objections to said petition no reference was made by Herrick to the fact that the court had previously made a decree of partial distribution of the undivided one-half of the San Francisco property referred to in the petition of said administrator to him. Upon said hearing the court refused to sustain the several objections urged by said Herrick against the partial distribution of said estate, according to the prayer of said petition, and thereupon proceeded to distribute, in accordance with the terms of the will of said deceased, an undivided one-half interest in the San Francisco real estate to said Herrick, and an undivided one-half interest therein to said Basletta, and further proceeded to distribute to the latter the whole of the Fresno real estate, conformably to the terms of said will.

Up to the time of the making and entry of this decree no bond had been filed by said Herrick in conformity with the requirements of the former decree of partial distribution of an undivided one-half interest in the San Francisco property to him; but a few days after the making and entry of the last decree of partial distribution he filed said bond, and thereafter took an appeal to the Supreme Court from said last-made decree of partial distribution, which appeal the Supreme Court at a later date transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

[1] The appellant presents three points upon this appeal. The first of these is that the trial court determined the right of A. Basletta as a nonresident alien to receive by devise any portion of the estate of Mary E. Turner, deceased, by its order dismissing the petition filed on behalf of A. Basletta for the probate of the will of said deceased and for the issuance to him of letters of administration therein.

The order of said court upon which the appellant relies in support of this contention reads as follows:

> "This cause coming on regularly to be heard this 23d day of September, 1918, upon the motion of H. S. Herrick, proponent of the last will of said deceased, and said proponent A. Basletta being represented by counsel on said motion, and it appearing to the court that said A. Basletta is a nonresident alien, and not a person interested in the estate of said deceased, and his said petition for the probate of the last wills of said deceased was not signed by him personally, in accordance with the requirement of section 1371, Code of Civil Procedure, but by his attorney in fact J. T. Harmes, it is hereby ordered that said petition for probate so filed by said Basletta be, and the same is hereby, dismissed."

The parties to this appeal have, for some reason, not seen fit to furnish this court with any of the proceedings in said estate prior to the making and entry of this order; but, so far as we are able to determine from the face thereof and from certain indirect references made thereto in other and later proceedings, it would appear that the only matter passed upon by the court in making said order was the right of said A. Basletta to have his petition for the probate of said will and for the issuance to him of letters of administration with the will annexed granted, and that the only determinative part of said order is the concluding portion thereof, in which it is ordered that said "petition for probate so filed by said Basletta through his attorney in fact be, and the same is hereby, dismissed." That sufficient basis existed for the making of this order cannot be questioned, for the reason that under section 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the said A. Basletta, not being a bona fide resident of the state, was not competent nor entitled to act as an administrator in said estate, and for the further reason, as expressly stated by the court, his petition for such letters was not properly signed under the requirements of section 1371 of the Code of Civil Procedure. So far as appears upon the face of this order, or so far as appears from the record in the case, the question of the right of A. Basletta as a nonresident alien to take by devise under the will of said decedent was not before the court, and was not decided by it at the time of making said order or according to its terms. That this was apparently the view of this matter taken by the trial court is evident from its later action in awarding A. Basletta the share of said estate devised to him by the will of said decedent in the decree of partial distribution, from which this appeal is taken, and when the direct question of the right of A. Basletta as a nonresident alien to take by said devise was presented to said court for determination. We find, therefore, no merit in the appellant's said contention.

[2] The next contention urged by the appellant is that said A. Basletta, as a nonresident alien and subject of Italy, is not entitled, under the Constitution and laws of this state, to receive by devise any portion of the real estate of said decedent, and hence that the decree of partial distribution from which this appeal has been taken, in so far as it purports to distribute to said Basletta any property whatever of said decedent, is void. In making this contention the appellant, in his brief, concedes that at the time of the death of said decedent, and also at the time of making said decree of partial distribution, there existed a treaty between the United States and Italy in which what is known as the "most-favored nation" clause appeared; but the appellant contends that, notwithstanding the existence of said treaty and the presence and effect of said clause therein, the Constitution of this state, by virtue of the amendment of section 17 of article 1 thereof, adopted in 1894, must be held to override said treaty and must be construed as denying to nonresident aliens the right to take and hold by succession or devise real estate in California.

We are of the opinion that this court is concluded from attempting to determine either of these two contentions in the appellant's favor by the decision of the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 431, 59 Pac. 787. That case involved the right of a nonresident alien, a citizen and subject of England, to take by inheritance, real estate in California. The Supreme Court, in passing upon that question, held: First, that the treaty-making power of the federal government with respect to the rights of aliens to inherit property was of controlling force, and that the laws of the individual states upon that subject, in so far as they were in conflict with the treaty provisions, were suspended or controlled during the life of the treaty.

It is true that in that case it appeared that the treaties between Great Britain and this country were silent upon that subject, but, notwithstanding this fact, the Supreme Court there decided that the laws of the several states were subject to treaty control. It is not contended by the appellant herein that the subjects of Great Britain and of a number of other foreign powers were not accorded the right, under treaties existing at the time of the death of said decedent and at the time of the making and entry of the decree herein appealed from, to take real estate by inheritance or devise in this state. In point of fact, the authorities cited in his brief, notably the case of Succession of Rixner, 48 La. Ann. 552, 19 South. 597, 32 L. R. A. 177, and notes thereto, show the existence of such rights under a number of existing treaties between the United States and foreign powers; while in the case last referred to as cited by the appellant himself it is held that a nonresident alien and citizen and subject of Italy is entitled by the "most-favored nation" clause of the Italian treaty to be accorded the same rights of inheritance and succession which the citizens and subjects of other nations under the express terms of the treaties therein referred to enjoy.

We are therefore constrained to hold that the language of the Supreme Court in Blythe v. Hinckley, above referred to, determines this point against the appellant's contention.

[3] It is further claimed by the appellant that the amendment of section 17 of article 1 of the state Constitution, adopted in 1894, has the effect of superseding the decision referred to, and was in fact adopted with the express intent of so doing. It is to be noted that the case of Blythe v. Hinckley, supra, was decided by the Supreme Court six years after the date of said amendment; and it may be inferred that, if any such change in the Constitution as is herein contended for had been effected by said amendment the Supreme Court would have so declared; but, instead of doing this, it appears that the court in its decision in said case also dealt with the question as to whether section 17 of article 1 of the Constitution was intended to be a limitation upon the powers of the Legislature to deal with the question of the right of succession of nonresident aliens to real estate; and in so doing the court expressly held that the constitutional provision in question was not to be construed as being such a limitation. A cursory examination of section 17 of article 1 of the Constitution, as amended in 1894, will show that it does not expressly prohibit nonresident aliens, eligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws thereof, from acquiring by inheritance or devise, real estate, but apparently leaves it to the Legislature to determine the extent and conditions under which such aliens may hold and dispose of such real estate as shall be thus acquired by them after the adoption of said amendment. The Legislature of California, acting, apparently, upon this construction of the state Constitution, adopted, in 1913, an alien land act (Stats. 1913, p. 206), wherein, in section 1 thereof, it is provided that—

> "All aliens eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire, possess, enjoy, transmit and inherit real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States, except as otherwise provided by the laws of this state."

We are of the opinion that the state Legislature was empowered to pass this provision, and that, having done so prior to the death of said decedent, and said statute being in force at the time of her death, she was entitled by her last will and testament to devise to A. Basletta the portion of her real estate assigned to him by the terms of said will.

[4] The third and final contention of the appellant is that, since the trial court by its decree of partial distribution, made on January 8, 1920, distributed to him an undivided one-half of the San Francisco real estate of said decedent, and that since its decree of partial distribution made and entered on March 17, 1920, also distributed to him an undivided one-half interest in the same property, he is entitled to the whole thereof under said decrees, or at least that the second of said decrees was in error in awarding to A. Basletta an undivided one-half of said property, since the court thereby attempted to dispose of more by one-half than the whole thereof.

We find no merit in this contention, since aside from the fact that up to the time of the making of said second degree the appellant had not complied with the requirement of the first decree in the matter of filing the bond provided for therein, and also since in his opposition to the making of said second decree he altogether failed to refer to the fact that he had already received an undivided one-half of said property by said former decree, we are of the opinion that these two decrees should be construed together, and that, when so construed, it must be held that it was not the intention of the trial court to do otherwise than to dispose of the real estate of said decedent, in conformity with the terms of her will, and hence by its second decree to assign to the appellant no more than that share of said property which he had been declared entitled to receive upon the accomplishment of the yet unfulfilled requirements of the first decree. This being our construction of said decrees, it follows that there is no merit in the appellant's contention as to the effect of said decrees.

Judgment affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing presented by the Attorney General herein is denied.

[5] The case of Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 431, 59 Pac. 787, cited in the main opinion herein, was not referred to as one involving the question of the right of the alien therein concerned to inherit real estate in California under a treaty provision, but was relied upon for the reason that the Supreme Court did expressly declare in that case that state laws "in so far as they are in conflict with treaty provisions are suspended or controlled during the life of the treaty." It is not the province of this court to treat as dicta and disregard as such this express declaration of the Supreme Court.

The case of Sullivan v. Kidd, 254 U. S. 433, 41 Sup. Ct. 158, 65 L. Ed. —, cited by the petitioner, does not in our opinion sustain his contention as to the effect of the "most favored nation" clause in treaties upon state statutes undertaking to regulate or restrict the inheritance of real estate by nonresident aliens.

There is no resulting trust from the fact that one obtains property by exchange of other property belonging to another; he believing the property to be his own.

7. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—Findings as to transfer from one corporation to another held not to be implied.

Findings should, if possible, be construed to uphold the judgment; and so the fact, if it existed, that a transfer was made by an old corporation of its property to a new one, being important to plaintiffs, against whom was the judgment, a finding of such transfer cannot be implied from findings that on a certain day the old corporation owned and was in possession of the property, and on that day, pursuant to the proposal of defendant M., accepted by the new corporation, all the personal property was delivered at his instance to the new corporation, and it took possession of the real property, and at all times since has continued to "own," hold, and occupy the same, especially where these findings are in the words of the amended complaint, seeking to charge M., as trustee, under a resulting trust, for the old corporation as to the shares of the new corporation taken in his name, as consideration for such.

8. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Finding of knowledge held not so inconsistent with facts as to require disregard on appeal on judgment roll.

The facts, even if they could be considered as appearing, that an old corporation made a transfer of its property to a new corporation, and that defendant knew thereof, would not be so inconsistent with as to allow disregard on appeal on the judgment roll of a finding that he carried out an exchange of the property for stock of the new corporation, believing that the real property, for which he held a tax deed, was owned by him, and that the personal property was owned by his father.

9. Trusts 🔑373—Inference from findings held to be that a defendant took stock through his father and not his brother.

From the findings that C. exchanged property of an old corporation for stock of a new corporation, believing the real property to be his and the personal property to be his father's, and that only a part of the stock was taken by him, the balance being taken by his brother J., the inference is that C. acted on behalf of his father as to the personal property, and that the stock taken by J. represented the personal property, and that he received such stock from his father as the real party to the transaction, so far as concerns the personal property; so that whether he held it on a trust for the old corporation depends, not on the belief of C., but on the question of whether the father would have held it on a trust had it been issued to him.

10. Trusts 🔑102(1)—Trust arises from president of corporation receiving consideration of transfer of its property.

As to anything that the president of a corporation receives as consideration for a transfer or sale of its property, a trust, either resulting or constructive, arises in its favor against him.

11. Trusts 🔑356(1)—To negative trust as affecting purchaser, affirmative showing of payment of value necessary.

To relieve the transferee of stock from the equity existing against his transferor, his father, who held it on a trust, it must affirmatively appear that he took it as a purchaser for value.

12. Trusts 🔑356(1)—Transferee of property held on resulting trust holds on a constructive trust.

The transferee of stock which the transferor held on a trust, even though a resulting trust, would hold it only on a constructive trust, if as between him and the transferor he took and held it for himself, and was not holding it for the transferor.

13. Trusts 🔑86—No presumption of resulting trust from father furnishing consideration for stock issued to son.

There is no presumption that stock issued to a son was held by him for his father, who furnished the consideration; but from the relationship the presumption is that stock was taken by way of a gift.

14. Trusts 🔑76—No resulting trust from defendant's receipt of stock paid for by property of corporation, he having no knowledge of such ownership.

From the fact that the consideration of issue of stock to defendant was the property of an old corporation, no resulting trust arises in its favor, he not being conscious that it was advancing or furnishing it, so that there was not the intent necessary for a resulting trust.

15. Trusts 🔑76—Director held not charged with notice as affecting resulting trust in favor of corporation.

The mere fact that one to whom stock in a new corporation was issued in consideration of property nominally furnished by his father, but really belonging to an old corporation, was a director of such corporation, is not conclusive, especially where such corporation had been practically defunct for years, that he understood it was advancing the consideration necessary for a resulting trust in its favor to arise.

16. Trusts 🔑373—Finding held to negative intention necessary for resulting trust.

Implied in the finding that defendant took and held stock from the beginning as his own is a finding that he did not take it under such circumstances that it can be presumed that he took it with intention of holding it as trustee, necessary for a resulting trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Fred L. Lezinsky and another, trustees, against the Mason Malt Whisky Distilling Company and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell, A. E. Cooley, and Percy V. Long, all of San Francisco (A. Walter Allen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Garret W. McEnerney, all of San Francisco (McWilliams & Hatfield, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an action brought by two individuals as trustees for the creditors and stockholders of an expired California corporation having the name of Mason Malt Whisky Distilling Company against an existing Nevada corporation of the same name, and two individuals, John and Clinton Mason, to have it declared that the stock of the corporate defendant possessed by the individual defendants is held by the latter in trust for the creditors and stockholders of the expired California corporation. Issue was joined upon material allegations of the complaint, a trial was had, findings of fact were made by the trial court, and upon the findings judgment was given for the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal upon the judgment roll alone, and their primary contention is that upon the facts as found judgment should have gone in their favor.

The corporate defendant may be dismissed from consideration. The only relief sought against it is that in case it be held that the individual defendants hold their stock in it as trustees it be required to cancel the existing certificates of the stock and issue new ones in accordance with the trust. The real relief sought is solely against the individual defendants. As to them, the complaint alleges that their stock was acquired by them in consideration for the property of the California corporation which was turned over to the Nevada corporation under an agreement between the former and the two defendants that the latter would hold the stock so acquired as trustees for it until such time as a dividend should be declared upon the stock, when it was to be transferred to its beneficial owner. The transaction occurred in 1905, and the present action was not brought until 1915, but the complaint alleges that no dividend upon the stock was declared until shortly before the commencement of the action, and that until that time the defendants had never repudiated the trust.

[1] As the above statement would indicate a reading of the complaint leaves no doubt but that the trust which it seeks to enforce was an express trust, based on the alleged agreement of the defendants. The trial court found against any such agreement having been made, and also that the defendants had never repudiated the trust until 1915, for the reason that until then they were wholly unaware of any claim that a trust existed. Although such was the finding of the court, the contention of plaintiffs' counsel, a contention which in fairness we should say was apparently made before the trial court as well as before us, is that the existence or nonexistence of an agreement giving rise to an express trust is wholly immaterial; that the complaint alleges and the findings show that the consideration for which the defendants acquired their stock was furnished by the California corporation, so that what is commonly designated as a resulting trust arose in its favor as against the defendants, and that because the facts giving rise to such a trust are both alleged and found the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment upon the findings. We may grant, at least for the purposes of discussion, that it would not be a material variance if the complaint were based upon the alleged existence of an express trust and the findings showed but a resulting trust. But it should be noted at the outset that the variance is material, if the findings show facts which would possibly create a trust, but such trust would be neither an express nor a resulting trust, but what is commonly designated as a constructive one, that is, a trust based on fraud, or, what is really a particular kind of fraud, a breach of some duty incident to a fiduciary relation. The complaint contains no allegations of fraud or breach of fiduciary duty or of facts from which either would appear, and a cause of action based upon such facts is manifestly very different from one to enforce either an express or resulting trust, based as they are upon the intention of the parties, expressed in one case and presumed in the other.

[2, 3] The defense of the statute of limitations would also be materially affected according as the trust was an express or resulting trust on the one hand or a constructive trust on the other. In the first case, the statute would not begin to run until a repudiation of the trust (Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108), and the complaint alleges and it is found that there was no repudiation by the defendants here until shortly before the commencement of the action. The plaintiff's cause of action, therefore, if it be one to enforce an express or resulting trust, was not barred when the action was commenced. In the case of a constructive trust, however, the statute begins to run at once upon the doing of the acts by reason of which the trust arises (Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88), and any cause of action of that character against the defendants was barred years before. Furthermore, plaintiffs' counsel themselves insist stoutly that they are not seeking to recover upon a constructive, but solely upon a resulting, trust. The question, therefore, as to the existence of a constructive trust is not in the case and may be disregarded, and the sole question is as to the existence of a resulting trust upon the facts found.

[4] The rule is too well established to admit of serious dispute that where property is acquired in the name of A., but for a consideration furnished by B., it will be taken, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, that B. is the real owner, and that A. holds the title in his name as trustee merely, that is, there is a resulting trust with him as trustee and B. as beneficiary. The ultimate question in this case is whether or not a case of that character appears from the facts found. Those facts, so far as material, are these:

The California corporation was organized in 1891 for the purpose of engaging in the business of distilling whisky. It continued in existence until November 30, 1905, when it expired through forfeiture of its corporate franchise for failure to pay the state annual license tax. At that time, and for years before, its stock had been owned one-half by the plaintiff George Lezinsky, and one-half by John Mason, Sr., the father of the two defendants. John Mason, Sr., was the president of the company, and the other plaintiff, Fred L. Lezinsky, was its secretary. The directors were the two Lezinskys and the two John Masons. The corporation acquired a lot in the town of Sausalito with a distillery upon it, and also the good will and business of the John Mason Distillery, which, presumably, was the name of the distillery upon the property, and the formulas and recipes of John Mason, Sr., for making whisky. It was the owner of these things in June, 1905, the title to the real property being in the name of one, Samuel L. Lezinsky, for some reason unexplained, but he holding it as naked trustee only. Whether the corporation in 1905 was a going concern doing business does not appear from the findings, but, according to both sides, the evidence was that it had ceased business some seven years before.

Some time previous to June, 1905, the real estate had been sold for taxes, and a deed to the purchaser executed by the tax collector. On the fifteenth of that month, the defendant Clinton Mason secured a conveyance of the real estate from the purchaser at the tax sale, paying therefor the sum of $430. Four days later the Nevada corporation was organized by John Mason, Sr., his two sons, and two other persons. Like the old corporation of the same name, it was organized for the purpose of engaging in the business of distilling whisky. Immediately after its organization and on June 23, 1905, Clinton Mason submitted to it a written proposal whereby he offered to transfer to it the real property mentioned, with the distillery, the good will, and business of the John Mason Distillery, and all formulas and recipes for making whisky owned by John Mason, Sr., in consideration of the issuance to him of 24.900 shares of the corporation's stock and the issuance to the five organizers, of whom he was one, of 20 shares each. This proposal was accepted by the corporation the same day, and immediately thereupon the personal property was, according to the findings, delivered to it, and it also took possession of the real property. The possession so acquired the corporation maintained from then on, using the property in its business. Four days after the acceptance of his proposal Clinton Mason executed a conveyance of the real property to the corporation, and the stock called for in his proposal was issued, although not exactly as specified in the proposal. Of the 24,900 shares that were to be issued to him, 3,320 shares were issued to third persons, and the balance to himself and his brother equally, 10,840 shares to each. In the following October John Mason, Sr., executed a bill of sale to the corporation of the personal property, and some eight years later Samuel L. Lezinsky, in whose name the title to the real property stood as trustee for the old corporation, conveyed that property to the new corporation. Why this conveyance was made is not found, but it is found that it was made without "any further consideration," presumably further than might be shown by the facts found and already recited that it was made at the instance and request of the two defendants, and with the consent of the plaintiff George Lezinsky, and at his direction, but that it was not requested by the Masons or consented to by Lezinsky for the purpose of performing any agreement with the old corporation.

[5] Along with these findings there is also the most important finding that Clinton Mason, when he made the offer to the corporation, believed that the tax title to the realty which he had purchased was good, although it was in fact bad, and also believed that his father was the owner of the personal property and had been the owner of the realty at the time of the tax sale. In other words, the finding is that Clinton Mason made his offer in the belief that he was dealing only with property owned by himself and his father, and which they had the full right to deal with for their own benefit and as they pleased. There is no explanation of why Clinton Mason so believed, and, in the absence of any explanation, every natural inference from the other facts found would be to the contrary. But there may well have been a sufficient explanation appearing in the evidence, and in any case the correctness of the findings is not under review, and there is no necessary inconsistency between the particular finding and the others. This being the case, we must accept the finding as it is.

There are also findings that the turning over of the old corporation's property to the new was not done under any arrangement between the old corporation and the defendants, that there was no agreement by the defendants that they would hold their stock in trust, and that they had always held it exclusively as their own.

[6] The case has been discussed before us as if upon the foregoing facts it was the same as to both defendants. We do not so view it. As to Clinton Mason, a determinative finding is the one that he made his proposal to the new corporation and presumably carried through the transaction in the belief that the old corporation had no interest in the property he was assuming to transfer, and that he was himself the owner of the realty and his father the owner of the personalty. If this were his belief, and we must take it that it was, no trust would result as to him from his assuming to convey the property, even if he were not the real owner of it. As to him, the case is not one of his purchasing something, in this case the stock in the new corporation, with a consideration furnished by the old. So far as he is concerned, the old corporation furnished nothing. The furnishing of the consideration, by reason of which a resulting trust arises, is a furnishing, not to the seller of the property bought, but to the purchaser. The whole theory upon which a trust is imposed upon the purchaser in such a case is that, as between him and a third person, it was the latter who furnished the consideration with which the property was acquired, so that it will be presumed that as between them it was intended that the purchase be for the benefit of him who supplied the means with which to make it. Manifestly, this theory has no application to a case where the purchaser uses what he believes to be his own property in making the purchase. So far as he is concerned, the consideration for the sale is what he himself furnishes. The present case, in other words, is, as to Clinton Mason, the not uncommon and very simple one of one who is not the owner of certain property, but believes he is, selling or otherwise disposing of it. No trust in such a case arises as to the proceeds of the sale in his hands. Lumber Co. v. Lowe, 75 W. Va. 715, 84 S. E. 566, L. R. A. 1916E, 718; Gaines v. Lizardi, 1 Woods, 56, 9 Fed. Cas. 1039.

[7] Before, however, dismissing the discussion of the case as to this defendant, notice should be taken of the contention of plaintiffs' counsel that it must be taken from the findings that the old corporation itself transferred its property to the new. There is no express finding to that effect. The contention is based upon the fact that it is found: First, that on June 23, 1905, the old corporation was the owner and in possession of the property; second, that on that day, pursuant to the proposal made by Clinton Mason and accepted, all the personal property was delivered at his instance to the new corporation, and it took possession of the real property; and, third, that the new corporation "at all times since has continued to own, hold, and occupy the same." It is difficult to see how the new corporation could immediately become the owner of the property without a transfer from its former owner, and it is claimed that because of this we must assume that such a transfer was in fact executed. There are two answers to this. In the first place, the findings conform upon these points to the exact language of the complaint, so that the complaint as well as the findings fail to show expressly any transfer by the old corporation to the new. Yet that fact, if it existed, was an important one for the plaintiffs, and we think the wording of the complaint, a third amended complaint by the way, justifies the conclusion that the failure to allege that fact was an intentional one. In view of this fact, and of the rule that findings should, if possible, be construed to uphold the judgment, we think we would not be justified in holding that it was found that the old corporation executed a transfer on June 23, 1905, merely because of the finding that the new corporation from then on continued to "own" the property.

[8] In the second place, assuming that there was such a transfer, there is nothing to show that Clinton Mason was aware of it, or that, if he was, his belief that he and his father were the real owners of the property was affected thereby. The making of such a transfer, if known to him, would have been very material as evidence that he did not have that belief, but it would not be conclusive. There might have been a transfer by the old corporation, and he might have known of it, and yet he might have believed that he and his father were the real owners, and have carried the transaction through in that belief, and as one solely for his and his father's benefit. We cannot disregard the finding as to his belief, and it is determinative. The judgment must therefore be affirmed as to the defendant Clinton Mason.

[9] As to the other defendant, John Mason, however, the case is not so simple. There is no finding either that he was or that he was not ignorant of the fact that the old corporation was the real owner of the property. Furthermore, he is not protected by the finding that his brother so believed, although it was the latter who purported to deal with the new corporation. The finding is that Clinton believed, not that he, but that his father, was the owner of the personal property transferred, and this fact, taken in conjunction with the fact that a part of the stock taken in return for the property was not taken by him, gives rise to the necessary inference that as to the personal property Clinton was acting merely on behalf of his father, and that the stock which he did not take, but went to his brother, represented his father's interest in the transaction. The case, then, as to John Mason must be taken as one wherein the stock, which he received, he received from his father as the real party to the transaction.

[10, 11] Now it would seem that in view of the fact, not alleged but found, that the father was at the time the president and a director of the old corporation, a trust, either resulting or constructive, would arise in its favor as against him as to anything he might receive by a transfer or sale of its property. Wells v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 133. If this be true, then the defendant John Mason took his stock subject to this trust, for he, in effect, took it from his father, and it does not appear that he took it as a purchaser for value, something which must affirmatively appear in order to relieve him of the equity existing against his transferor. Upon the facts found, therefore, it must, we think, be taken that John Mason took the stock which he received as the successor of his father, and therefore took it subject to a trust in favor of the old corporation.

[12] It does not follow, however, that judgment should go against him in this action. It can go against him only, as we said at the outset, in case such trust was as to him a resulting trust. If the trust was a constructive trust as to the father, it is evident that it is no more than such as to the son. We may therefore dismiss this alternative from consideration, and consider the matter as if the trust subject to which the father would have held the property was a resulting trust. Even so, the son would not himself hold the property subject to a trust of that character, unless it also appeared that as between himself and his father he was not holding it on his own account, but for his father. If, as between himself and his father, he took and held the stock for himself, then, while it would be true that he took and held it subject to the trust to which it was subject in the hands of his father, such trust would as to him be a constructive and not a resulting trust, and one against which the statute of limitations would commence to run immediately. This was directly decided in Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 Pac. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162, where, the trustee under a resulting trust dying, and the legal title to the property passing to his son as heir, it was held that while the son took the title subject to the trust, the trust was as to him a constructive one, since it was imposed upon him by operation of law and without his consent and contrary to his intention, with the result that the statute of limitations began to run in his favor at the moment the legal title came to him, i. e., at the death of his father.

[13] Even though it be true, then, that the stock would have been subject to a resulting trust in the hands of his father, and that John Mason took it subject to whatever equity would exist against it in the hands of his father, there was no resulting trust as to him because of these facts, and consequently no judgment is now possible against him because of them, unless it also appears that as between his father and himself he held the stock for the former. There is nothing to show this, and it is directly negatived by the findings. The only thing which appears and which it can be claimed would show that he so held the stock is the fact that as between his father and himself it was his father who advanced the consideration for which it was acquired. This would be sufficient except for the relationship between them, but, in view of that relationship, it is to be presumed that the stock was taken by the son by way of gift or advancement from the father. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 143; 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jur. § 1039; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 Pac. 321, 66 Pac. 860; Rossiter v. Schultz, 185 Pac. 997. There is nothing whatever to rebut this presumption. In addition, there is the direct finding that John Mason has at all times held his stock as his own exclusive property. It follows, then, that even though John Mason took his stock from his father subject to a trust in favor of the corporation, yet such trust was as to him but a constructive trust at best, and any cause of action upon it is not within the present complaint, and was long ago barred by limitation.

[14] The only other alternative upon which it can be claimed that a resulting trust arose as to John Mason is that as between him and the corporation directly it was the latter who furnished the consideration for the stock. This, as we understand it, is in fact the real contention of plaintiffs' counsel. But they proceed upon the theory apparently that merely because the property of the corporation was actually used as the consideration for the stock, a resulting trust arises. This is not true. A resulting trust is not founded on the simple fact that money or property of one has been used by another to purchase property. It is founded on a relationship between the two, on the fact that as between them, consciously and intentionally, one has advanced the consideration wherewith to make a purchase in the name of the other. The trust arises because it is the natural presumption in such a case that it was their intention that the ostensible purchaser should acquire and hold the property for the one with whose means it was acquired. But this presumption is rebuttable, and, if the evidence or the circumstances show that such intention did not exist, no trust arises. It is because of this that no trust will arise in the case mentioned of parent and child upon a showing merely that it was the former who advanced the consideration. Because of the relation between the parties in such a case, the natural presumption is that a gift or advancement was intended. In a number of other respects, which we need not enumerate, the rules in regard to the existence of resulting trusts are consistent only with the theory that such trusts depend upon the intention of the parties. As Prof. Pomeroy says, himself italicizing the word "intention" (3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1031):

> "In all species of resulting trusts intention is an essential element, although that intention is never expressed by any words of direct creation. There must be a transfer, and equity infers the intention that the transferee was not to receive and hold the title as the beneficial owner, but that a trust was to arise in favor of the party whom equity would regard as the beneficial owner under the circumstances."

The same idea is found in 1 Perry on Trusts, § 126, where it is said:

> "This rule [as to resulting trusts] has its foundation in the natural presumption, in the absence of all rebutting circumstances, that he who supplies the purchase money intends the purchase to be for his own benefit, and not for another, and that the conveyance in the name of another is a matter of convenience and arrangement between the parties for collateral purposes, and this rule is vindicated by the experience of mankind." (The italics are ours.)

We, perhaps, should say again at this point that we are speaking only of resulting trusts. Wherever by fraud or in breach of a fiduciary relation one uses the property of another to make a purchase in his own name, a trust arises regardless of intention. But such trusts are constructive trusts purely, and, as we have said, there are no allegations here of fraud or breach of fiduciary duty, and any cause of action by reason of a trust depending upon them cannot be considered. If the plaintiffs are to recover it must be solely because of a resulting trust dependent upon the intention of the parties.

It is not sufficient, therefore, that it appear merely that the old corporation's property was used to acquire the defendants' stock in the new. It must also appear, directly or indirectly, that, as between them and it, it was intended that they should acquire and hold the property for it. In the case of Clinton Mason, such intent is flatly negatived by the finding that he believed the property to be his own and that of his father. There is no such finding as to John Mason, but neither is there a finding that such intent existed as between him and the corporation, and in its absence the question is, Are such facts and crcumstances shown that such intent is to be presumed? It is to be presumed if it appear that as between him and the corporation it was the latter who consciously to him advanced or furnished the consideration. But if he were not conscious of that fact, then there was no furnishing of the consideration by it so far as he was concerned, there is no relation between him and it, and there is nothing upon which to predicate a presumption that it was, in the language of Prof. Pomeroy, "the intention that the transferee was not to receive and hold the title as the beneficial owner." Does it appear, then, that it was known to John Mason that the property which was being used to pay for his stock was owned by the old corporation? If this at least does not appear, there is no theory upon which the claim of a resulting trust against him can be sustained.

[15] There is no finding which declares this to have been the fact, nor does it necessarily appear from the facts which are found. That which is found is at most that the defendant's father, in breach, we will assume, since there is no explanation of his conduct, of the fiduciary obligation which he owed the old corporation as one of its managing officials, undertook through the medium of his son Clinton to turn over the possession and enjoyment of its property in consideration for stock issued to his two sons. These facts would give rise to a trust subject to which the son John Mason would hold his stock, but it would as to him be a constructive trust only. But so far as a resulting trust is concerned, there is nothing in them which necessarily infers that he knew that the property was not that of his father, but of the corporation, or that he understood that it was the latter who was advancing the consideration with which to make the purchase. This is true even though, as found but not as alleged, he was a director of the corporation at the time. That fact would be but evidentiary at best, and it loses much of the significance which would otherwise attach to it by reason of the fact which both sides say appeared in the evidence that the corporation had been practically defunct for years. It is not at all unlikely that he so knew and understood, and it may well be that in the absence of any explanation or counter evidence the trial court would have been justified in so finding upon the evidence alone of the facts which the court finally found. But whether there was any explanation or counter evidence we do not know. It is perfectly possible, for instance, that it appeared that the father represented to his sons, and they believed, that he had acquired the property of the corporation by virtue of some arrangement with it or with its only other stockholder. In any event, we cannot make the finding, and unless the facts which are found are consistent only with the defendant knowing it was the property of the corporation that was being dealt with, so that they are the practical equivalent of such a finding, it must be taken that such fact does not appear. That there is no necessary inconsistency between the facts found and the defendant receiving his stock without being aware that it was the corporation's property which was paying for it, we think fairly plain from what we have already said.

[16] Furthermore, there is the finding, heretofore adverted to, that the two defendants took and held their stock from the beginning as their own exclusive property. Implied in this is a finding that John Mason did not take his stock under such circumstances that it can be presumed that he took it with the intention of holding it as trustee. The result is that while the findings, because of facts appearing in them which are not supported by the averments of the complaint, may very possibly show that he originally held his stock subject to a constructive trust, there is lacking in them the finding of an element essential for the existence of a resulting trust, by reason of which alone the plaintiffs would be entitled here to judgment against him. It follows that the judgment against the plaintiffs must be affirmed as to him as well as to his brother, Clinton Mason.

2. Sales 🔑1(4)—Description of land in contract to sell peach crop held sufficiently definite.

Description in a contract of sale of certain peach crops, "The following orchards and lands leased or owned by the seller in the county of ——, state of California, to wit, located ¾ miles southeast of Visalia," and, "Acres, 10; present age, 6; varieties of fruit, Tuscan peaches. Acres 10; present age, 6; varieties of fruit, Phillips peaches"—held sufficient to sustain the contract, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1643, 1644, 1647, 1649, 1654, 3535, and 3541.

3. Sales 🔑54—Parties giving practical construction of contract bound thereby.

If a contract of sale of certain peach crops was ambiguous in its description of the premises but the parties construed its doubtful terms by a practical application of it to a particular tract of land, they are in some degree concluded to say that it does not describe the particular tract.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑22—Law exacts only such description as when aided by evidence will identify the property.

In a conveyance of real property the law exacts only such description as when aided by evidence applying the description to the property will serve to identify it, and it requires no such completeness of execution in an executory contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; William B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the California Packing Corporation against M. F. Grove and John Adelsbach. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to the last-named defendant, and reversed as to the first-named defendant.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for appellant.

Bradley & Bradley and Power & McFadzean, all of Visalia, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. This action was commenced for the purpose of recovering an amount due from defendants for failure to deliver certain peach crops, in accordance with the terms of a written contract entered into by respondent Grove and the assignor of the plaintiff. Respondent Adelsbach was made a party by order of the lower court for the reason that he became the purchaser of the real property upon which was grown the fruit mentioned in the contract. The plaintiff in an amended complaint sets forth the contract in full and also all the facts showing a violation thereof and the amount of damages sustained by him. The respondents demurred to the amended complaint upon the ground that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

This demurrer was sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment was entered accordingly, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals. Two points only are presented for the consideration of the court.

[1] 1. The respondent Grove claims that the contract in question runs with the land, and that, upon the conveyance of the premises to his codefendant, the latter was saddled with the burdens of the contract and the former was released therefrom. The contract contains the following provision:

> "It is mutually agreed between the seller and the buyer that the covenants herein contained shall run with the land herein described, and shall bind both parties hereto, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns."

This provision does not constitute a covenant running with the land. Sections 1460-1462, Civ. Code. Only those covenants that are made for the direct benefit of the property and are contained in a grant of the property run with the land. Sections 1460 and 1462, supra; Long v. Cramer Meat & Packing Co., 155 Cal. 405, 101 Pac. 297. It is so clear that this is not a covenant running with the land that an extended examination of the point would be superfluous. It is quite true that parties may so word a contract that it will create a charge or lien upon land for the performance of the terms of a contract, and yet it may fall far short of creating a covenant running with the land. In this case the language used by the parties is not sufficient either to create a lien upon the land or to bind the assigns of the respondent Grove. The provision that the covenants shall run with the land does not effect that result. The provision must therefore be rejected as surplusage. It could scarcely be contended that the remaining portions of the covenant clause could bind a purchaser from respondent Grove, and, at all events, they could not operate to relieve Grove from his contract. Cal. Packing Corporation v. Emirzian, 187 Pac. 77. And the determination of this last point is really the extent of our inquiry, since the appellant concedes that respondent Adelsbach should not be bound. This relieves us from any concern as to the success of the parties in creating a lien upon the premises. We are of the opinion that respondent Grove is bound, for the twofold reason that no covenant running with the land absolves him and carries the burden over to his grantee and that the parties have not used apt words in other respects either to relieve him or to shift the burden to another.

[2] 2. The second point relied upon to sustain the judgment is that the description of the real property is so defective that the contract cannot be made the foundation for a personal liability on the part of respondent Grove. It must be conceded that the description is somewhat faulty, but we are satisfied that it is quite sufficient to sustain this contract. The description is in the following words:

> "The following orchards and lands leased or owned by the seller in the county of ——, state of California, to wit: Located ¾ miles southeast of Visalia."

And further along in the contract occur the following statements, which may be useful in identification of the property:

> "Acres, 10; present age, 6; varieties of fruit, Tuscan peaches. Acres 10; present age, 6; varieties of fruit, Phillips peaches."

[3] It is fundamental that a contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties. Civ. Code, § 1636. An interpretation must make a contract lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of execution, if such interpretation is possible. Civ. Code, § 1643. A contract is to be construed according to its ordinary and popular meaning rather than according to its strict legal sense. Civ. Code, § 1644. A contract may be explained by references to the circumstances under which it was made and the matter to which it relates. Civ. Code, § 1647. Ambiguity must be resolved in that sense in which the promisor believed that the promisee understood the matter. Civ. Code, § 1649. Uncertainty must be resolved against the promisor. Civ. Code, § 1654. "Contemporaneous exposition is in general the best." Civ. Code, § 3535. "An interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void." Civ. Code, § 3541. These principles of interpretation, applicable alike to all contracts, are peculiarly illuminating when applied to the facts of this case. It is seen from the allegations of the complaint that the parties were contracting with reference to a fruit orchard containing 20 acres of peach trees of two well-known varieties, and about six years of age; that the promisor clearly intended to sell and the promisee intended to buy the fruit to be grown thereon for a period of five years; that for two years these parties construed this contract as applying to a certain orchard; that for these two years the promisor delivered the fruit to the promisee under this contract and received the stipulated price; and that he now repudiates the contract. It is shown that the respondent Grove did not, at the date of the contract, own any other peach orchard within the county. It is possible that this court might rest its conclusions entirely upon the contemporaneous exposition of the meaning of the contract evidenced by the acts of the parties for a period of two years. While the contract was entirely executory, each party had a right to rely upon its nominated terms; but when they construed its doubtful terms by a practical application of it to a particular tract of land they are in some degree concluded to say that it does not fully describe that particular tract. Upon this point the language of Mr. Justice Sawyer in Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 108, is pertinent:

> "But if the meaning of the language of the instrument can be considered doubtful, 'another rule of construction is, that when the words of a grant are ambiguous the court will call in the aid of the acts done under it as a clue to the intention of the parties.'"
> "The construction as to the boundary given to a doubtful deed by the parties themselves as shown by their acts and admissions will be accepted as the true one, unless the contrary is shown." 4 Eng. & Am. Ency. 796.
> "The construction which the parties have, by their acts, placed upon an ambiguous instrument is entitled to great, if not controlling, weight in determining its proper construction." 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. 24, citing a long array of authorities.

Along a like line is the case of Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 162, where the court says:

> "The law will not declare the instrument void for uncertainty, until it has been examined with all the light which cotemporaneous facts may furnish. If these render the intention clear, and the words of the instrument are, by fair rendering, susceptible of a construction to uphold such intention, then they will be so construed, and the instrument enforced."

This doctrine was cited with approval in County of Los Angeles v. Hannon, 159 Cal. 41, 112 Pac. 878. In Pio Pico v. Coleman, 47 Cal. 65, the court says:

> "The parties have themselves so construed the deed by their subsequent acts, and there is no reasonable ground to doubt that this is the correct interpretation of it."
> "Undoubtedly, where the location of premises intended to be conveyed can be ascertained from the terms used in the instrument of conveyance, neither the acts nor declarations of the parties are admissible to show their understanding of the description contained in the conveyance. But where the terms used to describe the premises meant to be conveyed are equivocal, ambiguous, or insufficient, the subsequent acts of the parties, while in interest, showing the practical construction put upon the terms of the description by them, may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining their intention." Truett v. Adams, 66 Cal. 218, 5 Pac. 96.

Our attention has been drawn to some other authorities in support of the same principle, but it seems unnecessary to cite them.

[4] 3. Independently of any construction based upon the acts of the parties, the language used in the description is sufficiently definite. In considering this point the court is required to keep in mind two leading principles: First, in a conveyance of real property, the law exacts only such description as, when aided by evidence applying the description to the property, will serve to identify it; and, secondly, it requires no such completeness of description in executory contracts. Upon the second point we cite Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386, where the court says:

> "But the rule as to the particularity of description required in executory contracts to convey is extremely liberal in favor of their sufficiency. The rule is, that where the description, so far as it goes, is consistent but does not appear to be complete, it may be completed by extrinsic parol evidence, provided a new description is not introduced into the body of the contract, and the complaint must contain the averments of such extrinsic matter as may be necessary to render the description complete. * * * But parol evidence cannot be heard to furnish a description. The only purpose for which such evidence can be heard is to apply the description given to the subject-matter. Thus if the description were my farm in Los Angeles county, an allegation in the complaint that I owned but one farm in said county, and where it was situated, would apply the description to the proper subject-matter, and render it certain. But if the description were a farm in Los Angeles county, it could not be rendered certain by the allegation of such extrinsic matter."

Again, in another case, the court says:

> "This, it is to be remembered, is a contract for the sale of land and not a deed of grant of the land, and much greater liberality is allowed in construing the descriptions contained in such contracts. The certainty required in deeds is not essential where even by parol evidence the property, in contemplation of the parties, to be conveyed can be definitely ascertained. * * * And even in the case of deeds, the ancient strictness of the rule is not adhered to." Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 Pac. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207.

But in this case now under review, the description of the land and its identity are only incidental to the main purposes of the contract. The contract does not involve the title or right of possession of the land. And it seems that in such case, even a less stringent rule applies than in the case of executory contracts to convey land. As said by this court, quoting from an earlier case:

> "Much greater liberality is allowed in construing and curing defective descriptions in broker's contracts than in a deed of grant of land, for, so far as the statute of frauds is concerned, the terms of the employment are the essential part, and such contracts will not be declared void merely because of a defect, uncertainty, or ambiguity in the description of the property to be sold or exchanged when such defect can be cured by the allegation or proof of extrinsic facts and circumstances." Goodrich v. Turney, 186 Pac. 806.

Carefully analyzing the description in this case, we see that it meets even rather exacting requirements. It is composed of the following elements:

(a) The fruits growing and to be grown during certain years;

(b) Upon the following orchards;

(c) Leased or owned by the seller;

(d) Located three-fourths of a mile southeast of Visalia;

(e) Containing 10 acres of Tuscan peach trees, six years old;

(f) Containing 10 acres of Phillips peach trees, six years old.

It will be noted that each one of these elements helps to identify the premises. It is averred in the complaint that the lands in question are owned by the seller and that he owns no other; that they contain orchards; that these orchards answer in all respects to the calls in the description; and that the premises are three-fourths of a mile southeast from Visalia. It may be that this last call is in fact a little hazy, but in theory it is not.

There is no intrinsic difficulty in locating a point three-fourths of a mile southeast of Visalia. Such a point exists and it is a mathematical point. The complaint informs us that such a point can be and has been found and that thereat is located an orchard of 20 acres, bearing certain fruit trees fulfilling in every particular the calls of the contract. There can be but one orchard at the point in question, but conceding for the moment that a description calling for a point three-fourths of a mile southeast of Visalia might possess such uncertainty as to be in some degree a floating point, still it is only barely conceivable that another orchard should be found in the immediate locality containing 20 acres and bearing fruit trees of the kind and age described in the contract. Such coincidences happen only in theory and not in practice.

Even in the case of deeds, much indulgence is allowed. "The general rule in regard to the construction of the description of the premises in a deed is one of the utmost liberality. The intent of the parties, if it can by any possibility be gathered from the language employed, will be effectuated." Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 21, quoting from page 37, "A deed is not to be held void for uncertainty if by any reasonable construction, it can be made available." 3 Washburn on Real Property, 2320. "A deed will not be declared void for uncertainty if it is possible by any reasonable rule of construction to ascertain from the description, aided by extrinsic evidence, what property it was intended to convey." 1 Jones on Real Property, 323.

In Wade v. Deray, 50 Cal. 381, a description for less satisfactory than that found in this case was upheld. In that case there were two descriptions, but one of them was held to be erroneous and was rejected. The following was held to be sufficient:

> "That tract of land now used and occupied by the said Deray as a vineyard, on the road leading from the town of Alviso to the city of San Jose, and about three miles in a southerly direction from the town of Alviso, or the Embarcadero, nearly opposite the old mill, near the mill of James Lick."

Respondent Adelsbach was improperly made a party, and the judgment as to him is affirmed. The judgment as to respondent Grove is reversed and the trial court is directed to overrule his demurrer.

51 Cal. App. 15

HARRIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 2241, Sac. 3221.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 5, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 4, 1921.)

1. States 🔑4—Federal government may avail itself of executive functions of state officers to enforce federal statute.

The federal government may, by statute, avail itself, to a limited extent, where necessary, of the executive functions of state officers to assist in enforcing valid federal statutes enacted, under the Constitution, to promote the public welfare.

2. Intoxicating liquors 🔑198—Warrant may be issued to city police officer for arrest for violation of National Prohibition Law.

Under U. S. Rev. St. § 1014 (U. S. Comp. St. § 1674), a valid warrant may be issued directed to a police officer of a city to arrest for violation of the National Prohibition Law, commonly known as the Volstead Act.

3. Bribery 🔑1(2)—Police officer holding warrant for violation of National Prohibition Law within rule relative to bribery.

In the event of warrant issuing, under U. S. Rev. St. § 1014 (U. S. Comp. St. § 1674), to a police officer of a city for arrest of another for violation of the National Prohibition Law, the police officer would be brought within the rule that where an officer of the law becomes directly or indirectly vested with power to take or not to take some official action he is guilty of bribery, denounced by Pen. Code, § 68, if he corruptly offers for reward to forego official action.

4. Criminal law 🔑95—Police officer charged with bribery in connection with National Prohibition Law could be prosecuted in state courts.

A police officer of a city charged with bribery, in violation of Pen. Code, § 68, in promising, for consideration, not to arrest another if such other should engage in the sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the National Prohibition Law, commonly known as the Volstead Act, may be prosecuted in the state courts for his violation of the Penal Code; his prosecution not being limited to the courts of the United States.

5. Criminal law 🔑95—Intoxicating liquors 🔑13—State court jurisdiction can try officer charged with a corrupt agreement not to arrest violator of National Prohibition Law; Congress has not exclusive jurisdiction in enforcement of Volstead Act.

Const. U. S. Amend. 18, does not give Congress exclusive jurisdiction in the enforcement of the National Prohibition Law, commonly known as the Volstead Act, and to the extent that Pen. Code, § 68, against bribery, regulates the duties of all persons who act under the law, and prescribes penalties for the violation of such duties, it is a valid statute, assuming concurrent jurisdiction by the state in the enforcement of the National Prohibition Law, giving the state jurisdiction to try a police officer of a city charged with bribery in agreeing not to arrest for violation of the National Prohibition Law.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

6. Prohibition 🔑10(1)—Writ available only in case of excess of jurisdiction.

The remedy of prohibition is available only in a case of excess of jurisdiction.

7. Prohibition 🔑3(4)—Writ not available to prevent superior court from proceeding with trial of cause wherein indictment attempted to charge offense.

Where the indictment clearly attempted to charge the offense on the part of an executive officer of a city of agreeing to receive a bribe, defined by Penal Code, § 68, it was for the superior court, on appeal from the judgment, to determine as to the sufficiency of the indictment, and alleged defect was not available as a ground for prohibition.

Application for writ of prohibition by E. B. Harris against the Superior Court of Sacramento County of the State of California and Hon. Malcom C. Glenn, as one of the Judges of said court. Writ discharged.

Downey & Downey, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for respondents.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an application for writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of Sacramento county from proceeding with the trial of petitioner upon indictment charging that petitioner, while serving as a police officer of the city of Sacramento, agreed to receive a bribe, in consideration of which he promised not to arrest one Argante in the event said Argante should engage in the sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the National Prohibition Law.

Petitioner claims that the indictment fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, for the reason that it fails to appear therefrom that petitioner, as a policeman, had any official authority to make an arrest for any violation of the National Prohibition Law. And, as stated by petitioner in his brief:

> "The sole issue for decision, therefore, is whether petitioner was acting in his official capacity as a Sacramento policeman when he is alleged to have agreed not to arrest one Argante should he engage in the sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the National Prohibition Law."

Section 68 of the Penal Code provides that—

> "Every executive officer * * * who asks, receives, or agrees to receive, any bribe, upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, or action upon any matter then pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be influenced thereby, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years," etc.

In construing this section, our Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 Pac. 620, 49 Am. Rep. 700, which was a case wherein was involved the prosecution of a police officer for promising to accept a bribe upon an agreement that he would not arrest persons engaged in violating a certain gaming ordinance, used the following language:

> "The scope of the definition of bribery is as broad as the duties of the officer who accepts the bribe. It is the duty of a police officer to arrest, with or without warrant, according to circumstances, every person who violates section 330 of the Penal Code. If, therefore, he agreed, in consideration of money paid him, not to arrest any person who should violate section 330, it would seem to the ordinary comprehension that he was bribed with respect to a matter which might be a subject of his official action."

And, quoting with approval from an Alabama case (Barefield v. State, 14 Ala. 603), the opinion continues:

> "The matter, cause, or proceeding must be one which may come before him, that is, comes within his jurisdiction, or which may be brought before the officer, or which may be pending at the time of the corrupt promise. The Legislature, I think, did not intend that the prosecution should depend upon the fact whether the officer actually had it in his power to carry out the corrupt agreement before the indictment was exhibited. It is sufficient, I think, that the subject-matter upon which the bribe was to operate existed, and could legally be brought before the officer in his official capacity. The offense consists, in contemplation of the statute, in poisoning and corrupting the fountain of justice, and although the particular deleterious consequence designed to be effected by the parties has not ensued, the state, nevertheless, has an officer corrupted, and society has lost all protection for its rights, so far as the administration of the law by him is concerned."

The National Prohibition Law (41 Stat. 305) has been held to be constitutional. It was enacted by Congress to give force and effect to the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that—

> "After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

And provides further that—

> "The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

And section 2 of title 2 of the enforcing act provides that—

> "Sec. 2. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors shall investigate and report violations of this act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who is hereby charged with the duty of prosecuting the offenders, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, as in the case of other offenses against the laws of the United States; and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors may swear out warrants before United States commissioners or other officers or courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders, and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the prosecution at the committing trial for the purpose of having the offenders held for the action of a grand jury. Section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby made applicable in the enforcement of this act. Officers mentioned in said section 1014 are authorized to issue search warrants under the limitations provided in title 11 of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stats. at Large, p. 217)."

And section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, being also section 1674, U. S. Compiled Statutes, Annotated, provides as follows:

> "For any crime or offense against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any commissioner of a circuit court to take bail, or by any chancellor, judge of a Supreme or superior court, chief or first judge of common pleas, mayor of a city, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, of any state where he may be found, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by law has cognizance of the offense. Copies of the process shall be returned as speedily as may be into the clerk's office of such court, together with the recognizances of the witnesses for their appearance to testify in the case. And where any offender or witness is committed in any district other than that where the offense is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of the district where such offender or witness is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal to execute, a warrant for his removal to the district where the trial is to be had."

From the foregoing it is plain that the National Prohibition Law expressly provides that offenders thereof may be arrested by a justice of the peace or other magistrate of any state where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state. Under the usual mode of procedure in this state (Pen. Code, §§ 811 to 818, and sections 834 to 838), an arrest by a justice of the peace or other magistrate is accomplished by the issuance of a warrant directed to a peace officer, such as a "sheriff of a county, or a constable, marshal or policeman of a township, city or town," whose official duty it thereupon becomes to execute such warrant by subjecting the party named therein to such restraint as is "necessary for his arrest and detention." It is true that the federal statute does not by name mention policemen, but the statute does mention the official source from which the policeman derives his official authority to act. And it has accordingly been held that a person cannot escape the pains and penalties of bribery by reason of the mere fact that his authority to act in the premises is not specifically conferred upon him by statute.

As stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Birdsall, 233 U. S. at page 230, 34 Sup. Ct. at page 514, 58 L. Ed. 930:

> "Every action that is within the range of official duty comes within the purview of these sections. There was thus a legislative basis (United States v. George, 228 U. S. 14, 22) for the charge in the present cases, if the action sought to be influenced was official action. To constitute it official action, it was not necessary that it should be prescribed by statute; it was sufficient that it was governed by a lawful requirement of the department under whose authority the officer was acting. Rev. Stat. § 161; Benson v. Henkel, 198 U. S. 1, 12; Haas v. Henkel, 216 U. S. 462, 480. Nor was it necessary that the requirement should be prescribed by a written rule or regulation. It might also be found in an established usage which constituted the common law of the department and fixed the duties of those engaged in its activities. United States v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. 1, 14. In numerous instances, duties not completely defined by written rules are clearly established by settled practice, and action taken in the course of their performance must be regarded as within the provisions of the above-mentioned statutes against bribery. Haas v. Henkel, supra."

Also, in the case of Krichman v. United States (C. C. A.) 263 Fed. 538, at page 542, the court uses the following language:

> "But in the case at bar, in order to sustain the indictment under which the defendant has been convicted, it is not necessary to hold, and we do not hold, that the defendant at the time the offense charged was committed was an officer of the United States. We do not think he was. But we do hold that he was acting on behalf of the United States in an official function, a function belonging to his superior, the Director General of Railroads, and committed to him for the purpose of being executed.
> "Any employé in any department of the government of the United States, who acts in the performance of a duty which is imposed upon that department, or aids in any way in the performance of such a duty, is acting on behalf of the United States in an official function and within the range of official duty, within the meaning of section 39 of the Criminal Code. The words of the section are not to be narrowed to the exclusion of what the Congress intended to embrace. That intention is not to be defeated by an overstrict construction. The rule that a penal law is to be construed strictly 'comes attended,' said the court in United States v. Hartwell, supra, 'with qualifications and other rules no less important. * * * The rule does not exclude the application of common sense to the terms made use of in the act in order to avoid an absurdity, which the Legislature ought not to be presumed to have intended.'"

See, also, Sears v. United States, 257 Fed. at page 261.

And, furthermore, if the federal statute section (section 1014, R. S.) is operative herein, it is begging the question to suggest that the warrant could not issue because the offense is not triable in the county, as required by section 811 of our Penal Code. For the power to issue the warrant in this instance comes not from the state statute, but comes, if at all, from the federal law. Likewise as regards the suggestion that the city charter of Sacramento forbids its policemen to follow any other profession, but requires that they devote their entire time to the performance of their official duty.

Now, as regards the power vested by the federal statutes in the magistrate to issue the warrant as a part of the usual mode of process to consummate an arrest: From the beginning of our history, in order to give effect to federal statutes, which are the supreme law of the land, and passed under the Constitution to promote the general welfare, use has been always made of the administrative agencies of the several states—sometimes with and sometimes without the express consent of the states. This has been the practice as regards the naturalization of aliens, though in an ante bellum case our Supreme Court, as then constituted, held that Congress had no power to confer jurisdiction upon the courts of a state to naturalize aliens, although, if such power be recognized by the Legislature of a state, it may be exercised by the courts of such state of competent jurisdiction. Ex parte Knowles, 5 Cal. 300. But it is now held that—

> "Whatever may have been the theory of some courts regarding the power of Congress to confer such authority upon the state courts in the past, the question is now settled that Congress has such power, and that state courts may constitutionally exercise the same when authorized by Congress to do so, without legislative authority from the states which created them, provided the exercise of such jurisdiction is not prohibited by state legislation." 2 Corpus Juris, p. 118; Levin v. United States, 128 Fed. 826, 63 C. C. A. 476; Holmgren v. United States, 217 U. S. 509, 30 Sup. Ct. 588, 54 L. Ed. 861, 19 Ann. Cas. 778.

In the above case, at page 517 of 217 U. S., at page 589 of 30 Sup. Ct. (54 L. Ed. 861, 19 Ann. Cas. 778), the court uses the following language:

"Unless prohibited by state legislation, state courts and magistrates may exercise the powers conferred by Congress under such laws. Stephens, Petitioner, 4 Gray, 559."

See, also, State v. Superior Court, 75 Wash. 239, 134 Pac. 916, also reported in Ann. Cas. 1915C, 452, with notes.

Likewise, in giving effect to its power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states, Congress has, without question of its right and duty so to do, availed itself of the administrative facilities of the several states.

Section 4598 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

"Sec. 4598. If any seaman who shall have signed a contract to perform a voyage shall, at any port or place, desert, or shall absent himself from such vessel, without leave of the master, or officer commanding in the absence of the master, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace within the United States, upon the complaint of the master, to issue his warrant to apprehend such deserter, and bring him before such justice."

And also section 4599 authorizes the apprehension of deserting seamen, with or without the assistance of the local public officers or constables, and without a warrant, and their conveyance before any court of justice or magistrate of the state to be dealt with according to law.

In the case of Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275, 17 Sup. Ct. 326, 41 L. Ed. 715, construing these sections, it was contended that—

"Congress has no authority under the Constitution to vest the foregoing power of arrest in the courts or judicial officers of the several states."

But after a review of the development of the national law in that respect, the court held:

"That Congress is still at liberty to authorize the judicial officers of the several states to exercise such power as is ordinarily given to officers of courts not of record; such, for instance, as the power to take affidavits, to arrest and commit for trial offenders against the laws of the United States, to naturalize aliens, and to perform such other duties as may be regarded as incidental to the judicial power rather than a part of the judicial power itself. * * *

"We think the power of justices of the peace to arrest deserting seamen and deliver them on board their vessel is not within the definition of the 'judicial power' as defined by the Constitution, and may be lawfully conferred upon state officers. That the authority is a most convenient one to intrust to such officers cannot be denied, as seamen frequently leave their vessels in small places, where there are no federal judicial officers, and where a justice of the peace may usually be found, with authority to issue warrants under the state laws."

See, also, Dallamange v. Moisan, 197 U. S. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. 422, 49 L. Ed. 709.

Likewise, in regard to bankruptcy proceedings, Congress, in order to give effect to its statute, made provision for punishment for perjury, and provided for the arrest of offenders under the provisions of section 1014 above cited. And accordingly, in the case of McIntosh v. Bullard et al., 95 Ark. 227, at page 230, 129 S. W. 85, at page 87, the court uses the following language:

"But, notwithstanding the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction as a state official to entertain proceedings for a prosecution for this offense under the laws of the state of Arkansas, nevertheless, as an agency and officer designated by the laws of the United States, he did have authority and jurisdiction to arrest and imprison or bail for trial any offender against the laws of the United States. It is provided by enactment of Congress (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 716, § 1014) that 'for any crime or offense against the United States, the offender may by any * * * justice of the peace * * * be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by law has cognizance of such offense.' The justice of the peace was designated by Congress as an official upon whom it conferred the authority to issue the warrant for and to bind over the person charged with perjury committed against the laws of the United States. The justice of the peace had therefore the jurisdiction to perform this function; and the warrant issued by him was not illegal and void. Thomas v. Loney, 134 U. S. 372, 10 Sup. Ct. 384, 33 L. Ed. 949."

Likewise Congress, in legislating in regard to territories, has availed itself of the above section 1014. And in the case of Roberts v. Brown, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 206, 94 S. W. 388, which was an action to recover damages for false imprisonment and arrest in Texas for a crime alleged to have been committed by plaintiff in Indian Territory, when the arrest was made under the provisions of the above section 1014, the court, after quoting the section in full, states as follows:

"Under these statutes, the justice of the peace of precinct No. 1 in Clay county was empowered, upon the complaint of appellee Brown, to issue a warrant for the arrest of appellant agreeably to the usual mode of process in this state, and appellee Brown was authorized, and it was his duty, upon receiving such warrant, to arrest appellant and to take him before the nearest circuit court commissioner or the nearest judicial officer having jurisdiction for a hearing, commitment, or taking bail for trial."

Petitioner relies upon, and incorporates in his brief, an opinion rendered last August by the learned Attorney General of the state of Maryland, holding:

"That the police of Baltimore city do not, at this time, by virtue of their official position, possess the power to make legal arrests for violations of the Volstead Act, or validity to execute federal processes issued by virtue of its provisions."

As a basis for this opinion, it is stated therein that—

"Since the federal system has no common-law jurisdiction from which an implied authority might be derived, and since no express power has, by any act of Congress, been conferred upon state officials in connection with the enforcement of the Volstead Act, I have come to the conclusion that, from the standpoint of federal authorization, the police of Baltimore are totally lacking in authority to enforce that measure."

And the opinion disposes of the authority to arrest given by section 2 of the act, as follows:

"And in section 2 it is declared that section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is made applicable in the enforcement of this act. Section 1014, however, although referring to a number of state officials, and authorizing them to arrest and imprison any one guilty of misdemeanor or offense against the United States, makes no reference whatever to policemen or similar officers."

And, continuing the opinion states:

"The inference naturally is that no authority whatever to arrest or issue the warrant was possessed by the magistrate, except that expressly conferred by the act itself."

And the opinion also states:

"In Dallemagne v. Moisan, 197 U. S. 169, an arrest by the chief of police of San Francisco was held to be illegal because the act of Congress did not include that official among the parties authorized to make that particular kind of arrest."

An analysis of the case cited by the Attorney General would seem to indicate that the statute referred to has been accorded by the Supreme Court of the United States a much broader and less sectional construction than that given to it by the learned Attorney General of the state of Maryland. In the case cited the court states:

"The proceeding arises on habeas corpus, to inquire into the validity of the detention of defendant in the city prison of San Francisco, in the state of California. His application for the writ was addressed to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, and it showed that he was a citizen of France and was imprisoned by virtue of a requisition in writing, signed by the French consul general residing in San Francisco, and addressed to the chief of police of San Francisco, Cal., requiring his arrest as one of the crew of the French ship Jacques, then in that port, on account of his insubordinate conduct as one of such crew. (The requisition contained all the averments of facts which would warrant the arrest of the petitioner under the provisions of the treaty of 1853 between the United States and France.) The petitioner also averred that at the time of the making of his application for the writ the ship was not in the port of San Francisco, but had departed therefrom some time before. The petitioner was arrested by the chief of police, under such requisition, on the 1st day of May, 1903, and since that time had been confined in the city prison of San Francisco."

The arrest in question was made in pursuance of the provisions of the eighth article of the consular convention between the United States and France, which provided as follows:

"The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents, shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captain, officers, and crew, without exception, particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not, on any pretext, interfere in these differences, but shall lend forcible aid to the consuls, when they ask it, to arrest and imprison all persons composing the crew whom they may deem it necessary to confine. Those persons shall be arrested at the sole request of the consuls, addressed in writing to the local authority, and supported by an official extract from the register of the ship or the list of the crew, and shall be held, during the whole time of their stay in the port, at the disposal of the consuls."

In construing the treaty in its relation to the state of California, the court uses the following language:

"The first objection made by the defendant is to the validity of the requisition of the consul general, because it was directed to the chief of police of San Francisco, he being an officer of the state as distinguished from a federal officer, the defendant contending that a federal treaty cannot impose on a state officer, as such, a function violating the Constitution of the state which he represents in his official character. It has long been held that power may be conferred upon a state officer, as such, to execute a duty imposed under an act of Congress, and the officer may execute the same, unless its execution is prohibited by the Constitution or legislation of the state. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539, 622; Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275. As to the objection that there was any statute or any constitutional provision of the state prohibiting the execution of the power conferred by the treaty upon the state officer, we think it unfounded. We find nothing in the Constitution or in the statutes of California which forbids or would prevent the execution of the power by a state officer, in case he were willing to execute it. The provisions in the Constitution of the state, cited by counsel for defendant, relate in substance only to the general proposition that no person should be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. The execution of a treaty between the United States and a foreign government, such as the one in question, would not violate any provision of the California Constitution; the imprisonment is not pursuant to a conviction of crime but is simply a temporary detention of a sailor, whose contract of service is an exceptional one > (Robertson v. Baldwin, supra), for the purpose of securing his person during the time and under the circumstances provided for in the treaty, as concerning the internal order and discipline of the vessel. * * *

> "The chief of police voluntarily performed the request of the consul as contained in the written requisition, and the arrest was therefore not illegal, so far as this ground is concerned."

The court, however, does hold that the foregoing section should be construed in connection with "the act of Congress, approved June 11, 1864 (13 Stat. 121 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 7629–7631])," which provided "for the issuing of a warrant for the arrest of the individual complained of, directed to the marshal of the United States, and requiring him to arrest the individual and bring him before the court or person issuing the warrant, for examination, and if, on such examination, it appeared that the matter complained of concerned only the internal order or discipline of the foreign ship, the court should then issue a warrant committing such person to prison," etc. And the court accordingly held that—

> "This statute having been passed by the United States for the purpose of executing the treaties it had entered into with foreign governments, must be regarded as the only means proper to be adopted for that purpose. Consequently, the requisition of the consul general should have been presented to the district court or judge, etc., pursuant to the act of Congress, and the arrest should have been made by the marshal as therein provided for. Therefore the arrest of the seaman by the chief of police was unauthorized."

It would therefore, from the foregoing appear that the arrest by the chief of police of San Francisco was held to be illegal, not, as stated by the Attorney General, "because the act of Congress did not include that official among the parties authorized to make that particular kind of arrest," but because the act explicitly required that the "warrant for the arrest should be directed to the marshal of the United States," requiring him to arrest the individual. And the case further does hold, affirming Robertson v. Baldwin, supra, that there is sufficient comity between the federal and state government to render an arrest by a state officer valid, when such state officer acts in pursuance of an authorization conferred by a federal statute, if there is "nothing in the Constitution or in the statutes of California which forbids or would prevent the execution of the power by a state officer in case he were willing to execute it."

The case of John Bad Elk v. United States, 177 U. S. 529, 20 Sup. Ct. 729, 44 L. Ed. 874, also cited by the Attorney General, involves simply the right of a policeman to arrest without a warrant a person charged with the commission of crime on an Indian reservation. In that case it was held that—

> "By section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, the officers of the United States named therein, and certain state officers, may, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, order the arrest of an offender for any crime or offense committed against the United States. This section has no application. Referring to the laws of South Dakota, we find no authority for making such an arrest without warrant."

And the case of Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 6 Sup. Ct. 148, 29 L. Ed. 458, holds simply that (quoting the syllabus):

> "A police officer of a state, or a private citizen, has no authority as such, without any warrant or military order, to arrest and detain a deserter from the army of the United States."

It does not appear that section 1014 was incorporated in the act pertaining to deserters from the army, as it has been incorporated in the Volstead Act. And the court in its opinion expressly held that "section 1014 of the Revised Statutes [quoting at length] manifestly applies to proceedings before the civil courts alone," as distinguished from military courts, and the opinion of the court contains the following pregnant language:

> "Sections 836, 837, 849, of the Penal Code of California of 1872, affirming the authority of a peace officer, without a warrant, or a private person, to make an arrest 'for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence,' as well as in cases of felony, and requiring the person arrested to be taken forthwith before a magistrate, evidently have in view civil offenses only, and if they could be construed to include such offenses against the United States, certainly do not include offenses which are not triable and punishable except by court-martial."

[1] Irrespective of the reasoning by which it has been arrived at, but, nevertheless, based upon a progressive spririt of state and federal comity, and a developed nationality as opposed to mere sectionalism, the rule seems to be well established in our country that the federal government may, by statute, avail itself, to a limited extent, where necessary, of the executive functions of state officers to assist in enforcing valid federal statutes enacted under the Constitution to promote the public welfare.

[2, 3] It would therefore appear that the petitioner has not brought himself within the reason of the rule which holds that the "crime of bribery cannot be predicated upon the offer of a reward not to perform duties for the performance of which there was no legal or constitutional warrant." United States v. Boyer (D. C.) 85 Fed. 425. There was, and is, under the rule, sufficient potency in the federal statute (1014, Revised Statutes) to permit the issuance of a valid warrant, directed to the petitioner, to arrest Argante for the violation of the National Prohibition Law. And in the event such a warrant under the foregoing authority should be issued, petitioner would then be brought within the rule that, where an officer of the law becomes directly or indirectly vested with power to take or not to take some official action, he is guilty of bribery if he corruptly offers for a reward to forego official action. People v. Jackson, 191 N. Y. 293, 84 N. E. 65, 66 L. R. A. 490, also reported 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1173, 14 Ann. Cas. 243; State v. Lehman, 182 Mo. 424, 81 S. W. 1118, also reported 103 Am. St. Rep. 670; State v. Potts, 78 Iowa, 656, 43 N. W. 534, also reported 5 L. R. A. 814; People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 Pac. 364, 370; State v. Ellis, 33 N. J. Law, 102, also reported 97 Am. Dec. 707.

[4] Petitioner also contends that—

> "He is acting solely under the laws of the United States, and it is axiomatic that where crime is committed in the execution of the laws of the United States, prosecution must be had in the courts of the United States—the offense is one against the United States, and not against the state."

And in this connection he cites Thomas v. Loney, 134 U. S. 372, 10 Sup. Ct. 584, 33 L. Ed. 949, and People v. Kelly, 38 Cal. 145, 99 Am. Dec. 560.

Each of these cases was a prosecution for perjury committed by a witness before a federal tribunal. In each case it was held that the state court was without jurisdiction to try the offense, for the reason that the defendant, being a witness under federal jurisdiction, and owing no duty to the state in the premises, could not at the same time be delinquent in the performance of any duty which he owed the state. But in the case at bar the petitioner exercised his authority to execute the warrant of arrest by virtue of the official position which he holds under the laws of the state. He at no time ceased to be a public officer of the state, and his capacity to speed the enforcement of the federal statute by executing the warrant issued thereunder by the designated magistrate was based upon the faithful performance by him of his sworn duty to the state. It would therefore be in derogation of its authority for the state of California to forego jurisdiction to punish its own official for an offense denounced by its own statute. In this instance the offense strikes directly at the integrity of the state. 2 Wharton on Criminal Law, § 1275, and State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245, also reported 9 Am. Rep. 196; Rump v. Commonwealth, 30 Pa. 475.

[5] Also it should be borne in mind that by the constitutional Amendment 18 itself, Congress is not given exclusive jurisdiction in the enforcement of the act. And therefore, to the extent that our penal statute against bribery regulates "the duties of all persons who acted under the law," and goes "to prescribe penalties for the violation of such duties" (People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 Pac. 620, 49 Am. Rep. 700), our penal statute is a valid statute, assuming concurrent jurisdiction by the state in the enforcement of the National Prohibition Law. And this gives our own court jurisdiction to try the petitioner. Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 281, 128 N. E. 273.

The writ will therefore be discharged.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [6, 7] The petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is denied, entirely without reference to the question discussed in the opinion of the court and without any intimation of our opinion as to the correctness of the views expressed therein. The judgment of the District Court of Appeal that a writ of prohibition be denied was correct, for the reason that no case for prohibition was made. As was stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Hart in Kitts v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 469, 90 Pac. 980, the remedy of prohibition is available only in a case of excess of jurisdiction, "and consequently the principle declared upon a similar point in the case of Ex parte Ruef (on habeas corpus) 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605, is pertinent" where the claim is that the indictment or information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. In the case cited we said:

> "We think the true rule is that, where an indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into on habeas corpus. Here the indictments clearly attempt to charge extortion, a crime defined by section 518 et seq. of the Penal Code, and within the jurisdiction of the superior court."

The rule so declared in the Ruef Case has since been uniformly followed by this court. See, also, In re Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 362. It was expressly held to apply in regard to the remedy by prohibition in Whitney v. Superior Court (decided January 26, 1920) 187 Pac. 12. In the case at bar the indictment clearly attempted to charge the offense on the part of an executive officer of agreeing to receive a bribe, a crime defined by section 68, Penal Code, and it was for the superior court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction and subject to review on appeal from the judgment, to determine as to the sufficiency of the facts stated to show such crime. The alleged defect in the indictment is not available as a ground for prohibiting the superior court from proceeding with the trial of the cause.

The petition for a hearing in this court is denied.

All concur.

ZARILLO v. LE MESNAGER. (Civ. 3494.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 18, 1921.)

1. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑29(3)—Mortgagee sued for conversion may counterclaim for mortgage debt.

In mortgagor's action against mortgagee for conversion of mortgaged truck in which mortgagee filed cross-complaint for judgment on the mortgage debt, it was proper for court to render judgment for mortgagee for amount of mortgage debt after offsetting damages sustained by mortgagor because of conversion.

2. Appeal and error 🔑909(1)—Existence of fact found by court assumed.

Appellate court will assume the existence of fact found by the trial court where there was evidence to sustain the finding.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑136—Mortgagee waived mortgage lien by conversion of property.

Mortgagee by conversion of mortgaged property waived his mortgage lien.

4. Pleading 🔑4—That counterclaim was called cross-complaint was immaterial.

That counterclaim was designated a cross-complaint was immaterial, since it is immaterial by what name a pleading is called, whether cross-complaint or counterclaim, if it contains a statement of facts and sufficient prayer for relief sought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Donico Zarillo against Louis Le Mesnager. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lewis Sherman Jones and Frank C. Hoyt, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the value of a certain motortruck, alleging that defendant had unlawfully converted the same to his own use. The value of the truck was alleged to be the sum of $2,000. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant for the sum of $324.25 with interest and costs, from which judgment plaintiff has appealed.

There was an answer and an alleged cross-complaint in which the transactions concerning the motortruck had between the plaintiff and the defendant were set out. In it defendant alleged that he took possession of the motortruck of the plaintiff in a claim and delivery action based upon a condition of a chattel mortgage which was a lien against the truck in his favor. He set forth the facts concerning the mortgage transaction in his alleged cross-complaint and in the prayer thereof demanded judgment in the sum of $1,024.25, with interest and attorney's fees as being due him upon the mortgage obligation, and further prayed for a decree of foreclosure. The court found the facts generally as they were pleaded in the answer and alleged cross-complaint, determining, however, that the defendant had converted the motortruck to his own use after obtaining possession thereof, and found further that the value of the motortruck was $700, and offset this value against the debt owing by the plaintiff to the defendant, the resulting figures entering into the judgment being as first above stated.

[1] So far as the facts are concerned the bill of exceptions show that there was evidence to sustain all the findings of the court. The plaintiff objected to any evidence being introduced under the cross-complaint on the ground that it was improperly made a pleading in the action, and consistently insisted upon that point throughout the trial. It may be admitted as sound law that a judgment of foreclosure would not have been proper to be entered as against the plaintiff in his action of conversion. However, the court did not render a judgment meeting the prayer for that particular equitable relief, but took the account of the defendant and adjusted the two debts with the result stated. The cross-complaint set out all of the facts respecting the existence of the mortgage debt.

[2, 3] Assuming, as we must, that defendant had converted the mortgaged property to his own use, he thereby waived his mortgage lien, and the plaintiff, by suing in conversion, adopted this condition as being established. Story & Isham Co. v. Story, 100 Cal. 30, 34 Pac. 671. In the case cited there was a counterclaim as against the cause of action for conversion, the counterclaim being based upon a cause of action connected with the property alleged to have been converted. The court therein, confirming the right in the defendant to have her accounts adjusted against the plaintiff, said:

> "By treating the goods as the property of the defendant and suing merely for their value, the plaintiff has elected to treat the obligation as of a fixed value, and it is immaterial in what form it stated its cause of action. In either case it would be competent for Mrs. Story to show that by virtue of the agreement between them the property had been subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's obligation to her, and that she had made such application, and to ask that the remainder of the unperformed part of the contract should be enforced."

[4] If it may be said that the matter set up by the defendant should have been presented by way of counterclaim rather than cross-complaint, the answer is, as has often been held, that it is immaterial by what name a pleading is called, whether cross-complaint or counterclaim, if it contains a statement of facts and sufficient prayer to authorize the relief sought. The cross-complaint here did set out the facts concerning the debt of the plaintiff and judgment was asked for the amount due. We find no error requiring us to disturb the judgment as entered.

The judgment is affirmed.

FURLONG v. WHITE et al. (Civ. 2267.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1921.)

1. Brokers 🔑88(14)—Finding as to agreement merged in written agreement in suit on one-half profits on sale of land held sufficiently certain.

In a suit for one-half the profits on a sale of land wherein defendant who sold the land himself alleged in full an uncontroverted written agreement certain in its terms wherein it was expressly agreed plaintiff was to share in the profits only in the event he sold the land, a finding that such agreement expressed the terms of a prior oral agreement merged therein sufficiently specified the terms of the prior agreement; and, even if it were uncertain as to some of the terms of the contract, it would not necessarily be a sufficient reason to reverse a judgment for defendant.

2. Pleading 🔑291(2)—Where answer sets up contract as defense, plaintiff may controvert it for fraud, undue influence, etc., without filing affidavit showing such facts.

Where defendant sued on contract has pleaded a written instrument in defense, plaintiff may controvert such instrument by evidence of fraud, mistake, undue influence, compromise, payment, statute of limitations, estoppel, and like defenses under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, without filing an affidavit setting up such ground.

3. Pleading 🔑67—Plaintiff not compelled to anticipate defense founded on subsequent agreement, but it would be proper to allege it and its invalidity.

While plaintiff, seeking an accounting under an oral contract, was not compelled to anticipate a defense founded upon a subsequent agreement, yet, knowing of its execution and that it was inconsistent with the terms of the contract sued on, it would have been commendable practice to express the alleged grounds of invalidity asserted against such agreement.

4. Appeal and error 🔑882(17)—Party failing to request further findings held not estopped from objecting to insufficiency of findings.

Although appellants' counsel refused to object to the insufficiency of the findings or request others, they were not thereby estopped in urging the insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

5. Attorney and client 🔑14—Attorneys are required to aid the court in avoiding error.

Counsel are officers of the court; and, while it is their duty to protect their client's interest, they are under an equally imperative obligation to aid the court in avoiding error and in determining the cause in accordance with justice and established rules of practice, and, failing therein, their clients are not entitled to favors within the court's discretion.

6. Appeal and error 🔑301—Sufficiency of findings reviewable on appeal from judgment, although not specifically mentioned in motion for new trial.

If appellant wished to object that the judgment is based upon findings which do not determine all of the material issues, and hence the decision against the law, and presents a case demanding new trial, he should have specifically mentioned such ground in his motion; nevertheless the question is reviewable on appeal from the judgment.

7. Appeal and error 🔑901—Party attacking sufficiency of findings must show error.

When a party relies on the insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment, to reverse a cause for denial of a new trial, he must show the appellate court, not only that no finding was made upon a material issue, but also that evidence would justify a finding in his favor.

8. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Evidence held to show that former oral agreement was consideration for written contract.

In an action for an accounting for profits on a sale of land in which an agent was to share, under an oral agreement, evidence including a declaration in a subsequent written agreement held to show that the oral agreement was the consideration for the latter agreement to be pleaded as a defense.

9. Brokers 🔑86(1)—No probability of fraud as related to representations as to meaning of contract, in view of intelligence of parties.

There is no probability of fraud as related to representations as to the meaning of a contract as affecting the right to share in the profits of a sale by the principal, where it appears both parties are above the average in mentality, are of mature years, have had wide and varied experience, and are proficient in the use and understanding of English.

10. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)—Party trying case on one theory may not change to another on appeal.

Where a cause was tried upon the theory that a particular question was in issue, it is too late to contend for the contrary on appeal.

11. Brokers 🔑40—Contract construed as requiring agent to sell land to acquire right to accounting for profits.

A contract construed to require that the agent himself must sell the land to acquire a right to an accounting for profits on a sale.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1027—Cause not to be reversed for errors which would not change result.

A case need not be reversed for errors, where it is perfectly apparent from the views of the trial judge that such errors or irregularities would be corrected upon a new trial, and that the same judgment would again be rendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Herbert W. Furlong against Richard White and others, for an accounting. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alan C. Van Fleet, of San Francisco, Jerome D. Peters, of Chico, and H. F. Chadbourne, John S. Partridge, and Charles A. Christin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank English, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was to compel defendant White to account to plaintiff for a one-half interest in the profits ensuing from the sale of certain property in Butte county, known as the Lott ranch. The judgment, from which the appeal is taken, was in favor of all the defendants, but it may be stated that it is not disputed that the decision is correct as to the defendants other than said White.

The complaint alleges that by virtue of certain instruments in writing, dated January 2, January 15 and March 12, 1917, constituting virtually the same contract, one Lott, who was the owner of said property, gave defendant White an option to purchase it. That on February 17, 1917, defendant Richard White entered into a certain contract and assignment with plaintiff, wherein it was recited that White was the owner and holder in his own name, but for the use, benefit, advantage, and profit of both parties to the agreement, of the said option; that the parties would share equally and mutually co-operate with each other in promoting a sale of the property under option, and said agreement containing this clause:

> "Now this indenture witnesseth that the said party of the first part [Richard White], for and in consideration of the premises, has assigned, transferred and set over to the party of the second part [H. W. Furlong] and by these presents does hereby assign, transfer and set over to the said party of the second part an undivided and equal one-half interest in and to that said above-described option from said Charles F. Lott to said Richard White as the same is evidenced by said agreements of January 2, 1917, and January 15, 1917, and the undivided one-half and equal share or interest in and to all advantages or profits to be derived from or that may accrue from said option, either by direct purchase thereunder or sale to others or otherwise."

The complaint then alleges that in October, 1917, defendant White entered into an agreement with the State Land Settlement Board for the sale of said Lott ranches to said board for the sum of $165,000, and that he has failed to account to plaintiff for one-half of the profits derived from said sale. It may be added that copies of the instruments to which plaintiff refers are attached to the complaint and made a part thereof.

Defendant White in his answer admitted the execution of said option and the purported assignment of February 17, but he alleged that this latter instrument was executed in connection with, and really as part of, a prior oral agreement between plaintiff and defendant White, and that on the 27th day of September, 1917, said prior oral agreement and said agreement of February 17, 1917, were both merged in and supplanted by a written agreement dated September 27, 1917, which agreement in effect, as stated by appellant, "provided that in the event that Furlong obtained a purchaser for the Lott ranch then, and in that event only, should Furlong receive one-half of the net profits derived from such sale. The September agreement further provided that Furlong's right to sell the property should not be deemed exclusive, and contained an express reservation of the right on the part of White to sell the property." It was further alleged that, on May 7, 1918, defendant White sold a portion of said Lott ranch to said State Land Settlement Board, and that "said sale of said lands as evidenced by said contract of May 7, 1918, aforesaid, and the said delivery of said deed in accordance therewith was negotiated, carried on, conducted, and consummated wholly by the defendant Richard White on the one side and said State Land Settlement Board on the other, plaintiff taking no part whatsoever therein; that as a matter of fact neither after the 27th day of September, 1917, nor at any time in said complaint or in this answer set forth or referred to did plaintiff make or consummate any sale of said lands and premises or report to the defendant Richard White any purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to purchase said lands and premises, or any part or portion thereof." Defendant White, therefore, claimed that plaintiff was not entitled to any portion of the profits of said sale, and with this claim the court agreed.

Appellant in his opening brief declares that his contention "turns wholly on the sufficiency of the findings as a matter of law, and is not concerned with the insufficiency of the evidence to support the same." As to this, it cannot be doubted that the judgment that plaintiff take nothing follows as a logical and necessary conclusion from the facts found by the court. It is also true that these findings of fact cover all the material issues that are expressly raised by the pleadings. We deem it unnecessary to detail these findings. Indeed, the controverted facts are few. Appellant admits that—

The "entire controversy turns on the effect of the two agreements between White and Furlong, the agreement and the assignment of February 17, 1917, and the agreement of September 27, 1917."

But the court found that the contract of February was superseded and supplanted by the contract of September. The parties had the legal right to substitute this latter for the former. This is not and cannot be disputed. Hence we must look to the September contract to measure the rights of the parties. But appellant admits that "The September agreement, however, provided that in the event that Furlong procured a purchaser, then and in that event only would Furlong receive one-half the profits. The September contract completely changes the February contract. Instead of a partnership agreement, a joint venture, we have what purports to be a contract between a principal and his agent. Furlong is no longer on an equal basis with White, but is dependent wholly on his success in making a sale for his share in the profits." The court further found—and the fact is admitted—that the sale was made entirely by White. According to appellant's own interpretation of said agreement of September 27, therefore, no other conclusion could be drawn than the one in favor of defendant.

However, appellant's real objection probably is that the court failed to make certain material findings that would have operated to nullify the effect of the finding as to said agreement of September 27, and would have required the court to give full force and effect to said agreement of February 17, according to its terms.

[1] Of these the first specification is that—

> "The findings leave us in ignorance as to the terms of the 'prior oral agreement,' except in so far as we discover that the agreement of September 27 'expressed the terms and conditions and intent of said prior oral agreement.' The court erred in not making a direct finding as to the terms of this prior agreement."

Herein appellant is entirely in error. The execution of said agreement of September 27 was not denied, its terms appeared in the instrument, which was set out in full, and the court found that it contained the expression of the parol agreement. There is no uncertainty as to the terms of the contract embodied in said written instrument. The finding, therefore, leaves us in no doubt as to what said parol agreement was. But even if the finding were uncertain as to some of the terms of said contract, it would not necessarily be a sufficient reason to reverse the judgment.

[2] The other objections are entitled to more serious consideration. They relate to the validity of the said contract of September 27. Herein appellant says:

> "If we can show that the September contract is invalid, then the February contract becomes the measure of the rights of the parties, and the plaintiff must prevail."

It is claimed that the learned trial judge entertained a similar view, as shown by his declaration:

> "If the agreement of September 27 had not been executed, then it would be perfectly clear that the plaintiff ought to prevail in this action."

The validity of said September agreement is assailed upon the grounds that it was without consideration, and that it was secured by fraud and undue influence. These elements were not pleaded, but since said agreement appeared for the first time in the answer, it is the claim of appellant that these defenses are pleaded by operation of law. The decisions are indeed to the effect that where the defendant has pleaded a written instrument in defense, the plaintiff "may controvert the instrument by evidence of fraud, mistake, undue influence, compromise, payment, statute of limitations, estoppel, and the like defenses, under section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630. Nor in such cases is the plaintiff required to file an affidavit setting up any such ground upon which he may rely, although such affidavit was filed herein by plaintiff.

[3] It may be added that plaintiff was not compelled to anticipate any defense founded upon the September agreement. Janes v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368. However, as he knew of the execution of the subsequent agreement of September 27, and that it was inconsistent with the terms of the February contract, it would have been commendable practice for him in his complaint to have expressly alleged the grounds of its asserted invalidity. If so, the court would have been less likely to overlook these elements in making the findings.

[4, 5] It is seriously claimed by respondents, however, that appellant should be precluded from urging any such objection by reason of the fact that he had an opportunity, but declined to offer any amendments to the findings. In that respect the record shows as follows:

> "After receipt by counsel for plaintiff of a copy of the trial court's written opinion in this case, counsel for plaintiff did address a communication to the said trial judge, under date of December 14, 1918, as follows: 'We have not been served with any copy of the proposed findings and when they are served, will desire to be heard on the settlement of the same.'
> "The said findings of fact and conclusions of law, as finally signed by the said trial court, were served by counsel for defendants upon counsel for plaintiff on January 3, 1919.
> "On January 26, 1919, the said trial judge wrote to counsel for the plaintiff as follows:
> "'Will you please send me any proposed amendments to the findings in the case of Furlong v. White, which you desire to make by the last of this week.'

"On January 29, 1919, said counsel for plaintiff did reply to the said trial judge by communication as follows:

" 'In re Furlong v. White et al., I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 26th, and to advise you that we have decided not to submit any amendments to the findings as proposed.'

"The said findings and conclusions of law were thereupon signed and filed by the said trial judge."

Counsel should not forget that they are officers of the court, and while it is their duty to protect and defend the interests of their clients, the obligation is equally imperative to aid the court in avoiding error and in determining the cause in accordance with justice and the established rules of practice.

We do not think that appellant is thereby estopped from urging the point, nor do we question the good faith of counsel, but we are of the opinion that the trial judge in denying the motion for a new trial was justified in making this comment:

> "In those cases where an issue arises out of the evidence rather than the pleadings, and the party in whose behalf such issue is so raised, after being served with proposed findings by the other party, remains silent as to such issue, knowing from the court's opinion that the issue must be found against him, there is nothing in such conduct to appeal to the court's discretion, if any there be, when the party moves for a new trial because of failure to find upon the very issue concerning which he remained silent, particularly where he was expressly given the opportunity to speak."

[6] The answer of appellant is, of course, that the court had no discretion to deny the motion, since a judgment based upon findings, which do not determine all the material issues, is a decision against law, and presents a case demanding a new trial. Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 Pac. 828.

However, in his motion for a new trial he should have specifically mentioned this ground. Kaiser v. Dalto, supra; Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 6, 44 Pac. 318.

Nevertheless, the question is reviewable upon the appeal from the judgment. Emirzian v. Asato, 23 Cal. App. 251, 137 Pac. 1072; Math v. Crescent Hill Gold Mines Co., 31 Cal. App. 636, 161 Pac. 140.

[7] But another principle operative to defeat appellant is this: When a party relies upon this ground he must show to the appellate court not only that no finding was made upon a material issue, but also that the evidence would justify a finding in his favor. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098.

If the finding must have been adverse, its omission is not sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Estate of Carpenter, 127 Cal. 582, 60 Pac. 162.

In the opening brief of counsel no quotation is made of any testimony, nor is reference made to any part of the transcript in which may be found any evidence of fraud, undue influence, or want of consideration. For that reason we would be entirely warranted in assuming that no such evidence is contained therein. If parties are too indifferent to point out the evidence upon which they rely, they cannot expect an appellate court to search for it through a voluminous record. However, we have read the entire transcript, and we are satisfied that this contention of appellant cannot be maintained.

[8] As to the consideration for said agreement of September 27, the lower court was warranted in holding that no other consideration than that supporting the original parol agreement was required. This follows for the reason that said instrument of September 27 did not constitute a new or additional contract between the parties. It was simply a written memorial or expression of the parol contract which was agreed upon by the parties in the beginning, and it was therefore supported by the consideration for said parol agreement. Of this there can be no possible doubt. The parties themselves in said September instrument deliberately declared that—

> "At and prior to the date of the execution of said option the parties hereto had entered into an oral agreement between themselves—which said agreement is now in force and effect. Such agreement and understanding between the parties has never been formally executed or reduced to writing. * * *
> "Whereas, it is desirable and for the mutual satisfaction and protection of both parties hereto that the agreement relating to said option between them should be definitely stated and executed in writing," etc.

It is admitted by appellant that—

> "If the prior oral agreement was a valid and subsisting agreement at the time of the execution of the September contract, then it may well be said that the September contract required no new consideration."

We could not expect to find better evidence that it was "a valid and subsisting agreement" than the written declaration of the parties to that effect. We may add that there was abundant parol evidence, admitted without objection, as to the terms of said contract, and that the purpose of the parties in executing said September instrument was simply to preserve written evidence of said original contract. But appellant replies:

> "We contend, however, that the September contract cannot be held to be 'the written expression of the original contract,' for the 'original contract' was merged in and supplanted by the February contract, and was no longer in existence."

As to this, though, the parties themselves should be the best judges. They not only declared in the September instrument, as we have already seen, that said parol contract was in force, but they also stated that the purpose and effect of the February agreement were to protect "the interests" of Furlong in said parol agreement, and "the assignment to the party of the second part set out in Exhibit A hereto annexed shall be binding upon and enforceable against the said party of the first part for the purpose of securing and protecting the party of the second part, his heirs and legal representatives in whatever interest he or they may have under the terms and conditions of this agreement." Here, again, parol evidence was also received without objection that said February agreement, although in the form of an absolute assignment, was executed as security for the enforcement of whatever rights or interest appellant might have in said "original agreement." There can, indeed, be no doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence to support such conclusion, and we do not understand appellant to contend that this purpose could not be shown, notwithstanding the instrument is in the form of an assignment. The situation does not involve the question of parol evidence being received to vary the terms of a written instrument or of a parol agreement being merged into a written contract, but the theory, which the trial court adopted, and which is supported by the evidence, is that the parties entered into an oral contract providing that if appellant should sell the property he would be entitled to a commission, but that respondent White should have the privilege of selling the same without accounting to appellant; that this contract remained in force throughout the entire transaction, and was recognized and declared by the parties to be the measure of their rights; that the February instrument was executed to secure the enforcement of this contract, and the parties thereafter embodied said oral contract in the written instrument of September 27, and therein also defined and limited the purpose and effect of said February instrument.

[9] In reference to the claim of fraud relating to the representations of White as to the meaning of the September agreement the trial judge declared:

> "In this connection it is important to consider the mental capacity of the two men. Both appear to be above the average in mentality. Both are of mature years, and have had wide and varied experience. Both are proficient in the use and understanding of the English language."

In view of these facts we consider it highly improbable that plaintiff did not understand the significance of this final instrument.

As to undue influence, there was not between the parties the relation of attorney and client. It is true that Mr. White was and is an attorney at law, and for that reason was requested to draft said written instruments, but the evidence shows without substantial conflict that the parties dealt at arm's length, and that each was keen and alert to protect his own right and interest in the transaction. The record justifies this statement of the trial judge:

> "The charge of undue influence may well be omitted from discussion, as I do not find any evidence to show that Furlong's mind was dominated by that of White, or that the will of the latter was substituted for that of the former in the execution of the agreement."

We are not unmindful of the contention of respondent that the findings of the court do actually cover these considerations, but we deem it unnecessary to inquire as to that.

[10] The point is made that it was not proper to show that the February agreement was really intended as security, since there was no allegation in the answer to that effect, the averment being that the February agreement was executed "as a part of the prior oral agreement." As to this it is sufficient to say that the evidence was received without objection; in order words, the case was tried upon the theory that the question was in issue, and it is now too late to contend for the contrary. In reference to the finding upon this matter it may be said that, while it contains said language of the answer, it also recites that said agreement of February 17 was merged in and supplanted by the written instrument of September 27, "which said instrument of September 27, 1917, expressed the terms and conditions and intent of said prior oral agreement and said agreement of February 17, 1917, aforesaid, and is in writing and is in words and figures following, to wit." Then follows a copy of said September agreement, which shows beyond peradventure that the parties intended the February contract to constitute security for the performance of the oral contract. Thus does the finding fully support the theory upon which the case was decided.

[11] In the closing brief, in direct conflict with his admission in his opening brief, appellant contends that even the September instrument does not limit his right to an accounting to the situation wherein a sale should be made by himself. For the first time he asserts that, construing the instrument as a whole, it is a fair inference that he was entitled to his allotment whether the sale was made by him or by White. We can see no merit in this contention. The instrument, as we have seen, purports to be and is a full expression of the rights of the parties, and it contains no provision for any participation in the profits by appellant except upon condition that he find a purchaser. The provision that—

> "The party of the first part has agreed and does hereby agree, that for and in consideration of the party of the second part promoting a sale and finding a purchaser or purchasers of the lands and premises * * * and a sale being made to such purchaser * * * the party of the second part shall be entitled to and receive, and the party of the first part agrees to pay him, one-half of the net profits arising from such sale, the same to become due and payable upon the full completion of such sale and the full payment of the purchase price thereof," —necessarily implies that it was only upon such condition that the party of the second part was to be entitled to a part of the profits. But if any further assurance were needed it can be found in the provision reserving to the party of the first part the right to sell said property himself or through other agents.

We are not disposed to notice specifically the decisions cited by appellant, as they involve familiar principles not in conflict with anything herein determined.

[12] On account of the earnestness with which the able counsel for appellant have urged their contentions, we have considered them somewhat at length, but we find no substantial reason for reversing the judgment. We may add that, if for any of the reasons urged by them, which may possess some merit, the cause should be reversed, it is perfectly apparent from the views expressed by the learned trial judge that the asserted errors or irregularities would be corrected upon a new trial, and a judgment would be rendered again in favor of respondent.

However, we are satisfied that within the limits prescribed for the exercise of our jurisdiction, we cannot disturb the finding below.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; HART, J.

BUCKLEY v. GADSBY et al. (Civ. 3662.)

1. Boundaries 🔑48(3)—Fence does not prevail over descriptions in absence of long acquiescence.

A fence built by former owner of parcel of land between two lots on which he built houses, and which he conveyed to predecessors of plaintiffs and defendants, respectively, will not prevail or control over the legal descriptions of the lots by metes and bounds in the conveyances to them in the absence of long years of acquiescence in the boundary fixed by the fence.

2. Boundaries 🔑48(1)—No acquiescence in absence of proof of boundary.

Where court is unable to determine where a fence originally stood, it cannot hold that the parties ever acquiesced in a boundary line originally evidenced by such fence.

3. Judgment 🔑747(5)—Decree quieting title held not res judicata in boundary dispute.

Judgment, in an action instituted by owner of lot, quieting title to the lot as described in a conveyance to her, was not res judicata in a subsequent boundary dispute with an adjoining lot owner.

4. Judgment 🔑747(½)—In action to restrain construction of bulkhead along boundary, held properly excluded in boundary dispute.

In an action in ejectment arising out of a dispute as to boundary, a judgment enjoining defendants from building a bulkhead upon plaintiff's side of "the line where the fence formerly erected by one formerly ran" or from "removing said fence and from placing the same in any other location than where it now is or formerly was," was properly excluded, where it could not be ascertained from anything contained in the judgment roll where the fence was at the time of such judgment or where the same "formerly was."

5. Judgment 🔑739—Quieting title held inadmissible in boundary dispute, where premises in present action were expressly excluded.

In ejectment arising out of boundary dispute, a judgment in a former suit to quiet title, which quieted the title of plaintiff to certain portions of premises described in her complaint and expressly excluded the fragments of land in controversy, and as to these the trial court found that the plaintiff was not, but the defendant was in possession at the time of the commencement of the proceeding, was properly excluded, since the court in the suit to quiet title had no jurisdiction over the title to premises not shown to have been in the quiet and peaceable possession of plaintiff when she commenced her proceeding.

6. Ejectment 🔑114—Judgment held to sufficiently describe premises.

Judgment, in ejectment arising out of boundary dispute between adjoining lot owners, sufficiently described the property in controversy, where it determined that plaintiff was entitled to recover the premises described in her complaint and decreed that such premises were referred to and described in two certain surveys which are a part of the public records of the city and county, and further described the premises in dispute as being embraced within the exterior boundaries of a certain lot having a frontage of 25 feet by a uniform depth of a certain number of feet as described in the language of plaintiff's original deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by Sophie E. Buckley against F. L. Gadsby and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. Gunzendorfer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action of ejectment. The premises involved in the action consist of five small strips or plots of land lying along a line between two larger portions of Mission block 109 in the city of San Francisco, which are owned respectively by the plaintiff and defendants herein.

The facts of the case as disclosed by the evidence are these:

In the year 1892 one Daniel Einstein became the owner of that portion of Mission block 109 having a frontage of 100 feet on Twenty-Second street by a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches. It was then unimproved and was somewhat precipitous, lying, as it did, upon the eastern slope of what is known as "Sanchez street hill." Einstein presently undertook to improve this property by first causing a survey to be made of its exterior boundaries and by proceeding to have it graded and subdivided into four lots; each having a frontage of 25 feet on Twenty-Second street and a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches. The lines dividing these lots were determined by the person grading and subdividing the tract through the use of a cotton string stretched from stakes driven in the ground at the front and back lines of the lot corners. Einstein began in the same year building cottages on these lots; the first of these being erected on the most westerly lot, which was in 1897 transferred to Catherine E. Gadsby, the predecessor of the defendants herein. Upon the adjoining lot a cottage was also erected, which lot, with its improvements, Einstein in 1898 conveyed to the predecessor of the plaintiff herein, who subsequently transferred the same to her. The deeds conveying the title to these respective lots described each by metes and bounds as being distant a definite number of feet from a common point, and as having a frontage of 25 feet on Twenty-Second street by a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches. Between these two lots, Einstein, at the time of the erection of the cottages thereon, built a division fence upon the line marked by the use of the string as before stated; but whether such fence was upon the correct boundary line between these two lots as shown by the descriptions in the deeds to the respective parties cannot be definitely ascertained from the evidence in the case. The parties, however, went into possession of their respective holdings as defined by this fence and for a while abode therein in neighborly amity without any particular inquiry, discussion, or knowledge as to just where the true line between their respective properties lay. It presently began to be noticed by both owners that the surface of the land lying along the rather steep sidehill upon which their lots were located was sliding, an effect due probably to defective subsurface drainage and that its trend was to the southward so as to cause the land and improvements of the lot owned by the defendant herein to encroach upon the lot then owned by the plaintiff's husband. One of the first observed effects of this movement of the soil was that the defendants' house had been projected a few inches across the supposed or accepted line between the lots, and when this was seen to be so the defendants raised their house and moved it back a little. Another effect was seen to exist in the condition of the fence between the properties, which in places became loose and irregular in outline, falling down in places. At times one or other of the parties undertook to put back the fence in place, but in doing so apparently did not satisfy the other party; in fact, discords over the location of the boundary arose and became accentuated as time went by.

In the year 1908 the wife of the defendant Gadsby herein commenced a proceeding under the McEnerney Act to have her title quieted to the lot, describing the same according to the metes and bounds of her original deed, and there being no appearances in that proceeding a decree was entered quieting her title to said described premises. In the year 1909 the plaintiff herein undertook to repair or replace a bulkhead along the front of her property, which had apparently been displaced by the sliding of the soil, and also attempted to extend the same inward along what she took to be the division line between the two properties. Defendant Gadsby's predecessor objected to this work upon the ground that it involved a trespass upon her premises, and she therefore commenced an injunction suit against the Buckleys, husband and wife, to restrain them from further proceeding with said work. In her complaint in said action she alleged that she was and for many years had been the owner of the house and lot on Twenty-Second street designated as number 3706, while the defendants were alleged to be the owners of the adjoining house and lot designated as 3704, which said two premises had been for many years separated by a fence erected by their common grantor and intended by him to form the boundary line between said two lots of land, which fence had ever since been maintained by the parties as such boundary line. She further alleged that the defendants were threatening to enter upon the premises of the plaintiff and remove said fence and put it in a different place in the course of building said bulkhead, wherefore she prayed that they be enjoined from so doing. The defendants, though regularly served with process in said action, did not appear to contest the same, and judgment was accordingly entered, which followed the language of the complaint in describing the lots of the respective parties by their house numbers, and which enjoined the defendants from building any bulkhead in front of the plaintiff's premises and from removing said division fence or placing "the same in any other place than where it now is or formerly was." No appeal was taken from this judgment. In the year 1910 the plaintiff herein commenced a proceeding under the terms of the McEnerney Act to establish and quiet her title to the lot upon which she resided, describing the same according to the boundaries of her deed as being 25 feet on Twenty-Second street by a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches. The defendant Gadsby herein appeared in that proceeding, and in his answer therein denied that the plaintiff was in possession of that portion of the premises described in her complaint, which consisted of those five fragmentary parcels thereof which are in controversy in the present action, and further affirmatively alleging that the said defendant himself was the owner and in quiet and peaceable possession thereof at the commencement of said proceeding by virtue of the transfer to him of the adjoining premises by Catherine E. Gadsby, his wife. The defendant further pleaded by way of estoppel the judgment theretofore entered in the injunction suit above referred to. Upon the trial and submission of that proceeding upon the issues thus presented the trial court made and entered its decree quieting the title of the plaintiff therein to those portions of the premises described in her complaint of which she was in possession, but as to the five fragmentary parcels of which the defendant Gadsby claimed to be the owner and in possession the trial court found that at the time of the filing of the plaintiff's complaint in said proceeding said Gadsby was in the actual and peaceable possession thereof. It therefore made no further finding as to the rights of the respective parties in and to said fragmentary parcels of land, but merely undertook by its decree to quiet the title of the plaintiff to the remainder of the lot described in her complaint of which she was admittedly in possession. This judgment also became final, no appeal having been taken by either of the contesting parties.

Thereafter and on May 4, 1915, the plaintiff commenced the present suit in ejectment to recover possession of those same five fragmentary plots of land to which defendant Gadsby had asserted ownership in the proceeding last above referred to. The defendant Gadsby appeared and answered, setting up substantially the same matters in the way of ownership and estoppel embraced in the answer filed by him in the former proceeding. Upon the trial of the cause the respective parties introduced their original deeds showing each to have been entitled by the descriptions contained therein to a 25-foot lot on Twenty-Second street of uniform depth, and each also in turn gave testimony as to the existence and location of the division fence, and as to the fact and effect of the sliding of the soil observed to be taking place not long after their respective ownerships began and which had caused the improvements upon the lot of said defendant to invade the plaintiff's premises as the same was described in her original deed. The said defendant, in addition to his testimony as to the location of said fence line and his long-continued possession of the fragmentary parcels lying upon his side thereof, offered to introduce in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Catherine E. Gadsby, Plaintiff, v. All Persons, above referred to, and which judgment roll the court admitted in evidence. The defendant then offered the judgment roll in the case of Sophie Buckley v. All Persons, also above referred to, but to the admission of this record the plaintiff objected, which objection the trial court sustained. The defendant then offered the judgment roll in the case of Catherine E. Gadsby v. Sophie Buckley and Daniel Buckley (the injunction suit above referred to), to the admission of which the plaintiff objected, which objection the court also sustained.

Upon the submission of the cause the trial court made its findings and decision in the plaintiff's favor, and directed a decree to be entered thereon adjudging that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the premises described in her complaint. The said defendant's motion for a new trial was thereafter made and denied, whereupon he took and has prosecuted this appeal.

The appellant's first contention is that the finding by the court that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the lot of land having a full 25 feet frontage on Twenty-Second street by a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches, as the same is described in the original conveyance to her predecessor, is unsupported by the evidence in the case.

[1] This contention rests upon several separate claims put forth by the appellant, the first of which is that the respective ownerships of the parties hereto in their adjoining properties are to be determined not alone or chiefly by the descriptions in their deeds, but rather by the facts that Einstein, who originally owned and subdivided the tract which embraced both these lots and who erected the buildings upon each and built the fence between them prior to any transfer to the predecessors of the parties hereto, had thereby determined the boundaries of each lot, and that these facts rather than the description by metes and bounds in the descriptions in the deeds of the respective parties control the location of the dividing line between their respective properties. In making this contention the appellant relies upon the case of Bullard v. Kempff, 119 Cal. 9, 50 Pac. 780. An examination of that case, however, shows a quite different situation than that presented in the instant case. There the original owner had so built the houses which he erected upon the respective lots afterwards sold by him that they stood upon and marked to the extent of their depths the dividing line between the lots, and as to the remainder of said line in front and rear of said houses he had terraced the lots and constructed permanent bulkheads, thus making each lower lot three feet below the next above it. These facts the Supreme Court held might be taken into account in determining whether one of the later lot owners was entitled to a temporary injunction to restrain his immediate neighbor from removing said bulkhead with a view to placing it upon the line called for by the descriptions of the deeds. The Supreme Court, while indicating that these facts were proper to be taken into account in passing upon the matter of granting or refusing a temporary injunction, expressly refrained from finally determining the rights of the parties in the premises. Its decision, therefore, cannot for that reason be regarded as a controlling authority in the instant case. The inapplicability of that case to the facts of the present case may also be seen to consist in this difference: That while in that case the improvements made by the original owner were so permanent as to be practically controlling proof of his intent as to the location of the division line betwen the lots of his subdivision, the fence erected by Einstein was no such permanent structure, and hence, even if its original location were known, it could hardly be said to overcome the specific descriptions in his conveyances defining the dimensions of the lots under consideration in the instant case.

[2] There is another reason why the decision in said former case is not to be given application to the facts of the case at bar. The court therein referred to the affidavits of the parties showing long years of acquiescence in the boundaries fixed by the permanent character of the structures marking the same. It is contended by the appellant in the present case that the evidence introduced herein shows a similar acquiescence in the boundary line, but with this statement we cannot agree, since the proofs herein sufficiently show that within a very brief period of time after the occupancy by the respective parties of their holdings the surface movement began to be observed and commented upon and its effects noted and for the time being corrected, but that ere long discords began to arise between the parties which finally resulted in the diversified litigation above referred to and which has continued in one form or other ever since. There has never been an agreement between the parties, express or implied, that the line as originally marked by the fence in question should constitute the boundary line between their premises. In addition to this, there is no satisfactory or sufficient evidence in the record which would have enabled the trial court, or which enables us, to determine just where said fence was originally placed, or whether or not it was upon the correct boundary line between these two properties as the same is delineated by their respective deeds and as said fence stood before the lands of the one began to slide down upon the lands of the other. The evidence sufficiently discloses that from the time when the effects of this shifting quality in the surface of the soil of these lots became noticeable the fence was at times and places in a loose, wobbly, and falling condition, and that it was from time to time replaced by the respective parties without particular regard for its original line or location. The various surveys made by the respective parties after the troubles had been brought to court when they show the fence at all, show it to be out of alignment either from the effects of the slide or from the acts of the parties in making its several replacements. This being the state of the record, we are unable to determine where the fence did originally stand, and hence cannot hold that the parties ever acquiesced in a boundary line which would place the fragmentary parcels of land involved in this litigation upon the defendant's side of said boundary.

And for a like reason we are constrained to hold that the cases cited by counsel for the appellant, and more particularly the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 95 Pac. 888, Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 488, 119 Pac. 893, and Silva v. Asevedo, 178 Cal. 495, 173 Pac. 929, cannot be given application to the case at bar.

[3] This brings us to the final contention of the appellant, which relates to the effect of the judgments rendered for or against the parties in those several actions or proceedings—instituted by one or other of them during the years of litigation preceding the commencement of the present action. In none of these, as we shall see, was the precise question at issue which would have rendered the judgment therein res adjudicata as to the matters involved in this action. The first of these proceedings was that instituted by Catherine E. Gadsby, the predecessor of defendant F. L. Gadsby, wherein she sought to have her title quieted to the 25-foot lot described in her original deed. The trial court admitted the judgment roll in that case, but manifestly the judgment obtained therein would in nowise affect the present controversy.

[4] The next case was that of Gadsby v. Buckley, a case commenced in 1909, by the present defendant's predecessor, to enjoin the Buckleys from attempting to build a bulkhead along the boundary between the two lots, in which case the trial court by its judgment granted an injunction upon the defendant's failure to appear. The defendant in the present case offered the judgment roll in that case in evidence, claiming that it determined the boundary line between the parties in that action, and, hence, in this one. The trial court herein refused to admit such judgment in evidence, and of this refusal the appellant herein complains. A cursory inspection of the judgment in that case, however, shows that it concludes nothing tangible as to the actual location of the boundary line between these two lots or of the fence originally marking the same. It refers to the premises of the respective parties by house numbers, which, of course, sheds no light upon the boundaries, and it enjoins the defendants from building a bulkhead upon the plaintiff's side of "the line where the fence formerly erected by one Daniel Einstein formerly ran," or from "removing said fence and from placing the same in any other location than where it now is or formerly was"; but where said fence was at the time of said judgment or where the same "formerly was" cannot be ascertained from anything contained in said judgment roll. It follows that the trial court properly held that said judgment determined nothing decisive of the case at bar, and, hence, properly excluded the same.

[5] The next proceeding was that of Sophie Buckley v. All Persons, instituted in 1910, wherein the plaintiff sought to have her title quieted to premises, the description of which embraced within their boundaries the fragmentary parcels of land involved in the present action. The defendant in the present action appeared in that proceeding to oppose the effort of the plaintiff therein to include in said proceeding said fragmentary parcels of land, asserting that he and not the plaintiff was the owner and in peaceable possession thereof at the time of the institution of that proceeding; that cause came to trial and upon its submission the trial court rendered a judgment quieting the title of the plaintiff therein to those portions only of the premises described in her complaint and expressly excluding said fragmentary parcels of land, and as to these the trial court found that the plaintiff was not, but the defendant was, in the quiet and peaceable possession thereof at the time of the commencement of the proceeding. Further than this the trial court did not go, and decided nothing as to the ownership and right of possession of said fragmentary parcels of land, being evidently and correctly of the opinion that in that sort of special proceeding it had no jurisdiction over the title to the premises not shown to have been in the quiet and peaceable possession of the plaintiff when she commenced her proceeding. It will thus be seen that the judgment therein also concluded nothing material to the present controversy, unless possibly to determine that the defendant Gadsby was in the quiet and peaceable possession of the parcels of land in dispute herein on July 7, 1910, the date of the initiation of that proceeding. The appellant herein complains that notwithstanding the exclusion of said judgment by the trial court it has made a finding to the effect that the said appellant was not in the quiet and peaceable possession of the premises herein on July 7, 1910, contrary to the effect of said judgment, which he therefore insists should have been allowed in evidence. It is true that the trial court made such a finding, and it is probably also true that the trial court should have admitted said judgment in evidence for the sole purpose of furnishing proof of that fact, but the fact itself is immaterial to the issues in this case, since it sufficiently appears that the defendant Gadsby herein has never had such a quiet, peaceable, and undisputed possession of the premises in question for such a period of time as would have invested him with the title thereto by adverse possession. Whatever error the trial court may, therefore, have committed in this particular matter we hold not to have been prejudicial to a degree justifying a reversal of the case.

[6] Finally, the appellant contends that the judgment herein is fatally defective for the reason that it does not definitely fix the location of the boundary line between the parties. The trial court does, however, determine that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession of the premises described in her complaint, and it further decrees that said premises are referred to and described in two certain surveys which are part of the public records of the city and county of San Francisco, to which reference is made, and the trial court further describes the premises in dispute as being embraced within the exterior boundaries of that certain lot having a frontage of 25 feet on Twenty-Second street by a uniform depth of 100 feet 6 inches and which is described in said decree in the language of the plaintiff's original deed. We think that these several descriptions render certain said decree so as to enable an officer executing the same to definitely locate the premises in dispute.

We do not deem the other points urged by appellant sufficiently important for separate consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

VON DER KUHLEN v. HEGEL et al.

(Civ. 3475.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 16, 1921.)

Judgment 🔑253(1)—Recovery of moneys not asked for in prayer unauthorized.

No recovery can be had in an action to foreclose a mortgage for taxes alleged in the body of the complaint, or for 8 per cent. interest, where judgment for the taxes was not asked for in the prayer, which only asked for 7 per cent., under Code Civ. Proc. § 580.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Charles Von Der Kuhlen against Kate Hegel, a single woman, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles J. Kelly and D. A. Stuart, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. L. Sacks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant Kate Hegel appeals from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage executed by her to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $12,000 and interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly.

Defendants' demurrer to the original complaint was sustained, and thereupon plaintiff filed an amended complaint praying judgment against defendants "(a) for the sum of $12,000, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 19th day of October, 1918; (b) for the sum of ——— paid for taxes from the ——— day of ———, 191—," followed by a demand for attorneys' fees, costs, order of sale, etc. Upon entry of defendant's default for failure to answer, judgment was rendered against her for the principal of the note in the sum of $12,000, and interest computed from July 19, 1918, amounting to $441, and $120.22 for taxes alleged in the body of the complaint to have been paid by plaintiff. Section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint." Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 Pac. 1012.

And in Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 Pac. 1073, it is said:

> "The relief 'demanded in his complaint' is held to refer to the relief asked in the prayer—the feature of the pleading to which alone reference may be had in default cases, to ascertain what relief plaintiff seeks—and the rule of the statute applies in its strictness to actions of foreclosure alike with those of any other character."

Under the rule stated, plaintiff was not entitled to judgment for interest other than as demanded at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 19th day of October, 1918; nor, since no demand was made for any sum on account of taxes paid, was he entitled to judgment therefor in the sum of $120.22. It thus appears that in rendering judgment the court erred in allowing $441 for interest, when the amount should have been $233.33, and likewise erred in allowing $120.22 for taxes, the total of which is $327.89 in excess of the amount which should have been awarded to plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Replevin 🔑8(3)—Plaintiff entitled to possession against sheriff, unless latter showed better right.

Plaintiff, in possession of personalty in leased premises, not only under claim of ownership by purchase, but also by virtue of renting the property from its owner, was entitled to the property as against the sheriff, unless the latter showed a better right thereto.

2. Affidavits 🔑18—Appeal and error 🔑1051(1)—Affidavit of plaintiff as to abandonment of attachment lien inadmissible, but error harmless, in view of establishment of fact otherwise.

In an action for possession of personal property against a sheriff, in support of plaintiff's contention that the lien of attachment was lost by abandonment and surrender of possession of the property by defendant sheriff, plaintiff's affidavit to such effect was improperly received in evidence over defendant's objection; but the error was harmless to defendant, where the fact was otherwise established.

Action by A. Claude Braden against John C. Cline. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Culver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hahn & Hahn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action, wherein judgment was rendered for plaintiff and from which defendant appeals, grew out of the following facts: At a time when plaintiff, claiming to be the owner thereof, was in possession of certain personal property described in the complaint, the defendant, as sheriff, seized the same under and by virtue of an execution issued upon a personal judgment for money rendered in an action brought by Joseph Uhlein against Edward J. Sheehan, a nonresident, upon whom service was obtained by publication, and on May 16, 1918, the property was by the sheriff sold under execution to Uhlein. At the time of the commencement of the action, August 19, 1916, a writ of attachment was levied upon the property, of which Sheehan was concededly the owner. While it appears that the writ of attachment was duly levied upon the property, the court found that on September 16, 1916, the sheriff withdrew the keeper placed in charge of the property, which was located in a building owned by D. E. Myers and of which Sheehan was lessee, and surrendered possession of the building, together with custody of the property, and thereafter exercised no control over the same until May, 1918, when, after the lapse of nearly two years, he as sheriff again took possession of the property under the writ of execution so issued upon the judgment in said action. About March 1, 1917, plaintiff leased the building from Myers, and, through a purported agent of Sheehan, rented the property involved, paying $25 per month for the use thereof, up to February 28, 1918, when he purchased the same from D. E. Myers, whose title to the property was based upon its purchase at a sale thereof under an execution issued upon a judgment obtained by Myers against Sheehan. It is conceded by both parties that this judgment was void on its face, and hence Myers acquired no title to the property which he purported to transfer to plaintiff.

[1] Nevertheless, plaintiff was in possession of the property, not only under claim of ownership by purchase, but also by virtue of renting the same from its owner, Sheehan, and however weak his claim might be, he was entitled to the same, unless the sheriff showed a better right thereto. Since Sheehan was a nonresident, no enforceable personal judgment could be rendered against him; hence, if by reason of an abandonment of the attachment, the property was not subject to the lien thereof, the act of the sheriff in seizing the property was wrongful.

[2] In support of plaintiff's contention that the lien was lost by abandonment and surrender of possession of the property by the sheriff, his affidavit to that effect was received in evidence over defendant's objection. This ruling undoubtedly was error. Nevertheless, it cannot be deemed to have prejudiced defendant's case because facts are established by uncontradicted evidence which conclusively show that defendant had, at the request of Uhlein, surrendered custody of the property to another representing the attaching creditor, and that defendant had had no control thereof for a period of some two years before the levy of the execution issued upon the personal judgment so rendered against Sheehan in favor of Uhlein, during which period, extending from about March 1, 1917, to May 6, 1918, plaintiff had been in the absolute possession and control of the property, claiming the right thereto both as lessee of Sheehan and as purchaser from Myers. Whether or not the sheriff was justified in thus surrendering possession of the property so attached, because plaintiff refused to pay the compensation of a keeper, is immaterial. The important fact is that he voluntarily relinquished possession and control of the property, by reason of which the lien due to the levy of the writ was lost and possession of the property restored to Sheehan as completely as though the writ had been discharged by an order of court.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Landlord and tenant ⟹124(1)—Implication passing easements to lessees arises from necessity or intention.

Rights and easements may and do pass to lessees by implication; but, where the express words of the grant are insufficient, implication which supplies such words flows either from reasonable necessity, or, considering all the circumstances, from the manifest intention of the parties.

2. Landlord and tenant ⟹124(1)—Door, passageway, and toilet facilities held not appurtenant to restaurant premises.

Door, passageway, and toilet facilities in a hotel building held not appurtenant, on any score of necessity, to the adjoining restaurant premises leased by defendant, the owner of both the hotel and such premises, to plaintiffs, so that there was no implied easement preventing defendant from closing them to plaintiffs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Trefon Harrison and another against Mary Ziegler. From a judgment refusing injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for appellants.
H. V. Weisel, of Anaheim, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiffs, as lessees of a certain building used as a restaurant and café, seek to enjoin the defendant, the surviving lessor, from interfering with the beneficial use of the leased premises. A temporary restraining order issued against the defendant was dissolved upon the trial of the cause. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal, contending that the evidence amply supports the allegations of their complaint and entitles them to the relief sought.

The defendant, Mary Ziegler, is the surviving wife of John Ziegler, deceased, and is the owner of the Valencia Hotel in the city of Anaheim. This building has its main entrance on Center street, in that city, and the easterly portion of the ground floor of the hotel was formerly equipped for the purpose of and was used as a saloon until January 1, 1919. On or about February 1, 1917, defendant and her husband leased to plaintiffs for a term of five years, under a written lease, a building adjoining the hotel on the east side and next door to the saloon, which structure also has its main entrance on Center street, and in which premises the plaintiffs are conducting a restaurant known as the Valencia Café. The leased premises are described in the lease as "the room known as the 'Valencia Café,'" and the lease further provides that the lessees are to have and enjoy uninterrupted occupancy of said room known as the Valencia Café during the term of the lease.

The barroom in the hotel building extends back to a hallway, which also connects with the rear part of the lobby of the hotel, and from which access is had to a toilet and lavatory located in the rear of the building. At the time the lease was entered into there was and is now a doorway opening from the easterly end of this hallway into the restaurant premises of the plaintiffs. Upon the advent of national prohibition the defendant, in remodeling the premises formerly used as a saloon, planned to remove the toilet and lavatory, and sought to close, and had actually begun the work of closing, the hallway and door leading to the restaurant. Thereupon plaintiffs brought this action, seeking to enjoin the defendant from proceeding with the work.

No mention is made in the lease between the parties of the doorway opening from the hallway into the restaurant, or of the use of the doorway; neither is the use of the toilet and the lavatory room in the rear of the hotel premises by plaintiffs, or by their patrons, provided for in the lease. Appellants contend, however, that the hallway and the door leading therefrom into the café are appurtenant to the restaurant premises and were intended to be covered by the lease. They also claim that the washroom and toilet were reasonably necessary and essential to the enjoyment of the leased premises. In support of their position evidence was introduced, the effect of which was that during the negotiations leading up to the signing of the lease, John Ziegler, who appears to have been acting in the premises for himself and his wife, showed the plaintiffs the door leading from the restaurant premises, the passageway and the adjacent toilet facilities, and assured plaintiffs that they would have access to and use of the same and have the "same privilege as other people." Other testimony would indicate that there was no such express promise, but merely an "understanding" that certain "privileges" enjoyed by former lessees were to be "transferred." Some other features were discussed, including the use by plaintiffs of a sample room in the hotel for serving special parties. Ziegler also said that plaintiffs could use a part of the garage on the premises for a storeroom, when he did not want to put his car in there.

It is in evidence that at one time Mrs. Ziegler said to Gathas, one of the appellants, that if the plaintiffs desired to use the lavatory and toilet room, they should keep it clean, or it would be locked. Gathas replied that he did not care, and Mrs. Ziegler might lock the place, if she so desired. Harrison, the other appellant, testified that the passageway was more used by the hotel guests in patronizing the saloon than in using the restaurant. On behalf of the respondent it was further shown that practically all of the patrons of plaintiffs' café used the Center street door of the building, and a very few used the door opening from the restaurant into the rear passageway. Very few of the restaurant customers used the lavatory and toilet facilities in the rear of the former saloon. At the time of the trial ample toilet facilities had been constructed in the rear of the restaurant, and were easily accessible through the kitchen of the leased premises.

On this and other evidence the trial court found that only a small number of the guests of the hotel, who patronized the restaurant of plaintiffs, used the passageway and door in the rear of the lobby as an entrance into the café. It further found that the doorway entering into the hall from the restaurant was used by plaintiffs, their employees, and to some extent by their customers, in going to and from the toilet room and lavatory in the rear of the saloon, but that the use of these facilities by plaintiffs was unnecessary, for the reason that the restaurant is equipped with separate and adequate toilet and lavatory facilities. It also found that the use of the door between plaintiff's restaurant and the hallway of defendant's hotel is not appurtenant to the room leased to the appellants, and that the closing of the door and hallway will not cause plaintiffs or their restaurant business to suffer any damages. The application for an injunction was, therefore, denied.

[1] The use of the door, passageway, and toilet facilities was not expressly included, nor even alluded to, in the lease. Nothing whatever is mentioned but "the room known as the 'Valencia Café.'" Did the right to use the door, passageway and toilet facilities pass to the appellants with the room known as the Valencia Café by necessary implication? Rights and easements may and do pass to lessees by implication; "but, where the express words of the grant are not sufficient, the implication which supplies those words flows either from a reasonable necessity, or, considering all the circumstances, from the manifest intention of the parties." Hill v. Shultz, 40 N. J. Eq. 164, 166. In this case, as in that, the question is:

> "Since the parties did not adjudge it important enough to contract respecting the use" of the doorway, passage. and toilet facilities "in plain terms, is the necessity so strong as to make the demands of the appellants appear reasonable"?

[2] It is very clear from the findings of the trial court, which we think are amply supported by the evidence, that the use of the door, passageway, and toilet facilities in connection with appellants' business was merely a convenience, but is not necessary to the beneficial use of the property. The door, passageway, and toilet facilities are therefore not appurtenant to the restaurant premises, and there is no implied reason which will prevent the respondent from closing the same. Jemo v. Tourist Hotel Co., 55 Wash. 595, 104 Pac. 820, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 926, 19 Ann. Cas. 1199; Walker v. Clifford, 128 Ala. 67, 29 South. 588, 86 Am. St. Rep. 74.

FLOURNOY v. EVERETT et ux. (Civ. 3415.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, Division 1. Feb. 15, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷115(1)—Lease not fixing definite term created tenancy from month to month.

Written lease, evidenced by writing which was a mere memorandum, containing no statement of a definite term, but merely fixing the amount of rental to be paid, created a tenancy from month to month.

2. Landlord and tenant ⚷291(14)—Allowance of attorney's fees to landlord, where charge not asserted in complaint, erroneous.

In an action of unlawful detainer, wherein the complaint asserted no charge for attorney's fees incurred by plaintiff against defendant tenants, allowance of $50 on such account to plaintiff was erroneous.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷291(14)—In unlawful detainer, court could include in damages rental value for period after suit brought.

In an action of unlawful detainer, though the complaint only assigned default by defendant tenants in the payment of two installments of rent of $35 each, it was proper for the court, as damages, to include the rental value of the premises for the period after suit was brought up to the time of judgment.

4. Appeal and error ⚷907(3)—Evidence must be held to have sustained the finding upon appeal on judgment roll.

Where the appeal is on the judgment roll, and no evidence is exhibited to the appellate court for examination, it must be decided that the evidence sustained the findings.

Action by Jeanette W. Flournoy against E. E. Everett and wife. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. O. Graves, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Geo. E. Cryer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal taken by the defendants from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. Judgment was for the possession of certain described premises and for the sum of $268.50 damages, together with costs.

Plaintiff alleged in her complaint that defendants were tenants occupying a certain apartment in a building controlled by the plaintiff, and that the rental required to be paid was the sum of $35 per month, payable on the 13th day of each month in advance. She alleged the nonpayment of the rental accruing on the 13th day of December, 1919, and the 13th day of January, 1920. She alleged that on the 20th of December, 1919, she had served written notice on defendants, requiring them to pay the rent then due or deliver up possession of the apartment. Prayer was for restitution of the premises, for damages in the sum of $70, and that such damages be trebled in amount. Defendants answered, claiming that they had tendered the amount of rent due, and that the plaintiff, in violation of a written lease agreement, had attempted to increase the amount of rent. The cause came on for trial, and was determined by findings of fact filed April 28, 1920. Judgment was entered on the same day.

[1] It is the contention of appellants that certain writing introduced in evidence was in effect a written lease for a term from September 13, 1919, to September 13, 1920; that writing was a memorandum which contained no statement of a definite term, but merely fixed the amount of rental to be paid,

If in fact it was the intention of the parties to make the writing express a lease agreement for a definite term, the language is not certain enough to import such an agreement. We think that the trial judge properly held that the tenancy was one from month to month.

It is the further contention of appellants that certain findings are not within the issues made by the complaint, and that the findings do not support the judgment as entered. We confess that we are utterly at a loss to understand how a part of the items included within the court's findings were arrived at. In that portion of the findings wherein the amount of rental which had accrued is determined, the court's language is as follows:

> "Installments due December 13, 1919, $36; January 13, 1920, $36; February 13, 1920, $75; March 13, $75; April 13 to April 26, 1920, $32.50; 1920, $75; April 13 to April 26, 1920, $32.50."

The court further determined that the plaintiff had suffered damages on account of attorney's fees incurred, amounting to $50, and that defendants were entitled to a credit in the amount of $36 as having been paid by the defendants on February 24, 1920. The total amount calculated by the court as being included within its findings, except costs, was the sum of $268.50. Particular items found by the court to be due, which seem to be duplicates, or erroneously inserted, are the last two, to wit, the one reading "1920, $75," and the one reading "April 13 to April 26, 1920, $32.50." Taking the sum of the remaining items and deducting the $36 credit allowed from the amount leaves exactly the sum for which judgment was entered.

[2] The appellants properly complain of the allowance of $50 as for attorney's fees incurred by the plaintiff, this if for no other reason than that the complaint asserted no such charge against the appellants. If we concede, which we do not, that attorney's fees are recoverable in an action of unlawful detainer, it is plainly essential that the complaint should show that the plaintiff had incurred a liability on that account. Respondent insists that, as the court in its conclusion of law stated that the amount of the judgment "should be trebled," and as the judgment itself included only the amount of $268.50, appellants are not in a position to complain. We must assume, notwithstanding that the court determined first that the amount should be trebled, that a determination was later made not to treble such amount, and that the judgment as entered was entered advisedly. It has already appeared that the sum as totaled by the court in favor of plaintiff improperly included at least the item of $50 for attorney's fees. It is fairly inferable also from an inspection of the findings that the other two items to which we have referred could not properly find place in the computation as made by the trial judge.

[3] While the complaint only assigned default in the payment of two installments of $35 each, it was proper for the court, as damages, to include the rental value of the premises for the period after suit brought and up to the time of the making of judgment. Keyes v. Moy Jin Mun, 136 Cal. 129, 68 Pac. 476.

[4] As to whether the evidence sustained the findings, of course, must be decided in the affirmative, because the appeal is on the judgment roll, and no evidence was exhibited to us for examination.

For the reasons given, judgment is reversed.

Michael F. Shannon and Ernest L. Kolb, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action against Joseph Rittigstein and C. H. Phillips to recover damages for the malicious prosecution of a criminal action against this plaintiff. The action was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against both defendants. Judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict. Thereafter defendant Rittigstein alone moved for a new trial. An order having been entered granting that motion, plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

[1] Counsel for appellant first suggest that since the defendant Phillips did not move for a new trial, and the judgment against him had become final, there is no authority of law for an order granting a separate new trial of the action as against the other defendant. There is no merit in this contention. Fowden v. Pac. Coast Steamship Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178.

[2] Next it is contended that the uncontradicted facts so completely established plaintiff's cause of action against Rittigstein that the court has abused its discretion in granting to him a new trial. But in fact the evidence is not thus clear and uncontradicted. There is in the record evidence tending to show that both Rittigstein and Phillips were instrumental in causing the criminal prosecution to be instituted, and likewise some evidence tending to prove that Rittigstein did not have probable cause to believe that Preluzsky was guilty as charged. On the other hand, it was Phillips alone who filed the criminal complaint. There is evidence which might well have warranted a jury in refusing to believe that Rittigstein caused that prosecution to be commenced, and likewise in not believing that the commencement of such prosecution was without probable cause. On that state of the record it was within the scope of the duties of the trial court to consider and determine whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict. Where the court, in the exercise of its authority therein, has granted a new trial, and the case-made shows a reasonable or even fairly debatable justification under the law for the action taken, such action will not be set aside. Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019. The rule just now stated is plainly applicable to the case at bar.

The order is affirmed.

W. J. BUSH & CO. v. VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO. (Civ. 3495.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1921.)

Corporations ⚷503(3)—Motion of defendant corporation to change venue properly denied.

Where a New York corporation having an office and branch factory in National City, San Diego county, sued defendant, a California corporation having a legal residence and principal place of business in Los Angeles county, to recover damages for breach of contract by defendant's refusal to accept and pay for merchandise made for it by plaintiff at its branch factory, the suit being brought in San Diego county, defendant's motion for change of venue was properly denied under Const. art. 12, § 16, permitting suit against a corporation where contract is made, or where the obligation arises or breach occurs, or in the county of the corporation's principal place of business.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by W. J. Bush & Co., a corporation, against the Van Camp Sea Food Company. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, and Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action in the superior court of the county of San Diego against the defendant corporation to recover damages for breach of contract alleged to have been suffered by reason of the refusal of the defendant to accept and pay for certain merchandise. It was alleged that defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of California; that in August, 1918, it entered into a written contract to purchase the merchandise in question from the plaintiff; that it had refused to accept and pay for the merchandise, except a small portion thereof; and that the merchandise had not been resold. The difference between the value thereof to the plaintiff and the price agreed to be paid was stated to be the sum of $2,856. The written contract referred to was attached to the complaint as an exhibit and made a part thereof. The contract was dated at New York and provided that delivery of the merchandise should be f. o. b. National City. Defendant filed a demurrer, together with a demand for change of place of trial to Los Angeles county; it being asserted that that county was the legal residence and principal place of business of the defendant. An affidavit accompanying the demand was made by the president of the defendant corporation, in which affidavit it was reasserted that the principal place of business of defendant corporation was in the county of Los Angeles, and that it had no other or different place of business, nor any place of business in the county of San Diego. In opposition to the demand for a change of place of trial, an affidavit was submitted on behalf of the plaintiff wherein it was set forth that plaintiff was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York; that it had and maintained an office and branch factory in the city of National City, county of San Diego, state of California, and that the factory at the latter place manufactured the merchandise contracted for by the defendant, and that the merchandise was actually manufactured at National City by the plaintiff; that the contract alleged was to be performed at National City according to its terms. The motion was presented to the court and denied, and the defendant has appealed from the order.

The order made by the trial judge is fully sustained by the decisions of this state, wherein the provisions of the state Constitution relating to the place of trial of actions where corporations are involved are construed. Section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution provides as follows:

> "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs, or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

In the case of Trezevant v. Strong Co., 102 Cal. 47, 36 Pac. 395, where the contention was made that the corporation had the right to insist upon trial of an action against it in the county of its residence, the court said:

> "The Constitution, however, can receive no such construction. That instrument * * * gives to a plaintiff the right to sue a corporation in either of the counties therein referred to, and the option thus given includes something more than simply the bare right to choose the county where the complaint shall be filed in the first instance, and confers upon a plaintiff the right also to prosecute such action in the county where it is commenced, unless the place of trial is changed for some other reason than that of the residence of defendant."

And, quoting from National Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 498, 24 Pac. 159 the court further says:

> "By this decision it is settled that, where a corporation is sued in any one of the counties mentioned in this section, it cannot demand a change of venue, as matter of absolute right, but only as in other cases and for other reasons than that the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county."

Pertinent to the conclusion just announced are the cases also of Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 144 Cal. 205, 77 Pac. 918, and Hammond v. Ocean Shore Development Co., 22 Cal. App. 167, 133 Pac. 978.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

LOPEZ v. PAYNE, County Auditor, et al. (Civ. 3451.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 18, 1921.)

1. Officers ⚷95—Only de jure officers entitled to compensation.

The right of a person in an office to collect compensation for his services depends altogether on his de jure character, for the right to compensation is attached to the title of the office and not to the mere exercise of the functions thereof.

2. Sheriffs and constables ⚷28—Constable holding over held not de jure officer under rule of necessity.

One appointed temporary constable by the sheriff in a township in Los Angeles county, there being no established eligible list of civil service candidates, was not entitled to receive compensation by holding over after the expiration of 60 days and 20 days after an eligible list was created by the civil service commission; such appointee not being a de jure officer under the rule of necessity by reason of the demands of the community in the direction of having peace preserved on failure of sheriff to appoint a successor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by P. L. Lopez against H. A. Payne, as County Auditor of the County of Los Angeles, and others. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. J. Hill and Edward T. Bishop, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. J. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff prosecuted this proceeding to obtain a writ of mandate to compel defendant county auditor to issue to him a warrant upon the treasury of the county of Los Angeles for the sum of $274.84, alleged to be due and owing to plaintiff for services rendered in his official capacity as constable of the township of San Fernando. Three members of the county civil service commission were made parties defendant for the purpose of requiring them to make the necessary certificate of the fact alleged that plaintiff was entitled to the compensation demanded. There was a demurrer and answer, and, after hearing had, peremptory writ was issued in accordance with prayer of the petition. Defendants have appealed from the judgment.

It was admitted by the parties and found by the court that the office of constable of the township in question was one which was subject to the regulations of the civil service department of Los Angeles county, under the provisions of the freeholders' charter and rules of the commission made pursuant thereto. The county charter makes the sheriff of the county the head of the constabulary and gives that official power to appoint the constables. In the county charter and in those provisions establishing the civil service (article 9, § 34), authority is given to the civil service commission to make rules and to provide, among other things, for temporary appointments where no eligible list has been established by examination, and in that connection this provision occurs:

> "But no such temporary employment shall continue longer than sixty days, nor shall successive temporary appointments be allowed."

The civil service commission in making its rules adopted the following:

> "Whenever there are urgent reasons for filling a vacancy in any position for which no examination has ever been held, the head of the department may appoint some person to fill the vacancy to serve until an eligible list for such position is created and an appointment made therefrom, or until twenty days after such eligible list is created, if no appointment is made during the twenty-day period."

[1] Further facts important to the determination of the controversy are: On the 4th of January, 1918, there was a vacancy in the office of constable of San Fernando township, and, there being no established eligible list of civil service candidates, the sheriff appointed the petitioner to fill the place. Petitioner accepted the appointment and performed the duties of the office continuously until the 18th of August, 1918. After said appointment the civil service commission, in order to establish an eligible list from which an appointment to the office might be made, caused a competitive examination to be held (in which examination petitioner did not participate, although it is admitted that he had notice of the holding thereof), and on the 20th day of March, 1918, regularly certified such eligible list as being in effect, which list contained the names of three persons who were eligible for and willing to accept appointment to the office. The sheriff failed to make appointment from such eligible list, and the petitioner was allowed to and did continue to hold office up to the time before stated. Under the terms of the county charter the temporary appointment could be legally made only for a period of sixty days. Under the rule of the civil service commission the temporary appointment would expire by limitation 20 days after the creation of a list of persons eligible to be appointed to the office. It is for the services rendered subsequent to the expiration of the 20 days referred to that compensation was sought to be secured by this proceeding. There seems to be no dispute between the parties but that the holding over of the petitioner in office after the creation of the eligible list was a de facto officer merely, unless by reason of some rule of necessity a different conclusion should be enforced. Such a conclusion, if valid, must find its support in the argument that the demands of the community in the direction of having peace preserved in the township were of such paramount importance as to override the ordinary rule of law applicable to the condition. For it is settled beyond the possibility of debate by the decisions that the right of a person in an office to collect compensation for his services depends altogether upon his de jure character, for the right to compensation is attached to the title to the office and not to the mere exercise of the functions thereof. Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 Pac. 732; Anderson v. Lewis, 29 Cal. App. 24, 154 Pac. 287; Legerton v. Chambers, 32 Cal. App. 602–605, 163 Pac. 678; Norton v. Lewis, 34 Cal. App. 621, 168 Pac. 388.

[2] Respondent in support of his argument that the rule of necessity demands that petitioner be held to have been a de jure officer and entitled to compensation during the holdover period, cites the case of People ex rel. Stratton v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44. We have carefully examined the facts and reasoning of that decision. Its chief claim to respect would seem to be the fact of its considerable age, its having been decided in 1865. In that case the court actually held that a state librarian who continued in office after the term legally fixed by his appointment (there being no law expressly providing that the incumbent should hold until the appointment of his successor) was entitled to collect the compensation, for the reason that the state library was required to be kept open during certain hours and, if the plaintiff there did not see that it was open during the appointed time, it perchance might not be opened at all. Why the court should there have assumed that, upon the retirement of the incumbent and incumbering official, an appointment would not have been made to fill the place, we cannot understand. A board authorized to make such appointment existed and was possessed of the right to fill the vacancy. And what would be the result here if the trial judge can be said to have been correct in his conclusions? The result would be that any official affected by the county civil service regulations and having the power to appoint subordinate officers could, whenever the opportunity came to make a temporary appointment, continue his appointee in office until compelled by legal proceeding to act and perform the function with which the law invested him. We are not ready to conclude that this may be done, nor are we willing to assume that, had the petitioner here ceased to exercise the duties of constable of the township after the term of his appointment had ended, the sheriff would have been guilty of so grave a dereliction of duty as to leave the office unfilled. In addition to the fact that the sheriff was invested with the power to appoint the constables, there was imposed upon him by the charter the larger and more important duty as the head of the constabulary department of the county to see that the county was efficiently policed. The petitioner here was put upon notice of the limitation as to his appointive term. He declined to participate in the competitive examination, which might have resulted in establishing his eligibility to the office. His continuing in the service would seem to have been a mere act of speculation; a speculation upon the chance of a court lending its aid in nullifying both the charter and rules of the commission made to further the reasonable operation of the civil service system. In the case of the very plain provisions of the law we have no difficulty in concluding that the writ should not have been granted. While the point is not here involved, it should be understood that we do not intend to declare that the rule of the civil service commission can in any event have the effect to continue the term attached to a temporary appointment beyond the 60-day period fixed as a maximum limit by the charter.

PRIMMER v. C. C. HARRIS OIL CO.
(Civ. 3473.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 15, 1921.)

1. Mines and minerals ⚷118—Right of lessor of oil lands to use property without interfering with wells not taken away.

Under the lease whereby defendant oil company, sued for injuries when a storage tank collapsed, held the property from the lessor, held that the right of the lessor owner to make such use of the premises as would not interfere with the operation of two oil wells by defendant company was not taken away.

2. Evidence ⚷471(17)—Question properly excluded as calling for conclusion of witness.

In an action against an oil company for injuries when its storage tank collapsed, demolishing a building in which plaintiff child was sleeping, objection to question as to whether in making inspection of an oil tank it was necessary to dig under the earth to ascertain whether water has percolated through the oil and dirt was properly sustained, as the question called for the conclusion of the witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Una Primmer, a minor, suing by her guardian ad litem, Georgie Primmer, against the C. C. Harris Oil Company, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cates & Robinson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Peyton H. Moore and H. A. Massey, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, a minor, by her guardian, prosecuted this action against defendant corporation, claiming damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by reason of negligent act of the defendant. Verdict in her favor was returned by the jury, and judgment thereafter entered accordingly. This appeal, taken from the judgment so entered, followed.

At the time of the accident which resulted in the injuries complained of, plaintiff was sleeping in a small house located at the rear of a main dwelling on a lot in the city of Los Angeles. The whole of the ground was not of great extent, being of average city lot dimensions. Upon a portion of the lot were located two oil wells, which were operated by the defendant corporation under a lease from the owner of the lot, Mrs. Cummins, who was the grandmother of the plaintiff. A few feet distant from the small dwelling in which the child was sleeping was an oil storage tank belonging to appellant. This tank was elevated above the surface of the ground about 18 feet, and stood upon timbers which were imbedded in the earth. On the night in question it was discovered that the tank was overflowing, and members of the plaintiff's family were awakened. In a very short while, however, the tank collapsed upon its foundations, and demolished, in part at least, the building, in which the child was sleeping, burying the child under the débris, from which she was extracted with difficulty in a seriously injured condition. There was ample evidence to show that the supporting foundation timbers, under the stilts upon which the tank was standing, were decayed and in an unstable condition. There seems to be no real dispute as to the jury having had ample evidence of a competent kind to warrant the conclusion that defendant had not exercised ordinary care in protecting persons to whom it owed that duty from the possibility of injury from the collapsing of the tank. We will therefore give no further attention to that feature of the case.

[1] It may be further stated that it appeared in evidence that the plaintiff was occupying the house with her mother and as a part of the family of the owner of the lot. The question arises in the case as to what the character of the occupancy was, that is, whether plaintiff and her mother were on the property as of their own right or as mere licensees of defendant corporation.

In the latter case it is argued, and we think properly, that the rule of ordinary care which the trial judge imposed upon the defendant by his instructions to the jury would not apply. On the other hand, if it was sufficiently shown that the owner had not, by the leasing of the premises, deprived herself of the right to occupy for dwelling purposes that portion where the rear house was situated, then the instructions of the court were correct and the judgment right, unless there is merit in other questions suggested in the brief of appellant. We think that the trial judge correctly concluded as a matter of law that, under the terms of the lease by which the defendant corporation held the property from Mrs. Cummins, the right of the owner to make such use of the same as would not interfere with the operation of the two oil wells by appellant was not taken away. The lease itself, which was introduced in evidence, after describing the portion of the premises let, proceeded with this language.

> "And so much of that part of said lot lying south thereof as shall be necessary for the purpose of operating the two oil wells situated on said lot ninety-six. * * * And it is further understood and agreed that the second party's rights apply only to the operating of the two wells as hereinbefore mentioned (no other well being permitted on said lot No. 96)."

The main dwelling house to which we have referred was mentioned in the lease, but it seems to be conceded that that house was not upon the portion of the lot described in the lease. However, in corroboration of the idea that there was reserved to the owner of the lot all rights of use, except such as might interfere with the practicable operation of the two wells, C. C. Harris, who had been connected with the defendant corporation for about 11 years and up to March of 1914, testified as follows:

> "All the use we had of it, any use of the property, was just where the derricks stood. That was the only use we had for it. We had a cable crossing from the front of the lot to the rear of the lot, which was the only obstruction that we placed on their lot at all outside of the two derricks. With regard to her use of the remainder, I can't tell you how much of the lot she used. She had access to use any part of it that she cared to. She did use any part she wanted. They had shrubbery there, and I think they used any part of the lot they saw fit. * * * Whether the back portion of this lot was used by Mrs. Cummins, and for a chicken yard, and for the children to play in, I do not know that positive. I think it was. I think it was fenced in. * * * We did not go in on the lot at all. We had a tank there, and there is an alley behind. We pulled the rods from that alley, and pulled the other rods from the street. That is the way we operated the property. There was no occasion to go in except to repair this cable when it was broken. That rear fence was hers."

Not only would it appear by fair inference from the terms of the lease that Mrs. Cummins had the right to have and use the dwelling house at the rear of the lot, but from Mr. Harris' testimony, it would seem that that construction had been given to the lease by the parties themselves. The lease term commenced September, 1903, and continued for 5 years. After the expiration date in 1908, the lessees and their assigns continued to use the premises for the same purposes and under the same conditions as to rental, etc., and this condition obtained up to and at the time of the accident referred to.

One of the points made by appellant is that the court erred in not allowing a witness, Snyder, who was an employee of the defendant, to testify as to whether the company had given permission to Mrs. Cummins to construct the small house in which the child was sleeping at the time she suffered injury. The plaintiff's mother had testified that she had occupied the rear house for about 5 years previous to the accident; hence the house had been there for that period of time at least. The witness Snyder, to whom reference has just been made, testified that at the time of the trial he had been manager of the company for about 3½ years, but did not testify that he had had any connection with the company prior to that time, or any knowledge of conditions as to the construction of the dwelling house. However, the point of the alleged error is lost as to the ruling first complained of when it is observed from the record that the witness answered fully the first question asked of him before objection was made, and the answer was not stricken out. The second question was as to whether during the preceding 3 years, which was subsequent to the time that the small house was built, the defendant corporation had rented to plaintiff's parents any portion of the lot. The court's ruling in sustaining an objection to this question coincided with his theory of the case that plaintiff had the right to be in the dwelling house, which right was derived from the lease conditions themselves. We have already expressed the view that this position of the trial judge was correctly taken.

[2] Error is also assigned because of the ruling of the trial court sustaining an objection to a question which had to do with the matter of care exercised by the defendant in the management of the oil tank. The question was as follows:

> "And in making inspections of oil tanks where the earth is mixed with oil around the foundations, is it necessary to dig under the earth to ascertain—is it considered necessary to dig under there to ascertain whether water has percolated through the oil and dirt?"

The objection was that the testimony called for would be incompetent, and that it would constitute the conclusion of the witness. We think that the objection was rightly sustained. The witness might properly have been asked as to what could be observed upon the surface of the ground, and what could be observed by digging beneath the surface, but whether, as the question required him to say, he considered it necessary to act in a particular way, certainly was open to the objection made, for the answer would be expressive only of the witness's opinion or conclusion.

The complaint of the plaintiff was answered without demurrer, and it states the facts both as to the occupancy of the dwelling and the occurrence of the accident in concise and sufficient language.

We have carefully examined the record presented in connection with the points made and the argument of counsel, and no substantial error appears to support the claim for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 3428.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 16, 1921.)

1. Election of remedies 🔑14—One defrauded has election to rescind, or to affirm contract and sue on it.

A party who by fraudulent means has been induced to enter into a contract, as for the purchase of its capital stock from a corporation, may, on discovering the facts constituting the fraud, and by prompt action to such end, rescind the contract; on the other hand, he may affirm the contract, and recover according to its terms, but having brought action for rescission he has waived his right to recover on the contract itself, and cannot in such action enforce any of its terms.

2. Corporations 🔑82—Contract to repurchase property at any time may be enforced within reasonable time.

A contract of resale may be made in connection with a contract of sale of shares of stock, and a contract to redeem and repurchase such property "at any time" may be enforced if the purchaser elects to take advantage of the option within a reasonable time.

3. Corporations 🔑80(10)—Buyer of stock held guilty of laches in failing to rescind for fraud.

Under Civ. Code, § 1691, in view of the facts, purchaser of investment company's stock from the company held guilty of laches in failing to rescind promptly on discovery of the fraud.

4. Corporations 🔑80(10)—One in exercise of voting rights as stockholder not permitted to enforce right to rescind for fraud purchase of stock.

One who seeks to withdraw from a corporation under claim of right to rescind for fraud his purchase of stock from the corporation should not be permitted to enforce such right to rescind while at the same time exercising his voting rights as a stockholder, such action on his part constituting a ratification of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by John T. Fulmele against the Los Angeles Investment Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Warran D. Isenberg, of Los Angeles, W. A. Marin, and D. E. Keefe, of East St. Louis, Ill., for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, James Westervelt, Warren B. Pinney, Flint & Jutten, and Henry S. Mackay, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 19th day of December, 1912, respondent sold to appellant 361 shares of its capital stock and received a certificate therefor in consideration of the sum of $1,498.15 then and there paid. The complaint alleged two classes of facts which induced him to enter into this transaction: First, that respondent represented and stated that appellant could at any time demand and respondent would upon such demand being made, redeem and repurchase from plaintiff said shares of stock and return and repay to plaintiff the consideration paid therefor; also that respondent made sundry representations of fact which are set out in the complaint, each and all of which were false, and by respondent known to be false, but which were believed and relied upon by appellant. The complaint further alleged that upon about the 1st day of May, 1913, and on divers dates thereafter, the plaintiff in person demanded of the defendant the return of his money from the defendant, and tendered and offered to defendant said certificate of stock and everything of value received from the defendant; that the defendant refused to accept said shares and certificate of stock and refused to pay, etc. It was further alleged that on or about the 21st day of October, 1914, the plaintiff first learned that said representations so made by defendant and relied upon by plaintiff were false and untrue, and that immediately thereafter plaintiff gave notice in writing of rescission of said agreement for the purchase of said shares of stock. Upon the facts stated in the complaint, appellant prayed for judgment against respondent for the rescission of said contract; for judgment in the sum of $1,498.15 with interest, and generally for equitable relief.

By its answer, respondent denied the making of the promise and representations set out in the complaint, and further pleaded that plaintiff had notice and knowledge of the matters on which he bases his right to rescind at least as early as January 1, 1914, and that plaintiff has been guilty of laches and on that ground should not be allowed to recover, and further that by voting the stock at the annual meeting of stockholders of January, 1915, the plaintiff ratified the sale.

The findings of the court recite that at the trial the plaintiff commenced to submit his evidence and in part did submit evidence in support of the allegations contained in the several subdivisions of paragraph V and in paragraph XIV of his amended complaint, which are the allegations referring to said promise and representations and relating to the offers and demands alleged to have been made by the plaintiff as above stated. The findings further state that thereupon the court of its own motion ordered that before proceeding further with plaintiff's case the issue of laches and the issue of ratification be tried; that both parties submitted their evidence on said issues, which, after argument, were submitted to the court for decision. The court thereupon made its decision in the form of findings of fact and conclusions of law, whereby it was determined that the plaintiff take nothing by this action. Judgment was entered accordingly. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] It is evident that in the trial of the case the court regarded the action as one for rescission of the sale upon the ground of fraud, and disregarded those allegations of the complaint under which appellant now claims that by the terms of the contract of sale he had the absolute right to return the stock to the defendant at any time and have returned to him the consideration paid. It does not appear that appellant objected to this construction of the nature of the action, nor could he well do so. The two remedies were inconsistent. A party who by fraudulent means has been induced to enter into a contract may, upon discovering the facts constituting fraud and by prompt action to that end, rescind the contract, or, on the other hand, he may affirm the contract and recover according to its terms. Having brought this action for rescission, as by his complaint, and the relief demanded therein, he distinctly appears to have done, he waived his right to recover upon the contract itself, and cannot in this action enforce any of its terms. If at the trial the plaintiff had insisted that his action was based upon the contract as well as upon his claimed right of rescission, the defendant might well have required that plaintiff elect upon which of these two inconsistent causes of action he would go to trial.

[2] We do not doubt that a contract of resale may be made in connection with a contract of sale of shares of stock, or any other property, and that even a contract to redeem and repurchase such property "at any time," may be enforced if the purchaser elects to take advantage of such option within a reasonable time. Schulte v. Boul. Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013; Brooks v. Trustee Co., 76 Wash. 589, 136 Pac. 1152, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 594 et seq. But as we have seen, that was not the remedy demanded by the complaint herein, or by appellant at the trial. Viewing the action, therefore, as one to rescind a contract upon ground of fraud, and assuming that the evidence if fully presented would have established the alleged fraud in the contract and sale, the merits of this appeal rest wholly upon the view which should be taken of appellant's contention that under the evidence introduced he was not guilty of laches nor did he ratify the contract after discovery of the facts constituting the fraud.

Briefly stated, the alleged false representations were that the stock of respondent corporation was worth $10 or $15 a share; that the company had a guaranty fund of about $200,000 deposited in the Globe Savings Bank as a trust fund to be used in buying back the capital stock of the company from purchasers thereof; that said fund was sufficient to protect all purchasers buying said stock from loss; that plaintiff could rely upon the defendant repurchasing the stock at any time plaintiff should desire to resell it; that the corporation was paying certain large annual dividends amounting to 28 per cent. of the par value of its capital stock, which dividends were less than it was able to pay; that a certain published statement of the corporation's assets and liabilities was among the representations shown to and relied upon by appellant in purchasing said stock.

In June, 1913, appellant went to respondent's place of business and without any trouble resold to respondent 121 shares of stock of the corporation which he had purchased at the same time when he purchased the 361 shares. It appears from his testimony that early in the following month, or later in the same month, he requested respondent to accept from him the 361 shares and return his money to him under the contract. Respondent's officers told him that he would have to sign a card and take his turn and that he would be notified when his turn came; that the president of the corporation said to appellant, "If you have got to have money, you can take your stock down to the exchange and get $2.50 for it, but I would not advise you to do that because you paid $4.15, and we will have money for you in a very short time"; that it would not be many weeks or months before appellant could have his money. A day or two after that interview appellant left the state of California and was absent more than a year. In the fall of 1913 there occurred what is commonly known as a "run" on the Globe Savings Bank, and before the end of that year appellant received information not only of the run on the bank, but also of the fact that an association of stockholders of defendant corporation giving itself the significant title of a "protective association" had been organized. Before the end of the year 1913 he had sent to the protective association a proxy to be voted at the annual election of 1914. Having returned to Los Angeles about September, 1914, appellant attended meetings of the protective association at which the troubled affairs of the corporation were discussed. On the 21st day of October, 1914, he served upon respondent a notice of rescission (Exhibit A of complaint), wherein he disclaimed any right, title, or interest in the shares of stock and demanded the return of the money paid by him therefor, all on the ground that the contract was made upon false and fraudulent representations of respondent, made as an inducement to him to enter into the contract of purchase of the stock. Nevertheless, appellant afterwards, on the 12th day of November, 1914, signed and executed a proxy authorizing the persons named therein to represent him and vote his stock at the annual meeting of the stockholders to be held in January, 1915, and under that proxy said shares were voted.

When in June, 1913, appellant was informed by the officers of the corporation that he could not have his stock redeemed or resold forthwith, and that for the satisfaction of his demand he must await his turn, that fact alone was sufficient to warn any reasonable man that very probably the representation theretofore made to him that a fund of $200.000 was on deposit in bank as a trust fund to be used in buying back the shares of stock of small stockholders was untrue, and that sundry other of the representations upon which he had relied would prove to be untrue. Not only did he obtain further information of the same tendency while he was absent from California, but upon his return in September, 1914, he accumulated much further information of like character. Yet he waited until October 21st before attempting to rescind his contract upon grounds of fraud, and until December 8, 1914, before filing his original complaint in this action. In the meantime, although he had disclaimed all interest in the stock, he gave a proxy whereby he caused it to be voted at the next annual meeting of stockholders.

[3, 4] Upon these facts we are satisfied that the court was justified in sustaining both and each of said defenses of laches and of ratification. A party must rescind promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind. Civ. Code, § 1691; Marten v. Burns Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 1107; Brown v. Domestic Utilities Mfg. Co., 172 Cal. 733, 159 Pac. 163. And as to ratification: While the party entitled to relief may either avoid the transaction or confirm it, he cannot do both; if he adopts a part, he adopts all; he must reject it entirely if he desires to obtain relief. Any material act done by him, with knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, or under such circumstances that knowledge must be imputed, which assumes that the transaction is valid, would be a ratification. Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) § 916, p. 1914. In the same work, at section 964, it is said:

> "If the party originally possessing the remedial right has obtained full knowledge of all the material facts involved in the transaction, has become fully aware of its imperfection and of his own rights to impeach it, or ought, and might with reasonable diligence, have become so aware, and all undue influence is wholly removed so that he can give a perfectly free consent, and he acts deliberately, and with the intention of ratifying, the voidable transaction, then his confirmation is binding, and his remedial right, defensive or affirmative, is destroyed."

In Marten v. Burns Wine Co., supra, wherein the plaintiff sought to rescind a contract of sale to him of shares of capital stock, it appeared that on the same day when the plaintiff discovered the facts constituting the fraud, he was present at a stockholders' meeting of the corporation and voted for the levy of an assessment on its capital stock; that at a later day he attended another meeting of the stockholders, and afterwards paid the assessment as levied without objection. This was held to be in effect an affirmance of the contract, and the plaintiff was not permitted to disaffirm "after having with full knowledge of the fraud dealt with the subject-matter thereof under circumstances and to an extent that amount to a ratification." Replying to respondent's citation of that case on the matter of ratification, appellant seeks to differentiate that case and the case at bar in this, that there the voting at the meeting of stockholders was for the levy of an assessment, whereas this was only an annual meeting for the election of directors. But it does not require much imagination to realize that an election of a new board of directors of a corporation which is in such condition that its stockholders have deemed it necessary to organize a protective association, is a meeting the result of which may have important consequences to all stockholders. Under such circumstances, one who seeks to place himself outside the pale of the corporation under a claim of right to rescind the sale of the stock to him by the corporation should not be permitted to enforce such right to rescind while at the same time exercising his voting rights as a stockholder.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOLLOWAY v. HOLLOWAY. (Civ. 3488.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1921.)

1. Divorce 🔑37(22)—Husband's desertion not justified by wife's objection to husband's illicit relations with other women.

Husband's desertion of wife because of her objections to his adulterous and illicit relations with other women entitled wife to divorce, since her objections did not justify desertion.

2. Divorce 🔑12—That wife could have based action on ground of adultery did not preclude her from suing on other ground.

That wife might have based her divorce action upon the ground of adultery did not preclude her from suing for divorce on any other grounds prescribed as a cause for divorce under Civ. Code, § 92.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Lena M. Holloway against William H. Holloway. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed, with direction to enter decree for plaintiff.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff herein sued for a divorce, alleging that defendant, on the 25th day of December, 1916, willfully and without cause, deserted and abandoned, and has ever since said date, and for more than one year next preceding the commencement of this action, so continued to desert and abandon, her, without her will or consent.

Defendant made default, and upon trial of the case the court, on October 30, 1919, found that on December 25, 1916, defendant voluntarily left the common abode of plaintiff and himself "because of the plaintiff's objections to the defendant indulging in adulterous conduct with a servant," and that such "voluntary absence from the plaintiff has continued ever since said date. * * * The court further finds that the plaintiff did not refuse to continue to live with the defendant, but that the plaintiff remonstrated with the defendant over his conduct with other women, and from the evidence this was the cause of the defendant leaving the plaintiff." As a conclusion of law, the court found that plaintiff was not entitled to any relief.

[1, 2] It thus, we think, clearly appears that defendant was guilty of the desertion of plaintiff. The effect of the court's action in denying the relief prayed for was to hold that defendant's desertion of plaintiff was due to her fault in objecting to his adulterous conduct with a servant and remonstrating with him as to his illicit relations, and hence he was justified in the act of desertion. In this we cannot agree with the learned trial judge. While she might, as stated by the court, have based her action upon the ground of adultery, such fact did not preclude the assertion of the right to a decree based upon any other existing ground prescribed in section 92, Civil Code, as cause for divorce.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of plaintiff upon the findings.

PRINGLE v. CITY OF SANTA CRUZ et al. (Civ. 3708.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 14, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑209 — Presumption of rights of consumer arise where water company permitted use of water without collecting rentals.

Where a water company and city acquiesced for 40 years in plaintiff's free use of water, it must be presumed that such acquiescence followed from a belief that such use was conformable to the rights of plaintiff, and to the rights of his grantor, and it must be presumed that the transaction was not a gratuity, but was based on value received, and that the water company and city and their agents ascertained the facts, and did their duty in not collecting rentals therefor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 4, 15, 19, and 20.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑209—Burden on city to show plaintiff's use of water was permissive.

Where plaintiff had proved a continuous free occupancy and use of water for a period of 40 years, he established a prima facie case, and it then devolved upon water company and its successor, a city, to show that plaintiff's use was permissive, or without the knowledge of the water company and city, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑209—Finding that plaintiff's possession of water was not hostile not supported by evidence.

In an action against a city, restraining and prohibiting defendant from discontinuing plaintiff's service of free water, a finding that plaintiff's possession was not hostile held not supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Pringle against the City of Santa Cruz and others. From a judgment refusing an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. C. Kramer and Charles B. Younger, both of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

Geo. W. Smith, of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced this action to obtain a decree restraining and prohibiting the defendant city from discontinuing his service of free water which he had theretofore received out of a water main now owned by the city of Santa Cruz. The defendant answered, a trial was had on the merits, judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed. The plaintiff claimed a prescriptive title. The court found that the plaintiff's use was open, notorious, uninterrupted, and with the knowledge of the defendant, but that it was not hostile. The plaintiff contended, and now contends, that his use was hostile. The sole question involved is this:

> "Was the finding that plaintiff's possession was not hostile supported by the evidence?"

The record is very short, and contains no conflicts. Prior to 1868 Daniel Ross, the plaintiff's grantor, had owned and occupied certain lands bordering Branciforte creek in Santa Cruz county. About 1876 the Santa Cruz Water Company so constructed a water system that it took water out of the creek at a point seven miles above the Ross lands and led the water in flumes and pipes down the stream and piped it across the property of Ross. In 1878 the employees of the company tapped its pipe on the Ross land and connected a supply pipe of three-fourths of an inch in diameter. Thereafter, and continuously down to the date of the trial, Daniel Ross used that quantity of water on the land described in the plaintiff's complaint. The books of the company thereafter contained under the heading "Rate,' the word "Free." After Daniel Ross had been so using the water for some time the then president of the water company called at the house of Daniel Ross, and the occurrence was told by Mr. J. M. Ross in these words:

> "I heard a conversation between my father and A. W. Bowman concerning the receipt of this water. That conversation took place in the early part of 1880—I don't know just exactly the date. It took place in our front yard, right inside the property. Just as near as I can remember the conversation, father wanted an inch of water instead of the three-quarters, and Mr. Bowman agreed with him that that would be all right. Then he says, 'We will have that in writing,' and Mr. Bowman told him to go over to the office, but, before my father got to the office, Mr. Bowman was called to San Francisco, so it was never put in writing, but Mr. Bowman at that time agreed to give him one inch of water. My father was receiving water through a three-quarter inch pipe at that time."

At this point it should be noted that, if Ross was a licensee, enjoying such a bounty, it was quite extraordinary that he should request or demand that his benefactor should increase the extent of the benefaction. If the increase was to be an additional gratuity it was yet more extraordinary that Ross should then request that his benefactor should reduce to writing the extent of the gift.

[1] June 27, 1903, Ross sold the land to the plaintiff by a deed which was immediately recorded in Santa Cruz, and which deed contained a clause:

> "Together with all the water rights and privileges now owned, occupied, and enjoyed by the party of the first part."

That clause would indicate that Ross and Pringle each, in turn, claimed the water right as owner. The plaintiff had held the title to the land only about one year when August Hihn, president of the water company, called. The plaintiff described the visit as follows:

> "They came around and asked me to show my water right, August Hihn did, after I had been there. It was in 1904, and I showed him my deed with the water right in it, and they never bothered me after that."

That incident shows that the water company was advised that the plaintiff was claiming as owner, as the grantee of Ross. The incident was sufficient to put the company to further inquiry. From 1914 to 1916 R. B. Zieber was the collector of the water company before it sold out to the defendant city. While so acting he was advised by Mr. Hihn "not to make any effort to collect from this property; that they had a free water right." The use, under these circumstances, continued over 40 years. It was uninterrupted. It continued when water was plentiful and when it was scarce. The plaintiff says:

> "I had all I wanted to use at the time water was so scarce; I had plenty of water to use if I wanted to use it."

In addition to the small fragments of evidence contained in the foregoing there are certain disputable presumptions which we must bear in mind. As the record was made in the trial court, and as it stands before us, it shows no debt or obligation at any time owing by the water company to the plaintiff or plaintiff's grantor. On the other hand, from the year 1878 daily to the date of the trial, the duty rested on the agents of the water companies to charge and collect all rentals and account therefor to their stockholders. We must presume that the water company and its agents ascertained the facts and did their duty. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subds. 4, 15. We must presume that the transaction was not a gratuity, but was based on value received. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subds. 19, 20. We must presume that when the water company acquiesced for 40 years in the plaintiff's free use of the water, such acquiescence followed from a belief that such use was conformable to the rights of the plaintiff and to the rights of his grantor.

Let it be conceded that the burden of proving that his holding was hostile rested on the plaintiff (Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 133 Pac. 21), such burden was met by the testimony hereinabove set forth.

[2, 3] Moreover, when the plaintiff had proved a continuous free occupancy and use of the water for a period of 40 years as though he were the owner, he established a prima facie case. It then devolved upon the defendant to show that plaintiff's use was permissive or without the knowledge of the defendant. 15 Cyc. 125; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 12; Gurnsey v. Antelope Creek Water Co., 6 Cal. App. 387, 92 Pac. 326; Cheda v. Southern Pacific Co., 22 Cal. App. 373, 376, 134 Pac. 717; Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 518, 123 Pac. 294. The finding that plaintiff's possession was not hostile was not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

In re SEAMAN'S ESTATE.

SEAMAN v. BANK OF SAUSALITO

(Civ. 3764.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 16, 1921.)

1. Wills 🔑220—Creditor of testator not entitled to contest, but may resist probate in county other than that of residence.

A creditor of a decedent, as such, is not a person interested in the will, or entitled, under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1307, to contest its probate, but such creditor has such an interest in the estate that he would be entitled to resist its probate in a county other than that in which decedent was a resident at the time of his death.

2. Wills 🔑221—Creditor of testator entitled to have order of probate in wrong county vacated.

Where it is made to appear that a will has been admitted to probate in the wrong county, and that testator's creditor has been deprived thereby of opportunity to present his claim, and that he has made a timely and satisfactory showing, he is entitled to have the order of probate vacated and set aside to give him opportunity to be heard in the matter.

3. Wills 🔑355—Motions to vacate probate in wrong county made and determined on affidavits.

Motions by testator's creditor to vacate and set aside probate of the will in the wrong county whereby the creditor has been deprived of opportunity to present his claim are usually made and determined on affidavits alone as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2009.

4. Judgment 🔑348, 363, 373—Motions 🔑59 (1)—Judgment may be set aside for fraud, etc., independently of statute, when motion seasonably made.

A judgment or order may be set aside on the ground of fraud, mistake, or lack of jurisdiction independently of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, when the motion is based on such ground and is seasonably made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George B. Seaman, deceased. Motion of the Bank of Sausalito, a creditor of decedent's estate, to vacate order admitting his will to probate presented by Russell G. Seaman, executor. From an order vacating order admitting the will to probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the order granting the motion of the Bank of Sausalito, a creditor of the estate of George B. Seaman, deceased, to vacate an order admitting to probate the last will of deceased. The motion was based on alleged fraud practiced upon respondent by Russell G. Seaman, the executor of the estate, and also upon the grounds of surprise, mistake, and excusable neglect of the respondent and its officers caused by said fraud. The motion was heard and submitted upon affidavits filed on behalf of the respondent and upon its proposed verified answer. According to said affidavits, which were undisputed, the deceased at the time of his death was a resident of Marin county, and was indebted to the respondent in the sum of $2,500 secured by a mortgage on real property standing in the name of and belonging to the deceased and situated in said county, a proceeding to foreclose which had been pending for some time. It also appears that the will of the deceased was filed for probate in the city and county of San Francisco, and that the filing of the same there was fraudulently concealed from the respondent, the officers of which did not learn of the filing of said will until the time had elapsed for the filing of claims.

This is not a proceeding, as appellant appears to contend, to contest the will or its probate. Its purpose is merely to set aside the order admitting the will to probate so that the respondent may be heard on the proposition as to which county, Marin or San Francisco, has jurisdiction of the administration of the estate.

[1, 2] It must be conceded that a creditor as such is not a person interested in the will or entitled under the provisions of section 1307 of the Code of Civil Procedure to contest its probate, but it cannot be seriously doubted, we think, that such creditor has such an interest in the estate that he would be entitled to resist its probate in a county other than that in which said decedent was a resident at the time of his death. If this be true, it follows that where, as here, it is made to appear that the will has been admitted to probate in the wrong county, and the creditor has been thereby deprived of an opportunity to present his claim, and that he has made a timely and satisfactory showing, he is entitled to have the order vacated and set aside so as to give him an opportunity to be heard in the matter. Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 Pac. 91; Levy v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 590, 73 Pac. 417; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 Pac. 317.

[3] It is also established law in this state that motions of this kind are usually made and determined upon affidavits alone, as authorized by section 2009 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Van Loan v. Van Loan, 142 Cal. 423, 76 Pac. 37.

[4] The appellant also contends that the order appealed from was based upon the sole ground that the court has no jurisdiction to make the same, and that this is a denial upon all the other grounds specified in the motion, and that lack of jurisdiction is not one of the grounds included in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; hence not a valid ground for such motion. It is true that in the recitals of the order it is stated that the motion is based on the absence of jurisdiction to admit the will to probate. The notice of motion, however, was not so limited, and it appears to us on a reading of the whole order that this reference to the grounds of the motion, reciting one of them, was only intended to be a formal reference to such motion, and that the court's order thereon being, as it is, general in terms, may be supported by any valid ground contained in the motion. But, even if we construed the order as based on the ground claimed by the appellant, the point is without merit; for under the law in this state a judgment or order may be set aside on the ground of fraud, mistake, or lack of jurisdiction independently of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, when, as here, the motion is based on such ground and is seasonably made. Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 Pac. 232; Norton v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 36 Pac. 9.

The order is affirmed.
